the ground that if he succeeded in the action he would hold the money for his trustee in bankruptcy—that is to say, he would be a trustee for his trustee. I do not think that the plaintiff would hold the money as a trustee for his trustee in bankruptcy, inasmuch as the latter could only get the money by an order of the Bankruptcy Court. But, even if the plaintiff were a trustee, it does not follow that he is a mere nominal plaintiff. If he succeeds in the action, he may be able to fulfil, or approach nearer the fulfilment of, the condition imposed upon the grant of his discharge by the Bankruptcy Court. Therefore if he succeeds he will obtain a benefit, though no doubt his creditors will also obtain a benefit. Accordingly he cannot be said to be a mere nominal plaintiff. Upon all grounds the appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point taken was that the plaintiff was not the right plaintiff. The defendant, however, is estopped from denying the plaintiff's title. It was then said that the plaintiff is a bankrupt, and ought to give security for the costs of the action. In Rhodes v. Dawson the question of security for costs was fully gone into, and this passage from Chitty's Archbold, vol. 1, 14th ed., c. 33, p. 398, was cited in the judgment with approval:—"The plaintiff will not be compelled to give security for costs merely because he is a pauper, or bankrupt, or insolvent, and this even in a qui tam action. And this rule applies where the plaintiff is trustee of a bankrupt and is suing for the benefit of the estate; or where the plaintiff is suing as executor for the benefit of the testator's estate." That seems to me to lay down the rule correctly, and covers the present case. As to the last point, that the plaintiff is a mere nominal plaintiff, I entirely agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls.

Appeal dismissed.

Stokes v. Ducroz. (a.)

Inland revenue—Legacy duty—Real estate in foreign country—Lex loci—Partnership property—Conversion.

A testator, who died in 1880, and who at the time of his death was domiciled in England, had for many years previous to his death carried on the business of sheep-breeding in partnership with his brother, R. S., in New Zealand. Part of the partnership property consisted of a freehold estate in New Zealand, known as the Milbourne Estate. By articles of partnership dated the 14*th of February,* 1879, made between the testator and R. S., it was agreed that the Milbourne Estate should be forthwith sold in the manner which the parties should mutually agree upon, and the articles contained provisions for sale in case of no agreement and for carrying on the partnership. R. S. died in January, 1880. The testator was entitled to four-sevenths of the partnership property. No sale of the estate was made in the lifetime either of R. S. or of the testator. The testator by his will gave his four-sevenths in the Milbourne Estate to trustees upon trust to sell, with powers of management until sale, and subject to the payment of an annuity, and of the income of one-seventh to the widow of R. S. during her life, to divide the proceeds and produce until sale among thirteen charities. The Milbourne Estate had never been sold, but the income since the death of the testator had from time to time been paid into court in an action to administer the testator's estate which was commenced in 1881. Under an order made in the action in April, 1888, the funds then in court were divided, and legacy duty had been paid upon the moneys arising from the Milbourne Estate. The duty had been paid under an arrangement that it should be repaid if it was ultimately decided that it should not be payable.

The Governors of the London Hospital, who had been appointed to represent the other charities, presented a petition asking for distribution of the fund which had accumulated in court, without payment of legacy duty, on the ground that, inasmuch as it represented proceeds of sale of real estate in New Zealand, it was not subject to English legacy duty.

Held, that, as the testator's interest in the property was personal estate, legacy duty was payable according to the law of the testator's domicil.

Petition.

The testator, J. M. Stokes, for many years previous to and at the time of his death carried on the business of sheep-breeding in New Zealand with his brother, Robert Stokes. Part of the partnership property consisted of a freehold estate, called the Milbourne Estate, in New Zealand, the legal estate of which was vested in the two brothers as tenants in common. The testator was entitled to four-sevenths of the partnership property, and Robert Stokes was entitled to the remainder. Prior to the year 1879 the partnership business was carried on without articles of partnership.

By articles of partnership dated the 14th of January, 1879, and made between the testator and Robert Stokes, it was agreed that the whole of the Milbourne Estate should be sold forthwith without any unnecessary delay in the manner which the parties should mutually agree upon, and the articles contained provisions for the case of the parties not coming to an agreement, and for carrying on the partnership until sale.

Robert Stokes died on the 20th of January, 1880. No sale had then been made of the Milbourne Estate. The testator by his will, dated the 11th of June, 1880, gave and devised to trustees therein named his four equal seventh shares, and all other, if any, the estate and interest which he might at the time of his death possess or have power to dispose of in the estate known as the Milbourne Estate, upon trust, as soon as conveniently might be after his decease, to sell the same, and he expressly authorized his trustees to concur with the owners or owner of any other shares or share in the said estate in any sale or contract for sale and division of the proceeds thereof, or to concur in, or to procure a partition of the said estate; and he directed his trustees, subject to the purchase of an annuity of £100, to divide the residue of the proceeds of sale among thirteen named charities, one in New Zealand, one in Scotland, and the remainder in England, and that until the sale the trustees should receive his share of the rents and profits of the said estate and the produce thereof, and after payment of the said annuity should invest and accummulate the residue and hold it upon the trusts aforesaid.

By a codicil, dated the 18th of September, 1880, the testator repeated the devise to his trustees of his share of the Milbourne Estate, including the sheep and stock thereon, and he gave his trustees full powers of management until sale; and he gave the income of one of his four-seventh shares, and the proceeds thereof, to the widow of Robert Stokes for her life, and subject thereto confirmed the trusts of his will.

The testator died on the same 18th of September, 1880. He was domiciled in England at the date of his death.

In 1881 an action was commenced for the administration of the testator's estate, and the usual decree was made in March, 1881. By the order on further consideration made on the 30th of July, 1883, certain funds in court were distributed, and the trustees were ordered to pay into court from time to time the moneys received by them in respect of three-sevenths of the New Zealand estate until sale, and that the same should be invested and accumulated. By an order dated the 12th of April, 1888, it was ordered that a part of the Consols then in court, amounting to £7,597, should be applied in discharging a legacy, and that the legacy duty on the residue of the Consols should be paid, and the residue divided among the thirteen charities named in the will. This legacy duty was paid under an arrangement with the Treasury that it should be repaid if it was ultimately decided not to be payable. After the date of this order the trustees paid into court a further sum of £3,054, representing the income of the three-seventh shares belonging to the charities accrued since the former order.

This petition was presented by the London Hospital, who had been appointed to represent the other charities, asking that this sum might be divided among the charities without any deduction for legacy duty.

Rigby, Q.C., and Morshead, for the petitioner.—All property is not subject to legacy duty. Before the Act 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, legacy duty was payable on receipts. That Act, however, charged it on the property, but it still was charged only on mere personalty. The Act 45 Geo. 3, c. 28, s. 4, charges the duty upon any legacy charged upon real estate, and on the proceeds of any real estate directed by the will to be sold. It was originally thought that the question depended upon where the property was situate or was collected. The case of Thomson v. The Advocate-General, 12 Cl. & F. 1, however, established the rule that the question depends upon the testator's domicil, and that if he is domiciled in England, property collected abroad must pay duty, but the rule in such a case refers only to personal estate properly so called, and not to a legacy charged on land, in which case the lex loci rei sitæ prevails. The case of Forbes v. Steven, 18 W. R. 686, L. R. 10 Eq. 178, will be relied upon by the Crown, but that case only really decides that conversion for one purpose is conversion for all. That case does not apply to land outside the jurisdiction.

The following cases and text-books were referred to in the course of the argument:—Chatfield v. Berchtoldt, 20 W. R. 401, L. R. 7 Ch. 192; Freeke v. Carberry, 21 W. R. 835, L. R. 16 Eq. 461; Duncan v. Lawson, 37 W. R. 524, 41 Ch. D. 394; Matson v. Swift, 8 Beav. 368; Attorney-General v. Lomas, 22 W. R. 188, L. R. 9 Ex. 29; Attorney-General v. Hubbuck, 13 Q. B. D. 275, 32 W. R. Dig. 170; Attorney-General v. The Marquis of Ailesbury, 36 W. R. 737, 12 App. Cas. 672; Hayes & Jarman Concise Forms of Wills, 5th ed., pp. 25, 26; Davidson's Precedents in Conveyancing, vol. 4, p. 264; Jarman on Wills, 3rd ed., vol. 1, p. 4.

Vernon Smith, for St. George's Hospital.

Rawlinson, for the plaintiff.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—The case of Forbes v. Steven is indistinguishable from the present case. It has never been doubted, it has always been followed, and it is incontestably right in principle.

Rigby, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J. (after stating the facts, continued:—)—In the course of the argument I suggested for consideration whether the conversion by the agreement was absolute, and whether the land was or was not part of the capital of the partnership. My own impression is that both those questions must be answered in the affirmative, but I thought they deserved some consideration. Mr. Rigby has, however, argued the case upon the footing that they ought both to be answered in the affirmative, having regard to the questions which are raised as to the incidence of duty in the present case. I do not stop, therefore, to consider those questions further, but I come to the conclusion that the estate is subject to a trust for conversion, whether by reason of the terms of the agreement to convert, or by reason of the provision that the estate is to be treated as part of the capital of the business.

Therefore, we have an estate belonging as to four-sevenths to the testator, and as to the other three-sevenths to Robert Stokes. Robert died shortly before the testator, and the testator died in 1880. During the lives of the brothers no sale of the estate had taken place, and, in fact, no sale has taken place down to the present time. The testator, by his will, deals with this property by a description which treats four-sevenths of it as being his own. He treats his interest as being four-sevenths of an existing estate, but, for the purpose of division among the several legatees, it is intended that a conversion shall take place after his death.

The question is, whether legacy duty is payable "on this" estate before it reaches the hands of the residuary legatees. The contention is, that it is immovable property abroad—real estate abroad. No question arises by reason of any distinction between what is known as real estate in our law, and what is known as immovable property in the civil law, but the question is, whether this estate is subject to legacy duty.

The question has been argued upon the basis that the law of New Zealand deals with the devolution of this estate, that the will cannot operate upon the estate, except so far as it is a New Zealand will, and that, if the law of New Zealand relating to wills were different from the law of England, the court must have regard to the requirements of the law of New Zealand as to the execution of wills, and a will must be bad there if it did not comply with the formalities imposed by the law of that country, although it satisfied the requirements of the law of England, and was perfectly good here. Looking at the words used in the will, it is necessary to see what the testator's interest in the property was, and, in my opinion, the interest to which he was entitled was a share in the proceeds of sale of the property to arise from a conversion. If, under the agreement to convert alone, it would be simply a share of four-sevenths of the proceeds of sale after the necessary expenses had been defrayed. If it was by reason of a conversion proceeding from the estate being treated as part of the capital of the partnership, then it would be a similar share in what was payable to him, or payable to his legatees after ascertaining what his share of the partnership adventure was, by satisfying all debts and liabilities and sums that he had received on account, and so on. But, whichever way it is taken, it seems to me the words of the will describe and operate to pass the testator's interest under the agreement that he had entered into with his brother, by virtue of which he was entitled to receive, not four-sevenths of the estate, or four-sevenths of the proceeds, but a share amounting to four-sevenths of the surplus, after making all the deductions that were necessary in respect of expenses, and also bringing into hotchpot any advances that either of the brothers had received which ought to be set against his share. The result is, that what he disposes of by his will is his interest in the estate.

Then what is his interest? In my opinion it is personalty. It is not a share in the estate, the interest of which would have to be arrived at by New Zealand law, but it is a share in the sum available for distribution when the agreement between the partners, under which it is to be converted and the surplus divided, has been given effect to. Whether you call it personal estate or movable estate, it seems to me, I will not say a chose in action, because I do not think that is a very happy word to describe it, but it is the credit to which the testator is entitled in respect of the estate, which is, in my opinion, what passed by the will, and that credit is a right to receive a share of the proceeds of the estate, and also, if there was a partnership, the share of the partnership under the arrangement made with his brother. In my opinion that is not an interest in land, and it seems to me that Forbes v. Steven is conclusive upon that point.

Several arguments have been urged before me to show that the decision in Forbes v. Steven is wrong, and those arguments may be entitled to consideration; they are certainly entitled to consideration anywhere, but they may be more effectual before a court which has power to overrule Forbes v. Steven if it is wrong, but I have not that power at all, and all I can do is to give effect to the law laid down in that case if it applies to the present case. In my opinion it does apply.

The sole point for decision there was this, whether duty was, or was not, payable in respect of the proceeds of sale of certain land which was part of the property of a partnership in India. If, the land being in India, the proceeds of that land were an immovable, and to go accordingly, the duty ought not to be paid, but the court came to the conclusion that, although the land was in India, the land belonged to a partnership; it was subject to a trust to convert, and the interest of the testator in the property was in the proceeds of that conversion, and, that being so, that it was property subject to duty in this country. So in the same way that case, in my opinion, applies here. I must hold that, the interest of the testator in the case before me being in money arising after the sale of land actually directed to be converted, Forbes v. Steven is undistinguishable from the present case, and that case is binding upon me. Under those circumstances I have no course open to me but to follow that decision, and I must hold that the duty has been properly paid—that is the effect of it, I think—and that it cannot be recovered back.

In re WOLMERSHAUSEN.

WOLMERSHAUSEN v. WOLMERSHAUSEN. (a.)

Statute of Limitations—Acknowledgment—Payment by principal debtor—Principal and surety—Discharge.

Five directors of a company gave, in the years 1871 and 1874 respectively, two joint and several promissory notes to secure an advance to the company. The advance was also secured by a mortgage by assignment by the company of certain leasehold collieries. The company was wound up, and at that date a considerable sum was due to the lenders. The collieries could not be profitably worked. One of the five directors afterwards became bankrupt, and the lenders proved against his estate for the balance due on the promissory notes. This proof was afterwards withdrawn, in pursuance of certain complicated arrangements which the lenders had entered into for the purpose of relieving themselves from the rents and covenants under the colliery leases to which they had become liable, and a general receipt had been given to the trustee in bankruptcy. The lenders now claimed to prove for the balance due on the promissory notes against the estate of another of the signatories which was being administered by the court. This claim was first made in 1879.

Held, that the claim on the first promissory note was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The fact that the principal debtor, the company, had made payments in respect of the debt did not prevent the statute from running in favour of the surety, and an affidavit by the testator's representatives as to creditors' claims was not a sufficient acknowledgment to take it out of the statute. The receipt given to the trustee in bankruptcy could not release the other sureties, because, although a release to one of several joint debtors is a release to all, the liability became on the bankruptcy several only, and the release was, in consequence, given to one of a number of persons severally liable. Moreover, the receipt was not in fact intended to be a release of the whole liability, but merely a compromise of the claim against the bankrupt's estate.

Held, also, that the withdrawal by the creditors of their proof against the bankrupt's estate was a pro tanto discharge to the co-sureties.

The question in this case was as to the right of Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co., bankers, to claim in the action, which was for the administration of the estate of the late Mr. George Michael Wolmershausen, as creditors for £6,000 and interest due on two joint and several promissory notes.

These notes, which were dated respectively the 29th of July, 1871, and the 21st of January, 1874, were given under the following circumstances.

In the month of July, 1871, Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. advanced £25,000 to the Original Hartlepool Collieries Co. (of which the testator in this action was one of the directors) on the security of a memorandum of charge, dated the 29th of July, 1871, and expressed to secure the sum of £25,000 and further advances up to £10,000, on two leasehold collieries known as the Wheatley Hill and Thornley Collieries, and the company thereby agreed to execute when required a legal mortgage.

At the time of this advance Mr. W. Ford, one of the directors of the company, held a mortgage on these two collieries which he agreed to postpone to Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co.'s charge. Ford's mortgage also included a third leasehold colliery belonging to the company, known as the Ludworth Colliery, and the loose plant on the Wheatley Hill and Thornley Collieries.

The advance was further secured by the joint and several promissory note, payable twelve months after date, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, of five of the directors of the company, including Ford and the testator. This was the note dated the 29th of July, 1871.

On the 17th of April, 1872, a mortgage by assignment of the Wheatley Hill and Thornley Collieries, was, in pursuance of the above-mentioned agreement, executed by the company in favour of Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. The mortgage did not include the loose plant and machinery.

A further advance of £10,000 was subsequently made by Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co., which was also secured by a joint and several promissory note of the same directors. This was the note of the 21st of January, 1874.

In the beginning of the year 1877 a resolution to wind up the company was passed, and a supervision order was subsequently made. A liquidator was appointed on the 19th of January, 1877, with power to carry on the collieries, which he did until the end of June, 1881. Payments had from time to time been made by the company in respect of the advances, of which the last was in 1875, and at the date of the winding up £5,500 remained due on the promissory note of the 29th of July, 1871, and £4,500 on the promissory note of the 21st of January, 1874. Two further sums of £2,000 were afterwards paid by Ford in repect of the note of the 29th of July, 1871.

The testator died on the 17th of July, 1879, leaving the defendant his executrix. On the 31st of July the present action for the administration of his estate was commenced, and judgment was pronounced on the 13th of August in the same year. Advertisements were issued for creditors, and in October, 1879, Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. made a claim against the estate for £6,000, the balance remaining due on the promissory notes, and interest.

The defendant, in an affidavit with regard to the claims of creditors, dated the 13th of March, 1880, said:—

"3. I have in the paper writing now produced and shown to me and marked A set forth a list of all claims the particulars of which have been sent in to me by persons claiming to be creditors of the said George Michael Wolmershausen, or which have otherwise come to my knowledge.

"4.—I have examined the particulars of the several claims mentioned in the paper writing now produced and shown to me marked A, and I have compared the same with the books, accounts, and documents of the said George Michael Wolmershausen in order to ascertain so far as I am able to which of such claims the estate of the said George Michael Wolmershausen is justly liable. From such examination I am of opinion, and verily believe, that the estate of the said George Michael Wolmershausen is justly liable to the amounts set forth in the sixth column of the first part of the said paper writing marked A, and to the best of my knowledge and belief such several amounts are justly due from the estate of the said George Michael Wolmershausen and proper to be allowed to the respective claimants in the said schedule."

The exhibit marked A contained the following particulars of Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co.'s claim:—

Names of claimants.	Address.	Particulars of claim.	Amount claimed.
Barclay, Bevan, & Co.	54, Lombard-street.	Contingent claim in respect of mortgage executed by the Original Hartlepool Collieries Co. (Limited).	£6,000 and interest.

Amount further to be allowed uncertain.

On the 1st of July, 1881, Ford entered into possession of all the three collieries and he worked them until the 4th of April, 1884. On the 24th of June in that year a receiving order was made against him, and he was afterwards adjudicated bankrupt. Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. proved in his bankruptcy for £6,000. The rents of the collieries were then in arrear, and large claims were made by the lessors for breaches of covenant, and distresses were put in for rent, rates, taxes, and workmen's wages. Unsuccessful attempts to sell the collieries were made both before and after Ford's bankruptcy. On the 24th of October, 1884, an order was made in Ford's bankruptcy giving his trustee leave to disclaim the colliery leases, and on the 1st of November following, the trustee disclaimed them accordingly.

Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co., being now liable for the rents of the Wheatley Hill and Thornley Collieries and the performance of the covenants in the leases, entered into arrangements with a company called the Weardale Coal and Iron Co. and with the lessors and the trustee in Ford's bankruptcy under which the lessors, in consideration of large payments by Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. were to accept surrenders of the leases of all the collieries (including the Ludworth Colliery), and to grant new leases of them to the Weardale Co., and the loose plant was to be purchased by Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. from the trustee in Ford's bankruptcy, in whom it was then vested, for a sum in cash and an undertaking by them to indemnify his estate against certain claims, and to be handed over free of charge to the Weardale Co. After these arrangements had been carried out the trustee required Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. to withdraw their proof against Ford's estate, which they ultimately agreed to do on condition of the trustee handing over to them certain further loose plant. These transactions were carried out without the knowledge of any of the other parties to the two promissory notes, and there was no express reservation of rights against them.

A dividend of 2¾d. in the pound was paid in Ford's bankruptcy.

The loose plant handed over to Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. realized a little over £11. A dividend of about 2s. 6d. in the pound was paid in the winding up of the Original Hartlepool Collieries Co. No proof in that winding up was made by Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co.

In the meantime no decision had been come to with regard to Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co.'s claim in the present action. Two summonses were accordingly taken out, one by the plaintiffs on the 8th of July, 1885, and one by Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. on the 20th of April, 1887. The plaintiffs' summons asked that all proceedings in the action in relation to Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co.'s claim might be stayed until further order without prejudice to such claim, and that Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. might be at liberty to bring an independent action to establish it. Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co.'s summons asked that their claim might be allowed without further evidence. Both summonses were adjourned into court for the purpose of enabling the questions arising upon the claim to be disposed of, and now came on for hearing.

March 26.—[Stirling, J., stated the facts, and continued:—] The first defence set up by the respondent is one which applies only to part of the claim—namely, the £1,500 remaining due on the note of the 29th of July, 1871. No payment having been made on this note by the testator or his representatives, the right to sue on it primâ facie became barred on the 2nd of August, 1878; and it is on the claimants to show that something occurred to take it out of the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16). It was admitted that the testator himself did not make any payment or any acknowledgment in writing in respect of his liability under the promissory note. It was not contended—at all events, not very strenuously—that the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57) had any application. That question was decided in the negative by Kay, J., in In re Frisby, Allison v. Frisby, but was left doubtful by the Court of Appeal. If it were necessary for me to express an opinion upon it, I should follow Kay, J.

It was, in the first instance, contended that the affidavit of the defendant of the 13th of March, 1880, was a sufficient acknowledgment in writing to take the case out of the statute. Such an acknowledgment must, however, be one from which a promise to pay can be implied, but when exhibit A to the affidavit is examined it seems impossible to infer from such acknowledgment as is contained in the affidavit a promise to pay the whole of the £6,000, or such part of that sum as was due on the promissory note of the 29th of July, 1871. In reply this argument was not insisted on.

It was next urged that the payments made by the company on account of the debt, the last of which was on the 1st of June, 1875, had the effect of preventing the statutory bar. The law as to the effect of payment as it stood prior to the passing of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act is thus stated in the 5th edition of Lindley on Partnership (p. 261) :—"It was held that if one of several joint debtors paid any money on account of the principal or interest due from them all, such payment was sufficient to take the debt out of the statute, not only as against the person making the payment, but as against all the others jointly liable with him (for this Whitcomb v. Whiting, 2 Doug. 652, 1 Smith's L. C. is cited). But even before the Mercantile Law Amendment Act payment by a surviving partner did not prejudice the estate of a deceased partner (for this Atkins v. Tredgold, 2 B. & C. 23, is cited) any more than a payment by the executors of the deceased prejudiced the partners who survived (for this Slater v. Lawson, 1 B. & Ad. 396, is cited), for the executors of a deceased partner are not jointly liable with the surviving partners." It thus appears to be the opinion of the learned author that the doctrine of Whitcomb v. Whiting only applies to cases in which a joint liability exists, and that is in accordance with the view expressed by Holroyd, J., in Atkins v. Tredgold. In no case, so far as I have been able to discover, has it been held that where the liability arises from several promises a payment by one of the parties so severally liable prevents the statute from running in favour of the others.

Under section 14 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), one co-debtor is not deprived of the benefit of the Statute of Limitations by a payment made by another co-debtor; and it was held in Cockrill v. Sparkes that where a principal and surety give a joint and several promissory note a payment by the principal debtor does not deprive the surety of the benefit of this enactment. If, then, the company had joined in the promissory notes the payments made by it would not have prevented the statute from running in favour of the sureties. But it did not join; it was liable neither jointly with the sureties nor jointly and severally, but severally only. It would be strange if, after the passing of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, a payment by the principal debtor under those circumstances were held sufficient to prevent the statute from running in favour of a surety.

It was said, however, that it is a general rule of law that a payment by a principal—at all events, where the principal is a mortgagor of real estate—is sufficient to prevent a surety from obtaining the benefit of the statute. Of this rule in its more general form I can find no trace in such cases as Perham v. Raynall, 2 Bing. 306, and Wyatt v. Hodson, 8 Bing. 309, where the decision arrived at in Whitcomb v. Whiting was applied to the case of one of the co-contractors being a surety. In support of the proposition in its narrower form one authority, and one only, was cited. This was the concluding portion of the judgment of Fry, L.J., in In re Frisby, Allison v. Frisby, where he says :—"If we were to confine payment to a payment by the person against whom, or his representatives, the action is brought, I think we should be doing great injustice. It is usual for the mortgagor—not the surety—to pay the interest, and it would be contrary to good sense, to the common understanding of mankind, that while he is doing so the statute should run in favour of the surety, unless he makes a payment or gives an acknowledgment." In my opinion, however, Fry, L.J., did not in that passage lay down any general principle, but simply gave reasons why it might well be that, under section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, payment was not to be confined to a payment by the person against whom, or whose representatives, the action was brought.

It was further suggested that, as the testator continued to be a director of the company down to the time when the winding up commenced, he must be deemed to have authorized the company to make the payment on his behalf as well as its own; but, in my opinion, this is not a necessary inference from the fact relied on, and there is no evidence before me as to the circumstances under which the payments were, in fact, made by the company.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the claim on the promissory note of the 29th of July, 1871, is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The claim on the note of the 21st of January, 1874, was resisted on entirely different grounds. It was first said that the dealings with the trustee in Ford's bankruptcy amounted to a complete release of his estate, and operated to discharge his co-sureties. Now, it is undoubtedly true that where several persons are liable jointly, or jointly and severally, a release of one is a release of all. This principle, which is entirely independent of any doctrine peculiar to the law of principal and surety, is stated by Lord Denman in Nicholson v. Revill, 4 Ad. & E., at pp. 682, 683. In each case, however, it has to be determined whether what has occurred amounts to a release, and where, as here, no formal release is given, but what is relied on is an agreement not under seal, then in determining the effect of that agreement the surrounding circumstances and the intention of the parties must be regarded. This is illustrated by the cases of Watters v. Smith, 2 B. & Ad. 889, and Ex parte Good, 25 W. R. 422, 5 Ch. D. 46. In the present case what is relied on is an agreement entered into, not with Ford himself, but with the trustee of his estate. Now, by the bankruptcy of Ford, followed by his order of discharge, the liability of Ford on the note was determined, and the liability of his estate was substituted. That liability was in the nature of a several liability, and there was no longer any joint liability with the other makers of the note. That circumstance alone would prevent the application of the rule followed in Nicholson v. Revill as to the effect of the release of one of several persons jointly, or jointly and severally, liable. But this further took place; the creditors, Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co., were desirous of realizing their security to the best advantage, the trustee in Ford's bankruptcy was desirous of having a dividend, and Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co., agreed to withdraw their proof against Ford's estate. What was compromised was a dispute as to the right of proof against that estate, and everything points to this, that the agreement was not intended to affect the whole claim on the note, but merely the claim against Ford's estate, the rights against third parties being intended to remain unaffected. The nature and circumstances of the transaction appear to me to show that the benefit which the bankers received under the agreement with the trustee was not given by the trustee or taken by the bankers in discharge of their whole claim on the note, or with the intention of destroying their rights against the other parties to it. Consequently, upon the principles laid down in Watters v. Smith and Ex parte Good, the agreement did not operate to release the co-sureties. In my opinion, therefore, the decision in Nicholson v. Revill does not govern the present case.

This, however, does not conclude the matter. It still remains to be considered how the transaction is affected by the law of principal and surety. The question there is as to the effect of an agreement entered into, not between the creditor and the principal debtor, but between the creditor and one of several sureties. The cases appear to show that the creditor (1) must not act in a manner inconsistent with the contract or arrangements under which the obligation of suretyship was incurred; and (2) must not act so that the right of contribution between the co-sureties is destroyed or prejudiced. The case of Ward v. National Bank of New Zealand is an authority for this proposition. As an illustration of the first of the obligations I may refer to the case of Bonser v. Cox, 4 Beav. 379, and the second is laid down by Lord Eldon in Mayhew v. Crickett, 2 Swans. 185. In Ex parte Giffard the report, both of the facts and the judgment, is somewhat obscure. Lord Eldon seems to have held that, as was held in Watters v. Smith and Ex parte Good, a receipt given to one of several sureties who had jointly signed two promissory notes on payment by him of a certain dividend under a composition with his creditors, and expressed to be "for £191 and the two notes, which, when duly paid, will be in full of the said debt and all other demands," did not amount to a release to the other persons liable on the note. Although exception was taken in the cases of Nicholson v. Revill and Webb v. Hewitt to some part of the language made use of by Lord Eldon, the decision itself does not appear to have been overruled. The view I have taken of the decision is supported by the remarks of Parke, B., in Kearsley v. Cole, 16 M. & W., at p. 136. Lord Eldon also appears to have held that no relief could be given so long as the other co-debtors paid no more than the share of the debt for which they were liable—that is to say (as I understand it), that the co-surety was not discharged to any extent so long as his right of contribution was not taken away or injuriously affected.

In the present case, as I have said, the nature of the liability of Ford has been altered, yet that is the result of the law, not of any act of the creditor. The liability of Ford's estate was in the nature of a several liability. I have already said that the arrangement between the creditors and the trustee of Ford's estate was not intended to release or discharge the other parties to the promissory note, and the case of Wyke v. Rogers, 1 De G. M. & G. 408, shows that the law of principal and surety does not require that the reservation of rights against a surety should be the subject of express agreement, either written or verbal. I must, however, inquire whether any right of contribution on the part of the co-sureties has been taken away or injuriously affected by the transaction between Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. and the trustee. It was not contended that the right of the co-sureties to prove against Ford's estate has been entirely taken away; it was not disputed that, upon payment by them of what remains due on the note, they may still go in and prove against Ford's estate. The effect of the compromise, however, has been to prevent Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. from receiving the dividend which has been paid by that estate, and which would have gone in reduction of the claim against the co-trustees. To that extent the rights of the co-sureties are prejudiced.

It does not appear to me, however, that I ought to hold that the co-sureties are thereby wholly discharged. If by the act of the creditor a security, to the benefit of which a surety is entitled, is wholly or partially lost, the creditor is only discharged to the extent of the loss. This is illustrated by Wulf and Billing v. Jay, and is stated by Blackburn, J., in Polak v. Everett, 24 W. R. 365, 689, 1 Q. B. D., at p. 675.

It appears to me that the right of proof against Ford's estate was a security in the hands of Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. within this rule, that the extent of the loss caused to the co-sureties by the transactions entered into with the trustee is the amount of the dividends not received by Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co., and that the co-sureties are only discharged to this extent by reason of the dealings which took place between Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. and the trustee of Ford's estate.

It was next contended that Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. could only recover on the terms of bringing into account sums received from the Weardale Co. for loose plant and otherwise without setting off what they paid to the lessors in respect of their liability under the covenants contained in the leases of which they were assignees, and it was said that the sureties ought not to prejudiced by the form in which the mortgage was taken. The memorandum of the 29th of July, 1871, expressly provides for the execution by the Hartlepool Collieries Co. of a legal mortgage in such form as Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. might direct, and the sureties must be taken to have been aware of that stipulation. The form of mortgage chosen by Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. is unusual, but is within the terms of the memorandum, and I think that the sureties cannot be heard to object to it. Even if this be not so, there is another answer to the claim in respect of the money received or allowed in account for the loose plant—viz., that according to the terms of the leases the lessees were only entitled to remove that plant if they had first paid and satisfied the rents reserved by the leases, and performed and observed all the covenants and agreements therein contained. To secure the right to reserve the plant, the mortgagees (even if they had taken a mortgage by demise) must have expended sums largely in excess of the value of the plant, and I think that this contention fails.

Lastly, it was contended that the sureties were relieved pro tanto by reason of the way in which Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. dealt with their security. These dealings took place during two periods, the first from the commencement of the winding up of the company down to the bankruptcy of Ford, the second subsequent to the last mentioned event.

During the greater part of the former period—viz., from July, 1881, to July, 1884, Ford was in possession—and it appears that the bankers from time to time pressed him to reduce the amount due on the security, and that he did so to a substantial extent. During this period, namely in 1883, Ford, under pressure from the liquidator, paid to him sums which have been applied in payment of a dividend of two shillings in the pound to the unsecured creditors. It should also be mentioned that attempts were made in 1879 and in 1884 to sell the collieries by auction, both of which proved unsuccessful. And apparently the collieries were worked at a loss by the liquidator and by Ford. Now it was open to Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co., as secured creditors of the company, to take one of three courses—viz., (1) to realize the security themselves, and prove for the balance remaining due after deducting the net amount realized; (2) to surrender their security and prove for the whole debt; and (3) to value their security and prove for the difference between the amount of the debt and such value; and, further, they were entitled to exercise such option in the manner most advantageous to themselves.

For this Rainbow v. Juggins is an authority. Moreover, the case of Carter v. White shows that the burden of proving that any loss has accrued from the course taken lies on the sureties. That burden the representative of the testator has, in my opinion, failed to discharge. During the first of the two periods it is not made out, in my opinion, that the adoption of any other course than that actually taken would have been more beneficial to the sureties, or that Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co. were guilty of laches or failed to make the most of their security; and as to the dealings after the bankruptcy of Ford, the evidence seems to me to show that what was done was really the best that could be done under the circumstances. Stress was laid in argument on the large value attributed by Mr. Marley (under whose advice the bankers acted) to the loose plant in his first valuation. The estimate was not realized. Mr. Marley has, however, made an affidavit, in which he states that in his judgment the mortgagees could not expect to get better terms than they actually got, and that if they had refused those terms they would have incurred a much heavier loss, and no attempt has been made either to shake this evidence by cross-examination or to rebut it by the testimony of other experts.

In my opinion the claim on the note of the 21st of January, 1874, ought to be admitted, subject only to the deduction of the amount of the dividends which might have been received from Ford's estate.

Bonner & Co. v. Lyon and Another. (a.)

Married woman—Wife's liability—Evidence of separate property—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75).

In an action by certain jewellers against a married woman for jewellery supplied, the jury found that she had purchased the goods "on her own credit for her own use as her separate estate." According to the evidence, the only separate estate existing at the time of the contract was certain other jewellery previously supplied by the plaintiffs and a wardrobe of dresses, furs, and jackets, and there was no evidence of any separate property being subsequently acquired other than these.

Held, upon a motion for judgment, that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment, on the ground that such separate property was property in respect of which the married woman might reasonably be deemed to have contracted credit within the meaning of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and that the words "unless the contrary be shown," in sub-section 3 of section 1 of that Act, only admit of evidence of the fact of there being no such separate property in respect of which a married woman could reasonably be deemed to have contracted, and not of any intention, or absence of intention, of the married woman so to contract, at the time of making the contract or getting credit.

Leake v. Driffield, ante, p. 93, 24 Q. B. D. 98, distinguished.

Motion for judgment.

The plaintiffs, jewellers at Brighton, brought an action at Lewes Winter Assizes against a Captain Lyon for £144, the value of jewellery supplied to his wife. The plaintiffs had for some time supplied jewellery to the lady under the name of Mrs. Stanhope, which she bore previous to her marriage, and for which she had paid under that name, and they had continued to supply her subsequently to her marriage, of which they were at the time ignorant.

As against Lyon the action was dismissed upon the jury finding that the goods were not "necessaries." As against Mrs. Lyon the jury found that she, as Mrs. Stanhope, "purchased the goods on her own credit and for her own use on her separate estate."

The only separate estate as to the existence of which any evidence was adduced at the trial, was the jewellery previously supplied to her by the plaintiffs, to the value of £100, and her wardrobe of dresses, furs, and sealskin jackets, to the value of £175.

Denman, J., upon the finding of the jury, left the plaintiffs to move for judgment, on the ground that he doubted whether such separate property as alone had been shown to exist was of the kind contemplated by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882—i.e., property upon which a woman could reasonably be presumed to have pledged her credit.

Willis, Q.C., and Mackintosh, for the plaintiffs.—This is not a motion to set aside the finding of the jury. That finding is sufficient upon which to base a judgment in favour of the plaintiffs. So long as there is evidence of some separate property of the wife upon which she might have pledged her credit that is sufficient, under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, to make her liable for her own contracts, and judgment should be given against her in the form ordered in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120—viz., against "such separate estate of the wife not subject to any restraint on anticipation, unless, by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Women's Property Act, 1882, such estate be liable to execution notwithstanding such restraint."

Blake-Odgers and Marshall-Hall, for the defendant, Mrs. Lyon.—The question is whether a woman could reasonably be presumed to have pledged her credit at the time of the contract upon the clothes she wore or the jewels she had previously bought at the same shop: Leake v. Driffield, ante, p. 93, 24 Q. B. D. 98. No evidence of separate estate acquired since the time of the contract was adduced. Jewellery is not necessarily separate estate: Mercier v. Williams, 30 W. R. 720, 9 Q. B. D. 337.

Gill appeared for Lyon, the other defendant.

Grantham, J.—I think there clearly must be a judgment entered here for the plaintiffs. The only ground alleged upon which the judge thought it best to leave them to move for judgment was that he had some doubt whether the separate property here shown was of the character contemplated by the Act. The Act of 1882 refers clearly to "any real or personal property" as capable of being held by a woman as her separate property, and Palliser v. Gurney, 35 W. R. 760, 19 Q. B. D. 519, has shown the extent of those words. But she cannot be held to have contracted on her own credit unless the plaintiffs show that she had some separate property in respect of which she might be deemed to have contracted at the time of entering into the contract. It is clear that there was some separate property in her possession. Of what character? Apparently jewellery and dresses, including several sealskin jackets and furs. We know that there are people of a certain class who do spend large sums of money on jewellery and furs and such like, knowing that they can raise money upon their exchange if need be, or with the idea of exchanging them for other jewels, &c., when they get tired of them. At any rate, here is evidence of property to the extent of some two hundred and odd pounds, and I do not think we are bound by the decision of Leake v. Driffield to hold that such property was of such a nature that a married woman could not have intended to contract in respect of.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Whatever view may be taken of the decision in Leake v. Driffield, I think that there is nothing unreasonable in our presuming here that the lady in question might have contracted in reference to the separate property mentioned. I consider that the words in sub-section 3 of section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, saying that "every contract of a married woman shall be deemed to be contracted by her in respect of her separate property, unless the contrary be shown," were not intended to let in evidence of the intention of the married woman at the time of entering into the contract, but only evidence of the fact of the existence or otherwise of any separate property. The Act provides that a married woman shall be capable of entering into, and so of being rendered liable for, contracts in respect of her separate property. Sub-section 3 of section 1 is a corollary to, and not a limitation of, such liability. The words "unless the contrary be shown," in reference to her separate property being bound by her contract, should be, in my opinion, interpreted as "unless the separate property be of such a nature that such presumption (the presumption set up by the Act) cannot arise." Sometimes there may be separate property which, though not fettered by any restraint against anticipation, is yet of such a nature as to be practically inalienable. That was instanced in Harrison v. Harrison, 36 W. R. 748, 13 P. D. 180, as cited by Mathew, J., in Leake v. Driffield. But I cannot think that evidence of the intention, in fact, of the married woman at the time of the contract was ever contemplated as admissible under either of these last-mentioned decisions, but only evidence showing the nature of the property—whether it is of such a nature in respect of which she could reasonably be presumed to have contracted. I think there is ample evidence of separate property here upon which she could and might have contracted credit; and, therefore, that judgment must be entered for the plaintiffs.

ROGERS & Co. v. LAMBERT & Co. (a.)

Bailment — Title of bailor — Determination of — Jus tertii — When bailee estopped from setting up — Interrogatories.

In an action by bailors against bailees for non-delivery of certain goods,

Held, that the bailees were estopped from setting up the title of third parties, under whose authority they did not claim to defend, and to whom they had not delivered the goods, although the property in the goods might, as a matter of fact, have passed to such third parties since the date of bailment.

Appeal from an order of Charles, J., allowing the defendants to administer certain interrogatories.

The plaintiffs had purchased from the defendants a certain quantity of copper, paid for it, and left it in the custody of the defendants as warehousemen. The latter subsequently refused to deliver up the copper. An action for wrongful detention having been brought, the defendants pleaded a denial of the plaintiffs' property in the goods, and for the purpose of supporting that contention sought to administer interrogatories as to whether the plaintiffs had not resold the copper to a firm of Morrison, Kekewich, & Co., and had been paid the price, and whether they had not indorsed and handed to Morrison, Kekewich, & Co. delivery orders in respect of the copper.

The defendants were defending the action for their own interests alone, and without authority from Morrison, Kekewich, & Co., although the latter had commenced an action against them claiming delivery of the copper.

Charles, J., allowed the interrogatories, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Cohen, Q.C., and Mansel Jones, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants, as bailees, cannot dispute the plaintiffs' title to the goods. The defence, therefore, which these interrogatories are intended to support is not a good one, and the interrogatories are irrelevant in consequence. It is not enough that a bailee has become aware of the title of a third person, or that an adverse claim is made upon him, to entitle him to set up a jus tertii. He must also have the authority of the tertius to defend: Biddle v. Bond, 13 W. R. 561.

J. V. Austin, for the defendants.—The rule laid down in Biddle v. Bond does not apply to the present case. In Biddle v. Bond the bailor's title was denied at the time of the bailment. The bailee is not estopped from showing that the bailee's title had, as in the present instance, subsequently determined.

Cohen, Q.C., replied.

DENMAN, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. The defence aimed at in the interrogatories is that the plaintiffs have ceased to have any property in the copper, having sold it to third parties, and having endorsed the delivery orders to such purchasers. But assuming those facts to be true, it appears to me that they would afford no defence, for the mere indorsement of the delivery orders would not free the plaintiffs from their responsibility to their purchasers, and consequently the defendants are not relieved from their responsibility towards the plaintiffs to deliver up the copper to them, and thereby to enable them to fulfil their contract with the third parties. The defendants seek to get these interrogatories answered with the view of making out that, the property in the copper having been transferred to such third parties, they (the defendants) would have no answer to an action at the suit of the transferees to recover the copper, and that under the circumstances the proper persons to sue them would be the transferees, and not the plaintiffs. I think, however, that there is nothing to distinguish this case from that of Biddle v. Bond, where it was established that a bailee was estopped from disputing his bailor's title unless he claimed to defend under the authority in whom he alleged the title to be. There is no suggestion that such was the case here. I think that the learned judge's order must be reversed, and the interrogatories disallowed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Although this is in form an application to administer interrogatories, the case raises a much more serious question than the mere right to interrogate. The plaintiffs being the bailors of the defendants, and having the defendants' acknowledgment that they held the copper to the plaintiffs' order, had, in the ordinary course of their business, sold the copper to Messrs. Morrison, Kekewich, & Co., and indorsed to them the delivery orders which they had received from the defendants; and the question is whether, under those circumstances, the defendants are entitled to say that they will not deliver the copper to the plaintiffs.

No doubt if the defendants had delivered the copper to Morrison, Kekewich, & Co., in pursuance of the delivery order, that would have afforded a good defence to the present action, but no such excuse for the non-delivery of the copper to the plaintiffs is here set up.

The plaintiffs, through the conduct of the defendants, are exposed to an action at the suit of Morrison, Kekewich, & Co. for failure to satisfy their contract of sale to them. This liability of the plaintiffs to their vendees, in my judgment, leaves them a sufficient interest in the copper to enable them to maintain this action. The defence, therefore, to which the interrogatories are directed is no defence in law; and the interrogatories, consequently, not being relevant to any matter which would afford a good defence to the action, must be disallowed.

Appeal allowed.

"The Carisbrook." (a.)

Breach of contract of carriage—Transfer from county court having admiralty jurisdiction—The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 8)—Commencement of lay days where option of spot of discharge at port of arrival given to charterer — Demurrage — Practice — Delivery of pleadings.

A vessel laden with a cargo of 1,855 tons of coal was chartered to proceed to O., or so near thereto as she could safely get, and deliver the same to the freighters alongside any safe wharf, store, craft, steamer, depôt, ship, or arsenal, as ordered by receiver. Cargo to be discharged at the average rate of not less than 300 tons per working day, Sundays and holidays excepted, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said working days at 16*s.* 8*d. per hour, except in cases of strikes, lock outs, colliery holidays, strikes at mines where steamer is booked, detention by railway, stoppage of trains, accidents to machinery, or any other causes beyond the control of the charterers or receivers, or their respective agents delaying the due loading and unloading. Time for loading and unloading to commence when the steamer is ready and intimation has been given in writing. The vessel arrived in the harbour of O. on the* 16*th of November, and came to anchor there, but not in any usual discharging berth, and the same day the master gave the agents of the consignees of the cargo notice in writing of the ship's readiness to discharge. On the arrival of the ship, and up to the morning of the* 20*th of November, it was impossible for the ship to get alongside the quay at O. in any of the usual discharging berths for coal cargoes, which were all occupied, but the consignees, whilst such berths were all so occupied, ordered the ship alongside the quay, and at the same time informed the master that he would have to wait his turn. On the morning of the* 20*th of November the ship got alongside the quay and commenced to discharge. On the afternoon of the* 25*th of November the discharge was finished. The owners of the ship afterwards brought an action in the City of London Court against the consignees for demurrage under the charter-party, and the judge of the City of London Court, during the progress of the cause, ordered it to be transferred to this court. At the hearing of the transferred cause in this court it was admitted that the agents of the consignees knew, at the time when they ordered the ship alongside the quay, that all the berths there were occupied; that there was no other place for discharge of coal cargoes at O., and that there were no lighters available.*

Held, that the defendants were liable for the demurrage proceeded for.

Davies v. McVeagh, 28 W. R. 143, 4 Ex. D. 265, followed.

Semble, that, the consignees' agents having exercised the option given them by the charter-party, and ordered the ship to a quay alongside which she could not get, the lay days began to run from the time when notice was given of the ship's readiness to discharge on the 16*th of November.*

Where a case is transferred to this court under the 8*th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act,* 1868, pleadings must be entered into as in actions originally commenced in the Admiralty Division.

This was an action for demurrage instituted on behalf or Messrs. John Foster & Co., the owners of the steamship Carisbrook, against Messrs. Smales, Eeles, & Co., merchants, the consignees of a cargo of 1,855 tons of coal laden on board The Carisbrook at Glasgow and discharged at Odessa. The action was originally commenced in the City of London Court, but during the progress was transferred to this court under the 8th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868.

The action was now heard in this court before Mr. Justice Butt.

No pleadings had been delivered, and counsel, on behalf of both the plaintiffs and the defendants, submitted that the court should hear the cause on the evidence of the master of The Carisbrook which had been taken in the City of London Court and had been printed for the purposes of the hearing in this court; on certain documents put in in the City of London Court, and on admissions of facts agreed to between the plaintiffs and defendants for the trial of the action.

Butt, J.—I will hear this case as an exception without pleadings, but in future, in all cases transferred to this court under the 8th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, I shall require pleadings to be delivered as in actions originally commenced in this division.

The hearing of the action was then proceeded with on the evidence, documents, and admissions above mentioned.

The admissions in question were in the following terms:—

Admissions of Facts.

1. That the steamship Carisbrook was loaded by Messrs. Lietke & Co., at Glasgow, with 1,855 tons of coal pursuant to a charter-party dated the 11th of October, 1888, a copy of which is annexed hereto.

2. That the master by his agents signed a bill of lading for the said cargo of coals, a copy of which is annexed hereto.

3. That the said bill of lading of the said cargo was duly indorsed to the defendants, to whom the property in the coals passed by reason of such indorsement.

4. That due notice of the vessel having passed Constantinople was despatched on the 14th of November, 1888, and was received by the defendants or their agents at Odessa in due course.

5. That The Carisbrook arrived at Odessa laden with the said cargo at 9.15 a.m. on the 16th of November, and came to anchor within the Mole, but not in any usual discharging berth, and that at noon due notice of the ship's readiness to discharge cargo was given to the defendants.

6. That the ship was ordered by the defendants to proceed alongside the wharf or quay to discharge, where she afterwards did discharge. The said wharf or quay was the usual place for the discharge of coal cargoes at Odessa.

7. That at 11 a.m. on the 20th of November The Carisbrook got alongside the said quay. It was impossible to get there earlier, as she had to wait her turn before the harbour officials permitted her to go to the quay. That the defendants knew when they gave such orders that all the berths of the said quay were occupied, but there was no other place for the discharge of coal cargoes at Odessa, and there were no lighters available.

8. That the cargo was all discharged at 3.30 p.m. on Sunday, the 25th of November, 1888.

"CHARTER-PARTY.

"It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. John Foster & Co., owners of the good steamer called The Carisbrook, of Whitby, register measurement, 1,108 tons net, and 1,724 tons gross, ——— master, now on passage to Glasgow, and expected ready to load about 20th inst.; and Messrs. Lietke & Co., of Glasgow, merchants: That the said steamer, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, after discharging of present cargo, if any, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to a customary loading berth, as ordered, at Glasgow (general terminus), and there load coals in 84 running hours (from 6 p.m. Saturdays to 6 a.m. Mondays, and holidays excepted) from the agents of the said freighters a full and complete cargo of coals, about 1,900 tons, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture; and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Odessa, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same to the said freighters or assigns alongside any safe wharf, store, craft, steamer, depôt, ship, or arsenal, as ordered by receiver, on being paid freight at and after the rate of 7/7½, say seven shillings and seven pence halfpenny, British sterling, per ton of 20cwts. delivered or taken on board in charterers' option, same to be declared before the discharging begins. Cargo is to be discharged at the average rate of not less than 330 tons per working day, Sundays and holidays excepted, and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said lay days, at 16s. 8d. per hour, except in cases of strikes, lock outs, colliery holidays, strikes at mines where steamer is booked, detention by railway, stoppage of trains, accidents to machinery, or any other causes beyond the control of the charterers or receivers, or their respective agents delaying the due loading and unloading. Time for loading and unloading to commence from the time the steamer is ready and intimation has been given in writing. . . ."

"BILL OF LADING.

"Shipped, in good order and well-conditioned, by Lietke & Co., of Glasgow, but without their responsibility for freight and demurrage, being agents only, in and upon the good ship or vessel called The Carisbrook, s.s., whereof is master for the present voyage, Ebblewhite, and now lying in Glasgow, and bound for Odessa, eighteen hundred and fifty-five tons two hundredweights coal, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in like good order and well-conditioned at the aforesaid port of Odessa (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever, excepted), unto order or assigns. Freight for said goods to be paid by the consignees at the rate of ———, and all other conditions as per charter-party.—11th October, 1888."

From the transcript of the evidence of the master of The Carisbrook it appeared that an agent of the consignees of the cargo had, at Odessa, written across the notice of the ship's readiness to load, "Not accepted till steamer in berth," and returned it to the master of The Carisbrook, and that such agent had told the master of The Carisbrook that he would have to wait his turn, and, as soon as there was a berth, get alongside the quay.

Robson, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs rely on Davis v. McVeagh, 28 W. R. 143, 4 Ex. D. 265, and Pyman v. Dreyfus, ante, p. 447, 24 Q. B. D. 152, which decide that where a ship has proceeded to the place of destination named in the charter-party—in this case the port of Odessa—and the charterer has an option as to what spot in such place to order the ship, and delay is occasioned by the ship being ordered to a spot to which she cannot get, the lay days commence from the time when the ship is ready at the place of destination, prepared, as far as she is concerned, to go to any spot to which the charterers have the option to send her. It is the duty of the charterer, if he has an option as to the locality in the port of destination where the ship is to discharge, not to name a berth to which she cannot get to discharge within the lay days.

He also referred to Nelson v. Dahl, 28 W. R. 57, 12 Ch. D. 568.

Pyke, for the defendants.—Since the decision of the House of Lords in Nelson v. Dahl, 29 W. R. 543, 6 App. Cas. 38, doubts have been thrown on the correctness of the decision in Davies v. McVeagh. And in Murphy v. Coffin, 32 W. R. 616, 12 Q. B. D. 87, a case very like the present, it was held that, although the berth named by the charterer was occupied when the ship was ordered there, the lay days did not commence until the ship was moved alongside such berth.

BUTT, J.—I have no hesitation in this case in deciding that the charterer is liable for the demurrage claimed. The ship arrives at Odessa, and there is no doubt she was ready to deliver her cargo at any place in the port where she might have been properly unloaded by lighters. Instead of doing as he might have done, and arranging to unload her into lighters, the charterer chose to exercise the option he had of ordering her to a quay which was crowded with vessels, and to which she could not get. The charterer had a perfect right to do this, but he had also a liability to pay under the terms of the charter-party in the event of his so exercising that option, and ordering her to a berth to which she could not get. I think that this is what is really laid down by the Court of Appeal in Davies v. McVeagh, first of all by Brett, J., before the case went to the Court of Appeal, and afterwards, on appeal, by Bramwell, Baggallay, and Thesiger, L.JJ., and indeed I must say that the decision there come to is quite in accord with my own opinion of previous decisions.

I am asked, on the authority of Murphy v. Coffin, a decision of a divisional court of the High Court of Justice, to treat the conclusion come to by Brett, J., and the judges of the Court of Appeal in Davies v. McVeagh as of no value. The learned judges who decided the case of Murphy v. Coffin are not reported as saying that the principle of the decision in Davies v. McVeagh is not applicable to the case before them, but according to the report, they say boldly that they consider Davies v. McVeagh to have been wrongly decided because it is inconsistent with other cases and because the Court of Appeal's attention was not properly called to some of the facts in the case. With all deference to the Divisional Court who decided Murphy v. Coffin, I should be bound to prefer the judgment of the Court of Appeal even if I had no opinion of my own as to the correctness of the decision in Davies v. McVeagh. But I have a strong opinion that the Court of Appeal was perfectly well aware of the real facts of the case when it decided the case of Davies v. McVeagh.

I give judgment for the plaintiffs.

Held (Fry, L.J., dubitante), that the words "any insurance company" only apply to companies in the United Kingdom existing at the date mentioned, and subject to the jurisdiction of Parliament, and not to foreign companies outside that jurisdiction at that date.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

1. At a meeting of the commissioners, William Frederick Heddon appealed against an assessment of £62, under schedule D. to the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, for the year ending the 5th of April, 1887, made upon him, and claimed that he should be allowed, by way of deduction from the said assessment, the sum of £6 4s. 2d., paid by way of premium on an insurance for £300 effected by him with the New York Life Insurance Co. under the following circumstances:—

2. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 54, any person who shall have made an insurance on his life in or with any insurance company which should become registered under any Act to be passed in the then present session of Parliament for that purpose, and which should comply with the requirements of such Act, should be entitled to deduct the amount of the annual premium paid by him for such insurance from any profits or gains in respect of which he should be liable to be assessed under schedule D. of the same Act, or to have any assessment which might be made upon him under the same schedule reduced or abated by the deduction of the amount of the said annual premium from the amount of the profits or gains on which such assessment has been made.

3. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, reciting the last-mentioned Act, and reciting that (as it might happen that an Act for the registration of insurance companies might not be passed in the then present session of Parliament) it was expedient that the benefit of the recited provision should for a limited time be extended to persons insuring or contracting with such insurance offices as thereinafter mentioned, it was enacted as follows:—

"Any person who shall have made any such insurance or contracted for any such deferred annuity, as in the said provision mentioned, in or with any insurance company existing on the 1st day of November, 1844, or in or with any insurance company registered pursuant to the Act of the session holden in the seventh and eighth years of her Majesty, c. 110, "for the registration, incorporation, and regulation of joint-stock companies," shall be entitled to all the benefits and advantages which, by the said provision, are expressed to be given in respect of the like insurance or contract in or with any insurance company which shall become registered under any Act to be passed in the present session of Parliament for that purpose."

The provisions of the said above stated Acts were in force on the 5th of April, 1886.

4. By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1886, s. 5: "All such provisions contained in any Act relating to income tax as were in force on the 5th of April, 1886, shall have full force and effect with respect to the duties of the income tax granted by the Act so far as the same shall be consistent with the provisions of this Act."

5. In the year 1886 the said William Frederick Heddon paid to the New York Life Insurance Co. the sum of £6 4s. 2d., being one year's premium due to the said company in respect of a policy of insurance for £300 duly effected on the 5th of December, 1883.

6. The New York Life Insurance Co. was incorporated by special Act of the Legislature of New York dated the 21st of May, 1841, as a marine and fire insurance company, and extended by an Act of State dated the 18th of April, 1843, to life insurance.

7. It was contended by the surveyor of taxes on the above facts that the provisions of the various above-named Acts referred only to the insurance companies existing in the United Kingdom, and did not relate to the New York Life Insurance Co., and that Mr. Heddon was consequently not entitled to the reduction of the assessment claimed by him.

8. The commissioners, however, were of opinion that the New York Life Insurance Co. came within the provisions of the above-named Acts, and the said William Heddon was entitled to a reduction from the amount of his assessment of the sum of £6 4s. 2d. premium paid by him, and decided accordingly.

The Divisional Court (Pollock, B., and Hawkins, J.) held that the abatement provided for by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 54, was only applicable to policies effected with insurance companies in the United Kingdom and within the cognizance of English law, that the New York Insurance Co. was not such a company, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Against this decision Heddon now appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and Bremner, for the appellant.—The purpose of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91 was to extend the benefits granted to registered companies to insurance companies generally, pending an Act intended to be passed for the registration of the latter companies. Such registration has been subsequently applied to insurance as to other companies, whether foreign or not, "carrying on business in the United Kingdom." The New York Life Insurance Co. has an office in London and does so carry on business. The abatement was for the purpose of encouraging thrift. It would have been contrary to the spirit of the legislation of that time and subsequent years, and to the comity of nations, to restrict such benefit to English companies, and so to protect them against fair foreign competition for insurance business. The decision of the Divisional Court confines this benefit to English companies, to the exclusion of Scotch as well as of foreign insurance companies existing on November 1, 1844. A general word cannot be limited to English application unless expressly so limited—e.g., the word "author" has been held to include foreign authors in the benefits of copyright: Jeffrey v. Boosey, 4 H. L. Cas. 815, 3 W. R. Dig. 155; Routledge v. Low, 16 W. R. 1081, L. R. 3 E. & I. App. 100. The registration of companies was for the purpose of insuring their bona fides, not for the purpose of regulating them, which admittedly is out of the power of the Legislature in respect of foreign companies. It is admitted that a foreign company not existing on November 1, 1844, is excluded by the terms of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, but that is owing to the postponement of the proposed legislation as to the registration of insurance companies.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Dankwerts, and Griffin, for the respondents.—If the appellant is right the practice of the Inland Revenue collectors since 1852 would have to be altered. It has never yet been questioned. The object intended to be carried out in section 54 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34 was to encourage insurance companies to become registered, and so secure the benefit of this abatement for their customers. Registration was optional under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. The penalty for non-registration did not, as a consequence, take away corporeal rights from companies. The Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110) and the Inland Revenue Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34) admittedly only apply to companies within the United Kingdom, or only to foreign companies carrying on business in the United Kingdom. Scotch companies are expressly excepted from the Act of 1844, but are undoubtedly included under the Revenue Act of 1853, and so are entitled to the benefit given by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91 so long as they are either registered companies or existing on November 1, 1844. That date can have no reference to foreign companies, but to companies affected by the Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110) which came into existence on that date, and that Act is admittedly confined to companies in the United Kingdom with the express exception of Scotch companies. Afterwards, under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 18, s. 1, the criterion of companies, whether British or foreign, requiring registration is "the carrying on of business in the United Kingdom," but that test cannot be read back into the earlier Act. The subsequent legislation as to the registration of insurance companies only applies to companies within the United Kingdom. As to the encouragement of thrift argument, why should that encouragement be limited to foreign companies existing on November 1, 1844, and to no later companies? "Existing" companies means companies existing within the purview of English law.

Bremner, in reply.—Companies coming under the Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110) were bound to be registered. Foreign insurance companies would not come under that Act. Hence the two classes of companies mentioned under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91 as entitled to the benefit of this abatement—viz., those registered and those in existence on November 1, 1844.

May 12.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The appellant before us insists on his right to have a return made to him of a part of the income tax upon which he has been assessed, and has paid, on the ground that he had insured his life in an insurance company, and that he can, therefore, deduct from the assessment the amount of his annual premium paid to the company. The objection taken to his application by the Inland Revenue Office is that he has insured with a New York life insurance company, incorporated by an Act of the New York Legislature, which company, though having an office in England, is a foreign company; and that the privilege or right to such a reduction of a life insurance premium is confined to companies subject to the laws of this country. The Divisional Court held that this right to a deduction did not apply to a foreign company, such as this company is, although it may have been in existence on November 1, 1844.

Our decision, like that of the court below, must turn on the true construction of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, s. 1. That section confines the benefit of this reduction to insurers in "any company existing on the 1st day of November, 1844, or in or with any insurance companies registered pursuant to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110." Obviously, this company here has not been registered pursuant to that Act. The only question is, then, does it come within the meaning of the words of "any company existing on the 1st day of November, 1844"? It admittedly did come into existence in New York in 1841, therefore, it is argued by the respondent, it comes within the very words cited. Suppose that part of the section stood alone, with nothing else to modify or explain it, is it, or is it not, right to say that such general words, if standing alone in an Act passed by the Queen's Parliament here in this country, would include all foreign companies wheresoever existing? Of course, if we are bound to consider, that Parliament, by the language it employs, explicitly determines that it intends in any Act to include within its purview foreign corporations or individuals not within its jurisdiction or control, whether such action be in opposition to or on the ground of the comity of nations or not, the courts must obey. But, if it has not so explicitly determined, I am of opinion that the proper construction of general words in the Acts of the Parliament of the United Kingdom should be taken to apply to, unless clearly expressed otherwise, and to deal with such things as, within the description there given, are properly under the jurisdiction of that Parliament.

It is said that such a rule may be true where Parliament is dealing with the constitution and regulation of the thing dealt with under the Act, but it seems to me that an Act, unless expressly so intended, ought not to be supposed to deal, either directly or indirectly, in any way with any person outside the jurisdiction of Parliament. I hold, then, that the general words, even if standing alone, must mean insurance companies with which Parliament has some jurisdiction to deal, either directly or indirectly. If so, the main difficulty in regard to Scotch companies advanced by the appellant's counsel ceases to exist, for Scotch companies are undoubtedly companies with which the Imperial Parliament might deal. It is true that some difficulty in regard to Scotch companies remains in that under the Registration of Companies Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110), joint-stock companies in Scotland are expressly excepted from its operation, and therefore under the words "any company registered under the provisions of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110," in the 2nd clause of section 1 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, Scotch companies must be excluded, while under the same words in the 1st clause—namely, "any company existing on the 1st of November, 1844"—Scotch companies might, by the argument, be included. I, for my part, am inclined to doubt whether that part of the section does not now include Scotch companies as it stands. If so, the difficulty as to the Scotch insurance companies being excluded from the benefits of the section, by our holding that foreign insurance companies are so excluded, vanishes. At any rate, should any doubt remain after our decision in regard to Scotch companies, surely a very short Act admitting the Scotch companies to the benefits of the Act could be passed with little or no difficulty by the present Parliament in this session? What I have said applies to the words of the section if they stood alone—namely, that such general words, even if standing alone, should primâ facie be held only to apply to companies under the jurisdiction and subject to the control or direction of the Parliament of the United Kingdom—i.e., companies under English and Irish or Scotch law. But there are the further words "existing on the 1st day of November, 1844," given as a description of the companies to be affected. Will not these words give us a clue as to what companies were contemplated by the Legislature to be included under the benefits of this Act? Looking at section 58 of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, we find companies (including insurance companies) similarly so described. Does not the description "existing on the 1st day of November, 1844," in the second Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 91), taken in conjunction with the other part of the clause referring to companies registered under the provisions of the first Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110), amount to an allusion to insurance companies comprised in the first Act? In other words, the Act of 1853, by its descriptive terms, contemplates dealing simply with such insurance companies as were included under the provisions of the Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110). If so, it is obvious that only companies of this kingdom, and not foreign companies, were intended to be dealt with under the Act of 1844. It is suggested that the words "any company" may include any company having offices or carrying on business in England, but that is to add something not in the Act to the description given. General words must be taken, as I said at the beginning, to apply to something within the description given by them. To adopt the suggestion made would be to add descriptive words.

But we must keep to the ordinary rule of construction where the words themselves are capable of a reasonable meaning without adding on words which would give them another special meaning. Another reason can be given in support of the opinion which I have already expressed as to the meaning of these general words "any company," even if standing alone. After the words "existing on the 1st day of November, 1844," there comes a copulative not a disjunctive "or," under which the benefit of the deduction of the premium from income tax assessment is extended to persons who have insured "in or with any insurance company registered pursuant to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110." That description clearly points to insurance companies of the United Kingdom only. But, if the first description of companies "existing on the 1st of November, 1844," applies to foreign insurance companies, we should have to make this strange distinction between the meaning of the same words "any company" as applied to the two parts of the same section. These are some additional reasons why I think that the words ought to be construed in the way I have held they should be if they stood alone. The difficulty has arisen owing to the effect of section 54 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34 being left dependent on the passing of an Act for the registration of insurance companies during that same session. Clearly such an Act could only have contemplated companies of the United Kingdom. No compulsory registration could be enforced on foreign companies. Not having been able to pass this proposed legislation, and not wishing evidently to deprive insurance companies, which were to have been dealt with under the proposed Registration Act, of the benefit given by section 54 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, in respect of such proposed registration, is it to be supposed that the Legislature in their subsequent Act of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, passed for this supposed temporary purpose, should have so altered and enlarged the purview of the temporary Act as to include all foreign insurance companies, whatsoever and wheresoever, when such companies could not have been within the scope of the proposed permanent Registration Act in respect of the postponement of which this temporary Act was passed?

Other anomalies suggest themselves so as to strengthen my view that the general words, even if standing alone, would apply only to insurance companies over which Parliament properly had jurisdiction. These general words joined with the descriptive words alluded to point still more clearly to the same conclusion that only such companies as are within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of the United Kingdom were in the contemplation of the Legislature. The anomaly of Scotch companies being excepted from the benefits of this statute, if it does exist, and as I said before I doubt if it does, is explained by their having been expressly excepted from the Registration Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, to which 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91 refers, and by which reference we have construed the meaning of section 1 in the latter statute: but certainly such an anomaly is a less startling one than that suggested, by which the same words are made to include foreign companies all over the world in one part of a section, and to be limited to English companies in another part of the same section. I think this appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—After a careful study of the Acts bearing upon this section I feel bound to say I have not been able to come to any very certain conclusion. The statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91 provides for a certain exemption in income tax assessments. This exemption was to depend in the main upon a condition of registration, or proposed system of registration, for which the Legislature of 1853 had hoped to provide. It is possible that the Legislature would have given permissible registration to foreign insurance companies such as was given by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110 to Scotch companies carrying on business in England, but it is more probable that such registration would be confined to insurance companies constituted in accordance with the laws of the United Kingdom. However, what we have to consider is the meaning and scope of an Act intended to be temporary, but, owing to the failure of the Legislature in 1853 to pass the proposed Registration Act in regard to insurance companies, must be construed as it stands without reference to what such proposed legislation might or must have contemplated. The benefits of this Act are confined to insurers in two classes of insurance companies—one, such companies as were "in existence on the 1st day of November, 1844," the other, such companies as were "registered pursuant to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110."

Now all insurance companies existing in England and Ireland in 1844 were required by the Act of 1844 to be insured. It seems remarkable, therefore, that the statute of 1853 should expressly provide for the benefit of insurance companies which had broken the Registration Act of 1844 for nine years by neglecting to register themselves. On the other hand, if the words "existing on the 1st day of November, 1844," were intended to include foreign companies, it seems odd to confine the benefits of this reduction to foreign companies existing at that date and to exclude, as the words admittedly do, foreign companies constituted since that date. There is a difficulty in either construction. It is argued that the words "any existing company," if standing alone, would primâ facie be confined to companies of the United Kingdom. I do not follow the Master of the Rolls in his opinion on that rule of construction. I think we are bound, first, in construing general words, to look at the scope and object of the enactment. No doubt if the words as they stand might include foreign corporations, but if, as so read, they proposed to do anything which constituted a breach of the comity of nations, the words primâ facie would be held to be construable only in reference to corporations constituted according to the law of the United Kingdom.

But we have nothing to do with such considerations here. There is no matter dealt with here which is confined to companies in the United Kingdom. The Act is not concerned with the construction of the companies referred to. But although I am not able to agree with the general rule laid down by the Master of the Rolls, I feel the pressure of the difficulty of any construction of the section in the opposite sense. It would be very anomalous if the benefit were confined to insurers only in foreign companies existing on the 1st of November, 1844, and not in those subsequently constructed. It is best to take words in their literal meaning, but as the Divisional Court and my learned brothers in this court have given valid reasons why a confined meaning should be placed upon their construction, and as I do not see my way to give any certain decision owing to the anomalies made apparent upon either construction of the words, I do not desire to express any conclusion different from my learned brothers.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and had it not been for the doubts expressed by my brother Fry, I should have thought that the construction of this section in question was reasonably clear when once one had appreciated the purpose of the Act under review and the other Act to which it refers. The simple question for us is, Do the words "any insurance company" in 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, s. 1, include foreign companies? It is clear that, even if they do, they can only contemplate foreign companies existing on the 1st of November, 1844; and on what principle could it be alleged that only those should be entitled to the benefits of the enactment, and others coming into existence after that date should be disentitled? But there is really a great signification in those words "existing on the 1st day of November, 1844," taken together with the sequence "or registered pursuant to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110." This last-mentioned Act was declared to come into existence on the very date referred to, and was to apply to "every joint-stock company, as hereinafter defined, established in any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, except in Scotland."

This earlier Act clearly does not apply to foreign companies. The reasonable construction of the section in the latter Act, seeing that it gives the specific date of and directly refers to the earlier Act, is that the section had in contemplation solely those companies which were contemplated by the earlier Act, and the description might be read as "any companies which were in existence on the 1st of November, 1844, or have been registered pursuant to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110." If that is not the meaning of the section a different construction must be put upon the words "any company" according as they apply to the first part of the section or to the second. In the first description they are to include, and in the second to exclude, foreign companies. Again, why should foreign companies constituted after that date be excluded from the purview if the object of the legislation is to encourage thrift? Or, why should foreign companies, though not registered, be included, and English companies, unless registered, be excluded, from this legislation? These are some anomalies which would follow if the appellant's argument is to prevail, and I do not think they have been explained away by my brother Fry. It is true, and I feel the force of the argument, that this construction may leave another anomaly, as to the Scotch companies being excluded, but that, if it does exist, is, at any rate, a less forcible anomaly than the others consequent on any other construction of the clause, and it is one which can be easily cured. I believe, therefore, that the Legislature only contemplated in this section of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91 insurance companies amenable to the jurisdiction of the Parliament enacting it, that foreign companies were not intended to be included, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LISTER & CO. (LIMITED) v. STUBBS. (a.)

Principal and agent—Agent receiving commission moneys without the knowledge of principal—Investment of commission moneys by agent—Principal's claim to follow investments.

The plaintiffs employed the defendant as agent to buy goods for them. The defendant entered into a corrupt bargain with the vendor of the goods, whereby the defendant received, without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, sums of money by way of commission on the goods bought. The defendant had invested part of such commission moneys in the purchase of real estate.

Held (affirming Stirling, J.), that neither the commission moneys nor the investments representing the same, could be treated as the property of the plaintiffs, and that, though the defendant was liable to account to the plaintiffs for the commission moneys, yet that the relation existing between the defendant and the plaintiffs in respect of such moneys was only that of debtor and creditor, not that of trustee and cestui que trust; and therefore that the plaintiff was not entitled, either to an injunction to restrain the defendant dealing with the investments in question, or to an order that the moneys should be paid into court pending the trial of an action which had been brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant to recover the moneys.

Appeal from the judgment of Stirling, J., on motion.

Samuel Cunliffe Lister carried on business for a long period as silk manufacturer and spinner at Manningham, Bradford. In February, 1889, he sold the business to a limited company, which carried it on under the name of Lister & Co. (Limited). The defendant had for many years been employed by Mr. Lister as foreman dyer, and he continued to hold the same position under the company. This post was one of much responsibility, and the defendant was intrusted for some years with the purchase of dyeing materials used in the business, such materials costing annually a large sum. He received at the commencement of these proceedings a salary of over £500 per annum. The defendant, it was discovered, had for some time dealt in the purchase of dyes with a firm of dryealters, Messrs. Varley & Co., and had entered into an arrangement with them by which he had received large sums from them as commission on the goods purchased.

The company commenced an action against the defendant to recover from him the money received by him as commission from Varley & Co.; the present motion was to restrain him from dealing with, selling, or disposing of certain houses and property purchased by him, as the plaintiffs alleged, with the moneys received by him as commission.

It appeared that the arrangement between the defendant and Messrs. Varley & Co. was to this effect: accounts were made up monthly of the goods delivered to the plaintiffs, which had been paid for during the preceding month, and the commission was ascertained at various rates and paid by Messrs. Varley & Co. to the defendant, through one of the partners in that firm.

Stirling, J., dismissed the plaintiffs' motion for an an injunction.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Ashton Cross (Graham Hastings, Q.C., with them), for the appellants.—Varley & Co. received excess money above the price of the goods supplied by them to the plaintiffs, which they paid to Stubbs; this was received by Varley & Co. as agents of Stubbs, the servant of the plaintiffs, who, as Varley & Co. knew, was defrauding the plaintiffs. If a man, knowing that a breach of trust is being committed, receives trust moneys, the court will call upon him to account. [COTTON, L.J.—Stubbs did not receive the money from you; can Varley & Co. be said to be his agents? LINDLEY, L.J.—You are confusing ownership with obligation.] Before Stirling, J., the defendant relied on the cases of Metropolitan Bank v. Heiron, 29 W. R. 370, 5 Ex. D. 319; In re Canadian Oil Works Corporation, Hay's case, 24 W. R. 191, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 593; and Morrison v. Thompson, 22 W. R. 859, L. R. 9 Q. B. 480, but these cases are distinguishable. This is a case for an account, and if the plaintiffs can show that a balance is manifestly due to them, where accounts must be taken, that money should be brought into court: Jervis v. White, 7 Ves. 413; Freeman v. Cox, 26 W. R. 689, 8 Ch. D. 148; Porrett v. White, 34 W. R. 65, 31 Ch. D. 52; Dunn v. Campbell, 27 Ch. D. 254n; Wanklyn v. Wilson, 35 W. R. 332, 35 Ch. D. 180.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the respondent, were not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—This is a motion by way of appeal from Stirling, J., for an injunction to restrain the defendant from dealing with certain real property, and for an order to secure, by payment into court or otherwise, certain other property, partly a money balance, and partly money which is invested in some way or other. The defendant was in the confidential employment of the plaintiffs, and made a corrupt bargain with persons who supplied the plaintiffs' firm with dye stuffs. According to the statement, which was not answered, that was a most manifestly corrupt bargain. But does that make the sum which, in pursuance of that bargain the defendant received, the money of the plaintiffs? I think I took a correct view in the judgment which I gave—and which was referred to by Stirling, J.—in the case of the Metropolitan Bank v. Heiron, that this is not the money of the plaintiffs, so as to make the defendant a trustee of that money for them, but that it is money acquired in such a way that, according to all rules applicable to such a case, the plaintiffs, when they bring the action to a hearing, can get an order as against the defendant to pay that money to them. That is, that there is a debt in consequence of the action of the defendant, but it is not that the money which he has received in pursuance of that corrupt bargain is the money of the plaintiffs, treating that money as still the property of the plaintiffs which was handed over to the defendant by Varley & Co. for the purpose of paying a debt which was assumed to be due, and which was due on the contract from the plaintiffs, to Varley & Co. When the facts are found out, the plaintiffs will have the opportunity of setting aside that bargain altogether, and of returning the stuff, or I will not say they could not, setting aside the contract, have sued Varley & Co. for this sum which they fraudulently agreed to hand over, and did hand over, to the defendant. But, in my opinion, it cannot be said that this sum which, under the corrupt bargain, was paid by Varley & Co. to Stubbs, remains the money of the plaintiffs before any such judgment or decree has been made. I know of no case, where because it is highly probable if the action were brought to trial the plaintiff could establish there was a debt due to him by the defendant, the defendant has been ordered to give security, till that has been established by the judgment or decree. The plaintiffs might apply, if so advised, for an immediate order under order 14, and then, if the defendant applied to defend, he could only do so upon such terms as the judge might think reasonable. But that is not the course which has been taken. In my opinion we cannot hold, however corrupt the bargain was, that the money was the money of the plaintiffs.

Hay's case was very different. There Hay himself was a director of the plaintiff company, and he had drawn cheques which purported to be drawn in order to pay for certain property to be bought by the company, but in fact one of those cheques was not drawn for any such purpose. It was drawn for the purpose of being paid to Hay to enable him to pay for his shares. That is a very different thing. There Hay, the director of the company, had received this ostensibly for a particular purpose, but then he did apply it, and knew it was intended to be applied, to an entirely different purpose, which was, as against the plaintiff company, fraudulent. That being so, the judges were quite right in holding that that cheque was still to be considered the money of the company, and therefore that the mere payment of that cheque in discharge of the calls on the shares was nothing but merely paying the company with its own money the claim which the company had, and therefore that Hay was still liable to pay it. Therefore I think the first ground, and the main ground, cannot avail the plaintiffs.

Then there is said to be a second point—namely, that there is such an admission here that this sum of money is due by the defendant that we ought to order it into court. Why? As security for the debt which, primâ facie, the plaintiff will make out is due to him? As I say, there is no case at all for anything of that sort being done, unless it is done as a condition of allowing the debtor to defend. But that is not the case here.

Then there were a number of cases cited which were cases where a trustee was held liable to pay into court a sum of money which, primâ facie, was due from him as a trustee to the cestui que trust. But, if the first point is, as in my opinion it is, wrong, those cases will not in any way help the plaintiff here, because they all depend on the money being money held by a trustee for the plaintiff. The only question really discussed in those cases was whether there was a sufficient admission to enable the court to deal in that way with the trustee, and to order him, when it was established there was a sufficient admission, to pay the money into court. But here, if this is not the money of the plaintiff, we should be ordering the defendant to pay into court a sum of money which he has in his possession, simply because there is a primâ facie case against the defendant that at the hearing it will be established he owes the money to the plaintiffs. I will not go through the cases which have been cited to us by Mr. Cross, but it would be, in my opinion, introducing an entirely wrong principle, which we ought not to do, even though we think it would be highly just if we look to the circumstances of the case, were we to hold that the defendant should be ordered to give such security as the plaintiffs ask for.

In my opinion the appeal fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—If we were to accede to this application, I do not think Stubbs could complain, but the question is whether we can do it properly having regard to the rules by which we are governed. I am clearly of opinion that we cannot. It is a temptation to us to stretch the law to an extent which, if we did, would, in my judgment, entail very alarming consequences. What is the real state of the case as between Lister & Co., Varley & Co., and Stubbs? Lister & Co. buy goods of Varley & Co. at certain prices, and pay for them. The ownership of the goods, of course, is in Lister & Co. The ownership of the money is in Varley & Co. So far there is no difficulty about it. Varley & Co. enter into an agreement with Stubbs, who orders the goods, to give Stubbs a commission. That is what it comes to. What is the legal position between Varley & Co. and Stubbs? Varley & Co. owe Stubbs the money. Stubbs can recover it from Varley & Co., I suppose, by an action, but Mr. Cross has asked us to stretch that, and to say that Varley & Co. are Stubbs' agents in getting it. That appears to me to be an entire mistake. The relation between Varley & Co. and Stubbs is that of debtor and creditor—Varley & Co. pay Stubbs. Then comes the question, as between Lister & Co. and Stubbs, who is entitled—the question whether Stubbs can keep the money without accounting for it. Obviously not. I apprehend that he must account for that money, or is liable to account for it, the moment he gets it. It is an obligation to pay and account to the company, with or without interest, as the case may be. I say nothing at all about that. But it is a relation of debtor and creditor; it is not the relation of trustee and cestui que trust. We are asked to hold that it is the latter, which would involve consequences which I confess startle me. One consequence would, of course, be that, if Stubbs were to become bankrupt, this property, into which the money has gone, would be withdrawn from the mass of his creditors and handed over bodily to Lister & Co. Can that be right? Another consequence would be that if Mr. Crackanthorpe and Mr. Cross are right, this company can compel Stubbs to account to them, not only for the money with interest, but for all the profits which he had made by embarking in trade with it. Can that be right? It appears to me that those consequences show there is some flaw in the argument. If by logical reasoning from the premises you come to conclusions which shock you, I for one go back and look at the premises, and see if they are sound. I am satisfied that they are not sound in this case, the unsoundness consisting in confounding ownership with obligation. It appears to me, therefore, that the view taken of this case by Stirling, J., was correct, and that we should be doing what I conceive to be very great mischief if we were to stretch the principle which we are asked to extend, tempting as it is as between the plaintiffs and Stubbs. I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I really do not think that I need add anything to what has been said.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

JAY v. ROBINSON. (a.)

Married woman—Ante-nuptial debts—Debts contracted during former marriage—Restraint upon anticipation—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 13, 19.

Section 13 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, by which a woman, after her marriage, is made liable in respect and to the extent of her separate property for all debts contracted by her before her marriage, and section 19, by which a restraint on anticipation imposed by a woman in a settlement of her own property is invalid against debts contracted by her before marriage, refer not only to debts contracted by her while a feme sole, but also to those contracted by her under the powers of the Act during a previous coverture.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.)

Mr. and Mrs. Robinson were married in 1881, and in August, 1886, the plaintiff obtained judgment against Mrs. Robinson's separate property for £180 and costs. (The judgment was practically in the form settled by Scott v. Morley, 37 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120). There was no application to set aside this judgment, and in June, 1888, a decree absolute for the dissolution of the marriage was pronounced, on the petition of Mrs. Robinson. On August 16, 1888, she presented a petition to the court for the variation of the trusts of the marriage settlement, and in February, 1889, she married a Mr. Caulfeild and executed a settlement in consideration of this marriage, whereby she settled to her own use without power of anticipation whatever sum might be ordered to be paid to her upon her petition for the variation of the trusts of her first marriage settlement. On July 15, 1889, an order was made upon that petition by Sir James Hannen directing that the sum of £5,000 should be paid over by the trustees of her first marriage settlement to the trustees of her second marriage settlement, to be held by them upon the trusts of that settlement. The plaintiff now sought to attach that sum for his judgment, and applied for the appointment of a receiver. The application was refused by Charles, J., and the Divisional Court.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Alexander Robertson, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff desires to take this sum in execution, and the proper method is by the appointment of a receiver: Webb v. Stenton, 11 Q. B. D. 518, 31 W. R. Dig. 8. By section 13 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, a woman after her marriage is liable for all debts contracted by her before her marriage, that includes not only debts contracted by her while a spinster or widow, but debts contracted during a previous coverture. By section 19 a restraint on anticipation imposed by a woman herself in a settlement of her own property is invalid against a debt contracted before marriage.

They cited Axford v. Reid, 37 W. R. 291, 22 Q. B. D. 548; Holtby v. Hodgson, ante, p. 68, 24 Q. B. D. 103.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Hugh F. Boyd, for the defendant.—Section 13 applies only to debts contracted by a married woman while a feme sole. A woman while under coverture cannot contract debts. She has only a limited power of contracting given by the Act: section 1, sub-section 2; Downe v. Fletcher, 36 W. R. 694, 21 Q. B. D. 11; Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120; Beckett v. Tasker, 19 Q. B. D. 7, 35 W. R. Dig. 96. The property was never the defendant's. It first belonged to her first husband, and then to the trustees of the first marriage settlement. Then by the order of the court it was transferred, not to her, but to the trustees of her second settlement.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—The following judgments were delivered.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff obtained judgment against Mrs. Robinson while she was a married woman but before she was marrried to her present husband. The judgment was a valid judgment against her separate estate, and was substantially in the form which has been settled by this court for judgments against the separate estate of married women. Since the judgment was obtained she has been divorced, and is now married to another husband, and the question is, whether the judgment is valid against the separate property which she brought into settlement on her second marriage? The whole matter really depends on the construction of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and more especially on sections 13 and 19. Do the words "before marriage" in those sections mean "before the existing marriage" or "before ever having been married?" A married woman after her marriage is to be liable in respect and to the extent of her separate property for all debts contracted by her before her marriage, and no restraint upon anticipation contained in any settlement by her of her own property is to be valid against debts contracted by her before marriage. In this case the question is whether her separate property is liable for debts contracted by her during a previous marriage, but the same question would arise if the debt had been contracted by her between her first and second marriages. The question is one of so much importance that we have taken time to consider it, and we have come to the conclusion that the words do not mean "before ever having been married" but "before the present existing marriage." It follows that the defendant's separate estate is liable for her debt to the plaintiff which was contracted before her present coverture, and that the restraint against anticipation imposed by her has no validity against such debt. Therefore we disagree with the Divisional Court, and we think that this appeal must be allowed and that a receiver ought to be appointed.

FRY, L.J.—I agree. The result of the facts (which his lordship stated) is, in my opinion, that at the date of her second marriage the defendant had a chose in action vested in her which, by the order of Sir James Hannen, was ultimately reduced into possession. There can be no doubt that it was her separate property, and that by section 1, sub-section 4, it was, therefore, liable for her debts unless there is something in the Act to the contrary. The contract of a married woman under the Act affects not only the separate property of which she may be possessed at the time, but also that which she may thereafter acquire.

The only question is whether section 19 has preserved the effect of that fetter. The material words of that section are, "No restriction against anticipation contained in any settlement . . . of a woman's own property to be made or entered into by herself shall have any validity against debts contracted by her before marriage." The argument for the defendant was, first, that this was not her own property, and, secondly, that she, as a married woman, could not contract debts within the meaning of the section. As to the first point, as I have said, I think that her expectation under the petition for the variation of the trusts of her first marriage settlement was a chose in action which was ultimately reduced into possession after the second marriage. It follows, therefore, that it was her property. As to the second point, that a married woman is incapable of contracting debts, it becomes necessary to consider the whole scope of the Act. Section 1, sub-section 2, makes a married woman capable of entering into and rendering herself liable in respect and to the extent of her separate property, and that enables her to create something which is very like a common law debt. A strong light is thrown on her position by section 1, sub-section 5, which makes a married woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband subject to the bankruptcy laws in respect of her separate estate. People become subject to the bankruptcy laws only in respect of debts, and it follows, therefore, that she is considered able to contract debts. Section 11, which relates to policies of insurance, speaks in direct terms of her debts, and makes provision for the creditors of the insured—that is to say, of the married woman. Therefore, I think that the obligations which the Act enables a married woman to contract are debts within the meaning of sections 13 and 19, and her liability after marriage for debts contracted before marriage include both the debts contracted dum sola and those contracted during a previous coverture. Cases have been pressed upon us in which we held that the engagements contracted under this Act by a married woman were not debts in respect of which proceedings could be taken under the Debtors Act, 1869, but those cases were entirely different from this, and turned on the meaning of the word "debts" in that Act.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree. I think that the plaintiff's debt was a debt for which the defendant was liable in respect and to the extent of her separate estate, just as for any other ante-nuptial debt. The words "before marriage" appear to me to relate to the existing marriage. The £5,000 was the defendant's property as a chose in action before the second marriage, and was reduced into possession by the order of the court. The restraint against anticipation is, therefore, invalid against the debt of the plaintiff, and the order for a receiver must go.

Appeal allowed.

COHEN v. MITCHELL. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Property acquired during the bankruptcy—Assignment by bankrupt of after-acquired property—Validity as against trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

All transactions entered into by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing bonâ fide with him for value, before the trustee intervenes, with respect to his after-acquired property, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid against the trustee.

An undischarged bankrupt, having brought an action for the wrongful conversion of certain goods acquired by him during the bankruptcy, assigned the cause of action to the plaintiff (who knew that he was an undischarged bankrupt) for value. The bankrupt recovered a verdict, and before the money was paid over the plaintiff gave notice that he claimed the money under the assignment. The trustee in bankruptcy also claimed it.

Held, that the assignment, being bonâ fide on the part of the plaintiff, and having been completed before the trustee intervened to claim the money, was valid as against the trustee.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial without a jury of an interpleader issue.

The facts were shortly as follows:—Arthur Cohen, who was an undischarged bankrupt, carried on business without the consent or knowledge of his trustee in bankruptcy, the plaintiff making him various advances for the purposes of his business, knowing that he was an undischarged bankrupt. Arthur Cohen having brought an action against one Foale to recover damages for the wrongful conversion of certain goods purchased by him for the purposes of his business since the commencement of the bankruptcy, the plaintiff made him a further advance to enable him to carry on the action, and, in consideration of this and the previous advances, Arthur Cohen assigned the cause of action to the plaintiff. Arthur Cohen subsequently recovered a verdict and judgment against Foale for £120, and before the money was paid over the plaintiff gave notice to Foale of the assignment, and that he claimed the money. The defendant also gave notice that he claimed the money as trustee in the bankruptcy of Arthur Cohen. An interpleader issue was directed to be tried.

Mathew, J., held that the assignment was bonâ fide, and that the plaintiff was entitled as against the trustee, and gave judgment accordingly. The defendant appealed.

Dig. 20; Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 44, 45, were referred to.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this case is, whether the plaintiff or the trustee in bankruptcy of Arthur Cohen is entitled to a sum of money, the proceeds of an action brought by Arthur Cohen against Foale. Arthur Cohen, an undischarged bankrupt, carried on business without the consent or knowledge of his trustee, and the plaintiff advanced him money for the purposes of his business, knowing that he was an undischarged bankrupt. After the action against Foale had been commenced, Arthur Cohen, by an instrument in writing, either mortgaged or assigned the cause of action to the plaintiff in consideration of the previous advances and of a further advance to enable him to carry on the action. Judgment was recovered in that action for £120, and thereupon the trustee in the bankruptcy of Arthur Cohen intervened for the first time and sought to intercept the money. It was not denied that the plaintiff entered into this transaction in good faith, and so the only question is whether the trustee has intervened in time.

Now it is said that the doctrine as to the time of the intervention of the trustee applies only to an assignment of money, and not to any other property acquired by the bankrupt during the bankruptcy. It is said on the one side that the doctrine applies to every bonâ fide completed transaction, and that an assignment, either absolute or by way of mortgage, of goods acquired during the bankruptcy is valid against the trustee in bankruptcy if the assignment is completed before the intervention of the trustee. Upon the other side it is said that the doctrine only applies where the thing dealt with is money acquired during the bankruptcy. The question to be considered is whether there is any real distinction between the two. I can see no distinction. Property of a bankrupt is divided into two classes—property belonging to him at the commencement of the bankruptcy, and property acquired by him during the bankruptcy. The first class of property belongs to and vests absolutely in his trustee. If the bankrupt were to bring an action in respect of that property the plea of bankruptcy would be a good plea, as the property would not belong to the bankrupt. As to the second class of property—namely, that acquired during the bankruptcy, the plea of bankruptcy has been held in several cases, and notably in Herbert v. Sayer, to be a bad plea unless the plea goes on to state that the trustee has interfered before the transaction has been completed. That shows that the bankrupt has a limited kind of property before the trustee interferes. In my opinion this principle ought not to be confined to money transactions. Every reasoning applicable to money is equally applicable to all other transactions. I am therefore prepared, with the concurrence of my learned brethren, to lay down this proposition which has been put into writing by Lopes, L.J.: until the trustee intervenes, all transactions entered into by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing bonâ fide with him and for value, with respect to his after-acquired property, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid against the trustee. It will be seen from the wording of the proposition that the stress as to the bona fides is laid entirely upon the person dealing with the bankrupt, and if he has dealt in good faith the question of the bankrupt's good faith as regards his creditors is immaterial.

That being the principle, the only remaining question is whether there is any decision binding upon us which is to the contrary. It does not seem to me that the case of Meggy v. Imperial Discount Co. touches this question at all. The two cases which deal with it are Herbert v. Sayer and Ex parte Dewhurst. I do not intend to go through those cases, but I content myself with saying that, so far from being contrary to the proposition which I have enunciated, they seem to me to support it. It is true that Ex parte Dewhurst dealt only with money, but the law laid down in those cases cannot be confined to money transactions. Nor can it be said that Wadling v. Oliphant is against it. Therefore it comes to this, that though we are laying down a proposition wider in its terms than any before laid down, yet the proposition is really involved in those decisions and follows naturally from them.

In the present case the transaction was completed before the trustee intervened; it was a transaction which was valid as between the bankrupt and the plaintiff: it was an assignment of a cause of action with respect to after-acquired property; and it comes, therefore, within the proposition above laid down. The judgment, therefore, in favour of the plaintiff was right, and the appeal must fail.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which vests the bankrupt's property in the trustee, includes both property belonging to the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy and property acquired by him before his discharge. Upon the mere wording of the section the reader might suppose that both kinds of property vested in the trustee in precisely the same manner. However, the inconvenience of such a reading struck the courts long ago, when dealing with former Bankruptcy Acts containing similar words. It was felt to be obviously right that while the property of the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy should vest absolutely in the trustee, yet, unless the bankrupt were to be the slave of the trustee, he must be allowed to acquire rights and property, and therefore the court could not hold that all after-acquired property vested absolutely in the trustee. That difficulty was met by establishing a distinction between the two classes of property, and it was held that after-acquired property did not vest in the trustee in such a manner that a plea of bankruptcy would be a good answer to an action by the bankrupt in respect thereof. The plea must allege, not only bankruptcy, but that the trustee has interfered. That distinction is plainly expressed in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Herbert v. Sayer, delivered by Tindal, C.J., where (at p. 981) he says:—"The effect of the statutory enactments may be either to transfer immediately such property or contracts (that is, future property and contracts) from the bankrupt to the assignees, vesting the property in the bankrupt for an instant only, or to give the assignees the beneficial interest, and to make the bankrupt acquire property or contract for their benefit only in the nature of an agent. The cases accord with the latter construction of the statute, and it is most consistent with convenience; for otherwise there would be no protection to persons dealing with an uncertificated bankrupt. Not only would they acquire no title by purchases from him, but payments for such purchases, and for all other debts due to the uncertificated bankrupt, would be invalidated. The Legislature, by several statutes, have protected all payments by and to, and all dealings and transactions with, the bankrupt bonâ fide made or entered into without notice of the act of bankruptcy before the fiat; but there is no provision by the statute law for such payments, dealings, or transactions after the fiat; and the only way by which they can be rendered valid, and great confusion, inconvenience, and hardship prevented, is by adopting the latter construction, and holding that the bankrupt acquires property and contracts for the assignees, who may, whenever they please, disaffirm his act, but until they do so his acts are all valid." I entirely adopt that with the exception of the phrase "disaffirm his act." I think the word "intervene" would be better, as the trustee cannot, by intervening, disaffirm what has been validly done in the bankruptcy.

Such being the nature of the distinction between the two classes of properties, it follows that the rights of the bankrupt with respect to after-acquired property must be different from his rights with respect to other property. It seems to me that all transactions with regard to any after-acquired property, not merely with regard to money, but with regard to all other property, fall within the same rule. I agree, therefore, with the rule laid down by the Master of the Rolls, and I think that that rule, though not laid down in any earlier case, flows naturally from the distinction between the two classes of property. The intervention, therefore, of the trustee in the present case could not invalidate the assignment to the plaintiff, which was effectual and valid at the time.

The conclusion I have come to is that all transactions entered into bonâ fide and for value are valid against the trustee, otherwise the law would have vested all after-acquired property in the trustee absolutely.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The rule laid down by the Master of the Rolls seems to me to follow from the decisions in Herbert v. Sayer and Ex parte Dewhurst.

MACDOUGALL v. KNIGHT & SON. (a.)

Libel — Privilege — Publication of judgment alone — Second action for same libel — Action stayed as frivolous and vexatious.

The defendants published in the form of a pamphlet a report of a judgment delivered in a former action brought against them by the plaintiff. The pamphlet contained no separate report of the evidence. The plaintiff brought an action for libel in respect of the pamphlet, and specified certain passages in it as defamatory. A jury having found that the report was accurate and was published bonâ fide and without malice, judgment was given for the defendants, and a new trial was refused by the Divisional Court, the Court of Appeal, and the House of Lords. The plaintiff then brought a second action in respect of the same pamphlet, specifying, however, other passages as defamatory, and raising as a point of law a question suggested as a doubt by Lord Halsbury, L.C., in the House of Lords (ante, p. 44, 14 App. Cas. 194)—namely, whether, if the report did not give reasonable opportunities to the reader to form his own judgment as to the conclusion to be drawn from the evidence given, it might be the subject of an action for libel and not be privileged.

Held, that the action must be stayed, as being frivolous and vexatious.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.).

In June, 1884, a judgment was delivered by North, J., in an action of MacDougall v. Knight. The defendants published a pamphlet purporting to be a verbatim report of the judgment, and the plaintiff brought an action against them for libel in respect of such publication, specifying certain passages as defamatory. The action was tried before Huddleston, B., and a jury, and the jury found that the report was accurate, and was published bonâ fide and without malice. Upon this, judgment was entered for the defendants.

The Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal refused to grant a new trial (see 34 W. R. 727, 17 Q. B. D. 636), and their decision was upheld by the House of Lords (ante, p. 44, 14 App. Cas. 194); but a doubt was expressed by Lord Halsbury, C., whether, if the report of a judge's judgment or summing up to a jury did not, in fact, give reasonable opportunities to the reader to form his own judgment as to what conclusion should be drawn from the evidence given, such publication might not be the subject of an action for libel and not be privileged. The plaintiff then brought a fresh action on the same pamphlet, but specifying as defamatory other passages omitted in the former action, and raised the question suggested in the House of Lords. The defendants took out a summons to stay the action on the ground of its being frivolous and vexatious. An order was made at chambers staying the action, but the Divisional Court allowed it to proceed on the plaintiff's paying the costs of the first action.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., and Blake Odgers, for the defendants.—This action raises the same points that were raised in the previous action. The libel complained of is the same, though different passages are picked out from those relied on in the former case. The plaintiff merely wishes to raise a point of law which he might have taken in the former action. Lord Coleridge, C.J., seemed to think that Brunsden v. Humphrey, 32 W. R. 944, 14 Q. B. D. 141, decided that a fresh action might be brought for each passage. That case, however, only decided that for each separate cause of action a separate action was maintainable, and the decision was approved in Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell, 11 App. Cas. 127, at p. 144, 34 W. R. Dig. 108. It is not necessary to force the defendants to enter a plea res judicata where the cause of action is obviously the same, and where the defendants must succeed upon the plea if the action is allowed to continue. The court will prevent its process being abused, and will dismiss the action as vexatious: Wills v. Lord Beauchamp, 34 W. R. 357, 11 P. D. 59; Lawrance v. Lord Norreys, 39 Ch. D. 213, 37 W. R. Dig. 145; Reichel v. Magrath, 14 App. Cas. 665; Goring v. Lloyd, 3 Times L. R. 455; Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Molleson, 1 App. Cas. 780, at p. 784; Marriott v. Hampton, 2 Sm. L. C. (9th ed.) 441; Hunter v. Stewart, 10 W. R. 176. Secondly, the dicta of the Lord

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chancellor and Lord Bramwell in MacDougall v. Knight, ante, p. 44, 14 App. Cas. 194, as to the report of the judgment not being privileged unless the jury found it to give a fair and accurate representation of the evidence, were erroneous. This point was decided in favour of the defendants by this court in the same case.

Oswald, for the plaintiff.—The question of law proposed to be raised is whether the report of the judgment of a judge published under the circumstances of this case is actionable, even though it was published honestly and without malice and was an accurate report. It is a question for the jury whether the publication is a fair and accurate report of the trial. That question was never raised at the first trial. It is contrary to the practice of the court to stop an action summarily where the defence is res judicata. That defence must be taken by plea: Ross v. Jacques, 8 M. & W. 135; Pechell v. Layton, 2 T. R. 512; Carter v. James, 13 M. & W. 137. The claim is not vexatious on its face. The practice is simply to stay proceedings until the costs of the former action are paid, as the Divisional Court have done: In re Payne, 31 W. R. 509, 23 Ch. D. 288; Martin v. Lord Beauchamp, 32 W. R. 17, 25 Ch. D. 12; and this court will not interfere with the discretion exercised by the Divisional Court. Further, this is not for the same cause of action, as the libellous passages complained of are different: Brunsden v. Humphrey; Earl of Bandon v. Becher, 3 Cl. & F. 479; Langmead v. Maple, 13 W. R. 469, 18 C. B. N. S. 255; Lord Townsend v. Hughes, 2 Mod. 150.

Odgers, in reply, referred to Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley, 33 W. R. 709, 10 App. Cas. 210.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff has brought an action against the defendants for libel, and the libel complained of is contained in a pamphlet published by the defendants. That pamphlet purports to be an accurate report of a judgment delivered by North, J., in a former action between the same parties which reflected on the conduct of the plaintiff. On the action being brought the defendants have taken out a summons to strike it out as frivolous and vexatious, because they say a previous action has been brought against them by the same plaintiff for the same libel, and that it is clear that a plea of res judicata if put in must be successful, and therefore that to allow the action to go on can obviously lead to no result but vexation and waste of time. If the action is vexatious and frivolous—that is to say, without any foundation—it is the duty of the court to stay it. But the defendants say further, that even if the plea of res judicata could not be maintained, the action is nevertheless vexatious, because in the previous action the plaintiff complained of certain specified portions of the judgment, and now he complains of other specified portions. That is to say, the plaintiff claims a right to bring and succeed in an action on certain portions of a libel, and then to bring separate actions in respect of other portions of the same publication which he omitted to specify in the first action. The defendants say that to do that is such an obvious abuse of the practice of the court that even if a plea of res judicata cannot be put in the court will interfere to stay the action.

I will first consider the case apart from the decision in the House of Lords. The action is brought in respect of the publication of the judgment of a judge at a trial before him. The pamphlet did not purport to give and did not give any part of the evidence on which that judgment was founded. It only purported to be a correct and accurate report of the judgment alone. Now, what questions were in issue before the court on the first trial. The law has been laid down in Lewis v. Levy, 6 W. R. 629, E. B. & E. 537, and other cases, and has been approved by this court in this very case. The publication without malice of an accurate report of what has been said or done in a judicial proceeding in a court of justice is a privileged publication even although what was said or done would but for the privilege be libellous against an individual and actionable at his suit. This is true although what is thus published purports to be and is a report, not of the whole judicial proceeding, but only of a separate part of it, if the report of that part is an accurate report of that part and published without malice.

The questions, therefore, in issue were practically two. Firstly, was the report an accurate and honest report of the judgment? Secondly, was it published bonâ fide and without malice? In effect, those were the questions left to the jury. Of course, if the publication had been malicious the report, although accurate, would not have been privileged. It is impossible to give an exhaustive definition of malice, but there may be many things which will be strong evidence of it. A report of part, and part only, of a judicial proceeding may be some evidence of malice. A report, although accurate, published, not to inform the public, but in order to gratify anger and to injure some individual, would be evidence of malice. A publication of a judgment by a person who had no interest in the matter, such as a newspaper reporter would have, but as a private person to be distributed among his friends, might be evidence of malice. In these cases, even if the report was perfectly accurate, the publication might be held to be not privileged. The jury, however, found in favour of the defendant on both questions. Now what are the questions which are in issue and which must be left to the jury in the present action. Surely they are precisely the same as in the previous action. Was the report an accurate report? Was it published maliciously? How can it then be said that the subject-matter of this action is not identical with that of the previous action. It is contended that the cause of action is not the same, because the defamatory statements which are relied on in this action are different from those on which the first action was brought. But both are in the same pamphlet, which was before the jury at the first trial, and there is only one publication. The Divisional Court have, I think, misapprehended the decision in Brunsden v. Humphrey. That case did not decide that when a cause of action contains several items of damage separate actions may be brought in respect of each item. In that case two separate different legal rights of the plaintiff had been infringed by one act of the defendant, which had caused at the same time injury to his person and injury to his property. It was decided that the plaintiff might bring separate actions in respect of those rights, but that was because those rights were separate, and the rule of damages relating to those rights was different. But that case has no application when, as in the present case, a plaintiff seeks to bring separate actions for the infringement of the same right, and where one set of damages would be given by a jury for the whole infringement. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff cannot select new passages from the judgment and bring a fresh action on them. The cause of action is the publication of the libel, and it is the same in both trials. Therefore, I think that if a plea of res judicata were put in it must inevitably succeed, and, that being the case, that it is our duty to stay this action.

That brings me, however, to the consideration of what has been said in the House of Lords. In the first place, I think it must be noted that the decision of this court in the previous case was not overruled in the House of Lords, and the law, therefore, laid down here must be taken to remain. Their lordships did not express a definite opinion on any point of law, but it is true that the Lord Chancellor and Lord Bramwell expressed what was not an opinion, but a doubt. I desire to speak with the highest respect of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Bramwell, but I confess I have some difficulty in understanding the precise nature of that doubt. If, as it seems, they thought that when a report of a judgment was published, it might not be sufficient, in order to entitle it to privilege, to show that it was an accurate report and published without malice, but that it might also be necessary to show that it correctly represented the evidence and gave the reader the means of judging for himself whether that evidence was fairly summarized by it, then I can only say that I most earnestly trust that when the matter comes to be argued out before them that doubt may be set at rest. To call upon the reporter to justify the judgment of the judge which he has reported appears to me so contrary to the very basis of the privilege itself, so opposed to every decision and to the daily practice of the press of this country, so prejudicial to public policy in its most material aspect, that it violates the very decencies of justice. What plea is the reporter to put in? Is he to justify the judge? or to say that his judgment is correct and fair? That would be to put him in the position of a court of appeal. If that is the effect of the view taken in the House of Lords then no newspaper will venture, however long a trial may be, to publish a daily report of it, and the results will be so enormous that, even in spite of the doubts of such eminent men, I cannot depart from the view which I have always taken of the law. I adhere to every word that I said when this case was laid before this court. I therefore think that no purpose could be served by allowing the action to proceed, and that it is our duty to do what the Divisional Court ought to have done, and to direct the action to be stayed.

FRY, L.J.—I approach the decision of this case with unusual difficulty and anxiety. I am fearful lest we should not appear to pay due weight to the views entertained in the House of Lords. I fear lest we should unduly interfere with the discretion of the Divisional Court. I am most anxious lest we should shut the doors of litigation unduly on any litigant. But, notwithstanding all these anxieties, I concur in the conclusion at which the Master of the Rolls has arrived. This is an application to stay proceedings, either on the ground that the plea of res judicata, if put in, must of necessity be successful, or that the proceedings themselves are of such a vexatious and frivolous character that it is the duty of the court to interfere to prevent an abuse of its process. The question of res judicata turns on whether or not the present action is for the same cause as the previous action. In my opinion it is. I know that the present statement of claim selects passages from the judgment which were omitted in the former statement of claim, but the action is brought for one and the same publication, and the law cannot, in my opinion, allow separate actions to be brought for every statement contained in such a pamphlet. The whole pamphlet was before the jury on the first trial, and it would be impossible for separate damages to be assessed in respect of each statement. Therefore I think that the plea of res judicata would be successful, but, even if it would not, I hold the attempt to bring separate actions in respect of each part of the pamphlet to be so vexatious that, quâcunque viâ, I should think it the duty of the court to stay the action. There I might leave the case were it not for its great public importance. I adhere to every word of the decision of this court in the previous case of MacDougall v. Knight. I think we are bound by that decision in spite of the doubts thrown out by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Bramwell, and nothing has occurred to shake my belief in its correctness. The publication of a fair and accurate report of a proceeding, or any part of a proceeding, in a court of justice, so long as such publication is bonâ fide and without malice, is privileged. That was most clearly laid down by the court then, and is in accordance alike with the practice of the press, the usages of society, and the convenience of her Majesty's subjects. To hold that no judgment must be published unless it correctly summarized the evidence would be to impose an undue fetter upon the press. The judgment of a judge must be presumed to be fair and accurate, and to contain every material necessary for the decision of the case, and to compel the reporter to prove this would impose upon him a burden inconsistent with the best interests of the commonwealth. I therefore agree that the appeal must be allowed, and that this action must be stayed.

LOPES, L.J.—But for the importance of the case, I should add nothing to the judgments which have just been delivered, and in which I entirely concur. In my opinion, the law laid down here when the case was last before this court has been in no way impeached, and I entirely adhere to it. That being so, the plaintiff's second action is brought for the same cause of action as his first, and cannot be allowed to go on, since no possible benefit would result. I do not think that the plaintiff can be allowed to bring separate actions for every statement in the pamphlet which he considered libellous. Such conduct is not permitted by the decision in Brunsden v. Humphrey, and cannot be tolerated. I agree, therefore, that the action must be stayed.

LAWRENCE v. HORTON. (a.)

Injunction—Mandatory injunction—Easement—Building complete before writ issued—Damages under Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27).

A mandatory injunction may be granted for the removal of a building obstructing ancient lights, although it was completed before the writ was issued.

The circumstances under which the court will grant such an injunction in lieu of damages under Lord Cairns' Act considered.

Trial of action.

This was a case of obstruction of ancient lights, and the sole point involved was the question whether the court would grant a mandatory injunction in the case of a building completed, or practically completed, before the writ was issued. The plaintiffs were the owners of a shop and premises, No. 25, Queen-street, Wolverhampton, with four cottages at the back. Several of the windows of the shop and cottages depended almost entirely for their illumination on the light passing over the roof of an adjoining warehouse belonging to the defendants, and the evidence showed that such windows were ancient lights.

In March, 1889, the defendants pulled down their warehouse and began building one of increased height. The plaintiffs first heard of their intention on the 23rd of May, 1889, and at once remonstrated, but, the defendants continuing their building operations, a writ was issued on the 28th of May, 1889, and served on the 1st of June, with notice of motion for an injunction. The motion stood over by consent for a time, and on its coming on the defendants submitted to an injunction till trial. In the meantime, however, they had hurried on the new building so that it was completed and roofed in by the time the motion was heard.

The evidence showed that the effect of the increased height of the warehouse was to greatly darken the windows of the shop, which was let to a milliner, and to render the cottages almost uninhabitable.

The plaintiffs claimed a mandatory injunction ordering the defendants forthwith to remove so much of their new warehouse as exceeded the height of the old warehouse, and asked for damages and costs.

The defendants paid £50 into court.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Arthur Underhill, for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to a mandatory injunction, although the building was practically completed before the issue of the writ: Smith v. Smith, 23 W. R. 771, L. R. 20 Eq. 500.

Romer, Q.C., and Wurtzburg, for the defendants.—A mandatory order is never made when the building is completed before the writ is issued except under special circumstances, such as where the completion is accomplished by fraud or a trick, which is not alleged here, or unless very serious damage will ensue if relief is refused: Durell v. Pritchard, 14 W. R. 212, L. R. 1 Ch. 244; City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, 22 W. R. 172, L. R. 9 Ch. 212; Isenberg v. East India House Estate Co., 12 W. R. 450, 3 De G. J. & S. 263.

Whitehorne, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J.—The question is, What is the appropriate remedy to be applied to the wrong which the defendants have inflicted on the plaintiffs? The wrong is an obstruction of the plaintiffs' ancient lights. It is said on the part of the defendants that damages are sufficient compensation. By that is meant, not the damages from the date of the writ, as was formerly the case with common law damages, nor the damages from the date of the assessment, which is the present ordinary rule, but compensation in lieu of injunction, which the court can grant so as to relieve the defendants from any future actions on the part of the same plaintiffs and all those claiming under them. On the other hand, the plaintiffs say that in the circumstances of this case a mandatory injunction is the appropriate remedy.

Now, in granting mandatory injunctions, the court exercises its discretion with caution, as it does in all cases in which it grants injunctions, and in deciding whether that is or is not the appropriate remedy it has regard to all the circumstances of the case. It is not easy, nor do I attempt, to lay down any hard and fast rule, and I do not think it is for the benefit of the persons whose rights are taken away that there should be such a rule laid down; but I observe from the turn of this case that there seems to be an idea that if the builder can only run up his building before the writ is issued, he can, at least, maintain his building in the position it has attained at that time. That I deny altogether. I do not think it right to admit the existence of any such rule, which would encourage men, not by trickery, but by using despatch, to run up the wall nearest the plaintiff's premises, leaving the rest of the building behind much lower—that is to say, not building in the ordinary way. In regard to that side of the building it is material to consider, as one of the circumstances of the case, the condition it is in at the time the plaintiff first makes his complaint. If he finds the building is not then completed, and he makes his complaint and issues his writ before the building is completed, in my judgment the court is in a position, if the other circumstances justify it, to grant the mandatory injunction. It is not like the case of a building that is completed at the time in ignorance of the plaintiff's rights. Here, again, I lay down no hard and fast rule, but I say that the circumstance that the building is of a certain height when the plaintiff first complains does not enable the defendants, the wrongdoers, to say that at least it shall remain at that height, and that there shall be no mandatory injunction to pull it down below that height. As in most of these cases, the amount of actual damage is in dispute, but there is no doubt that serious damage to the milliner's workroom and showroom has resulted, and the cottage, No. 4, which has never been well lit, is now so dark as to be scarcely habitable. It is no defence to say that it is only a miserable cottage. The lights of a cottage are entitled to as much protection as those of a mansion. On the 23rd of May the plaintiffs heard of the proposed height of the new building, and on the same day they remonstrated. The defendants, however, chose to proceed after the objection was taken. Without inquiring whether the plaintiffs' windows were ancient lights they erected their building and took their chance. It is true they were away from home at the time of the first complaint, but that is, of course, no defence. It was their duty to stop the work as soon as they knew of the plaintiffs' objection, and it is impossible to allow them to obtain any advantage by running up their building before the plaintiffs could come to the court. There must be a mandatory order as in Yates v. Jack, 14 W. R. 618, L. R. 1 Ch. 295, with costs. Its operation may be suspended for three months. The £50 paid into court must be returned to the defendants.

In re ROBSON. (a.)

Solicitor—Remuneration—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), General Order, schedule II.

Where a lease is granted partly in consideration of a premium and partly in consideration of a rent, the solicitor is entitled, under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and the General Orders made thereunder, to receive remuneration on a scale calculated both upon the premium and the rent.

Summons.

This was a summons to review taxation, and it raised a question involving the construction of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and the General Order made under it—viz., to what remuneration is the lessor's solicitor entitled where a lease has been granted partly in consideration of a premium and partly in consideration of a rent.

Vernon Smith, for the summons.

Swinfen Eady, for the lessees liable to the costs.

NORTH, J.—The appellant in this case is Mr. Robson, a solicitor, who complains of the reduction by the taxing master of his bill of costs for work done by him as a solicitor for the lessor in respect of a lease to the respondents. The burden of the costs has to be borne by the lessees. The lease is for a term of ninety years from September, 1883, in consideration of an annual rent of £50 and a premium of £4,400 payable by the lessees to the lessor. The solicitor delivered a bill for £59 10s., consisting of £3 10s. for disbursements and £56 for professional charges, calculated according to scale, made up of £14 in respect of the rent and £42 in respect of the premium, and the taxing master has allowed the £14 and struck out the £42. The taxing master has arrived at this conclusion as the result of the provision in the 2nd part of schedule I. to the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, which fixes two scales of charges, the first being that of charges payable to a lessor's solicitor for preparing, settling, and completing leases and counterpart in cases of lease or agreement for lease at rack rent (not including mining or building leases); and the second that of charges payable to a vendor's or lessor's solicitor for preparing, settling, and completing conveyance and duplicate or lease and counterpart in cases of conveyance in fee, or for any other freehold estates reserving rent, or building leases reserving rent, or other long leases not at rack rents (except mining leases); and it is the latter scale, if either, which applies in the present case. Then the 5th rule, which applies to part 2, provides, "where a conveyance or lease is partly in consideration of a money payment or premium and partly of a rent, then, in addition to the remuneration hereby prescribed in respect of the rent, there shall be paid a further sum equal to the remuneration on a purchase at a price equal to such money payment or premium." The taxing master has allowed the sum of £14 as the fee according to the scale on the rent, but has not allowed the £42, the scale fee claimed upon the premium. His view is that any such scale fee must be a sum equal to the remuneration on a purchase at a price equal to this premium—viz., in the present case £4,400; but that, as the solicitor would not, if this were a purchase at that sum, be entitled to any scale fee, because he has not negotiated or conducted the sale nor deduced any title to the property, he therefore does not come within the provisions of part 1 of the 1st schedule, and there is no scale fee applicable to the case. He has held, however, that, although the solicitor is not entitled to any scale fee on the premium, he is entitled, in addition to a scale fee on the rent, to the remuneration prescribed by the Act in respect of business the remuneration for which is not prescribed in schedule I.—viz., remuneration according to the old system as altered by schedule II.—and he gave the solicitor an opportunity of bringing in a bill of costs to be taxed upon that footing. The solicitor, however, has not adopted that course, but insists that he is entitled to be allowed the £42, the scale fee on the premium. In giving this option of bringing in a bill to the solicitor the taxing master was, in my opinion, clearly wrong. Supposing the solicitor had, as he was invited to do, brought in a proper bill under the old system, it would have contained full charges for all the work done, and the master must have allowed the whole of it, for he would have had no power, under the new or old or any system, to have allowed such sum only in respect of that bill as bore to the total amount of the bill the same proportion that £4,400 bore to the value of the whole consideration for the lease—i.e., the premium plus the rent. In this case, therefore, the solicitor would have got his full bill of costs under the old system as altered by schedule II., and would have received, in addition, a scale fee calculated on the rent.

This view of the case seems to me clearly inadmissible. A solicitor must, in my opinion, be paid according to the scale, or independently of the scale according to the old system as altered by schedule II., and cannot, in respect of one and the same piece of business, be entitled to receive a compound remuneration made up in part of a scale charge and part of a bill of costs in addition for professional work as distinguished from disbursements. This is not authorized by the Act, or order, or rules, except expressly in one case hereinafter referred to, and it would be to some extent giving double remuneration for the same work. This was also the view Chitty, J., took in In re Hickley and Steward, 33 W. R. 320. The question, then, is whether the solicitor is to be paid (a) by a scale on the rent and on the premium, or (b) by a bill of costs according to the old system as altered by schedule II. The case falls exactly within rule 5, part 2, of the schedule—viz., the lease is partly in consideration of a rent and partly of a money payment or premium. That rule provides that "in addition to the remuneration hereby prescribed in respect of rent there shall be paid," not a bill of costs, but a further sum equal to the remuneration on a purchase at a price equal to such money payment or premium." It does not say that the vendor's or lessor's solicitor is to be remunerated as if, to this extent, the transaction were a purchase, but that he is to be remunerated in the case of a lease or conveyance reserving rent by a sum equal to the remuneration on the purchase, a sum to be ascertained by reference to something else in the Act, to which reference effect must be given if possible. As we are dealing with the case of vendor's or lessor's solicitor the rule would have been more happily expressed and more accurate if it had referred to remuneration on a sale instead of a purchase, but the meaning is obvious. Now to what is reference here made? The remuneration on sales is given by part 1 of schedule I. to vendor's solicitors for three things: — (1) Negotiating a sale by private contract; (2) conducting a sale by public auction; (3) deducing title to property, and perusing and completing conveyance. The first of these cannot be intended, for it is settled by In re Field, 33 W. R. 553, 29 Ch. D. 608, and later cases that no charge can be allowed for negotiations in business coming within part 2 of schedule I., nor can the second be meant, for there is very little connection between sales by auction and the matters dealt with in part 2. The reference must, therefore, be to the remuneration payable to a vendor's solicitor for deducing title and perusing and completing conveyance. And it is said that as the scale fee on a purchase (or sale) is not payable unless the title is deduced as well as the conveyance completed, In re Lacey, 32 W. R. 233, 25 Ch. D. 301; Newbould v. Bailward, 37 W. R. 401, 14 App. Cas. 1, so it cannot be allowed on a lease, where the business is completed without deducing title. But it is clear that the two cases are not assimilated for all purposes. For instance, on a sale under part 1 a solicitor who negotiates a sale, and deduces title, and prepares conveyance receives separate fees for each, while a solicitor who negotiates a conveyance or lease coming under part 2 receives no fee for negotiating. Again, the law is established that a lessee is not, in the absence of express contract to that effect, entitled to call for his lessor's title, and such title notoriously is scarcely ever required, and it would be rather absurd, I think, to hold that the reference in rule 5 to remuneration in respect of the premium had reference only to the very rare cases of leases on which the lessor had by special contract to deduce his title, and that far the larger number of cases in which leases are granted in consideration in part of a premium without any title being deduced are unprovided for by the rule. In fact it is clear that the framers of the rules applicable to part 2 of schedule I. had in mind that title is not ordinarily deduced on grants of leases, and that those rules are not confined to leases on the grant of which title is not deduced, for the first rule applicable to part 2 expressly provides that if a vendor or lessor furnishes an abstract of title, it is to be charged for according to the existing system as allowed by schedule II., and this is the one case in which the order allows remuneration by a bill of cost in addition to scale fees. It is obvious that this charge is in addition to and not in lieu of a scale fee, for the rule hereby allows a separate charge for what is but a small part of the deducing of title, and it could not be intended that in cases where the title is deduced the solicitor should not receive any remuneration for deducing title except the charge for the abstract. The provisions of rules 5 and 6, that the solicitor is to have a scale fee on the premium, and if an abstract is furnished (which is part of the deducing of title) is to have something more, is, in my opinion, quite inconsistent with the contention that if title is not deduced—i.e., if an abstract is not furnished—he is not to have even any scale fee on the premium or other remuneration in respect thereof. If that were so, in the not uncommon case of a lease at a nominal rent and a large premium, no title being deduced, a solicitor would receive only a very moderate and possibly inadequate remuneration for his work—a state of things scarcely contemplated by the framers of the Act, orders, and rules. In my opinion the language of rule 5, referring to a further sum equal to the remuneration on a purchase at a price equal to the premium, was intended to avoid the repetition of the table showing the rate or scale of remuneration, as though there had been reference to it, mutatis mutandis, and was not meant to narrow its application to cases precisely identical, or to exclude almost all leases at a premium from its operation. Under those circumstances I have come to the conclusion that the solicitor is entitled to the £56 he claims, and the matter must go back to the taxing master for revision, and the solicitor must have his costs of this application.

SNOWDEN v. BAYNES. (a.)

Master and servant—Negligence—Conforming to order—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-section (3).

A workman sought to recover compensation from his employer under section 1, sub-section (3), of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, for injury caused by reason of the negligence of a person in the service of his employer, to whose orders the plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was bound to conform, and did conform, it being alleged that the injury resulted from his having so conformed. It appeared that on a certain morning the plaintiff was ordered to do a piece of work by S., a carpenter in the service of the defendant. The plaintiff was bound to obey the orders of S. as to what work he should do, but S. had no authority to specify any particular place where the work should be done. In the evening the plaintiff was working overtime at the piece of work in a shed which was his usual place of work. S., in stacking timber in the same shed, negligently let fall a beam which injured the plaintiff.

Held, that the injury did not result from the plaintiff having conformed to any order to do a particular piece of work, and that he was not entitled to recover.

This was an appeal from the Brompton County Court. The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of the Divisional Court.

The plaintiff sued the defendant in the Brompton County Court under the Employers' Liability Act for injuries received by him under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiff was a machinist in the employment of the defendant. He was accustomed to work at a particular machine in a particular shed. One Sellick, a carpenter, used to receive directions from the defendant or his foreman as to the work to be done, and to give orders to the plaintiff and to the other men as to the work each of them should do: these orders they were bound to obey. Sellick's duty and authority with respect to the plaintiff went no further, and in the performance by the plaintiff of the work which had been assigned to him, the plaintiff received no directions from Sellick, and was in no way under his control.

On the morning of the day on which the accident happened the plaintiff was told by Sellick what work he had to do, and according to the ordinary course of his work he went to the shed and to the machine abovementioned to do his day's work. There was evidence that the shed was not a safe place for two people to work in at once—in what respect unsafe it did not appear. The plaintiff's regular time for leaving off work was half past five, but on the evening in question he had elected to work till seven. Towards the end of the day, Sellick came in to do some work in the shed, and he and another man began to stack timber in the neighbourhood of the plaintiff. The plaintiff asserted that Sellick at that time directed him to go on with his work, although he himself was at work in the shed. But the jury found that this was not so. In the course of his operations in stacking the timber Sellick, by admitted negligence, caused a piece of timber to fall. It struck the plaintiff's right arm; the jerk threw the plaintiff's left hand into the machine, and he lost three fingers. The learned county court judge left to the jury, so far as is material to the present discussion, two questions—(1) Was Sellick a person to whose orders the plaintiff was bound to conform? To which the jury said "Yes." (2) Was the plaintiff at the time of the accident acting under Sellick's orders, and whether general or special? To which the answer was, "Under the general orders given that morning."

Upon these findings the county court judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

Ruegg, for the defendant.—There is no evidence to bring the plaintiff within section 1, sub-section (3) of the Act; the injury did not result from the plaintiff's having conformed to the orders of Sellick; he was working in his usual place of work, which did not depend on Sellick's orders.

Aspland, Q.C. (Parkes Wilkinson with him).—It is not necessary that the order should be a negligent one to bring the case within the sub-section. The plaintiff was working under Sellick's orders, and the accident happened through Sellick's negligence. That is enough. In Millward v. Midland Railway Co., 33 W. R. 366, 14 Q. B. D. 68, there was no express order given at all.

He also cited Dolan v. Anderson, 22 Sc. Law Reporter, 529.

Ruegg, in reply.—At the time of the injury the plaintiff was not bound to conform to Sellick's orders, for both were working together.

He referred to Kellard v. Rooke, 36 W. R. 875, 21 Q. B. D. 367.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 6.—The judgment of the COURT (POLLOCK, B., and WILLS, J.) was delivered by

WILLS, J., who, after stating the facts, said:—The learned counsel for the plaintiff contended that the case fell within the 3rd sub-section of section 1 of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42); that Sellick was a person to whose orders or directions the plaintiff at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform, and that the injury resulted from his having so conformed.

We think that Sellick was a person to whose orders as to what specific work he should do, but no further, the plaintiff was bound to conform. We think that the only order which affects the present case was the order given in the morning to do the work which the plaintiff did, and that, unless the injury can be said to have been the result of his having obeyed the order to do the particular piece of work selected for him, he cannot recover.

It seems to us that there is no connection between his doing that piece of work rather than any other, and the accident. Sellick had no authority to send him to any other place to work, or to exercise any discretion, or give any orders as to where he should go to do the work. Whatever work Sellick had told him to do he would have been in the same place, so that it was in no sense the exercise by Sellick of an authority vested in him, and exercised by him, that brought the plaintiff into what ultimately proved to be a place of danger. We think the order which is contemplated by this sub-section must be one which is really that of the person in the position of Sellick, and which is the direct offspring of some choice or exercise of judgment and will on his part; if not, it is not his order at all. Sellick had authority to say, "You shall do this bit of work or that bit of work," but not "You shall do it at this place or that place." The choice of place rested with someone else. So far as the evidence goes upon this point the shed in question was the plaintiff's regular place of work, and it has not been suggested that either he had any choice, or Sellick any control, in respect of the place where the work should be done.

There is another respect in which it is equally clear that the fact of the plaintiff being at the place of danger at the time when Sellick's negligence caused the accident was not due to any order of Sellick's. The accident took place shortly before seven. The plaintiff's own account is that his regular time was up at half-past five, that the timekeeper came round at three and asked him how long he would work, whereupon the plaintiff said he would work until seven. It was therefore his own doing, and not Sellick's, that he was there between half-past five and seven, and the jury negatived the suggestion arising from certain parts of the evidence, not necessary to set out, that the accident arose from a special order of Sellick's that the plaintiff should continue to work whilst Sellick was doing that which proved dangerous to the plaintiff.

We think that, for the reasons stated, the case of Millward v. Midland Railway Co., which was much relied upon for the plaintiff, has no bearing upon the present discussion, and we think it better not to attempt to lay down any law which goes beyond this case. We think it right, however, to point out that, besides the broad distinction we have already dealt with, there is one obvious difference (whether affecting the right of action or not) between a case in which the circumstances of danger are brought about by the performance, on the part of the person injured, of acts the direct result of obedience to an order then and there given, and which then expose him to immediate risk, if the person giving the order be careless, and a case in which obedience to the order is accompanied by no circumstance of present risk from the negligence of the person giving the order, and in which, if the mere fact that obedience to the order involves the presence of the workman in a spot where he is afterwards endangered by acts of the person giving the order, is sufficient to give a right of action, the liability may flow from an order given a week or a month before the accident happened. In such a case it is obvious that such an order might amount to very little more than the mere selection of a particular workman to be employed upon a particular job, and it is difficult to suppose that such a case could be within the Act. Each case, however, must be dealt with upon its own facts. In the present case the facts do not establish even the selection by Sellick, either as regards person or place, of the plaintiff to stand on the spot which proved to be one of danger, and we are clearly of opinion that the judgment of the learned county court judge must be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendant.

International law — Ambassador — Privilege — British subject appointed ambassador by foreign Government — Liability to parochial rates.

A British subject who is appointed to the embassy of a foreign Power in England, and received without any special conditions by the British Government, has all the privileges of a foreign ambassador, and is not liable to pay parochial rates.

This was a case tried before Mathew, J., without a jury. The facts are given in the judgment.

English Harrison, for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 24.—MATHEW, J.—In this case the plaintiff sought to recover £118 which he had paid under protest to get rid of a distress upon the furniture in his house levied by the defendants for parochial rates. The defendants contended that the distress was lawful, and that, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The plaintiff, Sir Halliday Macartney, who was an English subject, had been appointed by the Chinese Government English secretary of the Chinese Embassy, and had been received in that capacity by the British Government. His name had been submitted to the Foreign Office in the usual way, and his position as a member of the embassy recognized without reservation or condition of any sort. He would therefore seem to be clearly entitled to the privileges of the corps diplomatique, and it would follow that his personal effects would be exempt from seizure. His rights in this respect appeared to be fully recognized by the local Act, 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, under which the rates were levied. Section 190 of that Act provides: "And be it further enacted, that every rate or assessment which shall be made, laid, or assessed by virtue of this Act, for or in respect of any land, ground, house, shop, warehouse, wharf, coach-house, stable, cellar, vault, building, tenement, or hereditament whatsoever which any ambassador, envoy, resident, agent or other public minister of any foreign prince or state, or the servant of any such ambassador, envoy, resident, agent, or other public minister, or any other person not liable by law to pay such rate or assessment, now doth or hereafter shall inhabit, shall be paid by, and recoverable from, the landlord, owner, lessor, or proprietor of every such land, ground, house, shop, warehouse, wharf, coach-house, stable, cellar, vault, building, tenement, or hereditament respectively, who shall be liable and compellable to the payment thereof, and the same shall be recovered and applied as the other rates hereby made payable are to be recovered and applied."

For the defendant it was conceded that the plaintiff, if he had been a foreigner, might be entitled to the exemption which he claimed, but it was argued that as a British subject he remained liable to the laws of his own country, and it was said that he was not within the description of persons exempt by the local Act, for the operation of the Act was limited by the words "or any other person not liable by law to pay such rate." In support of this contention reliance was placed on passages of chapter 11 of Bynkershoek De Foro Legatorum, which, it was said, showed that the minister of a foreign state accredited to his own country remained subject to the laws of the state to which he owed allegiance. But the view of the learned author would seem to be that the envoy would be entitled to exemption from the local jurisdiction in all that related to his public functions, and this would seem to be the opinion of later writers on the subject (see Wheaton's International Law, 2nd ed., edited by Lawrence, p. 189, and the authorities there referred to). If this be the rule, the plaintiff would be protected from the seizure in question, which unquestionably interfered with the performance of his duty as a member of the embassy.

But there is another principle, which appears to afford the plaintiff the protection which he claims. Bynkershoek, in chapter 8, and all the later writers on the subject recognize the right of the state to impose such conditions as are thought proper upon the reception of a member of a foreign embassy. But it is said if the envoy be received without reservation the condition is to be tacitly implied that he fully enjoys the jus legationis. Bynkershoek points out that the only mode of escaping from the doctrine of exemption is to impose on the envoy when received a condition that he shall be subject to the local jurisdiction. This principle is, as it would seem, with much good sense extended by later writers to the case of the envoy accredited to his own Government. Thus Wheaton, International Law, p. 395, suggests that the privilege of the envoy to exemption from the civil jurisdiction of his own country is not lost where there has been no express condition to the contrary at the time when the member of the embassy is received by his own Government. Again, Calvo, Droit International, 2nd ed., vol. 1, book X., section 438, refers to the practice of some Governments to impose upon their own subjects, when received as envoys, the obligation to remain subject to the laws of their own country. He adds: "These conditions ought always to be expressly stated before or at the time that the member of the embassy is received." The rule is stated in similar terms in Phillimore's International Law, vol. 2, section 135. The learned author refers to many authorities in support of this position. In this case it appears from the correspondence which passed between the Home Office and the defendants that no such condition had been imposed upon the plaintiff. I am therefore of opinion that his goods were not liable to seizure, and that he is entitled to judgment for the amount claimed, and costs.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.) — Feb. 12, 13.

Ex parte LOWE.
In re LOWE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Tender of debt to one creditor—Refusal—Petition—Right of creditor to refuse payment after act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g).

After act of bankruptcy committed the debtor tendered to one creditor payment of his debt, but such creditor refused to receive it, and subsequently joined in a bankruptcy petition presented against the debtor, upon which a receiving order was made. The debtor appealed against the receiving order, on the ground that, by reason of the tender, there was no good petitioning creditor's debt.

Held, that, at the time when the tender was made, an act of bankruptcy having been committed by the debtor, of which the creditor had knowledge, he was justified in refusing to accept payment, and that the receiving order was rightly made.

Appeal from an order of the registrar of the county court at Nottingham making a receiving order against the debtor.

The case raised the question—whether a debtor, after an act of bankruptcy has been committed by him, can, by tendering payment of a debt to one creditor, prevent bankruptcy proceedings being taken against him founded in part upon the debt so tendered.

The debtor, Walter Lowe, formely traded under the style of Lorraine & Co. as a salesman at Nottingham, and on January 5, 1889, a writ was issued against him by Messrs. Hayes & Co. for goods supplied to the amount of about £21, judgment being allowed to go by default. On March 20, 1889, a bankruptcy notice under section 4, sub-section 1 (g), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was served upon the debtor by Messrs. Cullen & Sons, another creditor, in respect of the sum of £9 due to them from the debtor.

On April 23, 1889, a bankruptcy petition was presented against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy alleged being non-compliance with the terms of the said bankruptcy notice, such petition being signed by five creditors whose debts amounted in the aggregate to £54, and including Messrs. Hayes & Co. and Messrs. Cullen & Sons. This petition was appointed to be heard on May 15, 1889, but before the hearing the debtor paid to one of the petitioning creditors named Clark his debt of £10 5s., and the petition was in consequence dismissed on the objection being taken that the petitioning creditors' debt did not amount to £50.

On May 22, 1889, a tender of their debt of £25 4s. was made by the debtor to Messrs. Hayes & Co. who refused to receive it, and on May 27, 1889, a second bankruptcy petition was presented against the debtor by Messrs. Hayes & Co. and a Mr. Bendit, the aggregate debts amounting to £50 8s. 10d., such petition being founded on the act of bankruptcy committed on March 20, in the failure of the debtor to comply with the terms of the bankruptcy notice.

Objection was taken by the debtor to this petition mainly on the ground that he had made a valid tender of their debt to Messrs. Hayes & Co. before the petition was presented, and that, therefore, there was no sufficient petitioning creditors' debt, but the county court registrar made a receiving order against the debtor, from which he now appealed.

Hewtall, for the debtor.—There was no good petitioning creditors' debt, because there was a valid tender which brought it below £50. The attempt to settle was bonâ fide, and a debtor is entitled to pay his creditors piecemeal if he cannot pay in the aggregate.

He referred to Ex parte Kibble, In re Onslow, 23 W. R. 433, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 373; In re Andrew, 24 W. R. 197, 1 Ch. D. 358.

Herbert Reed, for the petitioning creditors—The real question is whether, when several persons are petitioning together, the debtor, after act of bankruptcy committed, can tender to one and so pay off the creditors in detail. He cannot do so, because after an act of bankruptcy the money tendered is not the debtor's money; but if there is a bankruptcy it is the money of the trustee. There are several authorities which show that where a petition has been presented the court will not compel the creditor to take his money, but will allow him to go on with his petition. The same principle applies after act of bankruptcy committed and before the presentation of the petition.

He referred to Ex parte Boss, In re Whalley, 22 W. R. 702, L. R. 18 Eq. 375; Ex parte Brigstocke, In re Brigstocke, 25 W. R. 262, 4 Ch. D. 348; Mann v. Shepherd, 6 T. R. 79; Ex parte Miller & Bate, Buck. 283.

Cave, J.—This appeal must be dismissed. I think not only that the registrar was right in making the receiving order, but that he would have done very wrong if he had not made it. It is quite obvious that the debtor was a person of a slippery nature, who would not pay his debts if he could avoid it. An act of bankruptcy was committed upon a small debt of £9; and the failure of the debtor to pay or secure that debt shows the position of the man. The creditors determine to take advantage of that act of bankruptcy, and some of them whose debts amounted to £50 agree to join for that purpose, and thereupon this man goes to one and pays him in full and so defeats the bankruptcy proceedings. Another combination is formed, composed of one creditor to the former petition and another who agrees to join him, and thereupon the debtor tries the same thing over again. He approaches one creditor and tenders his debt, and that was very properly refused. It is obvious that it was done solely for the purpose of preventing the proceedings being gone on with, and with the object of escaping payment of his debts at little cost. I am clearly of opinion that the creditor in this case was justified in refusing to accept the money, even admitting that it was duly tendered. Several cases have been cited the principle of which applies to this case, and those cases are founded on the principle that at the time payment was offered the man had committed an act of bankruptcy, and it might be that the money was not his to tender at all, and if there was a bankruptcy within three months the creditor might have to pay the money back again. I have had occasion, more than once, to tell people that they ought not to take money from a man who has committed an act of bankruptcy until the three months during which a petition may be presented have elapsed. We have frequently before us the case of a trustee under a deed of arrangement who has meddled with the bankrupt's estate after the act of bankruptcy and before the three months have elapsed during which time a petition may be presented, and when a petition has been presented and a receiving order made such persons who have dealt with the property have in vain applied to us for consideration. No matter what such trustee has said, he invariably has had to restore any money so received and pay the costs. To my mind it is perfectly clear that the creditor had a right—not to say that it was his duty—to refuse an offer made under these circumstances. The respondent was perfectly justified in the course he took, and no objection to the receiving order can be allowed on that ground.

A. L. Smith, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion

A liquidator is not entitled as of right to an order for examination of a person, under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862; it is in the discretion of the court to grant or refuse such an order. There is no hard and fast rule as to when it would be proper and when improper to make such an order; but the pendency of an action by the liquidating company, and the fact of discovery in such action having been ordered or refused, are material considerations.

A company, after the passing of a resolution for voluntary winding up under the supervision of the court, had instituted an action against another company, and had made an application in that action that the defendant company should give immediate discovery, which application had been refused by the judge, on the ground of its being premature. The liquidator of the plaintiff company then obtained an order in the winding up under section 115 for examination of a person who was the secretary of the defendant company, and in the course of examination put a question to the secretary for the purpose of obtaining the discovery sought in the action, but the secretary refused to answer. The liquidator then applied for and obtained from the judge in the winding up, an order that the secretary should attend at his own expense and answer the question. On appeal by the secretary from such last-mentioned order,

Held, that the order should be discharged, on the ground that the question had been put in aid of the discovery for the purposes of the action which had been refused by the judge in the action, and that the information sought to be elicited by the question was not, in the existing circumstances, wanted for the purposes of the winding up.

The North Australian Territory Co. was an English company registered in England, and formed for the purpose of purchasing an estate in Australia. The purchase was made from a Mr. Fisher and his mortgagees, Goldsbrough, Mort, & Co., under an agreement whereby the North Australian Co. were to give debentures in their company to Goldsbrough, Mort, & Co., in part payment of the purchase-money.

On August 9, 1889, the North Australian Co. passed resolutions for a voluntary winding up in England, and a supervision order was shortly afterwards made.

On November 7, 1889, the North Australian Co., through its liquidator, instituted an action in England against Goldsbrough, Mort, & Co., who were a company registered in Australia, but having an office in England with an English board of directors, claiming rescission of the above-mentioned agreement, repayment of the cash paid under it, and damages for misrepresentation. The plaintiff company, through its liquidator, made an application in that action that the defendant company, through their secretary, H. B. Hervey, might be ordered to make an affidavit of documents in their possession relating to the matters in question in the action, and to produce such documents for inspection, and also that he might be ordered to answer interrogatories which the liquidator desired to put.

Kay, J., on March, 7, 1890, made an order requiring Hervey to make an affidavit of documents, but refused to make an immediate order for production, and also refused to allow interrogatories to be delivered at that stage of the action, or until after a statement of defence had been delivered. The time for delivering the defence had not yet expired. The plaintiff company had not appealed from this refusal of Kay, J., to allow interrogatories to be then delivered, or to require immediate production of documents.

Subsequently, however, the liquidator applied for and obtained an order under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, that Hervey (who was also a shareholder in the liquidating company) should be examined under that section, and Hervey, accordingly, presented himself for examination before an examiner appointed by the court, when, having admitted that letters had passed between the head office of the defendant company in Australia and the London branch with reference to the purchase of Fisher's property, a question was put as to whether "communications passed in the same way with reference to the formation of the company to purchase Fisher's property"? This question Hervey refused to answer, and the examiner having referred the matter to the judge, Kekewich, J., sitting for Kay, J., on April 25, 1890, made the order now appealed from—viz., that Hervey should attend, at his own expense, before the examiner, and answer the question.

Section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that "the court may, after it has made an order for winding up the company, summon before it any officer of the company, or person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects of the company, or supposed to be indebted to the company, or any person whom the court may deem capable of giving information concerning the trade dealings, estate, or effects of the company . . ."

Section 117 provides that "the court may examine upon oath, either by word of mouth or upon written interrogatories, any person appearing or brought before them in manner aforesaid, concerning the affairs, dealings, estate, or effects of the company, and may reduce into writing the answers of every such person, and require him to subscribe the same."

Hervey appealed from the order of Kekewich, J.

Latham, Q.C., and Pollard, for the appellant.—The question which the appellant refused to answer is one referring to the very communications and documents in respect of which the North Australian Co. had founded and brought their action for rescission of the agreement on the ground of misrepresentation, and the liquidator of that company is now seeking, by means of section 115, to get the discovery which Kay, J., on the application for discovery made in that action, refused to order at that stage of the action, as being premature. The question is not put to obtain information as to the estate or dealings of the company in liquidation. In the case of In re Metropolitan Bank, Heiron's case, 15 Ch. D. 139, 29 W. R. Dig. 45, the court refused an application under this section by the liquidator for examination of a defendant in a pending action. [FRY, L.J.—But you have not appealed from the order made under section 115 for the examination of Hervey.] No, because Hervey could not then know what questions would be put to him on examination, and he would have been bound to answer questions properly put (e.g., relating to the assets of the company): Massey v. Allen, 26 W. R. 908, 9 Ch. D. 164. Besides, it is doubtful whether Hervey would have any locus standi to appeal from that order, having regard to the observations of Jessel, M.R., in In re Gold Co., 27 W. R. 757, 12 Ch. D. 77, at p. 82, and In re Silkstone, &c., Iron Co., 30 W. R. 33, 19 Ch. D. 118. [COTTON, L.J.—Examination of a person under section 115 is not an examination of such person as a witness in the ordinary sense.] Hervey is not an official of the company in liquidation, but he is the secretary of the defendant company in the action instituted by the liquidating company, and this is, therefore, an attempt to get from the opposing litigant the discovery in that action which Kay, J., refused to order at the present stage. The case of In re Metropolitan Electric Light and Power Co., Ex parte Leaver, 51 L. T. N. S. 817, is distinguishable, as there the person ordered to be examined was an officer of the company in liquidation. Though there may be no hard and fast rule that the pendency of an action is a bar to an order for examination under section 115, yet in the particular circumstances of this case Hervey ought not to be required to answer this question.

Renshaw, Q.C., and C. E. E. Jenkins, for the liquidator, the respondent.—Section 115 is perfectly general in its scope, and enables the liquidator, with the sanction of the court, to examine any person, and the judge below has decided that this question is a proper one, and ought to be answered by Hervey. The pendency of an action is no ground for staying an examination under section 115: In re Contract Corporation Co., Ex parte Bateman, 15 W. R. 118; that case shows that it has been the practice of the court to allow an actual litigant to be examined under section 115. The appellant has mistaken his remedy; he ought, when the order for examination under section 115 was made, have applied to have that order discharged, limited, or at least postponed, until after the trial of the action then pending: In re Imperial Continental Water Corporation, 33 Ch. D. 314, 35 W. R. Dig. 46. [BOWEN, L.J.—That objection was not taken by you before Kekewich, J.] We admit that the question has been put to obtain information in the pending action; but an action has also been brought by Goldsbrough, Mort, & Co. in Australia against the North Australian Co., and the question may be material as to that action.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order directing the secretary of the defendant company to attend at his own expense and to answer the question which has been put to him and which he declined at answer.

Is that order right? We have not now to decide whether a person summoned under section 115 has or has not any locus standi to appeal against an order made under that section. I do not, however, express any opinion at all favourable to the view that he cannot in a proper case appeal, because it seems to me that it will be wrong to say that when a person is examined, not as a witness in an action, and not for the purpose of giving evidence in the cause or action, but for the purpose of giving information to a liquidator of a company, he cannot appeal to ascertain whether the order has been properly made or not.

But that is not the question we have to decide now. Mr. Hervey, having been summoned to be examined under section 115, has refused to answer a particular question, and the judge has made an order compelling him to attend at his own expense and answer the question.

I think sufficient regard has not been paid to the words of the section, which are "the court may after it has made an order for winding up the company, summon before it any officer of the company" or any other person to attend and be examined and give any information he can with reference to the company which is being wound up; that shows, as I pointed out in a case which has been referred to (Heiron's case), that it is a matter in the discretion of the court, and not a matter of right in any person.

In the present case a question has been put, which is admittedly a question put simply for the purpose of obtaining information in the action which has been brought by the liquidator against the defendant company, whose secretary Mr. Hervey is.

It is very true that Mr. Hervey could not at first know what questions would be put, and, in my opinion, if questions are put under the powers given by this section which ought not in the opinion of this court to be put, we ought, under the circumstances of the present case, to interfere. As a general rule, where liberty is given—not to the liquidator—but to a creditor or contributory to examine under this section, the court does direct what questions shall be put in examination; but in the case of the liquidator the court does not generally direct what questions shall be put, but it trusts the liquidator. I should certainly do the same, unless I considered that questions were being put which, in the particular circumstances of the case, ought not to be put by the liquidator, even although trusting him to put only such questions as were necessary in the interests of the company. I do not say that the questions put in the present case are in no way in the interests of the company; they are no doubt put in the interests of the company with reference to the action which has been brought by the liquidator, but except with the view of enabling the company in liquidation to get judgment in that action, the questions put do not in any way tend to assist the interests of the company in liquidation.

In that action an order has been obtained by the liquidator as against the defendant company requiring the secretary of that company to make an affidavit of documents, but the judge held that it was permature at that stage of the action to make an order for production of those documents, and also that it would be premature until the further progress of the action to require the defendant company—by its secretary it may possibly be—to answer interrogatories which the plaintiff company desired to put.

As was pointed out by Bowen, L.J., in the course of the argument, the present proceeding is really an attempt to act contrary to that order, to get round it, and by a side wind as it were, by means of section 115, to do what the judge refused by that order to do. That order has not been appealed from, and we must take it to be a right order, and in my opinion it would be wrong in the present case to allow the liquidator, by means of section 115, to get discovery and inspection which the judge by that order has held it would be premature to give.

I do not at all say that circumstances may not occur when it may be right for the liquidator to put this question; the only question, however, which we have now to decide, is whether Kekewich, J., was right in requiring the secretary to attend and answer this question. I think he was wrong in that, and although the only order we make is that the order made by him be discharged, yet I express my opinion that under the existing circumstances it will not be right to put to Mr. Hervey, who is being examined, any question relating to the matters in question in that action.

We have nothing properly before us to show that this question can in any way benefit the interests of the company in liquidation, except by assisting them to get a judgment in that action.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The section put in motion in the examination of a person under such circumstances is a section which places the decision as to examination and as to its limits within the discretion of the court. That being so, I do not think that we ought to attempt beforehand to classify all the occasions upon which it may be proper to make such an order, nor to classify or categorize all the occasions on which it may be unwise to make such an order. We ought not to fetter the discretion of the court in the future. But it does not follow from that that nothing can be said on the subject which may not be worthy the attention of those who have to put in motion this section.

In the first place it is to be observed that the section is an extraordinary section. It is an extraordinary power, a power of an inquisitorial kind, which enables the court to direct the examination (not merely before itself, but before the examiner appointed by the court) of some third person who is no party to a litigation. That is an inquisitorial power, which may work with great severity against third persons, and it seems to me to be obvious that such a section ought to be used with the greatest care, so as not unnecessarily to put in motion the machinery of justice when it is not wanted, or to put it in motion at a time when it is not clear that it is wanted, and certainly not to put it in motion if unnecessary mischief is going to be done or hardship inflicted upon the third person, who is called upon to appear and give information.

Having regard to those characteristics of this section, I should certainly be reluctant to conclude that the witness—if I may call him a witness—the examinee, the person who is to be examined, and against or on whom the order has been served—has not a locus standi to complain that that order is oppressive or hard upon him; and though it is not necessary to decide it one way or other in this case, it seems to me that the point ought to be left open, notwithstanding the language of the late Master of the Rolls in the case of In re Gold Co., which seems to me at the first blush to go too far, and, indeed, to be contrary to the decision in Heiron's case. But I desire to leave the point perfectly open now, as it is not necessary now to decide it, and it is much better not to fetter ourselves in the future by deciding what is now unnecessary. For the same reason I abstain, like Cotton, L.J., from attempting to lay down any hard and fast categories as to what ought to be the character of the occasions on which judicial discretion should be exercised to make an order for the examination of a witness under this section. I do not, as far as I am concerned, lay down as a hard and fast line that the concurrence of an action is a necessary bar to the exercise of the discretion of the court under this section, though one cannot but see that the concurrence of an action begun by the liquidator is a matter which ought to be carefully considered by the court in exercising its discretion on the subject.

It is sufficient in this case to say (and it is on this ground that I decide this case) that at this stage this order to answer cannot properly be wanted for the purpose of the winding up. The question put, it is admitted (and it could not be denied), simply goes in aid of the discovery which would be given in the action which the liquidator has begun. There is an order for an affidavit of documents which has to be complied with on the 7th of June next, and the production of documents is ordered to stand over. A summons for interrogatories has been postponed— and rightly postponed, I doubt not—on the ground that it was premature; that the issues in the action had not been sufficiently defined for interrogatories, and that it would be time enough for interrogatories to be delivered when the defence had been put in. The court, therefore, in this very matter has thought that complete discovery was not wanted at this moment for the purposes of the action even. A fortiori, one would think, it cannot be wanted for the purpose of the winding up, it being admitted that the question which is sought to be enforced goes simply in aid of the discovery which would be wanted in the action. It is impossible, therefore, to resist the inference that this question is simply sought to be pressed in order to give the go-by to the decision of the court as to the postponement of the interrogatories and the non-immediate production of the documents; and it is really an attempt to get discovery for the purpose of that action at a moment when the court says it would be premature to insist upon it. Counsel for the respondent ask us to infer that the liquidator had some mysterious and excellent reasons, other than this, for insisting upon an answer to the question, but none have been shown; and, although it is, doubtless, not to be presumed that liquidators, who are officers of the court and have a duty to perform, will perform their duty recklessly, unless the court see some reason to think they will, as they do sometimes, yet there is such a thing as over-zeal in officers; and, having regard to the facts of the case which we do know, I do not hesitate myself to draw the inference I have mentioned. If so, it would be an abuse and an oppression to allow a witness to be forced. He will give such discovery in time as it is wanted in the action, and I say nothing as to any case which can be made either in aid of the action or otherwise as to employing this section should it be wanted for the purpose of the winding up. I am clear that at this stage this machinery is not wanted, and that it would be premature to use it in the way in which it is sought to use it, and that it would be an oppression.

I believe that, under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 113, and under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869, it will be found that appeals have been successfully maintained against orders of this nature.*

FRY, L.J.—I entirely agree with what has been said as to the nature of this section. The section gives a power to the court to summon a person before it, and the examination is taken, not under section 115, but under section 117, which enables the court to examine upon oath, either by word of mouth or by written interrogatory, the person. The whole of the proceeding, therefore, is a proceeding by the court, and the liquidator, the contributory, or the other person whom the court allows to intervene and to be active in the proceedings, only does so by leave of the court, because he is a person supposed to have the means of addressing inquiries to the witness; that is an entirely different proceeding to that in which a litigant summonses a witness and examines that witness before the court. The liquidator, therefore, in insisting, as he seems to have done in the argument addressed to us, upon the right to the question, has, I think, entirely mistaken his position. Each question is put by the liquidator only by the leave of the court and on behalf of the court.

The whole of the question comes, therefore, to be this; whether, if I, as a judge constituting a court, were sitting and examining this witness with the information which has been given us on both sides, I should put this question to the witness and require him to make the discovery which would be involved in the answer to this question? What are the circumstances under which this person is brought before the court? [The Lord Justice stated the facts as above set out, relating to the action brought by the company in liquidation against Goldsbrough, Mort, & Co., and the orders with respect to discovery made therein, and continued:—]. That is the way in which the learned judge, in the action instituted by the liquidator, has exercised his discretion. Should I, as a judge in the winding up, sitting with Mr. Hervey before me, put a question which, instead of exercising the discretion in the same way, exercises it in a totally different way, and instead of requiring an affidavit to be made at a future time giving full discovery, requires Hervey to state then and there whether there had been this correspondence. I should not have put that question to him, and I cannot help seeing that the liquidator has been endeavouring to induce Kekewich, J., to exercise his discretion in a manner entirely at variance with the exercise of a like discretion by Kay, J., in the action.

I have spoken throughout as if Hervey were the same person as Goldsbrough, Mort, & Co., and I do so because he is the secretary in England of the English board of directors of that company. Of course it is manifest that he is examined in that character, and the questions put were—as was very fairly admitted by the respondent's counsel—put with a view to elicit the same information which was not to be obtained in the action until a later date.

Like my brethren I desire entirely to abstain from laying down any proposition to fetter the discretion of the court from time to time to be exercised under sections 115 and 117. I have no right to fetter the discretion of the court in these cases; but one can see this plainly, that the question whether a man may be twice vexed with the same question may often be material; and the question whether the putting to him the interrogatory under section 115 would be inconsistent with the order which had been previously made in the litigation between the same parties may again be material; and therefore in this case I think that the right discretion would be not to allow the question to be put. The witness having refused to answer it, he ought not to be directed to attend and answer.

Though, no doubt, this court is unwilling generally to review and interfere with the exercise of discretion by the judge below—and we feel that in this case—yet in the present case it appears to me that Kekewich, J., has proceeded upon some notion of the right of a liquidator to obtain discovery under this section. No such right, in my judgment, exists. The right is that of the court, and that of the court only.

The decision of Kekewich, J., must be reversed, and the summons dismissed, with costs, both here and below.

Appeal allowed.

MITCHELL v. SIMPSON. (a.)

Attachment—Judgment debtor—"Attachment for debt"—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5—Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), s. 14, sub-section 1 (c).

A judgment debtor, against whom a committal order has been made under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, is not entitled, on his arrest, to claim to be taken to a safe and convenient dwelling-house for twenty-four hours before being taken to prison, since such a committal order is not an "attachment for debt" within the meaning of section 14, sub-section 1 (c), of the Sheriffs Act, 1887.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Denman and Charles, JJ.), reported 37 W. R. 798, 23 Q. B. D. 373.

A judgment having been obtained against the plaintiff in the Salford Hundred Court, an application was made for his committal under the Debtors Act, 1869, and on February 7, 1888, the judge, being satisfied that he had means of paying the debt and wilfully neglected to do so, committed him to prison for twenty-one days, or until he should pay the debt. On June 18 the defendant, the high bailiff of the court, arrested the plaintiff in London. The plaintiff asked to be taken to an hotel for the night, but the defendant refused, and took him first to a police-station, and thence by train to Manchester, where he was lodged in gaol.

The plaintiff brought the present action for damages for a violation of the Sheriffs Act, 1887, s. 14, sub-section 1 (c). Manisty, J., nonsuited the plaintiff, and the Divisional Court declined to grant a new trial, on the ground that the committal order was not an "attachment for debt" within the meaning of the sub-section.

By section 14 of the Sheriffs Act, 1887, "Where an officer, being a sheriff, under-sheriff, bailiff, serjeant-at-mace, or other officer whatsoever, arrests, or has in custody, any person by virtue of any action, writ, or attachment for debt, such officer shall not . . . (c) take such person to any prison within twenty-four hours of the time of his arrest, unless such person refuses to be carried to some safe and convenient dwelling-house of his own nomination, not being the private dwelling-house of such person, and being within the borough or town where such person was arrested, or, if he was not arrested within a borough or town, then within three miles of the place and in the county or franchise in which he was arrested."

Channell, Q.C., and J. D. O'Flynn, for the plaintiff.—The section is a re-enactment of 32 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 1. That spoke of "action, writ, process, or attachment." The words "attachment for debt" are, therefore, new, and refer to committal orders such as this. The Act of Geo. 2 had reference only to mesne process: Evans v. Atkins, 4 T. R. 555; and now that mesne process has been abolished by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 and by the Debtors Act, 1869, there is nothing but committal orders to which the words "attachment for debt" can apply.

Ambrose, Q.C., and A. J. David.—The Sheriffs Act, 1887, merely consolidates the law, and does not alter or amend it. Mesne process was not entirely abolished by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and therefore the section still applies to arrests on mesne process, and not to committal orders.

They cited and referred to Marris v. Ingram, 28 W. R. 434, 13 Ch. D. 338; Holroyde v. Garnett, 30 W. R. 604, 20 Ch. D. 532; In re Freston, 31 W. R. 804, 11 Q. B. Cur. adv. vult.

May 19.—The following judgments were delivered:—

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff brings an action against the high bailiff of the Salford Hundred Court because, under an order made by the judge of that court directing the high bailiff to arrest the plaintiff, the high bailiff did not allow him when arrested to to to an hotel for twenty-four hours before going to gaol. The judge's order was made under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and the jurisdiction given by that section is only to be exercised when it is proved that the person against whom the order is to be made might have had or has the means to pay his debt and has refused or wilfully neglected to pay it. It must, therefore, be assumed, and it is not disputed, that the plaintiff had the means to pay the debt for which judgment had gone against him, and that he had refused or neglected to pay. Now he brings an action under section 14 of the Sheriffs Act because the high bailiff did not take him to an hotel. He would have had to pay for his own food and drink while there, so that it is plain that when he asked to be taken there he had some money upon him. Can it be conceived that, under these circumstances, even if he were entitled to succeed, any jury would give him one farthing damages? However, he has raised a point of principle which is undoubtedly of importance. If he is right in his contention, then in every case, and they are very numerous, where a man is arrested under an order for committal he must be taken to an hotel or some such place for twenty-four hours, where he will, nevertheless, be in the custody of the sheriff's officer. The difficulties of carrying out such a provision are obviously very great; but, nevertheless, if the contention is right we must say so, and leave it to the Legislature to cure the flaw in the Act. But is the arrest under an order for committal an "attachment for debt" within the meaning of the section? I do not think it is. A man is not now arrested for debt. He is arrested for the offence of contumaciously refusing to obey the court and to pay his debt when he has the means to do so. The Sheriffs Act, 1887, is a consolidating Act, and the particular section follows very nearly the words of 32 Geo. 2, c. 28. Now, what were the circumstances to which that Act applied? At that time a man who was in debt before any action brought against him might be arrested by his creditor on mesne process. Then he was taken to a sponging house, where enormities and extortions of which we have all read were practised against him. The Act was passed to do away with that state of things. The Act recites that:—"Whereas many persons suffer in the execution of process for debt and the exaction of jaylers to whom such debtors are committed," and goes on to enact that henceforward any person arrested "by virtue or colour of any action, writ, process, or attachment" shall be taken to a dwelling-house of his own nomination for twenty-four hours. "Process" there, of course, means process for debt. The Sheriffs Act speaks of "any action, writ, or attachment for debt." It is, therefore, not an exact repetition of the Act of Geo. 2, but really the two sections are identical. On the other hand, what a difference there is between the arrest on mesne process for debt and the arrest for an offence against the court in contumaciously disobeying its order. The things are absolutely different in their nature, their legal cause and effect, and, quite apart from any other consideration, I should be prepared to say that neither the Act of Geo. 2 nor section 14 of the Sheriffs Act were applicable to an arrest under an order for committal. But the Act of Geo. 2 applied only to arrest on mesne process, and section 14 of the Sheriffs Act, being substantially a re-enactment of that Act, applies, therefore, also only to mesne process if there is in existence any mesne process to which it can apply.

It was argued that mesne process had been altogether abolished, but after long discussion we have come to the conclusion that it was not altogether abolished, but that it still exists in a restricted form for certain purposes. That being so, section 14 applies to mesne process only, and does not apply to an arrest under an order for committal. Therefore, the plaintiff's point fails, and he was rightly nonsuited, and this appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—The question turns on section 14 of the Sheriffs Act, 1887, and we have to decide whether a committal under the Debtors Act, 1869, is an attachment for debt within the meaning of that section. The Sheriffs Act, 1887, is a consolidating Act, and does not purport to alter or amend the existing law. It ought, therefore, to have the same, and no larger, effect than the Acts which it supersede. But it is said that whereas when the Act of Geo. 2 was passed arrest on mesne process existed, to which alone that Act was applicable, now mesne process has been entirely abolished, and that, therefore, there is nothing to which the words "attachment for debt" can apply but committals under the Debtors Act. No doubt the words must have some application, and no doubt in Evans v. Atkins Lord Kenyon said that the Act of Geo. 2 applied only to persons arrested on mesne process, and added, "Such, indeed, has always been the opinion in Westminster Hall since the passing of this Act." That case was decided in 1792, and the learning and industry of counsel have not been able to supply us with any case to the contrary, so that there seems to have been a uniform construction of the Act as applying only to arrest on mesne process. In 1838 the Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 was passed, which it is contended abolished mesne process. That argument is, I think, erroneous. It was provided by section 1 that no person should be arrested on mesne process after the commencement of the Act, except in certain specified cases, but power was reserved to arrest on mesne process in those cases. The Act, therefore, only restricted and modified, but did not entirely abolish, arrest on mesne process. A nice question which it is not now material to decide may arise as to whether the Crown may not still proceed by mesne process, for though the more usual procedure is by writ of extent, nevertheless it has the right to make use of any procedure which is available to a subject. It is sufficient for the present purpose if any mesne process exists to which the section can apply. As I have said, I think that, although restricted, mesne process has not been abolished. Therefore, there is something to which the words "attachment for debt" can apply, and the construction uniformly put upon the Act of Geo. 2 must also be given to section 14 of the consolidating Act. The plaintiff's contention accordingly fails, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—The Sheriffs Act, 1887, is a consolidating, and not an amending, Act. In my opinion, section 14 is only a re-enactment of section 1 of 32 Geo. 2, c. 28. That Act only applied to arrest on mesne process, and I think section 14 has no further application, and does not apply to an arrest under an order of committal. It is said that mesne process has been abolished, and that there is nothing to which the section can apply. Even if that were so I should still think that it did not apply to such an arrest as in the present case. But I think there are still cases of arrest on mesne process to which it might apply, such, for instance, as Crown debts and the writ of ne exeat regno. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

GEBRÜDER NÄF v. PLOTON. (a.)

Practice—Lien—Payment into court—Ord. 50, r. 8.

Under ord. 50, r. 8, where an action is brought to recover specific property, and the defendant does not dispute the plaintiff's title, but claims to retain the property by virtue of a lien upon it, the court has power, on the application of the plaintiff, to order the property to be given up to him upon payment into court of the amount in respect of which the lien is claimed.

Held, that, in order that the property should be given up to the plaintiff, the whole amount for which the lien is claimed must be paid into court, even though such amount exceed the value of the property.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Huddleston, B., and Grantham, J.).

The action was brought to recover goods consigned by the plaintiffs to the defendant as their agent.

The defendant admitted the plaintiffs' title to the goods, but claimed a lien upon them in respect of commission for £942 3s. 7d.

The plaintiffs took out a summons under ord. 50, r. 8, for liberty to pay into court the sum of £329 7s. 10d., which they admitted to be due from them to the defendant, and such further sum as the judge might order, and that upon such payment the goods should be given up to them. It was admitted that the value of the goods was about £600.

Lawrance, J., at chambers, ordered the plaintiffs to pay into court the whole amount of £942 3s. 7d. claimed by the defendant by way of commission, which was accordingly done, and the goods were given up. The Divisional Court upheld the order of Lawrance, J.

The plaintiffs appealed, and asked that the order should be varied by directing that upon payment into court by the plaintiffs of £329 7s. 10d. the goods should be given up by the defendant or that the sum of £612 15s. 9d. should be paid out of court to the plaintiffs.

By ord. 50, r. 8, "Where an action is brought to recover . . . specific property other than land, and the party from whom such recovery is sought does not dispute the title of the party seeking to recover the same, but claims to retain the property by virtue of a lien or otherwise as security for any sum of money, the court or a judge may . . . order that the party claiming to recover the property be at liberty to pay into court, to abide the event of the action, the amount of money in respect of which the lien or security is claimed, and such further sum (if any) for interest and costs as such court or judge may direct, and that upon such payment into court being made the property claimed be given up to the party claiming it."

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Pelle, for the plaintiffs.—The judge was wrong in making the order. He did not exercise his discretion. The value of the goods is less than the amount for which a lien is claimed, and at the most all that the plaintiffs should be ordered to pay should be the value of the goods. It is a hardship to order them to pay the full amount for which a lien is claimed, and an unreasonable or fraudulent claim for lien might utterly defeat the intention of the rule.

Robert Wallace, for the defendant.—The defendant has given up the goods on which he had a lien on the payment into court of the amount which he claimed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This rule must, I think, be construed in accordance with the ordinary rules of construction—that is to say, according to the ordinary grammatical meaning of the language used. Where an action is brought to recover specific property other than land, and the defendant admits the plaintiff's title, but claims to retain the property in virtue of a lien, the court may order that the party claiming to recover the property be at liberty to pay into court, to abide the event of the action, "the amount of money in respect of which the lien is claimed." What can that mean but the amount for which the lien is claimed? The plaintiffs claim the property, the defendant claims the money in respect of which he holds a lien on the property. There is nothing in the rule as to an order to pay the amount of the property into court. The words of the section are perfectly plain, and it is no answer to those plain words to say that they give rise to hardship. The order can only, I think, be made to pay the amount for which a lien is claimed. If, however, a fraudulent or unreasonable claim for lien is made for the purpose of defeating the rule, which, however, is not alleged to be the case here, the court will have to consider the question.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The order gives liberty to pay into court a sum of money in respect of which a lien is claimed, and on that payment to receive the goods claimed. That must mean the sum of money for which the lien is claimed. Mr. Collins invites us to read into the rule "or the value of the goods, whichever shall happen to be the smallest." I can see no authority for doing so. Things are to be taken as they stand, and the goods are to be given up on the payment into court of the amount for which a lien upon them is claimed. No doubt an unreasonable claim for lien might defeat the operation of the rule, but nevertheless the intention of the rule is obvious. The decision of the court is not invited on any litigated matter. The claims of plaintiffs and defendant are to be taken as they are, and on them the order is to be made.

LOPES, L.J.—In my opinion this rule gives an indulgence to a plaintiff. It is in his favour, for he gets what he could not get before. According to the ordinary meaning of language he must pay into court the amount for which the lien is claimed. In this case it is not alleged that there is not a bonâ fide and reasonable claim. That is, in my opinion, the true construction of the rule, and I think that the appeal therefore fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Ex parte OFFICIAL RECEIVER. (a.)

Bill of sale—Pretended sale of goods—Hiring agreement—Power of court to go behind form of document—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4.

A transaction purported to be a sale by delivery of certain goods for value, followed by an agreement in writing, under which the goods were let on hire by the alleged purchaser to the alleged vendor, with power to the alleged purchaser to retake possession on the happening of certain events. The real nature of the transaction was one of loan upon the security of the goods, and not a bonâ fide sale and hiring.

Held, that the court was not precluded by the form of the document from inquiring into the real nature of the transaction, and that the alleged hiring agreement was a bill of sale, it being a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt" within section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

In re Yarrow, ante, p. 175, not followed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Cave and Lawrance, JJ.), affirming the decision of the judge of the Liverpool County Court, upon an application for an order declaring that certain furniture, which had been seized by one Love, was the property of the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy of Mary Watson.

It appeared that Mary Watson, being in want of money, and not wishing to execute a bill of sale over her furniture, applied to Love, and he agreed to advance her £150. An inventory with a valuation of the furniture was made, and at an interview which took place between them, Mary Watson handed a chair to Love on behalf of all the furniture, stating that she sold him her furniture, and he paid her £150. She then signed a hiring agreement, to which the inventory was attached. In this hiring agreement Love was described as the owner and Mary Watson as the hirer of the furniture, and it stated that the owner agreed to let and the hirer agreed to take on hire the furniture, the hirer paying to the owner a rent of £40 every four months; the furniture to become the property of the hirer when £200 should have been paid in rent by her, but until then it was to remain the absolute property of the owner; with power to her during the hire to purchase the furniture by payment in cash of a sum which with any amounts already paid should make up the sum of £200. The owner had power upon the happening of certain events to terminate the hiring and retake possession of the furniture. This document was not registered under the Bills of Sale Acts.

Subsequently Mary Watson filed her petition in bankruptcy in the Liverpool County Court, and shortly before this Love took possession of the furniture under the hiring agreement. The official receiver applied for an order declaring the furniture to be his property, and that the hiring agreement was a bill of sale and void as against him under the Bills of Sale Acts. The county court judge found upon the evidence that there was no bonâ fide sale of the furniture by the bankrupt to Love; that in reality the transaction was one of loan upon the security of the furniture, the terms of the security being contained in the hiring agreement; but he held that he was bound by the decision in United £40 Loan Club v. Bexton (not reported), to hold that the document was not a bill of sale, and he accordingly dismissed the application.

The Divisional Court considered themselves precluded by the judgment of Cave, J., in In re Yarrow, ante,

p. 175, from going behind the form of the document, and dismissed the appeal.

The official receiver appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G. (Muir Mackenzie with him), for the appellant.—The county court judge considered himself bound by the judgment of Fry, L.J., and Mathew, J., sitting as a divisional court, in United £40 Loan Club v. Bexton (not reported) to hold that as a matter of law this document was not a bill of sale. In that case, however, the court found as a fact that there had been a bonâ fide sale anterior to the hiring agreement, while here the judge has found that there was not. Here the hiring agreement is the security, and it is either a "licence to take possession of the personal chattels as security for a debt," or it is an "assurance of personal chattels," within section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. The judgment of Cave, J., in In re Yarrow, where he criticized the previous decisions in the Court of Appeal as being inconsistent, cannot be supported. The decisions upon the point all show that the real nature of the transaction must be inquired into. If there has been a bonâ fide sale and a subsequent hiring agreement, then the hiring agreement cannot be a bill of sale. If, however, there has been no real sale, but only a loan on security, then the hiring agreement, which contains the terms of the security, is a bill of sale. [He referred to Yorkshire Railway Wagon Co. v. Maclure, 30 W. R. 761, 21 Ch. D. 309; North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co, 35 W. R. 443, 35 Ch. D. 191; and in the House of Lords, 37 W. R. 305, 13 App. Cas. 554; Gapp v. Bond, 35 W. R. 683, 19 Q. B. D. 200.] The decision of Kay, J., in Redhead v. Westwood, 59 L. T. N. S. 293, seems to show that the form of the document alone must be looked at, but that case cannot be supported.

He also referred to Phillips v. Gibbons, 5 W. R. 527.

A. J. Allen, for the respondent, Love.—In the present case the title to the furniture was transferred for value by delivery of a chair on behalf of all, prior to the hiring agreement. That document did not give Love any title to the furniture; his title was complete before the document was signed. The legal estate passed to Love by delivery for value, that being the intention of the parties; and Love, having the legal estate in him, was in a position to let the furniture on hire. Whether the transaction prior to the hiring agreement was a sale or a mortgage, the legal estate passed to Love at that time. The hiring agreement therefore was not an "assurance;" nor was it a "licence to take possession," because those words only refer to a licence to take possession of the goods of the borrower, and here the goods belonged to Love.

He referred to Meyerstein v. Barber, 15 W. R. 173, L. R. 2 C. P. 38, at p. 51.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., did not reply.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the learned county court judge first decided certain questions of fact, and upon those findings of fact arrived at a certain conclusion of law. The case was thereupon taken to the Divisional Court, and that court merely gave a formal judgment dismissing the appeal, feeling itself bound by a judgment of Cave, J., in In re Yarrow. Upon the suggestion that the decisions of this court are inconsistent with each other, and in consequence of that suggestion, the case has been heard before the full Court of Appeal. The question of law which we have to decide upon the facts as found by the county court judge seems to me to be this: Is the court precluded from going into the true nature of the transaction and deciding the case according to the facts because the parties have chosen to disguise the nature of the transaction by putting it into a form other than that of a bill of sale? The county court judge thought himself bound by authority so to hold.

Now the county court judge has found that the bankrupt did not intend to sell her furniture. She intended to borrow money on the security of it. Love never intended to buy the furniture; he intended to lend the money, taking as security a right over the furniture. He lent £150 and was to be repaid £200 by instalments. Then followed the handing over of the chair to Love in the name of all the furniture, which the judge found to be a sham, and not a delivery under a contract of purchase and sale. Then the hiring agreement, with the inventory attached, was signed, which document was the security for the loan, Love being thereby authorised to take possession of the furniture and sell it in certain contingencies. That document was the evidence of his security, and without it he could have no right to seize and sell the furniture. At the very least the document was a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt." If, however, the property in the furniture did pass under this document, the transaction was a mortgage, and the document was an assurance of personal chattels. I cannot doubt that in either case it comes within the definition of a bill of sale given in section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. I do not understand that the county court judge says that it is not, but he considered that he was precluded by authority from getting at the truth. Unless, therefore, the court is precluded from getting at the truth, this document must be held to be void as a bill of sale.

The question accordingly remains whether the court can go through the document to get at the truth. If I can possibly help it I never will be a party to allowing any document to stand in the way of the court getting at the truth. Is there any authority binding upon us which compels us to hold that we are bound by the form of the document? The county court judge thought that the case of United £40 Loan Club v. Bexton, before Fry, L.J., and Mathew, J., was a decision to that effect. It seems to me that the learned judge misconceived that decision. There were three questions raised in that case. The first question was whether the transaction was entered into with intent to defeat and defraud creditors. The court held that it was not. The second question was whether the property passed, and the court came to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that it was the intention of the parties that the property should pass, and that it did pass prior to the hiring agreement. The third question was whether the document, which was a hiring agreement, required registration under the Bills of Sale Acts. The court came to the conclusion, upon the facts, that there was a bonâ fide sale followed by a bonâ fide contract of hiring. That case is merely an instance of the proposition that, if the court comes to that conclusion, the hiring agreement is not a bill of sale. It is nowhere said that, if the transaction is put into the form of a hiring agreement by the alleged owner, and there is no bonâ fide sale and hiring at all, but the hiring agreement is in truth merely a licence to take possession, the court cannot get at the truth of the transaction. That case, therefore, does not support the conclusion of the county court judge. Then, with regard to the judgment of Cave, J., in In re Yarrow, having carefully considered the strictures that he has passed upon the various decisions, chiefly of this court, I can find no contradiction between those decisions. The first case is The Yorkshire Railway Wagon Co. v. Maclure, which was heard before Sir George Jessel and Lindley and Holker, L.JJ. Each of those learned judges does exactly what I have said the court ought to do. The documents put before them could, upon their face, admit of only one meaning. The court, however, inquired into the real facts of the case, and decided the case upon the true facts, and not upon the form of the documents. Lindley, L.J., says: "I understand the view of the learned judge was this, that this transaction of hire was a mere device or cloak to conceal a loan. If that had been the view I took of the facts, I should have come, of course, to the same conclusion. I should disregard or throw aside the cloak and look at the real transaction alone. But, for reasons I will give presently, I am satisfied that the purchase and hire transaction was the real transaction, in this sense, that the parties meant it to operate according to its tenor as comprised in the deeds. It was not intended by them as a mere blind or cloak for something behind, it was a transaction substituted for another, but bonâ fide substituted, and intended to be acted upon according to its purport and apparent effect." Therefore the court in that case did not stop at the documents, but inquired into the facts, and they found the documents to be in accordance with the truth, and that the transaction was a real sale and hiring, and that, consequently, the Bills of Sale Acts did not apply. Of course the court must take the form of the document into consideration as an element in arriving at the truth. Primâ facie the form is against those who allege that the document is a bill of sale. But if the evidence shows that the form is not in accordance with the real nature of the transaction, then the court will throw aside the form. The next case is The North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., and Cave, J., attributes to Cotton, L.J., a view inconsistent with what I have been stating. There Cotton, L.J., says: "Of course the hiring and letting agreement cannot in itself be a bill of sale, but it may be looked at to see what the nature of the transaction was as regards the second part of the transaction." He then goes into the facts of the case, and continues: "Here, upon the evidence, I think it is made clear that there was a perfect transaction of purchase and sale on the 18th of February independently of and before these two documents, and before the first of the documents was in any way asked for." There the court did inquire into the facts and act accordingly. Nor can I see that the opinion of Lord Macnaghten in the same case in the House of Lords lends any colour to the criticisms of Cave, J. Then, with reference to Redhead v. Westwood, Kay, J., in that case certainly does seem to make some observations that are contrary to the view I am expressing. I do not say that that case was wrongly decided, as I do not quite know how far the learned judge intended to go. If the learned judge inquired into the facts and came to a conclusion upon them, I agree with that process. If, however, he intended to say that he was precluded by the form of the documents from getting at the truth, then I do not agree with him. The next case is Gapp v. Bond, though prior in point of date, and there admittedly the same view that I have expressed was taken. Having thus gone through the authorities, it seems to me that the criticisms of Cave, J., are completely displaced, and are shown to be misconceived. All the cases seem to me to be consistent. If people try to evade an Act by putting forward documents which contain a false description of the transaction, the court will always go through the documents to get at the truth. If the transaction is, in truth, a loan with a security given by a document over goods, and the parties try to cloak the transaction by putting the document into the form of a hiring agreement following a pretended sale of the goods, then the document is a bill of sale; but if the sale and hiring is bonâ fide, then the document cannot be a bill of sale.

In the present case there was no sale of the furniture. There was nothing but a loan upon the security of the furniture, the terms being contained in a hiring agreement. The document is, at the least, a licence to take possession as security for the loan, and is, therefore, a bill of sale, and consequently void under the Bills of Sale Acts. The lender, therefore, cannot rely upon it. The judgment of the county court judge and of the Divisional Court must accordingly be reversed.

COTTON, L.J.—After the elaborate judgment of the Master of the Rolls, I need only express my opinion shortly. The findings of the county court judge, in my opinion, dispose of the case. The case seems to me to depend upon whether the transaction was a real transaction. If there was a real sale of the furniture, accompanied by the delivery of a chair on behalf of all, then there would be no difficulty in upholding the transaction. But the judge has found that it was a sham, and that the real transaction was one of loan secured on the furniture. The hiring agreement, in which the lender was represented as the owner of the furniture, was false, and, accordingly, the furniture remained the property of Mrs. Watson, and the hiring agreement was only a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt. The county court judge must be taken to have found that the lender had no security beyond the hiring agreement, and that the document came within the definition given of a bill of sale in section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, unless he was precluded from inquiring into the truth of the transaction, and was bound by the form of the document. In my opinion there is no case which even suggests that the court is bound by the form of the document. The judge thought himself bound by the form of the document. Lindley, L.J., has well expressed the true view in Yorkshire Railway Wagon Co. v. Maclure, where he says that if the transaction of hire was a mere device or cloak to conceal a loan, he would disregard or throw aside the cloak and look at the real transaction alone. Cave, J., in In re Yarrow, seems to have thought that I took a different view in the case of the North Central Wagon Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. In that case I, as well as the rest of the court, held that the transaction was a bonâ fide transaction of sale and hiring. In the present case the county court judge has held the transaction not to be a bonâ fide sale and hiring, but a loan upon the security of the furniture, and that the hiring agreement was the evidence of the lender's title. That being so, the hiring agreement is either an assurance of personal chattels within section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, or, as I am disposed to think, a licence to take possession of the furniture as security for a debt within that section.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot quite see why the learned county court judge came to the conclusion that he was bound to decide according to the form of the documents, when he found as a fact that the transaction was one of loan with security—a mortgage, and not a sale with a right of repurchase—and that it was intended that the hiring agreement with the inventory attached should be the record of the transaction and of Love's title. If the authorities are looked at carefully, they will be found to be perfectly consistent, the only apparent inconsistency arising from the difference of the facts in each case. If the hiring agreement is a real letting out of furniture, then the transaction does not come within the Bills of Sale Acts. But if that is not the real nature of the transaction, the question arises, what is the true nature of the document? In the present case it seems to me that it is a licence to take possession of the goods of the borrower. In that view it comes within the definition of a bill of sale in section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. If, however, the lender relies upon the document as showing title in him by way of estoppel against the borrower, then the document becomes an assurance of personal chattels within the definition of a bill of sale given in that section. The true view, however, is that it is a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt. In all the cases that have been cited to us, where the document was held not to be a bill of sale, the court came to the conclusion that the person who let the goods was the real owner of them. When once it is established that the person professing to let the goods is not the real owner, then the transaction becomes a bill of sale.

Fry, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I agree with Lindley, L.J., that this hiring agreement is either a licence to take possession of the goods of the borrower, or if it operates as an assurance of personal chattels it does so by way of estoppel. The only other observations I desire to make are with regard to the case of United £40 Loan Club v. Bexton. That was an interpleader issue. Bexton had been the owner of the goods, and the transaction in question was a sale of the goods by Bexton to Miller, the claimant, and a hiring back by Miller to Bexton. The plaintiffs were attacking Miller's title, and three points were taken on their behalf. It was first of all said that the transaction was void under 13 Eliz. c. 5 as having been entered into with intent to defeat and defraud creditors. We disposed of that point, holding that the transaction was not void upon that ground. Secondly, it was said that under the alleged sale prior to the hiring agreement no property was intended to pass. We arrived at the conclusion that the property was intended to pass, and that disposed of that point. Lastly, it was said that the hiring agreement required registration as a bill of sale. When once we had come to the conclusion, upon the facts before us, that there was a bonâ fide sale of the goods prior to the hiring agreement, that contention fell to the ground, and the document could not possibly be a bill of sale. That was all that that case decided, and it affords no ground for the conclusion of law arrived at by the county court judge in the present case.

Lopes, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the findings of the county court judge conclude the case, and I entirely agree with those findings. I should describe the document as a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for the loan. It comes, therefore, within the Bills of Sale Acts. I cannot help thinking that Cave, J., has misapprehended the various decisions, and upon closer examination he will find them all consistent with our present decision.

By an order made on the 5th of April, 1889, the defendant was directed as trustee to pay two sums of cash into court on or before the 6th of May. He did not comply with the order. On the 13th of May, 1889, a receiving order was made against him on his own petition, and he had not yet obtained his discharge. The plaintiffs now moved for liberty to issue a writ of attachment against him, the notice of motion being dated the 22nd of April, 1890.

Held, that the property and person of the debtor were protected by section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the court had no jurisdiction to direct a writ of attachment to issue against him.

Motion.

This case raised the question whether the court had jurisdiction to direct an attachment to issue against an undischarged bankrupt who had not complied with an order made upon him as trustee to pay money into court.

The order was made on the 5th of April, 1889, and, after stating that certain affidavits had been read, proceeded as follows:—This court doth order that the defendant, Frederick Newbery, as trustee of the will of the above-named testatrix, Maria Simes, do, on or before the 6th of May, 1889, or subsequently within seven days after service of this order, pay into court, as directed in schedule 1 hereto, the sum of £703 6s. 2d. And it is further ordered that the defendant, Frederick Newbery, as trustee of the above-mentioned indentures of settlement, dated the 11th of February, 1887, do, within the like period, pay into court, as directed in schedule 2 hereto, the sum of £473 9s. 4d." In the schedules these sums were described as cash, and were directed to be invested and accumulated in New Consols.

A receiving order was made against the defendant on his own petition on the 13th of May, 1889, and he had not yet obtained his discharge.

The plaintiffs served notice of motion, dated the 22nd of April, 1890, that "the defendant, Frederick Newbery, do stand committed to prison, or otherwise that the plaintiffs be at liberty to issue a writ or writs of attachment against the said defendant for his contempt in not having paid into court, pursuant to the order of his lordship Mr. Justice Kay made in this action on the 5th of April, 1889," the sums above-mentioned.

Waggett, for the motion.

Oswald, for the defendant.—I take the preliminary objection that the defendant is an undischarged bankrupt, and that the plaintiff cannot enforce any remedies against his person or property; he can only prove for the debt: Cobham v. Dalton, 23 W. R. 865, L. R. 10 Ch. 655; In re Ryley, Ex parte The Official Receiver, 33 W. R. 656, 15 Q. B. D. 329. The defendant cannot pay till he gets his discharge. The motion should be refused, with costs, as they must have known the circumstances.

Waggett.—The result of that would be that if any fraudulent trustee got himself made a bankrupt he would never get his discharge and could not be punished. The court has power to punish non-compliance with orders: Marris v. Ingram, 28 W. R. 434, 13 Ch. D. 338. This is a case of fraud. [Kekewich, J.—The jurisdiction depends on the order, not on the basis on which the order was made. The grounds on which the order was made, whether fraud or not, do not affect the jurisdiction. It is a debt provable in bankruptcy, and you can have no remedy against the person of the debtor.] The plaintiffs could prove for it, but that is not their only remedy. The court can enforce the order. Certain affidavits are entered in the order as read. The defendant is ordered to pay the money in the character of trustee, and the money must have been in his hands or the order would not have been made. [Kekewich, J.—The order does not say so, and it makes all the difference. The order directs him to pay into court as trustee, but a breach of trust may constitute a debt.] The order at least shows that it was not his money. There is evidence of his admission that the money was in his hands.

KEKEWICH, J.—I think that any order I may make must be based on Kay, J.'s order. I do not say that I may not look at the affidavits which are entered in the order as read in order to explain the order, but when once I understand the order I must be guided by the order, and not look beyond it in considering whether I have jurisdiction to direct the issue of an attachment against this trustee or not. The order directs him, as trustee of the will of Maria Simes, as to one part, and as trustee of the settlement as regards the other part, to pay into court by a certain date two sums of money. It is specified that the order is made against him as trustee, and that gives the court jurisdiction to enforce it against him, and to direct an attachment to issue for non-compliance. But, in the meantime, bankruptcy supervenes before this motion is brought, and so he comes within the proviso in section 9 of the Act of 1883, that "on the making of a receiving order an official receiver shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor, and thereafter, except as directed by this Act, no creditor to whom the debtor is indebted in respect of any debt provable in bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the debtor in respect of the debt, or shall commence any action or other legal proceedings unless with the leave of the court, and on such terms as the court may impose." This is clearly a debt provable in the bankruptcy. The money was payable by the bankrupt as a trustee, but whether it was payable in that respect or as a debt claimable by virtue of the order, it is a debt which he can be called upon to pay—that is, it is provable in his bankruptcy. Therefore, the remedy against the person or the property of the debtor is for the moment suspended. Mr. Waggett suggests that it must be money in his hands, or the order would not have been made; but, even if so, it would still be merely a debt. It would be quite different if it were a sum in Consols, or money on deposit at a bank, or anything of that kind, for then, being a fund that he was trustee of, it would not be the property of the debtor at all, and in that case there might be a remedy against his person. But there is nothing of that kind here, so the application is wrong, under the 9th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Mr. Waggett points out that the result of this will be that a fraudulent trustee who becomes a fraudulent bankrupt, and by reason of his own conduct does not get his discharge, may by that fact acquire his freedom. That fact is to be deplored, but I have nothing to do with it now. The words of the Act seem to me to be plain, and besides them I have the two cases cited by Mr. Oswald: Cobham v. Dalton, under the Act of 1869, and In re Ryley, Ex parte The Official Receiver, under the present Act. So I have two cases giving effect to the plain language of the Act, and, in my opinion, I have no jurisdiction to make the order, and must refuse the application. Mr. Oswald has asked for costs on the ground that the plaintiffs' solicitor must have known all the circumstances, but I do not care to give costs to a defaulting trustee.

Motion refused. No order as to costs.

In re CARDIFF SAVINGS BANK. DAVIES' CASE. (a.)

Company—Savings bank—Winding up—Trustees and managers—Omission—Neglect—Misfeasance—Contributory—Savings Banks Acts Amendment Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 87)—Trustee Savings Bank Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 47)—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 165, 200.

By section 11 of the Savings Banks Acts Amendment Act, 1863, trustees or managers of savings banks are exempted from personal liability, except (inter alia) for neglect or omission in complying with the rules and regulations required by the Act to be adopted for the maintenance of checks and the audit and examination of accounts.

D., a former manager and trustee of a savings bank omitted to observe the requirements of the section, and frauds were committed by the actuary which necessitated the winding up of the bank.

Held, that the section relieved a trustee or manager from liability to contribute under section 200 of the Companies Act, 1862, and that D.'s name ought not, therefore, to be settled on the list of contributories.

Held, also, that the omission or neglect to observe the rules and regulations, although it did not render a trustee liable as a contributory, constituted a misfeasance or breach of trust within the meaning of section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, and that D. must, therefore, contribute an adequate sum to the assets of the bank by way of compensation.

Two summonses were issued by the official liquidator of the Cardiff Savings Bank, by the first of which he sought to have Mr. Peter Davies settled on the list of contributories; and, by the second, he asked that Davies as being a contributor, or otherwise under the provisions of section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, and having regard to section 11 of the Savings Banks Acts Amendment Act, 1863, might be declared liable in respect of certain acts and omissions which fell, as it was alleged, within the exceptions from the protective powers of that section.

The Cardiff Savings Bank was originally formed so far back as 1819, but it was reconstituted after the passing of the Act of 1863, and the rules under which it thenceforth carried on business were certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt on the 19th of November, 1863. Its affairs were conducted by a president, seventeen trustees, and thirty-seven managers. Peter Davies, the respondent, became a manager in 1868, and a trustee in 1882. He carried on business as a draper at No. 10, Duke-street, Cardiff, the street in which the offices of the bank were situated, and he appeared to have taken an active part in the management of the affairs of the bank from the date of his appointment as manager down to the time when the bank ceased to carry on business. From 1850 down to the time of his death (the 26th of March, 1886) the actuary and paid officer of the bank was James Emerson Williams, who appeared throughout his life to have enjoyed the respect and complete confidence of the trustees and managers of the bank, as well as of his fellow-citizens at Cardiff, where he held various public offices. Upon his death, however, it was ascertained that he had been guilty of fraud, and had abstracted very large sums of money which ought to have been found in the coffers of the bank, whose assets were insufficient to meet the claims against it by many thousands of pounds. Under these circumstances the bank suspended payment in April, 1886. Subsequently, in or about September of the same year, arrangements were made by the trustees and managers under which a large number of the depositors accepted payment of 17s. 6d. in the pound in some cases, and in others of 17s. in the pound, in satisfaction of their claims. A certain number of the depositors, however, refused to accept these terms, and the affairs of the bank were investigated by a commissioner (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) appointed under the Trustee Savings Bank Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 47), and ultimately, upon the petition of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, presented under section 3 of the last-named Act, an order was made for the winding up of the bank as an unregistered company under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, and the Acts amending the same.

The charge against Davies of misfeasance and breach of trust in relation to the bank was in respect of various matters which may be grouped under the following heads — (a) neglecting or omitting to comply with the rules and regulations required by the Act of 1863 with reference to transactions of deposit and repayment; (b) neglecting or omitting to comply with such rules and regulations with reference to the audit and examination of accounts; (c) permitting deposits to be received which were illegal or irregular by reason of their exceeding in amount the limits imposed by the Act, or by reason of the depositor being entitled to the same benefit from other funds in the bank, or from funds in another savings bank; (d) misapplication of the funds of the bank after it suspended payment in connection with the arrangements for effecting compositions with the depositors. The rules and regulations required in the case of every savings bank by the Act of 1863 which Davies was charged with neglecting to observe were those comprised in sections 2, 3, 6, 10, 11, 21, 38, 39, and 55; and of these those comprised in section 6 were the principal. Shortly stated, the chief requirements of section 6 are that (2) not less than two persons, being either trustees, managers, or paid officers, one of whom is to be a trustee or manager, are to be present on all occasions of public business, and to be parties to every transaction of deposit and repayment, so as to form a double check on every transaction with depositors; (3) the depositors' pass books are to be compared with the ledger on every repayment; (5) no money is to be received from or paid to depositors except at the office and during the usual hours for public business; the other requirements are sufficiently referred to hereinafter.

Section 11 is as follows:—"No trustee or manager of any savings bank (subject to the provisions hereinafter contained in respect of savings banks in Ireland) shall be personally liable, except—

1. For moneys actually received by him on account of or for the use of such savings bank, and not paid over and disposed of in the manner directed by the rules of the savings bank.

2. For neglect or omission in complying with the rules and regulations required by this Act to be adopted as hereinbefore is provided in the maintenance of checks, the audit and examination of accounts, the holding of meetings, and keeping minutes of proceedings thereat.

3. And also for neglect or omission in taking security from officers as is hereinbefore provided."

The rules of the Cardiff Savings Bank provided (rule 2) that "the savings bank shall be open for receipts and payments on every Saturday throughout the year, between 10 and 2 o'clock, or on such day or days in every week as the trustees and managers for the time being shall in general or special meeting determine; and for the receipt of deposits only, on every Monday and Saturday evenings, from 7 till 8.30 p.m." No other days than those specified in the rules for receipts or payments were ever appointed. The rules embodied in most cases, in the very language of the statute, the requirements of section 6 of the Act of 1863. If they had been duly observed, then (1) no money could have been received or paid from or to depositors except at the office of the bank, and during the usual hours for public business; (2) one trustee or manager ought, in addition to the actuary, who was a paid officer of the bank, to have been present on all occasions of public business, and to have been a party to every transaction of deposit and repayment; (3) the depositor's pass book should have been compared with the ledger on every transaction of deposit and repayment; (4) an extracted list of depositors' balances should have been examined by the auditor once in every year; and (5) a book containing such list, checked and certified by the auditors, should have been open at any time during the hours of public business for the inspection of every depositor as respects his own account.

It was alleged by the liquidator, and in the view of the court was established by the evidence, that to the knowledge of Davies these requirements were not complied with. It appeared that the actuary was in the habit of receiving deposits and making repayments on days other than Saturdays and Mondays, and in the absence of a trustee or manager. The sums received or paid were entered in the depositor's pass book, and also in the cash book kept by the actuary, and this latter book was signed by the depositors. Afterwards, in many cases, the entries in the actuary's cash book were copied into a cash book kept by the trustees, and the transaction thus appeared to have taken place at a time when the bank was open for public business. The result of this mode of conducting the affairs of the bank was, as the court held, that the actuary falsified his cash book, and represented that he had made greater payments than he actually had made, and had received smaller sums than had actually come to his hands. In each case he retained the difference and thus committed frauds to a very large extent.

March 27.—Stirling, J., after stating the facts of the case, as they appeared from the evidence, as to the mode in which the affairs of the bank were conducted, continued:—It appears to me, therefore, that the rules and regulations required by the Act of 1863 to be adopted as regards the maintenance of checks and the examination of accounts were to the knowledge of the respondent

Davies not complied with: and the question arises, What is his liability in respect thereof? Now apart from the statute, if the president, trustees, and managers had carried on the business of the savings bank, and had received by themselves or their agents sums of money from depositors, I apprehend that they would have become indebted to the depositors for the sums so received, and would have each been liable to the last farthing of his fortune for the debts so incurred; and the circumstance that the business was carried on from benevolent or public spirited motives would not have served to exonerate any one of them from the fulfilment of such liability. The Legislature has, however, thought fit to intervene, and, regarding the promotion of thrift among persons of small means as a matter of great public importance, it has enacted, by the Act to consolidate and amend the laws relating to savings banks, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 87, s. 11, that the liabilities of the trustees and managers of savings banks are to be limited in the following manner. [His lordship read the section of the Act, and continued:—] On this occasion I have not dealt with any liability under sub-section 1, for although attention was directed to it in argument it was ultimately admitted that the summons before me was not framed with reference to that sub-section, and any liability of the respondent will be unaffected by my decision on the present occasion. What I have now to deal with is the liability of Davies arising from his neglect or omission to comply with the rules and regulations referred to in sub-section 2.

It was contended that, under section 200 of the Companies Act, 1862, Davies was liable as a contributory. The material part of that section is as follows:—"In the event of an unregistered company" (which this bank is to be treated as being) "being wound up, every person shall be deemed to be a contributory who is liable at law or in equity to pay or contribute to the payment of . . . any sum for the adjustment of the rights of the members amongst themselves, or to pay or contribute to the payment of the costs, charges, and expenses of winding up the company. . . ."

Now this section has been the subject of judicial construction in several cases, and in particular by the Court of Appeal in Ex parte British Nation Life Assurance Association. James, L.J., there says (27 W. R., at p. 93, 8 Ch. D., at p. 708):—"It is said that under the 200th section of the Act of 1862 all persons legally or equitably liable to contribute to the assets are contributories, and may be put on the list as such. It is impossible to hold that any person who is a debtor to the company in liquidation can be put on the list of contributories. He is bound to pay moneys, which moneys, when paid, will be part of the assets of the company, and in that sense he is liable to contribute to the assets, but that does not make him a contributory within the meaning of the Act. Again, a person who has taken shares in the name of a trustee is, as between him and his own trustee, the person liable to contribute, but that does not make him a contributory as between him and the company. The company may get at him as it has in several instances through and in the name of the trustees. But, still, the equitable liability is to the trustee only, and there is no privity or direct right of any kind as between the company and the cestui que trust. If an officer of the company has misappropriated assets"—that is a very material point—"he may be made to refund them to the liquidator as part of the assets, but that does not make him a contributory. The plain meaning of the Act is a legal or equitable liability to contribute in the character of a partner."

By that exposition of the meaning of the enactment I am bound; and I therefore hold that the liability referred to in section 200 is the legal or equitable liability to contribute in the character of a partner. Is, then, this the nature of Davies's liability? In my opinion it is not. I think that section 11 of the Act of 1863 relieves him of such a liability, but as the price of such exemption imposes another—namely, the liability for neglect or omission in complying with the rules and regulations; and that this liability does not make him a contributory any more than does the liability of an officer of a company to refund to the liquidator assets of the company which he has misappropriated. It was said, however, that even if Davies were not liable to pay or contribute to the payment of any debt or liability of the bank, he was, at all events, liable to pay or contribute to the payment of the costs, charges, and expenses of the winding up. In my opinion this is not so. The liability to contribute to the costs of winding up must, like the liability to contribute to debts, be a legal or equitable liability in the character of a partner. If, without any default on the part of the trustees or managers, the assets had proved insufficient for the satisfaction of the liabilities of the bank, and it had become necessary to have recourse to the process of winding up merely in order that the liabilities might be duly ascertained and the assets properly distributed, I cannot see how, in the face of section 11 of the Savings Bank Act, it would be possible to hold the trustees or managers liable for any part of the costs of such a winding up. The liability in respect of these costs, if such there be, and it is not necessary for me on this occasion to say whether there is or is not, must be attributable to the neglect or omission specified in that section.

In my opinion, therefore, Davies cannot be placed on the list of contributories. Is he, then, liable under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862? That section provides:—[His lordship read the section, and continued:—] The Legislature has relieved the trustees and managers of savings banks from personal liability, except for neglect or omission to comply with certain rules and regulations. Those rules and regulations have, to the knowledge of Davies, not been complied with; and under these circumstances he has been guilty certainly of omission, if not also of neglect, within the meaning of section 11 of the statute. That omission or neglect appears to me to constitute a misfeasance or breach of trust within the meaning of section 165, and, I think, by reason of it there is sufficient primâ facie evidence to satisfy me that the assets of the bank are less than they ought to have been, and that claims which those assets are insufficient to meet may be established in the winding up. That being so, Mr. Davies may, in my opinion, be properly compelled to contribute an adequate sum to the assets of the company by way of compensation. It was said on behalf of the respondent that the actuary was a man of high respectability, who enjoyed the confidence, not only of the trustees and managers, but of all his fellow townsmen in Cardiff. That appears to me to be no defence whatever. The Legislature has imposed on the trustees and managers this obligation—that not less than two persons shall be present on all occasions of public business for the purpose of watching and checking all transactions of deposit and repayment. That duty, to the knowledge of Davies, was omitted to be performed. What was the object of the double check, for the maintenance of which, provision is so anxiously made by the statute? Surely to prevent the bank from being defrauded. How, then, can it be any excuse for the omission that the transaction of business was intrusted to a single person to all appearance worthy of trust?

Such persons, as experience shows, not unfrequently yield to such temptations as were offered in the present case to the actuary; and the possibility of such an event was an evil against which the Legislature, in my opinion, desired to guard. Such frauds constitute one of the very mischiefs which it was the aim of the statute to prevent. These observations appear to me to answer another objection urged on behalf of the respondent—namely, that the damage occasioned by the acts of the actuary was too remote. Again, it was said that other trustees and managers were not less responsible than Davies for the non-observance of the statutory requirements, and that an order ought to be made against them as well as against him. The evidence certainly appears to indicate that other trustees and managers may or ought to have been aware of the disregard of the regulations, and it is quite possible that at some future period they may be held liable for the neglect or omission which I hold to be established against Davies. If so, it may be desirable that the amount to be contributed by each of them to the assets of the company by way of compensation should be ascertained at one and the same time; but this appears to me to afford no reason why I should abstain from now making a declaration of the liability of Davies. It is expressly laid down in In re British Guardian Life Assurance Co., 28 W. R. 945, 14 Ch. D. 335, that there is nothing in section 165 which points to the necessity of having everyone concerned before the court upon an application under it. On one matter which was much pressed upon me I must say a few words, although I do not regard it as at present ripe for decision. It was strenuously contended that the actuary had no authority on behalf of the bank to receive any sums of money out of the usual hours for public business; and that there could be no liability on the part of Davies for any such receipts which did not come to the actual possession of the bank. It is to be remembered, however, that the true receipts were entered in the pass books of the depositors and in the ledgers of the bank, and that in many cases the depositors were compromised with, on the footing of the assets of the bank being liable to make good these receipts; and, without expressing a final opinion on the matter, I am of opinion that there is a case for further investigation in respect of which it may ultimately prove that Davies is under some liability. Subject to any observations which may be made on the form of the order (to which I shall be most willing to give attention), I think I am bound to declare that Davies is liable, in the words of the statute, for neglect or omission in complying with the rules and regulations of the statute 26 & 27 Vict. c. 87, to be adopted in the maintenance of checks and the examination of accounts; and to direct an inquiry what sums of money ought to be contributed by him to the assets of the company in respect of such neglect or omission.

With the remaining questions raised by the summons I propose to deal briefly, for they also appear to be at present not ripe for decision. The evidence shows that sections 38 and 39 of the Act of 1863 have been violated, and that deposits were received by the bank which were totally or partially improper to be received, either by reason of the deposit exceeding in amount the limits imposed by statute or by reason of the depositor being entitled to some benefit from the funds of the bank or some other savings bank. In 1884 and 1885 the attention of the directors was called to this by the auditor in those reports to which I have already referred. [His lordship then read passages from the auditor's reports for 1884 and 1885, and continued:—] The result of this is that the National Debt Commissioners have paid interest on deposits of larger amount than the statute authorizes, and they have made a claim in the winding up to be repaid the interest on such deposits so far as they exceeded the legal limit. Until that claim has been dealt with and its validity established, it would seem to me premature to express an opinion on the liability of Davies in respect of these excessive deposits. Lastly, the trustees and managers are alleged to have misapplied the funds of the bank after the suspension of payment in stamping the documents by which certain of the depositors purported to release the trustees and managers from liability in providing for the costs and expenses of and connected with the preparation and execution of such documents and otherwise, and in payments to a Mr. Roberts for services in connection with what is termed "the unauthorized winding up of the bank," and otherwise. Questions are likely, as I understand, to arise in the present winding up with reference to these releases and the proceedings of the trustees and managers after the suspension of the bank; and, until these have been dealt with or disposed of, I do not see how the claims of the liquidator can be effectually dealt with. It seems to me best that these portions of the summons should stand over for the present; but I am quite willing to consider the propriety of directing any inquiries the prosecution of which will lead to any useful result.

Company—Winding up—Reserve fund—Shareholder's petition—Impossibility of carrying on business—Just and equitable cause for winding up—Majority of shareholders opposing petition—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 79, 80—Companies Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 76), s. 5.

The capital of a company was divided into £10 shares, of which £5 per share was not to be called up except in the event of a winding up. The company never made any profits during the six years of its existence; it was now doing no business, and all the paid-up capital had been lost, except enough to show a balance of £337 of assets over liabilities. It still had offices. 2,400 shares out of 100,000 had been issued. There were no debts, except directors' fees, which would not be claimed except in a winding up. On a winding-up petition by a contributory, supported by a minority of the shareholders,

Held, that the court had power, where the substratum of a company had gone, to order a winding up, even against the wishes of the majority of the shareholders, where there were no debts, and on a shareholder's petition; that the shareholders had a right to refuse to have the business continued at the cost of the reserve fund, which they had contracted to subscribe to only in the event of a winding up; that the subject-matter of the company had failed; and that the winding-up order must be made.

Petition.

This was a winding-up petition by a shareholder, involving a question as to the effect upon the position of the company of the possession of reserve capital.

The company was originally registered on the 21st of May, 1884, without articles of association, and with a share capital of £2,000, but by a special resolution of the 12th of June, 1884, confirmed on the 30th, articles of association were adopted in substitution for Table A of the Companies Act, 1862, and the share capital was increased by the addition of £998,000 divided into 99,800 shares of £10 each.

By the memorandum of association it was provided that not more than £5 per share should be called up except in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1879.

(a.) Reported by H. C. Roper, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

2,400 shares were allotted, and on these £5 per share had been paid.

The company commenced business as bankers in Bristol shortly after the date of the registration, but their operations resulted in a loss, and in 1888 they surrendered the lease of their premises and retired to a small office in a side street, where the business was carried on by the chairman of the directors with one clerk and an office boy. There were two other directors, but they lived at a distance.

The balance-sheet of the 7th of December, 1889, showed total liabilities £889 15s. 8d. against assets £1,226 17s. 5d., leaving a surplus of £337 1s. 9d., but the whole of the called-up capital of £12,000 had disappeared in preliminary expenses and business losses. The directors, however, insisted that the bad debts had been valued at too low a figure. The auditor's report also stated that there might be a further liability to the directors in respect of remuneration and travelling expenses, which were not included in the balance-sheet. The directors' fees were in arrear to the extent of about £1,000, but it was stated that they did not intend to ask for payment of any part of this unless the company were wound up. There were no other outside creditors. Two winding-up petitions had been previously presented, but unsuccessfully.

Negotiations for the formation of a new bank having its head office in London and for the fusion of the company in that undertaking were in progress, but no definite proposal had as yet been made.

The petition was presented on the 8th of March, 1890.

Thereupon a meeting of shareholders was called, when twenty-seven attended, representing £3,275, and passed a resolution unanimously requesting the directors to oppose the petition.

Under the articles of association five shareholders were the number requisite to form a quorum at general meetings, and motions, except in certain cases, were to be decided by a simple majority of votes given thereon, and in the first instance by a show of hands. Article 125 provided for a declaration of dissolution at a special meeting when three-quarters of the paid-up capital should have been exhausted; and by article 126 the company might at any time pass a resolution for a voluntary winding up by a majority of at least three-quarters in number and value, present in person or by proxy.

The shares of the company had been returned to the Inland Revenue as valueless, and some of them had been sold for 2s. 6d. each.

Bigby, Q.C., and Farwell, for the petition.

Benshaw, Q.C., and Farwell, for forty shareholders holding 1,019 shares, supported the petition.

Marten, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the company.—There are no debts except the directors' fees, and they will not claim them except in the event of a winding up. There has been no demand for payment of debts; Ex parte Spackman, 1 Mac. & G. 170; In re European Life Assurance Society, 18 W. R. 9, L. R. 9 Eq. 122. The substratum of the company has not gone: Baring v. Dix, 1 Cox. 213; In re Suburban Hotel Co., 15 W. R. 1096, L. R. 2 Ch. 737. The court will not order a winding up where, as here, a majority of the shareholders are opposed to it: In re Langham Skating Rink Co., 5 Ch. D. 669, 25 W. R. Dig. 65; In re Middlesborough Assembly Rooms Co., 28 W. R. 868, 14 Ch. D. 104.

Haldane, Q.C., and Oswald, for twenty-five shareholders holding 605 shares.—The court will not interfere with the domestic affairs of the company, and the shareholders have agreed that the majority shall bind the minority. No order to wind up a company possessing reserve capital has ever been made except on a creditor's petition. The company is not unable to pay its debts within sections 79 and 80 of the Companies Act, 1862. The assets are greater than the liabilities, so this is only a domestic question, and gives a shareholder no right to invoke the protection of the court. The company is a going concern, negotiations are on foot to transfer the business to another company. The right it possesses to issue capital is valuable, since duty was charged on nominal capital by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, s. 11: In re Haven Gold Mining Co., 30 W. R. 389, 20 Ch. D. 151; In re German Date Coffee Co., 30 W. R. 717, 20 Ch. D. 169.

Kekewich, J.—I think a winding-up order must be made. This is a petition presented by a shareholder and supported by other shareholders, and none of the creditors appear, at least in that character. The shareholders do not all appear, but of those who do appear more support than oppose the petition. It must not be assumed from that that a majority of the whole of the shareholders support the petition; far from it. If the shareholders desiring a winding up were in a majority they would, no doubt, obtain it in a different way, and not by petition. But I must take it that those who do not appear here either in support or opposition are not sufficiently careful about the result to express any opinion. Probably some are unable to be present, but the substantial result is as I have stated. In all cases where a contributory petitions for a winding up the court has regard to two matters which must, from first to last, be kept in view—first, the unwillingness of the court to interfere with shareholders in the management of their affairs, including the question whether the business ought to be continued or not, and whether the winding up should be voluntary or by the court. There are cases in which no question as to a voluntary winding up arises, and then the only question is whether there should be a winding up by the court or a continuance of the business. That is the case here. The opposition say that the business ought to be continued. The second point is, that there is jurisdiction in extreme cases to wind up a company at the instance of a contributory, notwithstanding that, as in this case, he is not supported by a majority of the shareholders. The court has expressed considerable reluctance to exercise this jurisdiction, and has cautiously expressed the terms of its exercise; yet that right has been sufficiently asserted. The jurisdiction was asserted more than once by Lord Cairns in In re The Suburban Hotel Co., and also by James, V.C., in In re The European Life Assurance Society. In the former case and in several others the ground of the decision has generally been the impossibility to continue the business. Lord Cairns says, at page 745:—"That case (Jennings v. Baddeley) therefore established this proposition, and this only, that, if there be a complete impossibility of pursuing the partnership business which was contemplated at the time the partnership was made, the court, in the case of an ordinary partnership, would dissolve it even without consent"; and he says that that would refer to a joint-stock company. It is not very easy to say what is meant by the expression "impossibility to carry on business," but several cases have come before the court. I will take three as illustrations. The Suburban Hotel Co., in which it was held that the impossibility did not exist; In re Haven Gold Mining Co., and In re German Date Coffee Co. In In re Haven Gold Mining Co. the mines had no existence, or could not be possessed by the company, so the physical substratum was altogether gone. In the German Date Coffee Co. there was a patent for making coffee out of dates, but the court came to the conclusion that the company was formed to work a German patent which had never existed, and that, therefore, the subject-matter of the business failed. So we have two instances where the physical substratum of the company was non-existent and the company was ordered to be wound up. But it is to be observed that in these cases reference was made to Baring v. Dix, an older case of ordinary partnership, as stating the rules on which the court proceeds, and there, notwithstanding the use of the word "invalid" by Lord Cairns, I collect from the report in Cox that the patent did exist, but the invention totally failed, and was entirely given up; and it was held that the substratum of the partnership had failed, and the court directed a reference to the master to see whether the business could be carried on according to the articles of partnership, with an intimation that, if it could not, the partnership must be dissolved. So failure of the substratum was treated as ground for a dissolution. I take it, therefore, that, where the subject-matter of a company is gone, the court will make a winding-up order, not because the shareholders wish it, but because what the company was formed for cannot be done, and that the court has jurisdiction to order a winding up. Before considering that point with reference to this case I must revert to Mr. Haldane's contention, which was also mentioned by Mr. Rigby in his opening. This case is different from any other case which has been presented to the court. I am not aware of any petition by a contributory asking the court to wind up a company possessing reserve capital. The chartered companies, which were formed on the principle of there being a certain amount of the original subscription available in the event of liquidation, were wound up sometimes by the court, but always on a creditor's petition.

The Act of 1879 has not long been in existence, and I have no knowledge of any case in which a contributory has come to the court and said, "I decline to allow my credit to be further pledged as regards the amount which I am bound to subscribe to in the event of a winding up, but in no other event."

The books are full of cases distinguishing between the winding up of companies limited and unlimited, but there appear to be none on this point. A contributory is bound to contribute to the full extent for which he has contracted, to enable the business to go on, and he cannot be heard to say that, because he would rather not pay up his shares in full, the amount which he has agreed to contribute shall not be contributed to enable those who wish to continue the business to do so. He has contracted to contribute as long as the business is continued, and he cannot refuse to do so. As regards unlimited companies, other considerations are allowed to intervene. I need not dwell upon those.

Here the case is different. A shareholder is bound to pay £5 per share, and another £5 if the company is ordered to be wound up. I must inquire what is the contract between the petitioner and the other partners who are concerned in the petition. The question of the shareholder's contract was discussed by Lord Cairns in In re the Suburban Hotel Co., where he considered the question as regards the position of a limited shareholder, and it was also discussed in In re the European Life Assurance Society. The question there was the contract on a policy—that is, with a creditor, not between shareholders inter se. I understand that the contract between shareholders is that the trade shall be conducted with a certain amount of capital, of which the shareholder contributes a portion, and on the faith of the credit attaching to his liability to contribute more in case of a winding up. But it is said that the trade must be carried on notwithstanding that the capital is exhausted, and so as to bring on the shareholder this contingent liability. That seems to me to be putting the reserve capital on precisely the same footing as the original capital, and saying that the trade must be continued, and he must be made liable for this contribution, not to pay the debts of the company, but in order to enable the directors to incur debts. That is not the contract into which he has entered.

Mr. Marten referred to article 126 in opposition to that view, but that refers to the dissolution of the company in certain events, and it does not seem to me to exclude the jurisdiction of the court if the case is made to fall within the Act of 1862. If the contract is what I hold it to be, the shareholders may invoke the protection of the court, notwithstanding the articles, under which they cannot insist on a winding up except in the events mentioned in article 126. Here events justify me in making a winding-up order, and compel me to do so. I take the affidavits and the balance-sheets and I find it suggested that the state of affairs is not truly set out in the latter, and that the assets are really more valuable than they are represented to be. It is extremely dangerous to make statements as to what was the real position of affairs, but there is a more satisfactory answer than that. I have heard no statement or evidence that one single penny of bad debts has been recovered since last year. So I think that the statement in the balance-sheet as to the bad debts is true. Then as to the other assets, the only point is the preliminary expenses. Under the articles the directors are empowered to distribute the payment of preliminary expenses over several years. That is reasonable. The expenses might be large, and it might be unfair to set them against capital or against the income of any one year, and it might be fairer to spread them over several years. But the money is no less gone because it is distributed over several years. Preliminary expenses have no less been incurred because they are paid for during several years.

The result is that there is a surplus of £337 1s. 9d. on paper. Part of that consists of office furniture and part of cash in the hands of agents of the company. But, putting it at its best, there was a surplus of £337 1s. 9d. Till this morning I had put against that the debt to the directors, but I am now told that they do not wish to insist upon that except in the event of a winding up. Previously it was stated to me in the alternative, or unless the company is successful, which, of course, was the only other chance of their getting it. Now they say they will take their fees only in the event of a winding up. The result of that is that there is no debt of the kind payable, so I pass over the subject of debts with this remark, that I do not agree that inability to pay debts means debts not only demandable but demanded. There is not a word in James, V.C.'s judgment to that effect. So there is a surplus of £337 1s. 9d. as assets with which to continue the business, but they have made no profits at all.

It is suggested that they made £80 one year, but it cannot be said that they ever really made a profit. The company has been in existence six years, and on the average amount of expenditure this surplus will be gone in less than one-third of a year, if it be not already gone. But I am told that there are two or three reasons why the company should not be treated as in a hopeless state of insolvency. There is hope of a transfer to another bank. It is hardly conceivable that any bank would give anything for this business, although it is said that negotiations are in progress. So I pass over that. Then I am told that they may carry on a better business in future; that they have reduced their expenses and changed their offices, and are working in the most economical way. No doubt it is. Those offices are in a back street, with only a manager and an office boy to do the work. The company is said to have a large capacity for issuing capital, that a large part of the capital has not been issued, and that the power to issue it is valuable. It is drawing largely on the imagination to suppose that the business of a bank which has exhausted all its paid-up capital, and has not yet made a profit so as to pay a dividend, and whose shares have been returned to the Inland Revenue as valueless, and are said to have been sold for 2s. 6d. a share, can have any capital to issue in a practical way. Does that bring the case within the principle to which I have referred? Has the substratum gone? Has the subject-matter of the company gone? I am perfectly well aware that in answering this question in the affirmative I am going beyond the decisions in the Haven Gold Mining Co. and the German Date Coffee Co., but I think I shall be deciding in accordance with the views expressed by Lord Cairns in the Suburban Hotel Co., and by James, V.C., in the European Life Assurance Society, and with the principle embodied in Baring v. Dix. I must not forget that this is a bank or the essentials for carrying on a banking business. It is impossible that this company can continue this business successfully, because it has not that without which a banking business cannot be carried on. Several shareholders oppose the petition, and the court is reluctant to interfere, but I think that this is a peculiar case, and a peculiar contract by the shareholder—a contract not going to the extent urged by the opponents of the petition. The petitioner is entitled—certainly he is if supported by several other shareholders—to say, I will not have the business carried on in order that at some future time, if the business is not successful, the reserve capital may be called up and used in assisting a business which I have not contracted so to assist. The order must go, and the usual order as to costs.

MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. v. ROBINSON. (a.)

Railway company—Mines and minerals — Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 77—79 —Limestone—Open working.

Beds of ironstone and limestone are "mines of ironstone and other minerals" within section 77 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, and this is so although, according to the custom of the district, they are got by surface workings.

So held by Lords Herschell and Watson (Lord Macnaghten dissenting).

It is sufficient, under section 78, if the owner have a bonâ fide intention of working by his lessees or licensees.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (36 W. R. 650, 37 Ch. D. 386) affirmed, Lord Macnaghten dissenting.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Lindley, and Lopes, L.JJ.) (36 W. R. 650, 37 Ch. D. 386).

The respondent was owner of lands in Northamptonshire through which about a mile and a half of the Kettering, Thrapstone, and Huntingdon Railway passed. In the conveyance to the railway company there were no special provisions relating to mines and minerals, the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, being incorporated in the special Act. The Midland Railway afterwards acquired statutory powers to work the railway. The respondent was the owner in possession of the minerals under the railway, and of the minerals under a portion of the land adjoining the railway; other portions of the lands adjoining had been leased by the respondent to a coal and iron company and worked by them. There was evidence that the respondent bonâ fide intended to work by his lessees or licensees, and it was the custom in that district to work by surface operations.

In January, 1886, the respondent gave notice, under section 78 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, that he intended to work the mines and minerals under portions of the railway and adjoining land as shown in a plan. Under the portions of the railway and adjoining lands referred to in the notice, were beds of ironstone and limestone, at depths varying from six to thirty-six feet. Negotiations followed, but eventually the appellants brought this action for an injunction to restrain the respondent, his servants, agents, and workmen, from working the mines and minerals described in the notice so as to injure the railway and works.

Chitty, J., dismissed the action, and the Court of Appeal affirmed his decision.

Rigby, Q.C., and Sir A. Watson (Beale, Q.C., and W. Baker with them), for the appellants.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Romer, Q.C. (Gye and William Radcliffe with them), for the respondent.

Dec. 9.—Lord HERSCHELL.—The main question in this case is whether certain beds of ironstone and limestone lying under and near the railway of the appellants are their property or the property of the respondent.

The appellant company, the Kettering, Thrapstone, and Huntingdon Railway Co., whose railway and undertaking are now, under statutory powers, worked by the other appellants, the Midland Railway Co., purchased from the respondent's father and predecessor in title, in the year 1865, certain land on which a portion of their railway has been constructed.

The purchase was made by virtue of the company's Act passed in 1862, which incorporated the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The grant of the land contained no special provisions relating to the mines and minerals under the same. This being so, section 78 of the incorporated Act operated to except from the grant any "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals, except such parts thereof as were necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the works." It is admitted that there lay beneath the lands purchased at depths varying from six to thirty-six feet, beds of ironstone and limestone, and it is not disputed that these are "minerals" within the meaning of the enactment just referred to. The principal question for your lordships' determination is whether these beds of ironstone and limestone are "mines of" ironstone and other minerals, according to the true interpretation of that enactment, and therefore excepted from the conveyance to the company.

I say this because, although considerable difference of opinion existed amongst those of your lordships who were parties to the judgment in the case of The Provost of Glasgow v. Farie, I think all were agreed that the words "mines of" had relation, not only to the word "coal," but to "ironstone, slate, or other minerals" also. The turning-point, therefore, of the decision upon this part of the case must be the interpretation to be put upon the word "mines" in section 77 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act.

It is contended on behalf of the appellants that the word "mines" is to be construed as applying only to those minerals which, according to the custom of that part of the country where they are situate, would ordinarily be won by underground workings, and that it does not comprehend minerals which, according to such custom, would be got by surface operations. It is contended, on the other hand, that the word comprehends all beds or strata of minerals without any reference to the method of working them.

I have already, in Farie's case, expressed my opinion as to the construction to be put upon the same words in a very similar enactment contained in the Waterworks Clauses Act. After carefully considering the able arguments addressed to your lordships in the present case, I have seen no reason to alter the conclusion I then arrived at. I desire only to say that when I stated that, in my opinion, the reservation extended "to all such bodies of mineral substances lying together in seams, beds, or strata as are commonly worked for profit and have a value independent of the surface of the land," I did not intend by these latter words to suggest that the value of the mineral substances at the time of the reservation was the test whether they were reserved or not. I used them in order to emphasize the fact that it was not every scattered piece of mineral lying under the land that could be called a "mine," but only mineral substances lying in seams, or beds, or strata.

In dealing with this case it must be remembered that all that your lordships have to do is to interpret the words of this enactment, and not to lay down (even if it were possible) any general rule as to the interpretation of the word "mines."

I doubt whether much assistance is to be obtained from the cases in which a construction has been put upon that word in instruments embodying merely agreements between the parties to them, unaffected by any statutory enactment. In such agreements, in the absence of a distinct indication of the contrary intention, it is always to be assumed that the reserved mines are only to be worked in such a manner as is consistent with the surface remaining undisturbed. And if this be true of minerals lying deep below the surface, it would be obviously out of the question to permit it to be disturbed by winning minerals which can only be wrought by surface operations. But in the case of mines reserved under section 77 of the Railway Clauses Act the case is different. It is clear that the mines reserved, if not purchased by the company, may be so worked as to interfere with the surface, the only limitation being that the working must be according to the usual manner of working such mines in the district where the same are situate.

The object of the 77th and following clauses was considered and explained in Bennett v. The Great Western Railway Co. Lord Cranworth said:—"It was obviously the intention of the Legislature in making these provisions to create a new code as to the relation between mine owners and railway companies where lands were compulsorily taken for the purpose of making a railway. The object of the statute evidently was to get rid of all the ordinary law on the subject, and to compel the owner to sell the surface, and if any mines were so near the surface that they must be taken for the purposes of the railway, to compel him to sell them, but not to compel him to sell anything more. The land was to be dealt with just as if there were no mines to be considered, nothing but the surface."

The effect of this legislation was obviously very advantageous to the railway companies, and inflicted no wrong upon the owner of the minerals. The company, in the first instance, paid only for the surface of the land, and for such minerals as had to be taken in the making of the railway. They enjoyed the support of the underlying minerals for an indefinite term without paying for it. The mineral owner, as I have said, suffered no wrong. He still retained the ownership of the minerals and the right to work them, which was all that he possessed before. The only burden imposed upon him, if it can be so called, was that, when desirous of working the mines, mines he should give the company an opportunity of purchasing them. It appears to me that these considerations point to the intention of the Legislature having been to use the word "mines" in the widest sense that can properly be given to it. Why should the Legislature have reserved and exempted the company from the necessity of purchasing beds of minerals lying at such a depth below the surface, or with superincumbent strata of such a character that the minerals would ordinarily be worked by underground operations, and compelled the company at once to purchase and pay for beds of minerals which would, in ordinary course, be won by surface operations? It is urged that in the latter case the working of the minerals would remove the very thing which the company had bought, and directly interfere with the existence of the railway. But it must be remembered that the surface might be rendered just as unfit for railway purposes by subterranean workings as it would be by operations from the surface. The learned counsel for the appellants asked what the company could be said to have acquired by the purchase of the land, if its very surface could be directly interfered with by mining operations? I fully feel the force of this question and the difficulty which it involves. If this difficulty were altogether got rid of by the construction contended for by the appellants, I admit that a strong ground would be shown for yielding to their contention. But it was properly conceded by the learned counsel for the appellants that this was not the case. Where a "mine" within the meaning attributed to that word by them, cropped out at or near the surface on a part of the railway, the same difficulty would arise. For it was not denied that this would be part of the mine, and, therefore, within the reservation. So, too, although a seam of minerals may lie at such a depth beneath the surface of the land purchased that it would ordinarily be got by underground workings, yet, owing to the works necessary for making the railway, be it a cutting or tunnel, the minerals may come to form the surface on which the railway rests. Such a seam would be a "mine" within the construction suggested, and, therefore, reserved to the landowner, together with the right to work it, and yet the same question might be asked. Can it have been intended that such owner should have the right to take away the surface upon which the rails are laid?

It seems to me too, that the appellants' construction, if adopted, would of itself give rise to serious difficulties and inconveniences. When land was to be taken for the purposes of a railway, it would be necessary to ascertain what minerals lay beneath the land which would not according to the usual manner of working in the district be got by underground workings. For these would become the property of the railway company, and their value must of course be taken into account in fixing the price to be paid for the land purchased. And further, the question what minerals were reserved, and therefore whose the property in them was, might have to be determined many years after the purchase, by an inquiry what was the usual mode of working in the district at the time of the conveyance, which perhaps might not have been the same as at the time when the controversy arose. And there are some cases where it might be almost impossible to say what minerals were, and what were not reserved. Beds of slate I believe exist which have been worked both by surface workings at the face and by levels driven underground. How much of such seams of slate would be reserved, and how much fall to be purchased by the company, would, I think, on the contention of the appellants, be a question almost impossible of solution.

But besides this, under section 78 the owner of mines not under the railway, but within the prescribed distance from it, is bound to give notice before working, so that the company may have the option of purchasing. If the word "mines" bear the meaning I have attributed to it the company need not concern themselves about the existence of minerals whether near the surface or not, within the prescribed distance. But if it is to have the more limited construction contended for by the appellants, it would be necessary for the company not only to ascertain what minerals lie under the lands adjoining any embankments or other works which would be injured by the working of what I will call surface minerals, but often to purchase these minerals, and the land under which they lie, for the protection of their works from subsidence.

Seeing, then, that the difficulties pointed out by the appellants are not avoided by adopting their view, and that its adoption would give rise to the difficulties and inconveniences I have pointed out, I think your lordships will do well to construe the language used with the aid of the light that is thrown upon it by the intention of the Legislature as manifested in the provisions relating to mines and minerals lying under and near the railway. And the considerations upon which I have dwelt point to the conclusion I have already indicated, that the widest construction ought to be given to the word "mines" which is possible, without improperly straining the language used.

Is there anything in the terms of the enactment compelling the narrower construction for which the appellants contend? I think not. Applying myself to the consideration of the word "mines," apart from the document or context in which it is found, I cannot think that its natural meaning imports such beds or strata of minerals only as are ordinarily got by underground working. If aid is sought from the lexicon, and the definitions there given are reviewed, I do not think that they afford support to such a construction. Dr. Johnson, I may observe, defines a "quarry" as a "stone mine." I see no reason to doubt the soundness of the view I expressed in Farie's case, that in ordinary parlance the word "mines" is not used to describe unwrought beds of minerals. I think it is ordinarily applied only to beds of minerals which are being or have been wrought; but in the enactment with which we are dealing it is obviously impossible so to interpret the word. I have already pointed out why I think the meaning attributed to the word by the courts, when contracts between individuals have been under consideration, does not afford a guide for construing this enactment.

These are my reasons for adhering to the construction which I put upon the words "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals," in Farie's case.

So far I have dealt with the case apart from authority, but it is not unworthy of consideration that the decided cases support the view adopted by the court below. In the case of the Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett Lord Chelmsford said: "That this section reserves to the mine-owner all the minerals, however near they may be to the surface, unless the company chooses to purchase them, appears very clearly from the exception of 'the parts necessary to be dug, or carried, or used, in the construction of the company's works, as these will, of course, be the minerals lying nearest to the surface." I admit the force of the criticism of the appellants' counsel, that the words quoted by Lord Chelmsford do not necessarily lead to the inference he drew from them, inasmuch as in making the railway it might be necessary in cuttings or tunnels to carry away or use minerals lying far below the surface. But the fact remains that the noble and learned lord intimated the opinion that all the minerals, however near they might be to the surface, were reserved. And the other learned lords who took part in the judgment not only do not dissent from Lord Chelmsford's view, but use language which I think shows that they shared it. An opinion thus expressed ought not to be lightly departed from. It is impossible to say how many transactions in the last twenty years may have been carried through on this view of the law. There has been no judicial expression of a contrary opinion that I am aware of until quite recently in Farie's case, whilst both in this country and in Scotland the point has been actually decided in accordance with the view taken by the learned judges in the present case. Indeed, in the case of the Caledonian Railway Co. v. Dixon, where the point was decided against the company by the Court of Session (7 Court Sess. Cas., 4th ser., 216), although the case was brought to your lordships' House by way of appeal upon another point, the railway company did not seek for a review of the decision of the Court of Session on the question now in controversy.

It remains for me to consider the subsidiary contention of the appellants, that the respondent was not in the present case "desirous of working" the mines. The first objection raised is that he has no intention of working them himself, that is, by his own servants, but only by lessees or licensees. I agree with the court below that this objection cannot, upon the true construction of the section, be sustained. Then it was urged that there was no real desire to work, but only to compel the appellants to purchase the minerals. I quite concur with what Cotton, L.J., said, that "there must be not only an expression of desire, but an honest actual existence of the desire to work either by himself or his lessees, to justify an owner in giving such a notice. If he gave the notice when it was obvious that there were no minerals, or that he could not possibly intend either to let or work them himself, that would be vexatious, and the court would not allow that to be acted upon." But in the present case the learned judge who tried the action, and the Court of Appeal, have come to the conclusion that there was a real and bonâ fide desire to work. After considering the arguments insisted upon by the learned counsel for the appellants I find myself unable upon this point to differ from the courts below. I am not a little influenced by the fact that the minerals on either side of the railway in the immediate neighbourhood of those now in question have actually been gotten by lessees of the respondent. It is urged that the minerals under the railway were left unworked because the respondent thought he had no no right to them. This matters not as regards the point I am now concerned with. Indeed, it seems to me to make the case of the respondent stronger.

For the reasons I have submitted to your lordships I think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

LORD WATSON.—I also am of opinion that both courts below have come to a right conclusion in this case, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal sustaining the decision of Chitty, J., ought to be affirmed.

Questions of nicety have arisen, and may yet arise, as to the particular substances meant to be included in the general words "or other minerals," as these occur in section 77 of the English, and section 70 of the Scotch, Railway Clauses Act of 1845. I do not think that any substantial question of that kind is presented in this case. The substances to which the argument at the bar has been confined are "ironstone," which is one of the minerals specially excepted in these clauses, and "limestone," which appears to me to be so much ejusdem generis with the minerals enumerated that it must necessarily be held to come within the description of "other minerals."

The real point of difficulty which this case presents, is due to the circumstance that the statutory exception is not of "minerals" but of "mines of minerals." It is mutually conceded that the ironstone and limestone below the appellants' railway, which the respondent has notified his intention to excavate, can only be worked, and, according to the custom of the district, would be properly worked, by open cast. But the appellants maintain that, according to the sound construction of the Act of 1845, no minerals are reserved to the landowner except such as are capable of being "mined," using that term in its strictest sense as signifying operations conducted wholly underground, and not open to the light of day.

That is a proposition which your lordships had recently occasion to consider in Provost of Glasgow v. Farie. In that case I came to the conclusion that every substance, being a mineral within the meaning of these clauses, is reserved to the owner irrespective of the method by which it may be wrought. I there said that, in the enactments of section 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (which are in the same terms with sections 77 and 70 of the Railways Clauses Acts of 1845), the word "mines" must be taken to signify "all excavations by which the excepted minerals may be legitimately worked and got." I do not think it is necessary to say more than that I adhere to the views which I adopted in Provost of Glasgow v. Farie. But, on consideration, I think it is more accurate to say that the expression "mines of coal, &c.," is used by the Legislature to denote the minerals in situ, and has no reference to the manner in which they can be worked. The result is the same, and rests upon the same considerations. I concur in the reasons which have just been assigned for his judgment by Lord Herschell. After all, this is a mere question as to the period of time at which railway companies must acquire and pay for the subjacent and adjacent minerals necessary for the support of their lines. The general policy of the Railway Clauses Acts and their special provisions alike appear to me to point to the result at which the noble and learned lord has arrived.

In my opinion, the appellants have failed to substantiate their averment that the respondent does not entertain a real and bonâ fide intention of working the minerals in question; and I therefore concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord Macnaghten.—The principal question, if not the only question, in this case is, what is the meaning of the word "mines," as used in section 77 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and in the heading to that part of the Act. On this question I have the misfortune to differ from your lordships. I abide by the views I expressed in Farie's case. I continue to think that the word was used both in the heading and in the section in the sense which, if I am not mistaken, every English judge who had occasion to consider the meaning of the word, before Farie's case was decided, took to be its ordinary signification. It seems to me that on such a point the opinions of such judges as Kindersley, V.C., Turner, L.J., and Jessel, M.R., are probably a safer guide than any definitions or illustrations to be found in dictionaries. Kindersley, V.C., was clear on the point, so was Turner, L.J., who agreed with the Vice-Chancellor on that question in Bell v. Wilson, and dealing with an exception of "mines within and under the lands whether opened or unopened," observed that those are "words which are ordinarily used with reference to underground workings." In Errington v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., where, contrary to the view thrown out by some of the noble and learned lords in Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett, it was held that railway companies could acquire mines compulsorily, Jessel, M.R., remarks: "There are no mines in the ordinary sense under these lands—at least, it is not shown there are. What are called mines and what are minerals probably within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, are some beds of gravel or some beds of clay lying near the surface, and it is said they can only be worked from the surface."

If that be the ordinary meaning of the word, if it was really the intention of Parliament that all minerals, however worked, should be deemed to be excepted from conveyances to railway companies unless expressly mentioned therein, I cannot conceive why the word "minerals" is not to be found in the heading to this part of the Act, or why the word "minerals" was not used in section 77 instead of the expression "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals," or why the Legislature, in the heading and in that section, avoided the use of the common, obvious, and well-understood expression "mines and minerals."

Whether the view of the appellants or that of the respondent be accepted, some difficulties and inconveniences unquestionably may present themselves. But I think the appellants were right in saying that the difficulties which attend their construction, however formidable they may appear in argument, are not really practical difficulties, and that those difficulties are reduced to a minimum since it has been decided that railway companies are not disabled from purchasing mines compulsorily if they think fit to do so.

It was said in argument that, if the appellants' construction were adopted, railway companies might be exposed to danger by the working of surface minerals on adjacent lands. But, in answer, it was pointed out that, if surface minerals are not within the enactment with respect to "mines lying under or near the railway," the ordinary rule as to adjacent support, so far as regards surface minerals, would be applicable.

Some reliance was placed on certain expressions in Lord Chelmsford's judgment in The Great Western Railway Co. v. Bennett which seem to show that, in his lordship's opinion, all minerals, of whatever kind and however near the surface, were reserved by the Act to the landowner. But it is to be observed that the question which has arisen in the present case could not possibly have arisen in that case, because the exception in the conveyance under consideration in that case did not follow the words of the Act. It excepted in terms both minerals and mines. The point, therefore, possibly was not present to his lordship's mind. On the other hand, Lord Westbury's opinion seems to favour the appellant's construction.

That a railway company is not entitled to support from subjacent or adjacent mines is perfectly clear from the Act, as was pointed out in Bennett's case. But I do not think that it necessarily follows from that circumstance that a mine owner who is entitled to withdraw support by working his mines in the ordinary course if the company do not compensate him, is entitled to enter upon the surface, which unquestionably belongs to the railway company, and break it up by working from the surface.

For these reasons and the reasons I have expressed in Farie's case, I should, but for your lordships' opinion, be disposed to reverse the judgment under appeal.

Judgment—Action on foreign judgment—Final judgment—Res judicata.

In order that an action may be brought in this country on a foreign judgment, such judgment must be final and unalterable in the court which pronounced it.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Lindley, and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported 37 Ch. D. 244, 36 W. R. Dig. 79.

The facts and the whole course of the proceedings are given in Lord Herschell's judgment.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Finlay, Q.C. (Yate Lee with them), for the appellant, referred to Scott v. Pilkington, 2 B. & S. 11, 38, 41; Williams v. Jones, 13 M. & W. 628, 633; Russell v. Smyth, 9 M. & W. 810.

Rigby, Q.C., Kenelm E. Digby, and J. D. Davenport, for the respondents, were not heard.

Nov. 22.—Lord HERSCHELL.—This appeal arises in an action brought by the appellant, the plaintiff below, for the administration of the estate of a deceased gentleman named Henderson. In order to found his claim to an order for the administration of that estate it became necessary for him to show that he was a creditor of the deceased. The case presented by him for the purpose of making that out was that he had obtained a judgment of a foreign court upon which he was entitled to sue in this country, and which in this country established the existence of a debt. The court ordered under these circumstances that there should be first tried the issue: "whether the judgment or decree" upon which he relied, one pronounced on the 5th of April, 1878, "and the other judgments or decrees whereof particulars have been delivered, or any and which of them, are orders or judgments upon which the claim of the plaintiff in this action or some and what part of it can be sustained."

It appears that Mr. Henderson, the administration of whose estate is in question, had purchased certain properties in the district of Seville, of the plaintiff, Mr. Nouvion, and that the deeds by which these properties were conveyed contain an obligation to make certain payments, and were registered in the registry of the district of San Roman; and that where deeds of that description are so registered, according to the law of Spain the person who is entitled to payment under such deeds can obtain what is called an "executive" judgment.

It is necessary to state distinctly what the nature of that judgment is; because I think it will be found that the decision of your lordships must be determined by that consideration. In an action of this nature only a very limited number of defences can be raised by the person sued. He cannot impeach the instruments upon which the action is founded or show that they were obtained by fraud, or that on any other ground they did not properly form the basis of an obligation on his part. He can only defend himself by such defences as are open to him on the assumption that the deeds were valid, and in the first instance did create the obligation. He may show that there has been a waiver, or that he has discharged the obligation by payment, but substantially, I think those are the only defences open to him. It is open to either of the parties to such an instrument to sue in the same court in another form of action which is called a declaratory or plenary action, and which is said to be the ordinary course, not as meaning that the other is a course which can only be taken under exceptional circumstances, but that the one conforms to the general and ordinary rules of procedure in an action in the Spanish courts and that the other is a special procedure allowed in particular cases. In such a plenary action, which is open to either of the parties, every defence which may be available is open, as well as every consideration establishing the ground of action; and such a plenary action may be instituted by either of the parties to the executive action; that is to say, the party against whom the decision has been pronounced in the executive action, be he either plaintiff or defendant, is at perfect liberty to sue in a plenary action for the purpose of obtaining a declaration of the rights of the parties; and in such a plenary action the fact that a judgment has been delivered in an executive action cannot be set up as at all affecting the rights of the parties either in the way of proof or of title to succeed in the plenary action. The same points which have been decided in the executive action can again be raised in the plenary action, as well as other questions which were not open in the executive action. No effect is given, even in the court in which it was pronounced and in which afterwards the plenary action may be pending, to the judgment in the executive action as being res judicata and final and as concluding the rights of the parties upon any point whatever.

In the present case the plaintiff, Mr. Nouvion, who was a party to the agreements which I have mentioned, which had been duly registered, brought an executive action, and in that executive action a decree was pronounced in these terms: "Let an order of execution be issued against the property and goods of Mr. William Henderson for the principal amount of 697,135 reales, 60 centimos, and also for the amount of the legal interests therein from the date of default being made by not meeting" certain drafts which are there mentioned.

It appears that owing to the absence of Mr. Henderson from Spain it became necessary, in accordance with the procedure of the Spanish courts, to send letters requisitorial to this country, that is to say to Scotland, where Mr. Henderson was resident, and to obtain from the Spanish consul in Scotland a return to those letters, which intimated that Mr. Henderson had not discharged, as he would then have had an opportunity of discharging, the liability which was declared by the judgment. Thereupon, Mr. Henderson having intervened and having alleged that the debt was not due by reason of a promise of the plaintiff not to sue him, and that having been decided against him, a decree was made, which I think may properly be termed a final decree in that action, that the distraint be carried into effect, "and in virtue thereof sale by auction be made of the property attached, and out of the proceeds thereof entire and complete payment to the executing plaintiff of the amount of the principal demanded" with interest.

The plaintiff relies upon that judgment as being sufficient to entitle him, when he sues upon it in the courts of this country, to a judgment for the amount of the debt for which it was ordered that execution should issue; and the only question in this case is whether, under the circumstances which I have mentioned, that judgment is sufficient to entitle him in the courts of this country to a judgment for his debt as being a creditor of the deceased person, Mr. Henderson.

Now, there can be no doubt that in the courts of this country effect will be given to a foreign judgment. It is unnecessary to inquire upon what principle the courts proceed in giving effect to such a judgment, and in treating it as sufficient to establish the debt. Reliance was placed upon dicta of Parke and Alderson, BB., in the case of Williams v. Jones, where the law is thus stated: "Where a court of competent jurisdiction has adjudicated a certain sum to be due from one person to another a legal obligation arises to pay that sum on which an action of debt to enforce the judgment may be maintained."

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

But it was conceded, and necessarily conceded, by the learned counsel for the appellant, that a judgment, to come within the terms of the law as properly laid down, must be a judgment which results from an adjudication of a court of competent jurisdiction, such judgment being final and conclusive. I shall of course have something to say upon the meaning which must be given to those words, but the general proposition in that form is not disputed by the learned counsel for the appellant. They contend that this judgment is final and conclusive, and no doubt in a certain sense that must be conceded. It puts an end to and absolutely concludes that particular action—about that there can be no manner of doubt—in that sense it is final and conlusive. But the same may be said of some interlocutory judgments upon which there can be no question that an action could not be maintained; they do settle and conclude the particular proceeding, the interlocutory proceeding, in which the judgment is pronounced. It is obvious, therefore, that the mere fact that the judgment puts an end to and finally settles the controversy which was in question in the particular proceeding, is not of itself sufficient to make it a final and conclusive judgment upon which an action in the courts of this country may be maintained, when such judgment has been pronounced by a foreign court.

I think that, in order to establish that such a judgment has been pronounced, it must be shown that in the court by which it was pronounced it conclusively and finally and for ever settled the existence of the debt of which it is sought to be made conclusive evidence in this country, so as to become res judicata between the parties. If in the same court which pronounced it, it is not conclusive, so that notwithstanding such a judgment the existence of the debt may, between the same parties, be afterwards contested in the same court, and if, upon proper proceedings being taken and such contest being adjudicated upon, it may be declared that there existed no obligation to pay the debt at all, then I do not think that a judgment which is of that character can be regarded as finally and conclusively evidencing the debt, and so entitling the person who has obtained the judgment to claim a decree from our courts for the payment of that debt.

The principle upon which I think our enforcement of foreign judgments must proceed is this—that in a court of competent jurisdiction where, according to its established procedure, the whole merits of the case were open—at all events, to the parties, however much they may have failed to take advantage of them, or may have waived any of their rights—a final adjudication has been given that a debt or obligation exists which cannot thereafter in that court be disputed, and can only be questioned in an appeal to a higher tribunal—in such a case it may well be said that, giving credit to the courts of another country, we are prepared to take the fact that such adjudication has been made as establishing the existence of the debt or obligation. But where, as in the present case, the adjudication is consistent with the non-existence of the debt or obligation which it is sought to enforce, and it may thereafter be declared by that tribunal that there is no obligation and no debt, it appears to me that the very foundation upon which the courts of this country would proceed in enforcing a foreign judgment altogether fails.

It has been suggested that a judgment obtained in an "executive" action may be regarded as analogous to a judgment obtained in a common law action in the times prior to the Judicature Act, the execution of which might be restrained by a court of equity, and you might have prevented the plaintiff who had succeeded in such an action from obtaining the fruits of his judgment. I do not think that such an analogy is a complete one; but even if it were more complete than I think it to be, it appears to me that it would afford very little assistance to your lordships unless we could know what had been the course adopted with regard to such judgments in countries in whose system of law the same force and effect is given to foreign judgments as in given by the courts of this country. Upon that point we have had no information whatsoever.

Then it is said that such a judgment would be analogous to a judgment which has been obtained, upon which a suit may be instituted in the courts of this country even although an appeal may be pending. It appears to me that there is a vital distinction between the two cases. Although an appeal may be pending, a court of competent jurisdiction has finally and conclusively determined the existence of a debt, and it has none the less done so because the right of appeal has been given whereby a superior court may overrule that decision. There exists at the time of the suit a judgment which must be assumed to be valid until interfered with by a higher tribunal, and conclusively establishes the existence of the debt which is sought to be recovered in this country. That appears to me to be in altogether a different position from that which exists in the present case, where the judgment is a "remate" judgment, and where the very court which pronounced the "remate" judgment (not the court of appeal) may determine, if proper proceedings are taken, that the debt for which this "remate" judgment is sought to be used as conclusive evidence, has no existence at all.

The plaintiff in such a suit, an executive suit, is not really, by the decision which is now under appeal, deprived of his rights. He may still sue upon the original cause of action. Of course, it may happen that in this particular case such a suit is barred by lapse of time, but that is an accident. The right of the plaintiff to sue on his original cause of action is not at all interfered with by the judgment which has been pronounced; and in such an action, if it were brought, all questions arising, upon which depend the rights of the parties, and by which must be determined ultimately the obligation to pay, would be open to consideration, and could be dealt with by the courts, and finally and conclusively settled. I do not, therefore, see that there is any wrong or any hardship done by holding that a judgment which does not conclusively and for ever between the parties establish the existence of a debt in that court, cannot be looked upon as sufficient evidence of it in the courts of this country.

Very ingenious arguments have been urged upon your lordships by the learned counsel for the appellant, and they have strenuously contended that the proper course would be to permit such a judgment to be sued upon, and that justice might be done by staying proceedings as might be done in the case of an English judgment sued upon, which was under appeal.

But no authority has been cited, no case has been referred to, which supports the view put forward on behalf of the appellant, that such an action upon such a judgment as this could be maintained, and I certainly cannot advise your lordships to make such a precedent, because it appears to me, after giving due weight to all the arguments of the learned counsel for the appellant, that on the whole the result would, as a general rule, be likely to be mischievous and to work injustice rather than justice between the parties.

For these reasons I move your lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord Watson.—This case has been very ably argued for the appellant. But the reasons assigned for the judgment of the Court of Appeal are, to my mind, so satisfactory that I agree with your lordships in thinking it ought not to be disturbed.

That the court of Seville had jurisdiction to determine all questions competently raised between these parties, when duly convened before it, in relation either to the constitution or subsistence of the contract upon which the appellant relies, and also that the courts of England would recognize and give full effect to any final and conclusive judgment of the Spanish court upon these questions, are propositions neither disputed by the respondents nor controverted in the opinions delivered by the learned judges of the Appeal Court. The only question which the facts of this case present for decision is, whether the decree of the 5th of April, 1878, obtained by the plaintiff in what is termed an "executive" proceeding, comes within the principle established by decisions comparatively recent, of which Godard v. Gray, 19 W. R. 348, L. R. 6 Q. B. 139, and Schibsby v. Westenholz, 19 W. R. 587, L. R. 6 Q. B. 155, are leading examples.

The decree of the 5th of April, 1878, appears to me to be deficient in certain particulars which are necessary in order to bring it within that principle. It is not necessarily a decision which exhausts the merits of the controversy between the parties, because in "executive" proceedings the court can entertain no plea stated by the defendant which does not go to payment, satisfaction, or waiver of the plaintiff's claim. What, in my opinion, constitutes a still graver defect is the fact that the same court which issued the "executive" decree has jurisdiction in an "ordinary" or "plenary" action to entertain and dispose of any and every plea which the original defendant may think fit to urge against his liability, and in that action can re-try those pleas which have already been put forward and repelled in the "executive" suit. If the decision of the court in the "plenary" differs, in whole or in part, from that pronounced by it in the "executive" suit, the latter is, to the extent of that difference, superseded or nullified.

The English cases to which I have already referred establish a more liberal rule in regard to the enforcement of foreign judgments than is to be found in the older authorities; but no decision has been cited to the effect that an English court is bound to give effect to a foreign decree, which is liable to be abrogated or varied by the same court which issued it. All the authorities cited appear to me, when fairly read, to assume that the decree which was given effect to had been pronounced causâ cognitâ, and that it was unnecessary to inquire into the merits of the controversy between the litigants, either because these had already been investigated and decided by the foreign tribunal, or because the defendant had due opportunity of submitting for decision all the pleas which he desired to state in defence. The decree need not be final in the sense that it cannot be made the subject of appeal to a higher court, but it must be final and unalterable in the court which pronounced it; and, if appealable, the English court will only enforce it subject to conditions which will save the interests of those who have the right of appeal. The case of Patrick v. Shedden, 2 E. & Bl. 14, appears to me to be very much akin to the present. There the executive decree of the Court of Session for costs was final in this sense, that it was not appealable, and that it was enforceable in Scotland; but the Court of Queen's Bench refused to recognize it as a final and conclusive judgment, mainly on the ground that it might be at any time recalled or modified by the Court of Session on just cause shown. In my opinion there is no real difference in principle between a court retaining the power to alter its own decree by an order in the same suit, and its retaining the power to defeat its operation by an order pronounced in another suit relating to the same debt.

I accordingly concur in the judgment proposed.

Lord BRAMWELL.—I think this judgment should be affirmed. I think the proceeding in the Spanish court which is relied on was final, and I think, also, that it was a personal judgment, as far as such a judgment could be personal; but I think I am right in reading it, not as a judgment that a debt is due, but as an order that execution do issue. Then we know that this is, what I may call, for want of a better expression, a defeasible judgment—that is to say, the defendants, who are subject to the order that execution may issue, may take proceedings which would have the effect of defeating or nullifying or making an end of the judgment or order which has been pronounced that execution may issue. It seems to me that that is not such a judgment as can be (to use the old fashioned expression which Parke, B., used) the subject of an action of debt—that is to say, now that we have got rid of the forms of action, the subject of an action in a court in this country. Whether what is called the comity of nations had anything to do with the matter, I do not know, nor do I think it material; but Parke, B., in the judgment he pronounced, does not refer to the comity of nations as a reason, but he speaks of foreign judgments, and of colonial judgments, and of judgments of inferior courts; and he seems to consider—I believe he says so, but at all events if he does not say so directly he says that from which I infer that his opinion was—that where the judgment of a competent court had been given, it showed that there was a debt, and that, that being so, there was a legal obligation, and I am somewhat inclined to think he was of opinion there was a moral obligation on the part of the person against whom it was decreed or adjudged that there was a debt, to pay it. But how is that applicable to a case of this description? How can it be said that there is a legal obligation on the part of a man to pay a debt, who has a right to say, "I owe none, and no judgment has established against me that I do." I cannot see. On that short ground it seems to me that this judgment ought to be affirmed.

There are, however, one or two other observations I should like to make. It was said that my argument, or such an argument as I am now using (for it is not my argument in particular) would equally apply to all cases where there was a possibility of error being brought. Not so. There is no presumption that error may exist in the proceedings; the presumption is the other way; the presumption is, that a court of competent jurisdiction has given a right judgment. But there is no such presumption here; on the contrary, we learn that it is perfectly possible, not merely that what was decided in the court may be reversed, but that there may be questions raised between the parties which could not be decided in that proceeding. There is an essential difference, therefore, between the case where a court of competent jurisdiction has entertained the controversy between the parties, and come to a conclusion, which is to be presumed to be accurate, and this case, where there is no ground for saying that all the controversies between the parties have been decided.

Then another argument that was urged was this. It was said, "Why if this argument is a good one, there never was a judgment in an English court upon which an action ought to have been maintainable, because it was always possible that it might be set aside by proceedings in equity." Really I do not think any argument can be founded upon, what I may take the liberty now of calling, the preposterous condition of things that existed in England before the Judicature Act, where one court gave a final judgment finding a debt due, or damages due, or what not, and another court said, "Well, that is all very well; we find no fault with the judgment being right in point of law, it was perfectly right in point of law; but if you, the plaintiff, in whose favour it was given, enforce it, we will put you in prison." Really, I think that some twenty or thirty years hence, when the present generation of lawyers has ceased to exist and there is another one, it will scarcely be believed that such a state of things did exist in a civilized country. I do not say this for the purpose of finding fault with the state of things which is now, happily, at an end, and was brought about, I dare say, by persons who had very sincere desires to improve the jurisprudence of the country; but I say it for this purpose, that I do not think you can found any argument upon such a condition of things as then existed.

Then there was a matter brought forward prominently by Lord Ashbourne which I think is entitled to good consideration; and that was, that if we should give judgment for this plaintiff here he would be better off than he would be if there were a mere affirmance of the judgment with all its consequences in Spain, because in Spain the judgment that he has got is liable, as I have said before, to be defeated, but, if judgment were given for him here, there would not be that liability to be defeated by proceedings being taken here analogous to the plenary proceedings in Spain. Well, I think that is a cogent argument. It occurred to me that perhaps it might be met in this way, that if a judgment in a foreign court or in an English court were reversed upon error, and an action upon the judgment had been brought in an English court and judgment given in that action on the judgment, then afterwards when the original judgment was reversed upon error, I suppose there would, in such a case as that, be some remedy for the defendant who had got rid of the first judgment against him. By auditâ querelâ I should think he would be entitled to get rid of the second judgment against him. It is not worth while going into it minutely. The remedy of auditâ querelâ is now abolished, but there is a rule which says that the court may give relief (I should suppose that that would mean that they must give relief) where the original defendant would have got relief upon auditâ querelâ. But it is not the same thing. He would have a judgment against him which he would have to get rid of; so that, in the first instance, he would have to get rid of judgment in the Spanish court, and then he would have to come to England to get rid of the judgment by proceedings in the nature of the old-fashioned auditâ querelâ. I think, therefore, he would be worse off if judgment were given against him, as is prayed in this action, than he is at present by the proceedings in Spain. It perhaps is not of any very great consequence; but I cannot help thinking that it is worth mentioning, at all events for the purpose of showing that we are not dealing with a judgment like a judgment in proceedings where all the questions can be gone into, which is presumably right, and has decided all the possible controversies that the parties have thought fit to bring before the court.

Upon these grounds I think this judgment should be affirmed.

Lord Ashbourne.—I also am of opinion that the judgment under appeal is correct and should be affirmed. The reasons which have led me to that conclusion have already been expressed by such of your lordships as have spoken.

It is conceded, there is no controversy that a foreign judgment will not be upheld in this country and made the foundation of relief here, unless it is final and conclusive. There is no question about that. That has been treated as axiomatic in the arguments on both sides in the courts below, and in the argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellant, and in the judgment of North, J., and in all the judgments of the learned judges who sat in the Court of Appeal. The sole controversy in law before us, and before those tribunals was—is this a judgment which can be regarded as coming within the definition of a final and conclusive judgment?

I entirely concur that in a sense this must be regarded as a final judgment, but only in a limited and narrow sense. It is a summary judgment, it is an executive judgment, it is a remote judgment. In its terms there is nothing to contradict the fact that there has been a final judgment; but then it is a judgment which could only be encountered by a certain limited number of pleas of a certain prescribed and definite character. It was not a judgment upon a claim which could be met by pleas upon the merits, going exhaustively into all the topics upon which the defendant was entitled to rely if he had the wide scope open to him, which in any plenary suit a litigant would have, for he would be entitled to have the whole merits discussed before a judgment was given against him. Therefore in no sense can this be regarded as an adjudication in a cause where the merits were, or where they could be tried; and I am not aware of a single case where a foreign judgment has been given effect to in this country where the adjudication was had in a case where the merits could ex necessitate rei not have been discussed. No such case has been suggested in the course of the argument, and none was suggested in the courts below. This is a peculiar judgment. There is no analogy to it that I know of in our law; none has been stated. A couple of cases were mentioned as approximations to an analogy; but no judgment known to our law or to the law of Scotland has been suggested which is at all really analogous to this peculiar form of remate judgment, which may be nullified, which may be paralysed, which may be reduced to a state of absolutely worthless paper by a proceeding in which the merits can be gone into. In other words we are asked to say that this remate judgment shall be accepted by our laws as final and conclusive, when the laws of Spain itself which produced this remate judgment say that it is one which may be absolutely swept away when proceedings come before the court in which the merits can be gone into.

It would be, I venture to think, a very startling result if in this country we should hold this executive summary remate judgment to be final and conclusive, while in the municipal institutions of the country which has sent out this judgment it would not even be regarded as res judicata. That is a point referred to with force and persuasiveness in the arguments addressed to the court below, and most powerfully in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., and I adopt everything that he said. It strikes my mind as being to the last degree surprising to listen to a suggestion that when the laws of Spain do not regard this judgment as of such a binding character that it can be relied upon in any proceeding as res judicata, the very minute the intervention of a foreign country is invoked it becomes so sacrosanct that it is to be regarded by us as final and conclusive. It appears to me to be almost a contradiction in terms to make the suggestion.

For these reasons I entirely concur in the decision at which your lordships have arrived.

Practice—Evidence on inquiries in chambers after trial—Time for closing the evidence—Order for cross-examination—Discretion of judge—R. S. C., ord. 38, r. 18.

Though no hard and fast rule can be laid down that, in proceedings in chambers after judgment, no fresh evidence can be adduced after cross-examination—that being a matter in the discretion of the judge—yet there is nothing reprehensible in the practice which has grown up in chambers, and is well known to practitioners there, that liberty to cross-examine is, in the absence of special circumstances, only accorded on the footing that all the evidence will be completed before cross-examination. In ordinary cases, and under ordinary circumstances, this practice is a good and convenient one.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

The action had been brought to set aside a promissory note, and to have an account taken. The plaintiff was the executor and surviving trustee of the will of the testator, Davies, and the defendants were the executors of a residuary legatee under that will, and they had counter-claimed for payment of the sum due on the note, which had been given by the plaintiff to the defendants' testator for the amount shown to be due on an account stated.

At the trial of the action judgment had been given directing accounts and inquiries. The plaintiff, on October 24, 1889, brought in accounts in chambers, and on November 26, the defendants, without having filed any evidence themselves, issued a summons for leave to cross-examine the plaintiff on the accounts; the summons was heard by the chief clerk on November 30, and on the hearing the plaintiff's solicitor intimated to the defendants' solicitor that if the defendants cross-examined they would not be entitled to file evidence. The chief clerk made the order for cross-examination, but fixed no time for the defendants to file their evidence. The plaintiff filed further evidence as to the accounts on February 17, 1890; and on February 18, the cross-examination of plaintiff by the defendants was commenced.

On February 28, after the cross-examination had closed, the defendants applied for leave to file evidence as to the accounts, but the chief clerk refused the application, on the ground that the defendants should have filed their evidence before cross-examining the plaintiff on the accounts. The defendants then moved before Chitty, J., to have it declared that they were entitled to file evidence in answer to the inquiries and accounts delivered by the plaintiff, or in the alternative for a declaration that they were entitled to file evidence generally, notwithstanding the fact that the cross-examination of plaintiff on the accounts had closed.

Chitty, J., dismissed the application, on the ground that, in the exercise of his discretion, he would not depart from what was the ordinary practice in chambers, though no hard and fast rule existed—viz., not to allow an order for cross-examination to go until the evidence was complete. (See the report, 34, SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 399.)

From this refusal the defendants appealed.

Swinfen Eady, for the appellants.—In the case of cross-examination of an accounting party on the accounts it would be unfair to require the other party to put in all his evidence before the cross-examination. He could not be expected to file his evidence without seeing how far the accounting party's case has broken down on cross-examination. Where no time has been fixed by the chief clerk for the defendants' to file their evidence, they are entitled to do so at any time before the matter comes before the judge: In re Chifferiel, Chifferiel v. Watson, 36 W. R. 806. When the chief clerk gave the defendants leave to cross-examine he did not, as part of his order, fix any time for the defendants to file their evidence. There is no rule of court that all the evidence must be completed before cross-examination, and the judge cannot make a practice for himself. The rules on which Chitty, J., relied by way of analogy —viz., ord. 37, r. 21, and ord. 38, rr. 25—28—relate to the times for filing affidavit evidence before trial, and have really no application to filing evidence after trial with reference to inquiries and accounts. The defendants have a right to cross-examine the plaintiff as an accounting party: In re Lord's Estate, Lord v. Lord, L. R. 2 Eq. 605, 27 W. R. Ch. Dig. 103; and when a right exists it cannot be limited or conditions put on it by the action of the udge. In proceeding on an account it has never been the practice to put the non-accounting party under a condition to complete his evidence before cross-examining the accounting party.

He also referred to Muir v. Kirby, 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 139; Concha v. Concha, 35 W. R. 477, 11 App. Cas. 541.

Romer, Q.C., and McSwinney, for the respondent, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I wish to say at once that anything which may fall from me now is without prejudice to any application which the defendants may make in the court below for further time to file affidavits on any special grounds.

The appeal has been argued on the wide ground that the order of Chitty, J., is wrong as not being warranted by the Rules of Court and as being contrary to the general practice.

Now there is no rule expressly dealing with this matter; but rule 18 of order 38 has been construed by North, J., in In re Chifferiel as empowering the chief clerk to fix a time in chambers for the closing of the evidence. Independently of that, however, there is no special rule expressly applicable. It has, however, been found convenient, as a matter of practice in chambers, to require that a party wishing to cross-examine a party verifying accounts, should first file all his evidence and afterwards cross-examine. There is no general hard and fast rule, but that practice has been found to work well, and there is no reason why we should discourage it; the practice is well known, and everyone who is familiar with the practice in chambers knows that he cannot get an order to cross-examine at all, except on the understanding that all the evidence has been put in. In the present case Mr. Eady's client was warned by the plaintiff's solicitors that if he obtained an order to cross-examine he would not afterwards be allowed to put in further evidence, and the whole matter proceeded on that footing, and it was with that understanding that the chief clerk made the order.

We are now asked to condemn that practice. If a hard and fast rule had been laid down I should condemn it, but that is not so, and I think the ordinary practice, which has been found to work well, is a good one. Chitty, J., considered that he had a discretion, and as no special grounds were alleged why he should depart from the ordinary practice he refused to do so, and I am of opinion he exercised his discretion rightly.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I am impressed with the fact that Mr. Eady asks us to set him at large to file evidence generally, without showing any special circumstances upon which he might be entitled to the indulgence of the court. The rules are silent as to this matter. It is, therefore, left to the chief clerk acting for the judge, in the exercise of his discretion, to fix the time within which the cross-examination of a particular witness is to take place in each case. The practice which has grown up, that liberty to cross-examine will not be accorded, in the absence of special circumstances, until all the evidence is complete, and that after cross-examination no fresh evidence can be adduced, is obviously for the convenience of business, and there is nothing reprehensible in it. This is not a hard and fast rule, as in the circumstances of some cases it would clearly work inevitable injustice to close the mouth of a party. It may, therefore, be necessary that Mr. Eady's client should have leave hereafter to adduce evidence on the ground of some special circumstances. It has always been accepted by the Court of Appeal that a judge who has a discretion reposed in him as to a particular matter shall have liberty to indicate to the practitioners coming before him on what lines his discretion will run in ordinary cases and under ordinary circumstances, and it is only by that means that the time for cross-examination is fixed in chambers at all.

I have no doubt that this practice was well understood in the present case both by the chief clerk and by the clerks of the solicitors in the case; the attention of the defendants' solicitor was called to it by the plaintiff's solicitor, and the chief clerk and all the solicitors' clerks engaged in the case must have understood that each was aware that that was the usual practice in chambers. Mr. Eady, therefore, cannot claim as a matter of right to be emancipated from that, the order having been taken on the implied understanding of both parties that the usual practice would be followed.

Poor law—Settlement—Illegitimate child under sixteen—Birth settlement—Settlement of mother—Onus of proof—4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71.

Upon the hearing of an appeal against an order of removal of an illegitimate child under sixteen to the place of its birth settlement, it was proved that the mother was alive, but no evidence as to her settlement was given.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the onus of proving that the mother had a settlement lay upon the appellants, and that, in the absence of such proof, the order adjudging the child to be settled in the place of its birth was right.

Reg. v. St. Paul's, Covent Garden, L. R. 7 Q. B. 232, discussed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a case stated by the court of quarter sessions for the borough of Ipswich on appeal against an order of removal (24 Q. B. D. 414).

The pauper, Alice Mary Beckley, was the illegitimate daughter of Alice Beckley, who was still alive. The pauper was born on the 14th of August, 1880, at Headington Workhouse, and the order of removal adjudged that the place of the last legal settlement of the pauper was in the parish of Headington, in the appellants' union. The notice of chargeability and grounds of removal sent to the appellants set forth the following as the particulars of the pauper's settlement in the Headington Union:—"The said Alice Mary Beckley was the illegitimate daughter of Alice Beckley, and was born on the 14th day of August, 1880, at Headington Workhouse, in the parish of Headington, in your union above named." Upon the hearing of the appeal against the order of removal, it was admitted by the respondents that the mother of the pauper was still alive, but no evidence was given to show that the mother had any settlement at all. No evidence was given to show that there had been any failure by the respondents to make inquiries.

(a.) Reported by W. F. Barry, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellants contended that in the case of an illegitimate child under the age of sixteen, with a mother still living, there was no presumption that the place of its birth was its place of settlement, and that before such child could be adjudged to be settled in the place of its birth there must be an inquiry into the settlement of the mother.

The respondents contended that the place of the birth of such a child was to be taken as its place of settlement until the contrary was proved, and that the burden of such proof lay upon the appellants.

The recorder held that the contention of the respondents was right, and affirmed the order. The Queen's Bench Division (Pollock, B., and Hawkins, J.) having affirmed this order, the guardians of the Headington Union appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and Shortt, for the appellants.—By 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71, illegitimate children are to take the settlement of their mother until they attain the age of sixteen or acquire a settlement in their own right. Therefore, since that statute, there is no presumption in favour of the birth settlement of an illegitimate child, and in this respect it differs from a legitimate child. The settlement of the mother must be disposed of before the birth settlement can be relied upon. The onus, therefore, of showing that the mother had no settlement to which the child could be removed lay upon the respondents, and until they discharged that onus the child could not be removed to its birth settlement.

They referred to Reg. v. St. Paul's, Covent Garden, L. R. 7 Q. B. 232.

R. C. Glen and J. F. P. Rawlinson, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord Esher, M.R.—It is admitted that, unless the case of Reg. v. St. Paul's, Covent Garden, covers the appellants' contention, they cannot succeed. That case seems to me to decide this, that a parish which gives a notice of removal to another parish must state in the notice the settlement which it alleges the pauper has in that other parish. In that case the parish did not specify the settlement relied upon, and the court held that the notice was bad upon the ground that it did not state, and therefore the court could not say, what settlement was intended to be relied upon. That case, therefore, does not substantiate the contention put forward on behalf of the appellants. In the present case the parish, in their notice of chargeability and grounds of removal, do state the settlement in the other parish upon which they intend to rely. The parish which gives the notice has a right to rely upon any alleged settlement in the other parish. If they fail to prove the settlement which they state in their notice that they rely upon, they fail altogether. If another and a superior settlement is proved, they likewise fail. In the present case an illegitimate child is ordered to be removed to its birth settlement in the appellants' union. That is the settlement relied upon in the notice given by the respondents. The appellants might have set up another and a superior settlement, and, according to the ordinary rule of law, if they meant to rely upon it they must have proved it. It is admitted that that is the law as to legitimate children, but it is said not to be applicable to illegitimate children since the statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71. I can see nothing in that Act which has any such effect. It leaves the case of a birth settlement untouched until a superior settlement—that is, the settlement of the mother—is proved. Those who rely upon a superior settlement for the purpose of displacing the birth settlement must prove it. In my opinion the law is the same in this respect both with regard to legitimate and illegitimate children. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Divisional Court is right, and I entirely agree with the reasons given for that judgment by the learned judges.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

LOPES, L.J.—I also agree with the judgment delivered by the Master of the Rolls, and with the reasons given by the learned judges in the Divisional Court.

Bill of sale—Validity—Chattels real included in security—Statutory form—Bills of Sale Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43).

A bill of sale had been drawn mainly in the form set out in the schedule of the Bills of Sale Amendment Act, 1882, but to "all and singular the several chattels and things specifically described in the schedule" there had been added the words "together with all tenant-right, valuation, and goodwill, tillages, and interest of the mortgagor" in a certain farm, and these interests were further specified in the schedule, together with various personal chattels.

Held, that the document was void as a bill of sale, on the ground that it was not drawn in the statutory form, nor had the same legal effect, since it included chattels real in the security, whereas the Bills of Sale Acts only contemplate advances on the security of chattels personal.

In re Burdett, Ex parte Byrne, 36 W. R. 128, 20 Q. B. D. 310, distinguished.

Appeal from a judgment of MANISTY, J., directing a nonsuit.

The plaintiff, the grantee of a bill of sale, had brought an action against the sheriff for the seizure and sale at the instance of an execution creditor of the grantor of the bill, of goods comprised in the bill of sale. The bill of sale ran mainly in the statutory form, but included in the descriptive clause chattels real as well as personal. The clause in question ran as follows:—"All and singular the several chattels and things specifically described in the schedule, together with all tenant-right, valuation, goodwill, tillages, and interest of the mortgagor in the farms, land, and premises." The schedule specified, in addition to the personal chattels, the interest of the mortgagor in a particular farm, and added the said words as to tenant-right, valuation, &c. Manisty, J., held that the document was void as a bill of sale by including chattels real, and withdrew the case from the jury. Against this decision, on the point of law, the plaintiff now appealed.

Kisch and Horace Kent, for the appellant.—A bill of sale is divisible in regard to the security, and may be good as to part of the security, though bad as to another part: In re Burdett, Ex parte Byrne, 36 W. R. 128, 20 Q. B. D. 310. This bill is good as to personal chattels, and the plaintiff is entitled to the growing crops seized and sold by the sheriff. The document is exactly in accordance with the wording of the statutory form, and merely fills in the blanks in that form in a manner allowable by implication: Thomas v. Kelly, 37 W. R. 353, 13 App. Cas. 506.

J. V. Austen, for the respondent.—The document is invalid as a bill of sale through not being in statutory form. There was no seizure of growing crops.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—A creditor of the defendant, the mortgagor of the security in question, has seized and sold the goods comprised in this security. No growing crops were capable of being seized at the time, so that point of the plaintiff's case is disposed of. The action is brought against the sheriff for the proceeds of the sale of the goods claimed by the plaintiff under this mortgage, which he maintains to be a valid bill of sale. Was this bill of sale valid as against an execution creditor? The document has been registered. It is said, however, to be void because it is not in the statutory form. Is it in the statutory form? or so nearly in that form as, according to a previous decision of this court, to be equivalent to that form? The bill of sale is to secure the lender of £50 with interest. It is a security of the goods mentioned in the schedule. But it contains as security, in addition to the personal chattels described in the schedule, certain chattels real. All the chattels real and personal are specifically mentioned, and the security is a mixed real and personal one. At the trial the plaintiff said he was entitled to the personal chattels under this bill of sale, though he admitted he might not be to the chattels real. Is a bill of sale so drawn, exactly like the form given in the Act of 1882? It is like that form, with some other things filled in in a way, as is alleged, admitted by the form. But what are these things? They are chattels real. But it is clear that the Act only deals with personal chattels as security. It cannot be said, then, to be drawn in the statutory form. But is it in such a similar or equivalent form as to come within our decision in Ex parte Stanford, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259? Is it so substantially in the same form as to have the same legal effect? The only way to judge that, is to see whether the same document in the statutory form would have the same legal effect? Obviously it would not, since it includes things which could not be included in the statutory form. But it is said that, even if so, a bill of sale, under the decision of In re Burdett, is divisible, so that it may be held valid as to one part of the security, the personal chattels, and that the part dealing with the chattels real may be struck out. In my opinion In re Burdett is not an authority for any such an argument. In that case the dispute was as to whether certain real chattels were within the Act at all. If the document in that case was one dealing with chattels real not mentioned in the Act it was outside the Bills of Sale Act altogether, and did not require registration. When the conveyance is one of chattels real its form is immaterial so far as the statute is concerned, and it is not fettered by section 9 of the Act. That case was rightly decided, and is not applicable to cases where the dispute is as to the validity of a document comprising chattels real as well as things admittedly within the Act.

This appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—The question whether a bill of sale containing a clause including "the tenant-right, valuation, goodwill, tillages, and interest of the mortgagor" among the chattels specified as securities for the loan is within the statutory form? The rule laid down in Ex parte Stanford is that you must first take the form in the statute and the instrument in question and consider whether they differ in any substantial respect? Has the one a greater or less legal effect than the other? If they differ in legal effect they are not similar. Has this instrument here the same legal effect as the statutory form? Plainly it has not. The form in the Act only deals with personal chattels. This instrument deals with chattels real as well as personal. It is, therefore, void as a bill of sale through not being in or equivalent to the statutory form.

LOPES, L.J.—There is little real difficulty in this case. Section 9 of the Act of 1882 enacted that a "bill of sale should be void unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule." The words in that form "all and singular the several chattels and things" related to personal chattels and nothing more. The schedule to this bill of sale specified chattels real as well as personal. Clearly such a document could not be said to have the same legal effect as the statutory form when it deals with things altogether outside the purview of the statute.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I should like to add that if the argument raised in this case were tenable the protection of ignorant or careless borrowers against money lenders, which was intended to be secured by the Bills of Sale Acts, would practically be done away with.

Appeal from the decision of Lopes, L.J., sitting at nisi prius without a jury.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment of Fry, L.J.

In June, 1888, Mr. Ernest Benzon was the owner of a racehorse named Kilworth, which, on the 8th of that month, was ridden by the defendant Moore, who was a gentleman rider, in a steeplechase. The same day, the horse being then at the stables of a trainer named Yates, Benzon gave by word of mouth to Moore an undivided fourth share in the horse, which was accepted by Moore. A few days afterwards Benzon wrote to Yates, telling him of the gift to Moore, but did not inform Moore that he had done so.

In July Benzon executed a bill of sale to the plaintiff Cochrane for £10,000, in the schedule to which the horse Kilworth was included. At the time of the execution of the bill of sale, Moore's interest in the horse was mentioned, and Cochrane undertook that it should be all right. The horse having been sold by Messrs. Tattersall, an interpleader issue was directed to try the right to the sum of £156, representing the fourth part of the price received for the horse.

Lopes, L.J., held that the gift was valid, and also that the bill of sale was void, and gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Addison, Q.C., Henn Collins, Q.C., and Kisch, for the appellant.—A present gift of a chattel by word of mouth, although accepted then and there, is not sufficient to pass the property without delivery. This was laid down in Irons v. Smallpiece, 2 B. & Ald. 551, by the court of Queen's Bench, in Shower v. Pilck, 4 Ex. 478, by the Court of Exchequer, and in Bourne v. Fosbrooke, 13 W. R. 497, 18 C. B. N. S. 515, by the Court of Common Pleas. Those decisions were in accordance with the old law. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Benjamin on Sales, 4th ed., p. 3.] No doubt those cases have been doubted in Lunn v. Thornton, 1 C. B. 379; Ward v. Audland, 16 M. & W. 862; and in a note by Serjeant Manning to London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co. v. Fairclough, 2 M. & Gr. 674, at p. 691, but the older authorities required that the gift should be at least attested by sufficient evidence, of which delivery was the strongest and most essential: Blackstone's Commentaries, 7th ed. (1775), c. XXX., p. 441; Comyn's Digest, tit. Biens (D. 2); Smith v. Smith, 2 Str. 954; Year Book M. 7 Ed. Delivery was held to be necessary for a valid donatio mortis causâ (see a note to Walter v. Hodge, 2 Swans., at p. 101; Williams on Executors, 8th ed., vol. I., p. 786; Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. sen. 431; Tate v. Hilbert, 2 Ves. jun. 111; Lampleigh v. Braithwaite, 1 Smith L. C., 9th ed., 153; Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N. C. 136. The American decisions are to the same effect: Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 422. The modern cases which have departed from the doctrine of Irons v. Smallpiece are wrong: Winter v. Winter, 9 W. R. 747; In re Ridgway, 34 W. R. 80, 15 Q. B. D. 447; and Danby v. Tucker, 31 W. R. 578. A gift without delivery is revocable, and the bill of sale operated as a revocation. Even if it was not intended to operate as a bill of sale, it stands as security for the advance: Urquhart v. Macpherson, 3 App. Cas. 831, 26 W. R. Dig. 58; Tyler v. Yates, 19 W. R. 909, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 665; Earl of Aylesford v. Morris, 21 W. R. 424, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 484.

Pollard and Hugh Mitchell, for the respondent.—At common law a gift by word of mouth of a chattel, if accepted by the donee, vests the property in the chattel in him without delivery. None of the cases cited are cases of acceptance. Irons v. Smallpiece has always been doubted. A difference always existed between things that lay in livery and things that lay in grant: Perkins' Profitable Book, ed. 1827, p. 13.

Henn Collins, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 28.—The following judgments were delivered.

FRY, L.J.—The judgment I am about to read is that of Bowen, L.J., and myself.

The question in this interpleader issue arises in respect of a sum of money representing one-fourth of the proceeds of a horse called Kilworth, sold by Messrs. Tattersall. The plaintiff claims the money under a bill of sale executed by one Benzon, comprising this and other horses. The defendant claims it under an earlier gift of one-fourth of the horse to him by Benzon.

The relevant facts, as they appear in the judgment of Lopes, L.J., and in that part of the evidence to which he attached credence, are shortly as follows:—

The horse was in June, 1888, the property of Benzon, and was kept at the stables of a trainer named Yates, in or near Paris, and on the 8th of that month was ridden in a steeplechase by Moore, a gentleman rider. In consequence, as it appears, of some accident, the horse was not declared the winner, and on the same day, according to the view of the evidence taken by the learned judge, Benzon by words of present gift gave to Moore, and Moore accepted from Benzon, one undivided fourth part of this horse.

A few days subsequently Benzon wrote to Yates, in whose stables the horse was, and told him of the gift to

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Moore. But he did not inform Moore, nor did Moore know of any communication to Yates of the fact of the gift.

On July 9, 1888, Cochrane advanced £3,000 by way of loan to Benzon, and took from him a promissory note for £3,500, payable on August 9 following.

On July 16 of the same year Cochrane advanced to Benzon a further sum of £4,000, and took a promissory note for £4,800, payable on September 16.

On July 26 Cochrane advanced to Benzon two sums of money:—One, £1,680 10s. 11d. (to be paid to one Sherrard, a trainer), and £745; making together £2,425 10s. 11d. And on the same day Benzon executed a bill of sale for £10,000, under which Cochrane claims. Kilworth and other horses were included in the schedule to this instrument.

It is proved by the evidence of the witnesses, whom the learned judge believed, that before the execution of the bill of sale Benzon, with the assistance of a friend, Mr. Powell, was going through the list of horses to be included in the schedule, and that when Kilworth was mentioned Powell spoke of Moore's interest in the horse, and that thereupon a discussion arose as to what was to be done with it, and that Cochrane undertook that it should be "all right." After this the bill of sale was executed by Benzon.

On these facts it was argued that there was no delivery and receipt of the one-fourth of the horse, and, consequently, that no property in it passed by the gift. The learned judge has, however, held that delivery is not indispensable to the validity of the gift.

The proposition on which the Lord Justice proceeded may perhaps be stated thus: that where a gift of a chattel capable of delivery is made per verba de præsenti by a donor to a donee, and is assented to by the donee, and that assent is communicated to the donor by the donee, there is a perfect gift, which passes the property without delivery of the chattel itself. This proposition is one of much importance, and has recently been the subject of some diversity of opinion. We therefore feel it incumbent upon us to examine it, even though it might be possible in the present case to avoid that examination.

The proposition adopted by the Lord Justice is in direct contradiction to the decision of the Court of King's Bench in the year 1819 in Irons v. Smallpiece. That case did not proceed upon the character of the words used, or upon the difference between verba de præsenti and verba de futuro, but upon the necessity of delivery to a gift otherwise sufficient. The case is a very strong one, because a court consisting of Lord Tenterden, C.J., and Best and Holroyd, JJ., refused a rule nisi, and all held delivery to be necessary. The Chief Justice said: "I am of opinion that, by the law of England, in order to transfer property by gift there must either be a deed or instrument of gift, or there must be an actual delivery of the thing to the donee," and he went on to refer to the case of Bunn v. Markham, 2 Marsh. 532, as a strong authority.

These observations of the Chief Justice have created some difficulty. What did he mean by an instrument as contrasted with a deed? If he meant that an instrument in writing not under seal was different from parol in respect of a gift inter vivos, he was probably in error; but if, in speaking of the transfer of property by gift, he included gifts by will as well as gifts inter vivos, then by instrument he meant testamentary instrument, and his language was correct.

Holroyd, J., was equally clear on the principal point: "In order to charge the property by a gift of this description" (by which we understand him to mean a gift inter vivos) "there must be a change of possession."

The correctness of the proposition thus laid down has been asserted in many subsequent cases of high authority.

Thus in Reeves v. Capper the Court of Common Pleas under Tindal, C.J., referred to Irons v. Smallpiece, and the proposition "that a verbal gift of chattels, unaccompanied with delivery of possession, passes no property to the donee" as being good law and without the expression of any doubt.

In 1849, in the case of Shower v. Pilck, the same question came before the Court of Exchequer, and the court without hesitation affirmed the ruling of Lord Truro, then Wilde, C.J., at nisi prius, and adopted the rule of Irons v. Smallpiece. The alleged gift in question was per verba de futuro, but in respect of chattels then in the possession of the intended donee. The gift was held open to both objections. "To pass the property," said Alderson, B., "there must be both a gift and a delivery; here there is hardly a gift." "There must be a delivery to make the gift valid," said Lord Cranworth, then Rolfe, B., "here there is a mere statement that the goods which the defendant has in her possession the owner will give her."

Again (in 1865), in Bourne v. Fosbrooke, Erle, C.J., adopted the rule in Irons v. Smallpiece as undoubted law; and in 1870, in Douglas v. Douglas, the Court of Exchequer declined to consider whether they should overrule that case, and expressed a decided leaning in its favour.

In Ireland, in like manner, the doctrine has been asserted, Lord Plunkett, as Lord Chancellor, holding delivery to be the only admissible evidence of the gift of a personal chattel: Patterson v. Williams, L. & G. temp. Plunkett, 95.

We have thus a great body of authority in favour of the necessity of delivery; but, on the other hand, there are several authorities which require consideration.

The first note of dissent was sounded in the year 1841, or twenty-two years after the decision of the case of Irons v. Smallpiece, by Serjeant Manning in a note on the case of the London and Brighton Railway Co. v. Fairclough, in which he impugned the accuracy of Irons v. Smallpiece, and asserted that after the acceptance of a gift by parol the estate is in the donee without any actual delivery of the chattel. The authorities cited in that note we shall hereafter consider.

In 1845, in Lunn v. Thornton, Maule, J., interlocutorily observed that he had always thought Lord Tenterden's opinion in Irons v. Smallpiece very remarkable, because by referring to instruments of gift he left it to be inferred that an assignment might be otherwise than by deed. But beyond this his criticism did not proceed. To the report of this case Serjeant Manning appended a note similar to that in the second volume of Manning and Granger.

Two years afterwards (1847) Lord Wensleydale, in Ward v. Audland, quoted the passage from Lord Tenterden's judgment already cited, and observed, "that is not correct." To which counsel replied by referring to the criticism of Maule, J., and the learned judge made no further observation. The criticism of the two learned judges was probably directed to the same point—namely, the use of the expression, deed or instrument. Lord Cranworth was present as a Baron of the Exchequer during the argument in Ward v. Audland, and, as we have seen, two years afterwards unhesitatingly adopted Irons v. Smallpiece, and that without note or comment—a course which he would hardly have pursued if he knew that Lord Wensleydale considered the case itself bad law.

In 1852, in the case of Flory v. Denny, where the authorities lastly cited were mentioned, Lord Wensleydale referred to the two notes of Serjeant Manning, and read a portion of the later, but expressed no opinion as to the correctness or incorrectness of the conclusion.

In 1861 the case of Winter v. Winter came before the Court of Queen's Bench. In that case a barge belonging to a father had been in the actual possession of his son as his servant. The father gave the barge to the son, and he subsequently, with the father's knowledge and assent, possessed and worked the barge as his own, and paid the wages of the crew. Wightman, J., upheld the title of the son on the ground of a change in the possession consequent on the gift. Crompton, J., on the ground that actual delivery of the chattel is not necessary to a gift inter vivos, and that it was sufficient that the conduct of the parties showed that the ownership had been changed. Lord Blackburn, then Blackburn, J., simply concurred. What, however, is most to our present point, Crompton, J., said that, although Irons v. Smallpiece and Shower v. Pilck had not been overruled, they had been hit hard by the subsequent cases.

In 1883 the case of Danby v. Tucker came before Pollock, B., sitting as a judge of the Chancery Division, and he declined to follow the decision of Irons v. Smallpiece, saying that he "certainly could not accede to the proposition generally that the actual delivery of a chattel is necessary to create a good gift inter vivos." "The question to be determined," he said, "is not whether there has been an actual handing over of property manually, but whether, looking at all the surrounding circumstances of the case, and looking particularly at the nature and character of the chattel which is proposed to be given, there has or has not been a clear intention expressed on the part of the donor to give, and a clear intention on the part of the recipient to receive and act upon, such gift. Whenever such a case should arise again, I am confident that that would be the basis of the decision of a court of common law, and, of course, the same result would follow in a court of equity."

Lastly (in 1885) Cave, J., in the case of In re Ridgway, expressed his opinion "that it is going too far to say that the retention of possession by the donor is conclusive proof that there is no immediate present gift; although, undoubtedly, unless explained or its effect destroyed by other circumstances, it is strong evidence against the existence of such an intention."

These two latter authorities have been followed by Lopes, L.J., in the case now before us, feeling that when sitting as a judge of the first instance he could not rightly depart from them.

There is thus some difference of judicial opinion as to the rule stated in Irons v. Smallpiece. We cannot think that the few recent decisions to which we have referred are enough to overrule the authority of that decision, and the cases which have followed it, but they make it desirable to inquire whether the law as declared before 1819 was in accordance with that decision or with the judgment of Pollock, B., in Danby v. Tucker.

This inquiry into the old law on the point is one of some difficulty, for it leads into rarely-trodden paths, where (as is very natural) we have not had the assistance of counsel, and where the materials for knowledge are for the most part undigested.

The law enunciated by Bracton in his book "de acquirendo rerum dominio," seems clear to the effect that no gift was complete without tradition of the subject of the gift. "Item oportet," he says (vol. i., p. 128), "quod donationem sequatur rei traditio, etiam in vita donatoris et donatorii; alioquin dicetur talis donatio potius nuda promissio quam donatio, et ex nuda promissione non nascitur actio, non magis quam ex nudo pacto, non enim valet donatio imperfecta, nec chartæ confectio, nec homagii captio cum omni solemnitate adhibita, nisi subsequuta fuerit seysina et traditio in vita donatoris." And again (p. 300): "Item non sufficit chartam esse factam & signatam nisi probetur donationem esse perfectam, & quod omnia, quæ donationem faciunt, ritè præcesserunt, & subsequutam esse traditionem, alioqui nunquam transferri potest res donata ad donatorium. Poterit enim homagium præcessisse, & quòd charta ritè facta sit, & vera & bona & cum solemnitate recitata & audita, tamen nunquam valebit donatio nisi tunc demum cum fuerit traditio subsequuta, & sic poterit charta esse vera, sed sine facta seysina, nuda." And to the same effect is another passage in chapter xviii., p. 310.*

In Bracton's day seisin was a most important element of the law of property in general; and, however strange it may sound to jurists of our day and country, the lawyers of that day applied the term as freely to a pig's ham (select Pleas in Manorial Courts, p. 142; see also Professor Maitland's papers on the Seisin of Chattels, the Beatitude of Seisin, and the Mystery of Seisin: Law Quarterly Rev., i. 324; ii., 484; iv., 24, 286) as to a manor or a field. At that time the distinction between real and personal property had not yet grown up: the distinction then recognized was between things corporeal and things incorporeal: no action could then be maintained on a contract for the sale of goods, even for valuable consideration, unless under seal: the distinction so familiar to us now between contracts and gifts had not fully developed itself. The law recognized seisin as the common incident of all property in corporeal things, and tradition or the delivery of that seisin from one man to another as essential to the transfer of the property in that thing, whether it were land or a horse, and whether by way of sale or of gift, and whether by word of mouth or by deed under seal. This necessity for delivery of seisin has disappeared from a large part of the transactions known to our law; but it has survived in the case of feoffments. Has it also survived in the case of gifts?

It has been suggested that Bracton, whilst purporting to enunciate the law of England, is really copying the law of Rome. But by the law of Rome, at least since the time of Justinian, gift has been a purely consensual transaction, and did not require delivery to make it perfect (Inst. ii., vii.).

Coming next to the great law-writers of the reign of Edward I., they hold language substantially the same as that of Bracton, except indeed that the difference between transactions purely voluntary, or for pecuniary consideration, appears to be growing somewhat more important. "Donatio," says Fleta, "est quædam institutio, quæ ex mera liberalitate, nullo jure cogente, procedit, ut rem a vero ejus possessore ad alium transferatur. Dare autem est rem accipientis facere cum effectu, alioquin inutilis erit donatio, cum irritari valeat et revocari" (Lib. iii., c. 3). He then proceeds to discuss various kinds of gifts, and says: "Alia perfecta, et alia incepta et non perfecta: ut si donatio lecta fuerit et concessa, et homagium captum, ac traditio nondem fuerit subsecuta" (loc. cit.; see also Lib. iii., c. 15).

In Lib. iii., c. 7, he discusses the necessary elements of donations, and, amongst other things, the effect of duress on a gift; and here the necessity of delivery is again clearly shown, because, according to Fleta, a promise made without duress followed by delivery under duress is not a valid gift. "Refert tamen," he says, "utrum metus præveniat donationem vel subsequatur, quia si primo coactus, et per metum compulsus promisero, et postea gratis tradidero, talis metus non excusat; sed si gratis promisero et compulsus tradidero tunc excusat metus."

Britton held substantially the same language. In citing him we shall prefer the translation of Mr. Nichols to the Norman-French of the original. In his chapter on Gifts (Lib. ii., c. 3) he gives a very clear description of the nature of a gift. "A gift," he says, "is an act whereby anything is voluntarily transferred from the true possessor to another person, with the full intention that the thing shall not return to the doner, and with full intention on the part of the receiver to retain the thing entirely as his own without restoring it to the giver. For the gift cannot be properly made if the thing given does not so belong to the receiver, that the two rights, of property and of possession, are united in his person, so that the gift cannot be revoked by the donor, or made void by another, in whom the lawful property is vested" (pp. 220, 221).

And again (Lib. ii., c. 3):—

"Some gifts are complete, where both rights unite in the purchaser; others are begun, and not completed; and such titles are bad, as in case of gifts granted whereof no livery of seisin follows" (pp. 225-6).

Passages of similar import will be found in Lib. i., c. 29, and Lib. ii., c. 8.

The third writer of the age of Edward I. is one of a very different character from Fleta and Britton—we mean Horn, the author of the Mirror of Justices; he attacked the judges and the administration of the law in his days with a vehemence which it is to be hoped was undeserved. But though amongst the 155 abusions or abuses of the law which stirred his soul to wrath some relate to seisin, yet he has nothing to say at variance with his contemporaries on the necessity of delivery; but, on the contrary, expressly affirms that "the law requires but three things in contracts—(1) The agreement of the wills; (2) satisfaction of the donor; (3) delivery of the possession and gift" (chap. v., sec. 1, para. 75).

In the reign of Edward IV. a step seems to have been taken in the law relative to gifts, which resulted in this modification: that, whereas under the old law a gift of chattels by deed was not good without the delivery of the chattel given, it was now held that the gift by deed was good and operative until dissented from by the donee.

Thus, in Michaelmas Term, 7 Edw. 4, pl. 21, fol. 20, it was held by Choke and other justices that if a man executes a deed of gift of his goods to me that this is good and effectual without livery made to me, until I disagree to the gift, and this ought to be in a court of record.

In Hilary Term, 7 Edw. 4, pl. 14, fol. 29, it was alleged by counsel (Catesby and Pigot), that if a man give to me all his goods by a deed, although the deed was not delivered to the donee, nevertheless the gift is good, and if he chooses to take the goods he can justify this by the gift, although notice has not been given to him of the gift; and further, that if the donee commit felony before notice, &c., still the king will have the goods, and although notice may be material, nevertheless when he has notice, this would have relation to the time of the gift, &c. But the court said that such a gift is not good without notice, for a man cannot give his goods to me against my will.

An earlier case in the same reign has been cited as bearing on the present question. In Michaelmas Term, 2 Edw. 4, pl. 26, fol. 25, a case arose on trespass of goods, in which Laicon was counsel for the defendant, and the court was engaged in considering the sufficiency of his pleas. In the course of the discussion Laicon put this question, "Suppose I give to you my goods, which are at Everwike, and before that you are seised of them, a stranger takes them away, have you not a writ of trespass against the stranger?" Which he then proceeds to answer. "Yes, sir, for by the gift at once the property was in you and the possession by the writ is adjudged in you presently. Danby, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, seems to have assented, apparently on the ground that pleading to such a writ by way of justification would confess the possession of the plaintiff and the taking of the defendant (car la si vous pled. vr. matter accord, et justif, et vous confess. prisee hors de son poss.). But immediately after this discussion Laicon found his argument so hopeless (videns opinionem curiæ contra eum) that he seems to have amended his pleadings.

This case seems to us of no authority on the point under investigation. What was said was not in discussion of what really passed by the gift, but only of the effect of pleading in preventing the denial of the plaintiff's possession. The question seems to relate to an effectual gift of goods without possession, but there is nothing to show whether the parties to the discussion had in contemplation a gift by deed or not. The cases already referred to, which occurred a few years later, seem to show that the effect of a deed in passing the property without delivery of the chattel was claiming the attention of the lawyers of that day.

Brooke, in his Abridgement (Trespass, 303), cites this case of the 2 Edw. 4, and seems to put it upon a somewhat different ground to the Year Book itself. He says that Danby agreed in Laicon's argument, "for by the gift the property is in him, and then the law adjudges possession, which was not denied, and it seems to be the law, because goods are transitory whilst land is local." We can find no authority for these reasons in the entry which he professes to be abstracting.

This case, as explained by Brooke, seems to underlie the proposition asserted twice in the case of Hudson v. Hudson, Latch. 214, 263 (discussed in 2 Wms. Saunders, 47, 6, a) to illustrate the right of an executor to sue in trover before actual possession. If, it was said, a man in London gives to me his goods in York and another take them I can bring trespass; for property, it was added, draws possession in chattels personal. The court were not considering what gift of chattels did carry the property, but only illustrating the proposition that where the property has passed, as by the will to the executor, there the law attracts to it possession. This would be perfectly illustrated by the case of chattels in York transferred by deed executed in London. The whole supposition that this case lends any countenance to the notion that chattels can pass without delivery seems to be derived from the silence of the case as to the way in which the gift was made; and this point was not material to the matter under consideration by the court. Moreover, when a legal result could only be produced by a deed, our elder law-writers were, we believe, less apt to mention the deed than their less technical descendants.

One other case in the reign of Edward IV. must be mentioned. In Michaelmas Term, 21 Edw. 4, pl. 27, fol. 55, it was said by Brian, J., that in detinue of chattels it was a good plea to say that the plaintiff after the bailment gave them to the defendant and then he could have his law—quod fuit concessum. The case appears to go only to this, that if A. after bailing a chattel to B. then gives it to B., B. might defend himself by his suit in an action of detinue. If good law, it seems to establish that delivery first and gift afterwards is as effectual as a gift first and delivery afterwards.

One case in the reign of Henry VII. perhaps requires consideration (Hilary Term, 21 Hen. 7, pl. 30, fol. 18). The question seems to have been whether the use of land was presently transferred by a bargain and sale, and in the course of the report the following passage occurs:—"If I give to a man my cow or my horse, he may take the one or the other at his election; and the cause is that immediately by the gift the property is in him, and that of the one or the other at his will; but if the case were that I will give to him a horse or a cow in future time, then he cannot take either the one or the other, for then it is in my election to choose which of them I will give him." The case is interesting as the first one which we have found which emphasizes the distinction in gifts between words in the present and in the future tense. But the passage we have cited appears to have no real weight of authority. It is only part of the argument of the Attorney-General, and the argument does not appear tenable; for surely it is open to question whether the gift, even a grant for valuable consideration, of one or other of two things at the election of the donee or grantee can pass the property in one or other or both of these things immediately and before the election of the grantee. It is further to be observed that the question before the court turned on the doctrine of election; and whether the supposed gift was to be by deed or not is a point on which the report is silent. This silence is the only reason why the passage has been thought by some persons relevant to the present inquiry.

In was in the reigns of the early Tudors that the action on the case on indebitatus assumpsit obtained a firm foothold in our law; and the effect of it seems to have been to give a greatly-increased importance to merely consensual contracts. It was probably a natural result of this that, in time, the question whether and when property passed by the contract came to depend, in cases in which there was a valuable consideration, upon the mind and consent of the parties, and that it was thus gradually established that in the case of bargain and sale of personal chattels, the property passed according to that mind and intention, and a new exception was thus made to the necessity of delivery.

This doctrine, that property may pass by contract before delivery, appears to be comparatively modern. It may, as has been suggested, owe its origin to a doctrine of the civil law that the property was at the risk of the purchaser before it passed from the vendor; but, at any rate, the point was thought open to argument as late as Elizabeth's reign (see Plowd. 11 b., and see a learned note, 2 Man. & Ry. 566).

Flower's case, Noy, 67, which seems to have been decided in 39 Elizabeth (see p. 59), appears to show that the necessity of delivery was then upheld by the court. The case is thus stated by Noy (p. 67):—

"A. borrowed one hundred pound of B., and at the day brought it in a bagg and cast it upon the table before B., and B. said to A., being his nephew, I will not have it, take it you and carry it home again with you. And by the court that is a good gift by paroll, being cast upon the table. For then it was in the possession of B. and A. might well wage his law. By the court, otherwise it had been, if A. had only offer'd it to B., for then it was chose in action only, and could not be given without a writing."

The court seems to have held that delivery was necessary, but that, by the casting of the money on the table, it came into the possession of the uncle, and that the nephew taking the money in his uncle's presence and by his direction, there was an actual delivery by the uncle to the nephew—so that the nephew might wage his law—i.e., might conscientiously swear that he was not indebted to his uncle (see the case discussed in Douglas v. Douglas).

In Jenkins's Centuries (3rd Century, Case ix.), it is said: "A gift of anything without a consideration is good; but it is revocable before the delivery to the donee of the thing given. Donatio perficitur possessione accipientis. This is one of the rules of law"—a statement made with little reference to the other matters treated of in the case. We know of no other authority exactly to the same effect as this, nor is it stated as having the authority of any judicial decision.

Blackstone's discussion of the subject of gifts of chattels is perhaps not so precise as might be desired; but his language does not seem to us essentially to differ from the earlier authorities: "A true and proper gift or grant is," he says, "always accompanied by delivery of possession and takes effect immediately." "But if the gift does not take effect by delivery of immediate possession, it is then not properly a gift but a contract: and this a man cannot be compelled to perform" (Book 2, c. 30).

In 1818, the year before Irons v. Smallpiece was decided, the then Master of the Rolls, Sir Thomas Plummer, in Hooper v. Goodwin, 1 Swans. 485, 491, said: "A gift at law or in equity supposes some act to pass the property: in donations inter vivos . . . if the subject is capable of delivery, delivery."

These are, so far as we can find, all the relevant authorities before the decision in Irons v. Smallpiece, though they are not all the authorities that have been cited as relevant. But several that have been relied upon appear to us to have no real bearing on the point at issue. Thus in Wortes v. Clifton, Mich. 12 James I, Roll. 61, Coke arguendo uses as an illustration of the difference between the civil law and ours—that in the civil law a gift is not good without tradition—but that it is otherwise in our law. Here, for aught that appears, the gift which the learned counsel referred to as good without delivery is a gift by deed.

In like manner several authorities which affirm that a gift of chattels may be good without deed and are silent as to delivery (Perkins' Profitable Book Grant, 57; 2 Shep. Touchs. 227; Comyn Digt. Biens D. 2) have been cited as if they likewise asserted that a gift was good without delivery—a proposition which they do not affirm, or, as we think, imply.

This review of the authorities leads us to conclude that according to the old law no gift or grant of a chattel was effectual to pass it, whether by parol or by deed, and whether with or without consideration unless accompanied by delivery: that on that law two exceptions have been grafted, one in the case of deeds, and the other in that of contracts of sale where the intention of the parties is that the property shall pass before delivery: but that as regards gifts by parol, the old law was in force when Irons v. Smallpiece was decided: that that case therefore correctly declared the existing law: and that it has not been overruled by the decision of Pollock, B., in 1883, or the subsequent case before Cave, J.

We are therefore unable in the present case to accept the law on this point as enunciated by Lopes, L.J., in deference to the two latest decisions.

But assuming delivery to be necessary in the case of the gift of an ordinary chattel, two questions would remain for consideration in the present case—the first, whether the undivided fourth part of the horse admits of delivery, or whether on the other hand it is to be regarded as incorporeal and incapable of tradition; the other, whether the letter written by Benzon to Yates was either a constructive delivery of this undivided fourth part of the horse, or an act perfecting the gift of this incorporeal part so far as the nature of the subject-matter of the gift admits. On these points we do not think it needful to express any decided opinion, because in our judgment what took place between Benzon and Cochrance before Benzon executed the bill of sale to Cochrane constituted the latter a trustee for Moore of one-fourth of the horse Kilworth.

Another objection to Cochrane's title was based on the bill of sale, which bore date the 26th of July, 1888, and stated the consideration as a sum of £7,575 then owing by Benzon to Cochrane, and of the further sum of £2,425, then paid by Cochrane to Benzon, making together a sum of £10,000; whereas in fact at the date of the bill of sale Benzon was only indebted to Cochrane on two promissory notes then current and payable respectively in August and September, and for sums amounting together to £8,300. It is said that by an agreement arrived at at the time, this £8,300 due in futuro was to be taken as between the parties as represented by the sum of £7,575; but, if so, this agreement should in our opinion have been stated in the bill of sale, and we are therefore of opinion that the document was void as not truly stating the consideration for which it was given.

For these reasons we are of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion, it always was the law of England that an owner of a chattel could transfer his ownership thereof to another person by way of exchange or barter, or by way of bargain and sale for a consideration, or by way of and as a mere gift, or by will. Once conclude that such was always the law, and it follows that it is the common law. That law could not and cannot be altered by mere judicial decision, but only by Act of Parliament. The authority of any judicial decision to the contrary could be overruled at any time, however remote, by a competent court. But each of the above propositions is a fundamental proposition of law — i.e., a proposition which is not evidence of some other proposition which has to be proved, but a proposition the existence of which—i.e., the facts necessary to constitute which—is to be proved by evidence. The moment those facts are proved the proposition of law is proved, to which the legal tribunal will give effect. Although no court can properly alter such a fundamental proposition, the amount or nature of the evidence which will satisfy a court of the existence of such a proposition, as applicable to a particular case, may vary, and has varied, at different epochs. I have no doubt that in every one of the propositions enumerated, unless it be in the case of a gift by will, there was a time when, as part of the evidence of the existence of the proposition in a particular case, the courts always required that there should have been an actual delivery of the chattel in question. Though there was proof of a contract for good consideration, in a form which would now pass the property in a chattel without delivery, proof of actual delivery was required. Though the transfer was contained in a deed, proof of actual delivery was required. Equally the statement that one had declared in mere writing or in words that he did then, at the moment, transfer, without consideration, his chattel to another, and that the other did at the same moment state in writing or in words that he accepted such transfer, was not acted upon by the courts as proof of a gift executed, without proof also of an actual delivery. The evidence required in all cases was not complete without proof of an actual delivery. But in some of the cases the courts undoubtedly do not now require proof of an actual delivery. They do not now require that piece of evidence. They do not in the case of a transfer by deed, or in the case of a transfer by a contract for good consideration, showing in its terms an intention that the ownership should pass at once before or without immediate delivery. If I thought that there was not a difference between those cases and the case of what has been called a gift in words by the donor, and an acceptance in words by the donee of a chattel, I should be strongly inclined to think that, even though the courts would have required in such case proof of an actual delivery, up to and including the case of Irons v. Smallpiece, the courts might now in such case, as former courts did in the other cases, be satisfied by other evidence of the gift by the one and the acceptance of the gift by the other, which are the facts which constitute the proposition of a transfer of ownership of a chattel by way of and as a gift.

Up to the time of Irons v. Smallpiece, and afterwards, I have no doubt the courts did require proof of an actual delivery in such a case. Upon long consideration, I have come to the conclusion that actual delivery in the case of a "gift" is more than evidence of the existence of the proposition of law which constitutes a gift, and I have come to the conclusion that it is a part of the proposition itself. It is one of the facts which constitute the proposition that a gift has been made. It is not a piece of evidence to prove the existence of the proposition; it is a necessary part of the proposition, and, as such, is one of the facts to be proved by evidence. The proposition is not—that the one party has agreed or promised to give, and that the other party has agreed or promised to accept. In that case it is not doubted but that the ownership is not changed until a subsequent actual delivery. The proposition before the court on a question of gift or not is—that the one gave and the other accepted. The transaction described in the proposition is a transaction began and completed at once. It is a transaction consisting of two contemporaneous acts, which at once complete the transaction, so that there is nothing more to be done by either party. The act done by the one is that he gives; the act done by the other is that he accepts. These contemporaneous acts being done, neither party has anything more to do. The one cannot give, according to the ordinary meaning of the word, without giving; the other cannot accept then and there such a giving without then and there receiving the thing given. After these two things done, the donor could not get possession of the chattel without bringing an action to force the donee to give it back. Short of these things being done, the donee could not get possession without bringing an action against the donor to force him to give him the thing. But if we are to force him to give, it cannot be said that he has given. Suppose the proposing donor offers the thing saying, "I give you this thing—take it"; and the other says, "No, I will not take it now; I will take it to-morrow." I think the proposing donor could not in the meantime say correctly to a third person, "I gave this just now to my son or my friend." The answer of the third person would (I think rightly) be: "You cannot say you gave it to him just now; you have it now in your hand." All you can say is, "That you are going to give it him to-morrow, if then he will take it." I have come to the conclusion that in ordinary English language, and in legal effect, there cannot be a "gift" without a giving and taking. The giving and taking are the two contemporaneous reciprocal acts which constitute a "gift." They are a necessary part of the proposition that there has been a "gift." They are not evidence to prove that there has been a gift, but facts to be proved to constitute the proposition that there has been a gift. That being so, the necessity of their existence cannot be altered unless by Act of Parliament. For these reasons I think that the decision in Irons v. Smallpiece cannot be departed from, and I cannot agree with the decisions, which have been cited to us, of Pollock, B., and Cave, J.

I think, therefore, that we cannot agree with the main reason given by Lopes, L.J., for his decision in the present case, which he gave because he thought that, sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division, he ought to follow the later decisions. His own opinion was in favour of maintaining Irons v. Smallpiece. But I do entirely agree with what I understand was another ground on which he was prepared to decide this case, and which he found, as a fact, existed in this case—namely, that the deed on which the claimant's case rested was obtained by a fraudulent misrepresentation, and was repudiated by the giver of it as soon as he discovered the fraud.

For this reason, and the others mentioned by my brother Fry, I think the appeal must be dismissed. I wish to say that I am not prepared to differ in any respect from the judgment of my learned brothers; but I wish to add my own particular reason.

Appeal dismissed.

VADALA v. LAWES. (a.)

Judgment—Action to enforce foreign judgment—Defence alleging fraud—Re-trial of the merits of case adjudicated on by foreign court.

In an action brought in England to enforce a foreign judgment, it is legally competent for the defendant to raise a defence alleging fraud, even although the fraud alleged is such as necessitates a re-trial in England of the merits adjudicated on by the foreign court.

Abeuloff v. Oppenheimer, 31 W. R. 57, 10 Q. B. D 295, discussed and followed.

Appeal from an order of a divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division (Denman and Wills, JJ.).

The question raised by this appeal was whether, in an action to enforce a foreign judgment, it was open to the defendant to raise the defence that the foreign judgment was obtained by an alleged fraud, the proof of which required a re-trial of the merits of the case adjudicated upon by the foreign court.

The plaintiff was a stock and share broker in Sicily, and the defendant carried on business in England as a chemical manure manufacturer, and had appointed one Reynolds as his agent in Sicily. In 1881 Reynolds, purporting to act on behalf of the defendant, accepted several bills of exchange for a large amount drawn by the plaintiff. Reynolds, having shortly afterwards absconded, the plaintiff took proceedings against the defendant in the Italian court upon the bills of exchange, and the defence raised, in substance, was that the bills were not good commercial bills as the plaintiff represented, but bills given, without the knowledge of the defendant, in respect of gambling transactions. The Italian court gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, who accordingly brought the present action to enforce that judgment in England against the defendant.

The defendant, by his statement of defence, alleged that the plaintiff, "by fraudulently concealing from the Italian court the true transactions between the plaintiff and Reynolds, and by inducing the said court to believe that the said bills of exchange, fraudulently prepared as herein mentioned, were accepted by Reynolds as the result of commercial transactions entered into by Reynolds on behalf of the defendant, obtained the said judgment." There was also an allegation in the statement of defence that the plaintiff had commenced the foreign action relying on forged bills, and had misled the foreign court by fraudulently substituting, in collusion with Reynolds, the bills signed by Reynolds for the forged bills. The defendant also delivered these particulars of fraud:—"The bills of exchange were given for the purpose of enabling Reynolds to repay to the plaintiff moneys lost by Reynolds in speculative and gambling transactions to the plaintiff. Reynolds, being impecunious and unable to meet his liabilities in respect thereof to the plaintiff, gave the said bills or acceptances, which were discounted by the plaintiff, who kept the proceeds of the said bills and appropriated the same to payment of the debt due to him from Reynolds. The plaintiff concealed from the court the facts above mentioned, and induced the court to believe that the bills were discounted in the ordinary course of business with the authority of the defendant."

The action was tried before Charles, J., who held that in substance the only defence of fraud raised by the defendant was that the foreign judgment had been obtained by the fraudulent substitution of forged bills in the Italian court, and he declined to allow the defendant to give evidence on the point as to whether or not there had been a fraudulent misrepresentation made to the Italian court as to the bills being good commercial bills, and he decided, on the other point of defence, in favour of the plaintiff.

The Divisional Court (Denman and Wills, JJ.) held that the second head of defence was sufficiently raised by the defendant's pleading and particulars, and that it was open to the defendant to raise it, and accordingly ordered a new trial.

The plaintiff appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., A. T. Lawrence, and Leslie, for the appellant.—Fraud can only be set up as a defence to an action to enforce a judgment when the fraud alleged is as to a matter extraneous to the question adjudicated on. The defendant is not entitled to have the question actually adjudicated on by the foreign court re-tried in this action: Bank of Australasia v. Nias, 16 Q. B. 717; Flower v. Lloyd, 27 W. R. 496, 10 Ch. D. 327; De Medina v. Grove, 10 Q. B. 152, 171; Ochsenbein v. Papelier, 21 W. R. 516, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 695; Cammell v. Sewell, 8 W. R. 639, 3 H. & N. 617, 5 H. & N. 728, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 45; Crawley v. Isaacs, 16 L. T. 529, 15 W. R. C. L. Dig. 57; Adams v. Adams, 51 New Hampshire Rep. 388. The case of Abouloff v. Oppenheimer, 31 W. R. 57, 10 Q. B. D. 295, is distinguishable, and was never intended to go against the previous long current of authorities. There would be no finality in judgments if it were open to one of the parties to have the case re-tried by asserting that the other party knew that the case put before the court, and upon which the judgment was obtained, was a false one. The case where a person who was not a party to the suit in which the judgment was pronounced seeks to have that judgment set aside is quite different: Philipson v. Egremont, 6 Q. B. 587. The principles on which our courts act as to impeaching judgments on the ground of fraud are laid down in the House of Lords in Shedden v. Patrick, 1 Macq. 535, at p. 607, and also in Duchess of Kingston's case, 2 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., p. 812, and Henderson v. Henderson, 6 Q. B. 288. But in point of fact the defendant, by his statement of defence, has not raised the point that the plaintiff fraudulently represented to the Italian court that the bills were good commercial bills.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and English Harrison, for the respondent, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiff on a judgment obtained in the Italian courts. The Italian action was brought upon certain bills of exchange, and the defence raised in it was in substance that those bills were given in respect of gambling transactions by an agent of the defendant, without the authority of the defendant, and that the defendant was not liable upon them. That defence was tried on its merits—i.e., the questions whether those bills were given for gambling speculations, and whether, if they were, the defendant was affected with notice of it, were fully gone into, and decided in favour of the plaintiff and against the defendant. Judgment was given for the plaintiff for the amount of the bills, and this action is brought to enforce that judgment.

The defence raised in that action is one of the matters in controversy now. It is said on the one side that the only defence raised is, that the judgment of the Italian court was obtained by fraud, consisting in this, that in the Italian courts there was a shuffling of the bills—a substitution of some genuine ones for some forged ones—and that by that shuffle and fraud the Italian court was imposed on. That head of defence, which was obviously open to the defendant, has been tried and decided in favour of the plaintiff by Charles, J.

But the defendandant alleges (and this is what gives rise to the controversy) that he has also raised another ground of defence—viz., that the plaintiff in Italy fraudulently represented these bills as commercial bills, when he knew they were not, and that he thereby imposed on the court and obtained his judgment.

The first question is whether that defence is really raised. Charles, J., thought it was not. The Divisional Court, on looking further into the pleadings and the particulars, came to the conclusion that the defence might be construed, and ought to be construed, as raising that second head of defence. On looking at the amended statement of defence, especially at the seventh paragraph, it appears to me that the defence is capable of being construed in the wider sense. I do not think it is very clear; but there is certainly no surprise to the to the plaintiff, because if there were any obscurity in the pleadings, that is removed by the particulars, which make it clear enough. I have come, therefore, to the conclusion that the second head of defence—viz., that the plaintiff imposed upon the Italian courts by fraudulently representing that these bills were good commercial bills and not bills for gambling transactions, is sufficiently raised to enable the defendant to go into it, if in point of law he is entitled to do so.

That brings me to consider the other and more difficult question—viz., whether this head of defence can be gone into at all. There are two rules relating to these matters which have to be borne in mind, and the joint operation of which gives rise to the difficulty. There is first the well established rule, that a party to an action can impeach the judgment in it for fraud, whether it be the judgment of an English court or of a foreign court is immaterial; using general language that is a general proposition. But there is another general proposition equally well settled—viz., that in an action on a foreign judgment, the merits which have been tried in the foreign court cannot be gone into.

Then what is to be done in a case where the alleged fraud cannot be gone into without going into the merits? Which rule is to prevail? That point appears to me to have been one of very great difficulty before the case of Abouloff v. Oppenheimer, decided in 1882. At that time there was a long line of cases, including Bank of Australasia v. Nias, Ochsenbein v. Papelier, and Cammell v. Sewell, all recognizing and enforcing the first general proposition—viz., that in an action on a foreign judgment the merits cannot be retried. But until Abouloff's case the difficulty of combining the two rules, and saying what ought to be done in a case where an allegation of fraud could not be proved or gone into without re-opening the merits, had never been the subject of explicit decision.

That point was raised and decided in Abouloff's case. As I read the judgments of the judges (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Baggallay and Brett, L.JJ.) of the Court of Appeal in that case, they all say this: That if the fraud upon the foreign court consists in the fact that the plaintiff has induced that court by fraud to come to a wrong conclusion, you can reopen it, even although you will have, as a result of that, to go into, in the English court, the very questions investigated and decided in the foreign court. The technical objection that the issue is the same, is technically answered by the reply that the issue is not the same, because in the English court you have to consider whether the foreign court has been imposed upon. That, however, is only meeting a technical argument by a technical answer, and I do not attach much importance to that. But in Abouloff's case the court faced the difficulty that you could not give effect to the defence without re-trying the merits. In that case the fraud alleged to have been practised on the foreign court was the misleading of that court by evidence known to the plaintiff to be false. The fact of whether what the plaintiff had said in the foreign court was or was not false, was the very fact that had been adjudicated on in the foreign court, and, notwithstanding that, the English court said, 'If the foreign judgment was obtained fraudulently, and if it be necessary, in order to prove that fraud, to re-try the merits, then, according to the law of England, the merits must be retried.' To understand the judgments in that case, the argument for the defence ought to be looked at, because, as it appears to me, that argument was accepted by the court; and the argument was, "Even if the Russian courts had inquired into the existence of the fraud, and had been induced by fabricated evidence to come to a wrong conclusion, the circumstances under which the judgments were given could be investigated in an English court." Then Lord Coleridge, C.J., in his judgment says this: [The Lord Justice then read the passage beginning with the words, "An ingenious attempt has been made," and ending, "submitted to the determination of the Russian courts"; and continued:—] Mr. Finlay and Mr. Lawrence have pointed out, and I think unanswerably, that that would be really frittering away the general rule that you cannot re-try the merits. To a technical objection it was a good technical answer. But I understand the decision to go to the length of saying that you do re-try the merits for the purpose of satisfying an English jury that the foreign court has been imposed upon; and that, if you cannot prove the imposition without re-trying the merits, that you are at liberty to re-try them. Baggallay, L.J., in that case said:—"If the judgments had not been improperly obtained the right of the plaintiff would be clear. In using the words 'improperly obtained' I desire to be understood as not limiting them to a case where a fraud has been perpetrated upon the foreign court itself. I apply them also to a case where a fraud has been perpetrated and the foreign court was not ignorant of the facts on which the assertion of fraud was based." That is to say, not only where there has been a fraud on the court by what is called extrinsic circumstances, such as the alleged shuffling of the bills of exchange, but where the plaintiff has obtained judgment by the use of perjured evidence—that is such a fraud as would enable the defendant to impeach the foreign judgment. Then Brett, L.J., in giving judgment, said:—[The Lord Justice read the passage on page 306 beginning: "It is a very small matter to be considered," and ending, "entitled to succeed in the present action"; and also the passage at page 308, beginning, "I accept the whole doctrine," and ending "suit in the foreign court"; and continued:—] That last passage can only be applicable to cases where there is what is called extraneous fraud, such as imposition on the court itself; but when I come to look at the defendant's argument and the whole judgment, I cannot conceal from myself that it has been decided to the effect I have already mentioned, and that, therefore, it is competent in point of law for the defendant in this action to raise this defence, and to satisfy the jury, if he can, that the Italian court was misled by the fraud of the plaintiff; that fraud consisting in this, that the plaintiff knowingly placed before the Italian court bills of exchange which he alleged to be good commercial bills, when in truth and in fact he knew them to be nothing of the sort, but bills for gambling transactions. And if the jury were to find in fact that not only were the bills bills for gambling transactions, but, further, that the Italian court was imposed on by the fraud, that is a good defence to the present action, according to Abouloff v. Oppenheimer. It seems to me, therefore, in the face of that case, impossible to differ from the view taken by the Divisional Court, and this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

MACNEE v. PERSIAN INVESTMENT CORPORATION. (a.)

Company — Lottery — Concession — Illegal contract— Prospectus advertising foreign lottery—English company setting up lottery abroad—Lotteries Acts (9 Geo. 1, c. 19, s. 4; 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 66).

A company, incorporated in England for the purpose of carrying on financial and other operations in Persia, issued a prospectus stating that it was intended to acquire under a certain contract a concession from the Shah, which granted the exclusive privilege of floating lotteries and similar loans in Persia; that the headquarters of the scheme would be in Persia, but that agents would be employed in the chief cities of Eastern Europe for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions; and that "five issues have to be made annually in Persia, with minimum drawings of £10,000, and it is estimated that these operations should return continuously-increasing dividends." A shareholder moved to restrain the company from acquiring the concession, or advertising the lottery loans or similar enterprizes.

Held, that the purchase of the concession was legal, and that the issue of the prospectus containing the statement of the five annual issues was not a notice of a foreign lottery within 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 66.

Motion.

The Persian Investment Corporation (Limited) was incorporated in 1889, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, for the purposes, as appeared by the company's prospectus, dated the 25th of November, 1889, of (1) acquiring and working concessions granted by the Shah of Persia; (2) carrying on financial, exploration, promotion, and commercial business in Persia and elsewhere, and generally for certain other purposes set forth in the memorandum of association, being of a very wide and extensive character. The prospectus further set forth (inter alia)—(1) that the company would acquire in the first instance the concession granted by the Shah, and dated the 20th of July, 1889, conferring for the period of seventy-five years the exclusive privilege of conducting all operations in connection with lottery loans and other similar issues in Persia during the term of the concessions; (2) that the granting of this concession would result in business of a very remunerative character, resembling the Government lottery schemes carried on in Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Spain, and that the headquarters of the system would be in Persia, but that the company would not be limited to that country in the field of its operations, for it was intended, as in the case of the continental issues above referred to, that the company should be represented by agents in the chief cities of Eastern Europe for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions; (3) that, by the intended operations of the company, "at least five issues have to be made in Persia annually with minimum drawings of £10,000, and it is estimated that these operations should return continuously-increasing dividends"; (4) that it was in contemplation to establish subsidiary companies for various districts of the Persian Empire, whereby the company would profit by sales or by royalties; (5) that the terms on which the company was to acquire the concession were embodied in a contract dated the 15th of November, 1889, and made between the vendors, the Anglo-Asiatic Syndicate (Limited), and John Thorley, the temporary secretary, as trustee for the company, under which the total amount payable was £220,000, in cash and in shares.

The concession was duly executed by the Shah and authenticated by Prince Malcolm Khan, Persian Minister to Great Britain, being subject, as was represented in the prospectus, to the payment of certain percentages to the Persian Government. The Persian Government also undertook to protect the interests of the company without interfering with its internal administration.

The plaintiff applied for 200 shares of £5 each, of which 150 were allotted to him. He paid on the allotment £2 per share.

On the 27th of March, 1890, the plaintiff issued a writ on behalf of himself and all other the shareholders in the defendant company, except such as were defendants thereto, against the defendant company and five of the directors of the defendant company, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant company from acquiring or dealing with, and to restrain all the defendants from printing or publishing or causing to be printed or published any prospectus proposal or scheme for or relating to, the acquisition by the defendant company of a concession, dated the 20th of July, 1889, granted by the Shah of Persia for conducting operations in connection with lottery loans or other similar issues in Persia, or any other concession for the like purpose, and from printing or publishing any prospectus, advertisement, or notice in any manner relating to such lottery loans, and from applying or pledging any of the funds of the defendant company in or towards the purpose of the acquisition of the concession aforesaid, or any such other concession, or for any purpose connected therewith.

The plaintiff now moved for an injunction in the terms of the writ.

The motion was by consent treated as the trial of the action.

A correspondence had taken place between the Director of Public Prosecutions and the secretary of the company, the letters forming which were put in evidence, commencing with a letter of the 13th of January, 1890, from the Director of Public Prosecutions, which stated that the attention of the Government had been drawn to the prospectus, and that the enterprise described therein was unlawful, and that if continued the directors and other persons engaged therein would render themselves liable to the penalties prescribed by the Lotteries Acts. The secretary, in reply, wrote a letter dated the 15th of January, 1890, stating that the company was advised by four eminent counsel that their enterprise was not unlawful, that no further copies of the prospectus would be issued, that it was not intended to publish any notice of the drawing or intended drawing of any foreign lottery, or to publish any notice of the sale of any tickets or chances in any such lottery. The letter further stated that the directors proposed in the future to raise in Persia or in other foreign countries where lotteries were legal, Persian State and other loans by drawings there, but not to advertise such lotteries in this country. The Director of Public Prosecutions wrote a letter of the 13th of February, 1890, to the secretary in reply to the last letter, informing him that the Government referred the corporation to the warning already given, and that proceedings to test the legality of any act that might be done by the corporation in furtherance of the enterprise in contravention of the Acts passed for the suppression of illegal lotteries would be commenced without further warning.

On the motion coming on, the defendants consented not to raise any question as to the plaintiff's knowledge of the company's proposed business at the time of his application for shares.

Counsel for the company stated during the course of the argument that it was not intended to publish any other scheme.

Byrne, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the motion.—The prospectus is illegal. This amounts to advertising a foreign lottery in this country, and inviting subscriptions here to set up a lottery in a country where a lottery is lawful and thereby deriving a profit. The fact is stated that there will be foreign lotteries held, and funds are asked for to promote the enterprize. If the nature of the scheme involves the publishing here of announcements of drawings and accounts, it is an illegal act; it is making known to the public the fact of the existence of the lotteries. It is clear the company hold out here that foreign lotteries will be conducted. The plaintiff is entitled to an injunction to prevent the company doing acts or making payments for the purpose of carrying on such lotteries: 9 Geo. 1, c. 19, s. 4; 10 & 11 Will. 3, c. 17; 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 66. It is admitted that lotteries are lawful in Persia. [CHITTY, J.—The company may do illegal acts, but it is not necessary for them to do illegal acts. All the business may be done in Persia, you want me to assume illegality. How is the plaintiff concerned by the advertisements?] The advertisements are necessary for working the concession. To advertise that large profits will be made by a foreign lottery is illegal. It is after all setting up a future lottery here, especially if there is an office in England. The plaintiff is interested, and can prevent any acts done towards the completion of the contract, which must be referred to in every prospectus issued. [CHITTY, J., referred to Sykes v. Beadon, 27 W. R. 464, 11 Ch. D. 170.]

Romer, Q.C., and G. F. Hart, for the defendants.—The plaintiff is not damnified in any way. The prospectus is not illegal. The plaintiff says the prospectus referring to the fact that lotteries will be held in Persia renders the promoters liable to penalties, but if that were so any newspaper referring to the existence of foreign lotteries would be so liable. The object of the Lotteries Acts is to prevent persons here being invited to gamble. It is not illegal for a person to take shares in, or for twenty persons to combine to take shares in, a foreign lottery, but it is illegal to invite persons here to take shares in, and to gamble, by means of a lottery. That is not what the defendants have done. The Act of Will. 4 does not deal with lotteries as a whole, only with special or particular lotteries.

Byrne, Q.C., in reply.—The readers of the prospectus know where they can find out where and when the lotteries are to be held, and can inquire where to purchase tickets: this comes within the mischief dealt with by the Lotteries Acts. As to the right to the injunction, it is the right of any shareholder to come and prevent the commission of any illegal act.

CHITTY, J.—Two points are raised on this motion. The first and the more important point is this. It is said that the company, by its directors, are about to apply their money in the performance of an illegal contract; that they have already spent some of the company's money in partly performing the contract, and now they propose to spend more. The case is not one of an illegal company, for it has not been contended, nor can it be contended, that the company has among the objects on the face of the memorandum any object or any purpose which is illegal. But it is said that the contract which the company has entered into (and it is admitted on the part of the plaintiff that it is) is within the objects which are stated in the memorandum. The case, therefore, is not any mere case of ultrà vires. It is admitted that the contract is within the powers of the company, but it is said that the contract itself is an illegal one.

The Shah of Persia granted a concession for the sole and exclusive right and privilege throughout the Persian Empire of initiating and conducting all operations relating to lotteries and lottery loans, and the formation of a lottery company and the sale of lottery tickets, and other rights which are now particularly set forth in the concession. The contract, which is impeached by the notice of motion, is a contract which the company entered into to buy that concession. The illegality alleged is illegality under the Lotteries Acts, and the only Act that counsel for the plaintiff has been able to point to as being the Act which makes this contract illegal is the Act of 9 Geo. 1, c. 19, s. 4. That section contains are cital which has been read: "And whereas in order to elude the many good laws made for suppressing unlawful lotteries, several evil disposed persons have of late presumed to erect and carry on several lotteries upon pretence and colour of some grant and authority given by foreign princes or states; for the better preventing of which illegal practices for the future, be it declared and enacted, that if any person or persons shall from and after the 1st day of July, 1723, by virtue or colour of any grant or authority from any foreign prince, state, or government whatsoever, erect, set up, continue, or keep, or shall cause or procure to be erected, set up, continued, or kept, any lottery or undertaking in the nature of a lottery, under any denomination whatsoever, or shall make, print, or publish, or cause to be made, printed, or published, any proposal or scheme for any such lottery or undertaking, or shall within this kingdom sell or dispose of any ticket or tickets in any foreign lottery, and shall be convicted of any of the said offences upon the oath or oaths of one or more credible witness or witnesses by two or more justices of the peace of the county, division, or liberty where such offence shall be committed or the offender shall be found (which oath such justices of the peace are hereby empowered and required to administer) the person so convicted shall for every such offence (over and above any former penalties inflicted by any former Act or Acts of Parliament made against unlawful lotteries) forfeit the sum of £200." Now is the contract that I have mentioned a contract falling within the scope of that section? The words principally relied on were "erecting, setting up, continuing, or keeping, causing or procuring to be erected, or set up," and so on. The company, by virtue of its contract, do not propose to set up any lottery in this country, and the proposal or the object of the contract is very simple. In Persia, I take it, seeing that the concession has been granted by the Shah, lotteries are lawful, and this company proposes under the concession to set up lotteries in that country. This Act of Parliament is not addressed to such a case as that; it is directed against the erection of lotteries unquestionably in this country, but the Legislature of Great Britain of that day did not intend to exercise any jurisdiction over lotteries in foreign countries, kept and carried on exclusively in foreign countries; and there is nothing in this Act, nor, indeed, in any of the Acts that I have been referred to (and I think I have read through the Lotteries Acts, not for this purpose, but for some other purpose some time ago), which would prevent two Englishmen in this country, British subjects, from putting together a fund for the purpose of employing that fund in erecting a lottery in a foreign State (and I add though it is unnecessary to do so) where foreign lotteries are lawful. By no ingenuity can the case be brought within that section, and it is to be borne in mind in considering these Lotteries Acts that they are particular enactments directed to particular offences which are specified, and I am not at liberty to take some general notion of what may or may not have been the intention of the Legislature, because I am here dealing with the criminal law, and it is important to remember that the Act of Parliament is so framed as to create and deal with specific offences.

It is said, as part of the argument for the plaintiff, that it would be impossible for the company to perform this agreement without violating in some way or other portions of the Lotteries Acts. I see no foundation whatever for that, and I am not at liberty to speculate and say that the company which can perform its operations lawfully and without violating the Act of Parliament will probably do something which will bring it within some one or other of the Lotteries Acts; that is not my function sitting here as a judge; and turn it over in what way I can, I can find no ground for the suggestion that this is an illegal contract. There is no ground, therefore, for restraining the company from applying its money in the way it proposes. That is the main point of the motion, but there is a subordinate one founded on the prospectus. The company have issued this prospectus, they have obtained their capital, and, as has been stated in the correspondence with Sir Augustus Stephenson, they do not intend to issue any further prospectus. But the plaintiff says he has no undertaking from the company that they will not issue some further prospectus, and that they may, and probably will, put forward to the public another prospectus similar, or somewhat similar, to the one that I have before me. Then it is argued that the prospectus which they have actually issued, and which prospectus has done its business, is an illegal one. Now the material parts of the prospectus which are attacked by the motion are these: "The headquarters of the system will be in Persia, but the company will not be limited to that country in the field of its operations, for it is intended, as in the case of the continental issues above referred to" (the continental issues above referred to relate to Italy, Austria-Hungary, Spain, &c.), "that the company should be represented by agents in the chief cities of Eastern Europe for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions." It is plain, therefore, that the company, upon that statement in the prospectus, does not propose to seek for subscriptions to lotteries in this country. Then the following paragraph was relied on by the plaintiff: "The intended operations of the company will (pursuant to the terms of the concession) be conducted generally upon the lines adopted in the European States where Government lotteries are in vogue. At least five issues have to be made annually in Persia, with minimum drawings of £10,000, and it is estimated that these operations should return continuously-increasing dividends." It is said that this is an advertisement or notice of lotteries to be held in Persia. Now the Act of Parliament relied on by the plaintiff on this point is the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 66. The title of that Act is, "An Act to prevent the advertising of foreign and other illegal lotteries." There is a recital, "And whereas the laws in force are insufficient to prevent the advertising of foreign and other illegal lotteries in this kingdom, and it is expedient to make further provision for that purpose"; and it enacts that, "if any person shall print or publish, or cause to be printed or published, any advertisement or other notice of, or relating to, the drawing or intended drawing of any foreign lottery, or of any lottery or lotteries not authorized by some Act or Acts of Parliament"—that is to say, a notice relating to the drawing, or any intended drawing, of any foreign lotteries; those are the important words on the question before me—"or if any person shall print or publish, or cause to be printed or published, any advertisement or other notice of or for the sale of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, or of any share or shares of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, of or in any such lottery or lotteries as aforesaid, or any advertisement or notice concerning or in any manner relating to any such lottery or lotteries, or any ticket, chance, or share, tickets, chances, or shares thereof or therein." This, again, is a particular and special enactment; and the only words that the plaintiff could rely upon as bringing the case within this enactment are the latter general words—namely, "any advertisement or other notice concerning, or in any manner relating to, any such lottery or lotteries."

Now I am dealing with this question on a motion for an injunction, and I am not really called upon to express an opinion with reference to this prospectus, because the defendants have said that they do not intend to issue another prospectus of similar effect, and merely at the bar they refuse to give an undertaking. I am not prepared to say, in circumstances of that kind, that the plaintiff is, without any other evidence than the issue of this prospectus, entitled to call upon the court to hold, as a matter of inference, that there is an intention hereafter to issue a similar prospectus, and that such an intention is to be inferred from the acts already done, and the refusal to give the undertaking, and that such an intention is to be inferred notwithstanding the statement in the correspondence with the Government, to the effect that the prospectus has been issued, and there is no intention to issue any further prospectus. But if I am called upon to express an opinion upon the point, I hold that this prospectus is not within those general words at the end of the section—in other words, it is not within the section. There is no lottery that has been set up, that has been opened, that has been commenced, there is no invitation in this prospectus to anybody to subscribe to the lottery or to take tickets in the lottery, it is a mere statement that at least five issues have to be made annually in Persia. That is the material part of the statement. Supposing a newspaper dealing with public news said, "There are five State lotteries held every year in Austria," if the plaintiff's proposition is right that is an offence against the Act. I think that would be straining the Act, and that is not the offence that the Act must mean. I am purposely very careful in what I say with regard to any Act of Parliament of this sort, because I am not disposed in any way to make observations which may lessen the effect of the enactment, and it appears to me that I discharge my duty rightly in this case, supposing I am bound to decide this question, by holding, as I do, that this prospectus is not within the Act of Parliament. The mere general statement that there will be at least five issues to be made annually in Persia, with minimum drawings of £10,000, I say is not an advertisement or notice of any such lottery within the meaning of that section.

Then there is the further point, supposing that what I have said is not well founded. On the second point, what interest has the plaintiff? The Act is a penal Act, and the persons who contravene the Act will be the agents of the company personally, who will issue the advertisements. What has the plaintiff to do with that? He will not be liable, and they cannot make him under any criminal law responsible for their acts, and he cannot of course, after what has taken place, in any way be liable, although he has taken shares in this company, and although this prospectus was before him when the shares were taken, he may or may not have read it, but that is quite immaterial, and he cannot be said to have caused to be printed or published any such advertisement or notice as that which he is afraid may hereafter be issued. Therefore, he has no sufficient interest in the question to justify his motion on that point.

Upon these grounds, the first question being the substantial one, and the second question being comparatively trifling, I refuse the motion, and, as this is the trial, I refuse it with costs.

Motion refused.

By consent, the motion was treated as the trial of the action.

Action dismissed.

BERRIDGE v. BERRIDGE. (a.)

Principal and surety—Co-sureties—Security given to one surety—Contribution out of security to indemnify other co-sureties.

Where one of several co-sureties receives from the principal debtor a security to indemnify him against liability as surety, he is entitled to apply the whole or such part of the same as may be necessary to repay himself and his co-sureties all payments made by them on account of the principal debt.

Special case.

In March, 1880, W. Berridge, sen., J. Berridge, W. Berridge, jun., W. Gilbert, and A. Gilbert jointly and severally guaranteed to the Leicestershire Banking Co. any sum not exceeding £2,000 which S. Berridge should owe to the bank on his current account.

W. Berridge, sen., in April, 1880, deposited with the bank, as further security, title deeds of his own property, and by the accompanying memorandum of deposit declared that they were deposited as a security "for all sums of money now or hereafter to become due from my brother S. Berridge to the banking company, either upon banking accounts or in any other manner whatsoever." The receipt given by the bank for the deeds stated that they were deposited "as security for his brother S. Berridge's account when in excess of £2,000."

S. Berridge, prior to 1882, deposited with W. Berridge, sen., two policies of assurance on his own life for the sum of £1,000 each.

W. Berridge, sen., died in 1882, and the plaintiffs, J. Berridge and J. Earl, were his executors.

By an indenture dated the 28th of August, 1884, and made between S. Berridge of the one part and the plaintiffs of the other part, S. Berridge assigned to the plaintiffs the two policies of assurance, subject to reassignment, if the estate of W. Berridge, sen., deceased, should at any time be released from all liability in respect of the suretyship.

In February, 1886, S. Berridge was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the bank proved in the bankruptcy, and after receiving a dividend there remained owing to them £3,334 9s.

The bank called upon the five sureties to pay the £2,000 guaranteed, which they did in the following shares—viz., executors of W. Berridge, sen., £400; J. Berridge and W. Berridge, jun., £500 each; W. and A. Gilbert, £600; and the executors of W. Berridge then paid the balance of the debt, amounting to £1,334 9s., and they also paid as premiums on the policies after the bankruptcy of S. Berridge the sum of £165 16s. 8d.

S. Berridge died in 1887.

W. and A. Gilbert were both adjudicated bankrupts.

In June, 1888, the sum of £2,490 was received by the plaintiffs in respect of the policies.

The questions for the opinion of the court were—1. Whether the said sum of £2,490 should be applied (1) in payment to the plaintiffs, as executors of W. Berridge, of the sums expended by them in respect of premiums on the policies with interest thereon, and in payment of the plaintiffs' costs, charges, and expenses in respect of the policies and of the deed of the 28th of August, 1884; (2) in payment to the plaintiffs of the sums of £400 and £1,334 9s. respectively with interest thereon; and (3) whether the residue of the said sum of £2,490 should be paid to the defendants and the plaintiff J. Berridge in his own right, or some or one of them; or 2. How the said sum of £2,490 ought to be dealt with.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Dibdin, for the plaintiffs.—A co-surety who obtains from the principal debtor a security is bound to share equally with his co-sureties the benefit he derives from it: Steel v. Dixon, 29 W. Ingle Joyce, for the trustee in bankruptcy of the principal debtor.—The deed of August, 1884, shows the policies were deposited only for the purpose of releasing the personal estate of the plaintiffs' testator from liability. The surety who holds a security is only entitled to be repaid therefrom the amount which he has paid. The co-sureties cannot call on him for contribution: Turner v. Davies, 2 Esp. 478; De Colyar on Guarantees, p. 313.

The other defendants were served but did not appear.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—The £1,334 9s. is entitled to priority over the £2,000.

NORTH, J.—There does not appear to me anything in the memorandum of deposit which shows that W. Berridge, sen., thereby undertook any personal liability, on which he can be sued in respect of the amounts covered by that security. If the security had been given by the principal debtor, who was receiving the advance from the bank, the position would have been totally different. But the surety's liability must be ascertained by what is expressed in the written document which alone constitutes the security; and here the title deeds are merely deposited as security. That is not a contract that he is also to be personally liable for the debt. Then there is the receipt for the deeds signed by the bank's agent, and I think the two documents contain the terms of the deposits and should be read as one. The latter document shows the nature of the deposits. It was to be a security for the surplus of the debt to the bank in excess of the £2,000. Subsequently S. Berridge deposited with W. Berridge, sen., the two policies of assurance, though it is not known at what date, and I have no means of judging. The deed of the 28th of August, 1884, followed, and afterwards S. Berridge became bankrupt and died, and a sum of £2,490 has been received by the plaintiffs in respect of the policies. The question is, How should the money be applied? The £2,000 was paid to the bank by the five sureties in unequal proportions. Of course, the construction of the indenture of August, 1884, cannot be affected by subsequent events; but if the bank had claimed from the plaintiffs, as executors of W. Berridge, payment of the whole debt, and they had paid it, what would be their right as against the policy moneys? The policies were to be re-assigned only if the estate of W. Berridge, deceased, should be released from all liability in respect of the said suretyship. Now, at this point all liability in respect of the suretyship would have been at an end, because the principal debt would have been paid off by the surety. But it would be absurd to suppose that as soon as one surety has paid off the principal debt the deposit by way of security is at an end. The policies are to be a security to the surety so as to relieve him from every liability. Therefore, in the case I have suggested, the executors would have been entitled to receive back the £2,000 which had been paid; but, in fact, only £400 was paid by them as executors. But now, the policy moneys being divisible, in what shares ought they to be divided? The other co-sureties now claim the benefit of the security of W. Berridge, sen., upon the policies, and the question is, What is to be done with this money for the purpose of indemnifying the plaintiffs. I think the premiums should first be repaid with interest, and then the costs of the equitable mortgage and costs of the action. The next claim is the £1,334 9s. paid by the plaintiffs in respect of the equitable mortgage. The plaintiffs are entitled to receive the £1,334 9s. out of the proceeds of the policies. They are also entitled to the £400 which they paid to the bank on account of the £2,000, and when that £400 has been paid to the plaintiffs or received by them it cannot be applied solely in satisfying them; but it must, according to the doctrine of Steel v. Dixon, be shared between them and the other co-sureties. Then, will the plaintiffs be entitled to receive anything more? In my opinion they will, because otherwise the testator's estate will not have been released from all liability in respect of the suretyship. It will only have been repaid one-fifth part of the £400 which it has paid to the bank, because the balance of the £400 will have gone to pay the co-sureties. The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to something more—viz., such sum as will make up to them what they have paid to the co-sureties. That further sum will again have to be distributed in a similar manner, and thus, by successive payments, the rights of all the co-sureties must be satisfied before the plaintiffs would be able to say they had got the £400 to which they are entitled under the deed of August, 1884. This is the necessary result of the doctrine of Steel v. Dixon. In that case the plaintiffs limited their claim to a share of the first payment received by their co-surety by means of his security, and did not ask to share in any subsequent payments made to him. They did not claim to share in the whole of the proceeds of the security, but only to the extent of £400. I think the principle of the decision would have entitled them to more, if it had been asked for, and I think it entitles the co-sureties in the present case to the relief which I have mentioned. This would decide the whole question if the policies were sufficient, after the prior payments I have mentioned, to pay the whole £3,334 9s.; but this is not the case. Ought the £1,334 9s. to be paid in priority to the £2,000. I think not. The deposit of the policies was to release the estate of W. Berridge from all liability in respect of his suretyship, and I find nothing in the indenture of August, 1884, which makes a distinction between his liability under the memorandum of deposit and his liability under the original guarantee.

I therefore hold that the surplus of the policy money, after making the prior payments which I have mentioned, must be applied so far as it will extend rateably in satisfaction of the £2,000 and £1,334 9s.

In re CRAWSHAY.

CRAWSHAY v. CRAWSHAY. (a.)

Power—Special power of appointment—Appointment of part of fund to object of power, with directions for settlement—Appointment of residue of fund to another object of power—Absolute appointment of previously appointed part of fund to last object of power in case of failure of previous appointment with directions for settlement—Validity—Fraud on power.

A testator having, under a settlement, a power to appoint by will a sum of £35,000 among his children, bequeathed a legacy of £150,000 to a daughter J., with directions that it should be paid to trustees upon trust for J. for life, with remainder to her issue; and then, after reciting the power of appointment, appointed £10,000 (part of the £35,000) to J., with directions that it should be paid to the trustees of the legacy of £150,000 bequeathed to her upon the trusts declared with respect to that legacy. After making appointments to other daughters, the testator appointed the residue of the £35,000 to his son R. absolutely, and provided that, in case he had exceeded his power in not appointing the £10,000 to J. unconditionally, but in directing a settlement thereof, and in case anyone having a right to the settlement thereof should so object, or should not confirm such settlement if required so to do, then he appointed the sum of £10,000 to R. absolutely, adding, "But who will, I am assured, settle the same voluntarily in the manner in which I have attempted to settle the same as aforesaid, so as thereby to carry out my wishes." R. did in fact execute a declaration of trust to carry out the testator's wishes, but there was no evidence of any bargain between the testator and R.

Held, that the appointment to J. was invalid, but that the absolute appointment to R. was valid, and that the trustees of the declaration of trust executed by him held the fund upon the trusts declared thereby.

Originating summons.

The question to be decided was, whether a power of appointment among children given by a voluntary settlement was validly exercised.

By a voluntary settlement dated the 7th of August, 1828, and made by William Crawshay, a sum of £35,000 (the payment of which to the trustees of the settlement within six months after his death was secured by his bond) was settled upon trust for all and every or any such one or more of his seven children therein named, including his daughters Amelia and Jessy, as he should by will appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for the seven children in equal shares, with a hotchpot clause to provide for a partial appointment.

By a settlement dated the 17th of October, 1849, made in consideration of the marriage of the daughter Jessy with her cousin Alfred Crawshay, her interest in the sum of £35,000 was vested in the trustees of her marriage settlement upon the trusts therein mentioned.

By his will, dated the 21st of October, 1865, William Crawshay bequeathed to his daughter Amelia a legacy of £150,000 Consols. He also bequeathed to his daughter Jessy a legacy of £150,000 Consols, which he directed to be paid to special trustees to be held upon trust as to the income thereof for his daughter Jessy during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death upon trust for her children or remoter issue as she should by deed or will appoint, and in default of any such appointment for her children in equal shares; and in case there were no issue, then upon trust for such person or persons as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for her next of kin exclusive of her husband. The testator then, after reciting his power to appoint the sum of £35,000 among his children created by the settlement of the 7th of August, 1828, proceeded, "Now, therefore, my will is, and by virtue of the said power and of every or any other power enabling me in that behalf, I appoint that the sum of £10,000, part of the said last mentioned sum, shall go and belong to my daughter Amelia; the sum of £10,000 further part thereof, shall go and belong to my daughter Jessy. . . . . But my will is that as to the two first mentioned sums of £10,000 and £10,000 the same shall be paid to the respective trustees hereinbefore named and appointed with reference to the legacies hereinbefore bequeathed to them, my said two daughters respectively, and be held upon the trusts and for the intents and purposes hereinbefore declared of and concerning those legacies. . . . . And as to the residue of the said sum of £35,000, I appoint and declare that the same shall go and belong to my son Robert T. Crawshay, his executors, administrators, and assignees, absolutely. And in case I have exceeded my power in not appointing the said sums of £10,000, and £10,000 . . . unconditionally, but in directing the settlement thereof respectively as aforesaid, and in case my said daughters Amelia and Jessy respectively, or their respective husbands, or others having any right or power to object to the settlement thereof as aforesaid, shall so object or shall not confirm such settlement thereof if required so to do, then I appoint that the said sums of £10,000, and £10,000 shall also go and belong to my said son Robert T. Crawshay absolutely, but who will, I am assured, settle the same voluntarily in the manner in which I have attempted to settle the same as aforesaid, so as thereby to carry out my wishes."

The testator died in 1867, and in November of that year his son Robert T. Crawshay, with the view of carrying out the testator's wishes, executed a declaration of trust of the sum of £10,000 appointed by the testator in trust for his daughter Jessy.

The testator's daughter Jessy survived her husband, Alfred Crawshay, and died on the 17th of July, 1889, having made her will, dated the 29th of January, 1885, and thereby, in expressed exercise of the power of appointment given her by the testator, William Crawshay, over the legacy of £150,000 and the sum of £10,000 respectively bequeathed and appointed to her by his will, appointed certain sums to her children and their issue, and declared that, if any of them should object to or try to defeat the exercise of the powers of appointment and provisions of her will, they should forfeit all benefits conferred by her will, and that every appointment or bequest in their favour should be considered as having been made to her daughter, Jessy Sandeman.

This was an originating summons, taken out by the trustees of the sum of £10,000 appointed in the will of the testator, William Crawshay, to his daughter Jessy, for the determination of the questions—(1) whether the trustees of the settlement of the 17th of October, 1849, made on the marriage of Jessy Crawshay, were entitled to have the £10,000 paid to them, or (2) whether the plaintiffs held the £10,000 upon the trusts declared by the will of the testator, as well as by the declaration of trust by the testator's son, Robert Crawshay, of the 7th of November, 1867.

Bramwell Davis and Reginald Winslow, for the plaintiffs, stated the facts.

Seward Brice, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for Jessy Sandeman. — The appointment of £10,000 to Jessy Crawshay by the testator is coupled with a direction that it should be paid to trustees to be held upon the trusts of the settlement thereof declared by the testator. If valid, the trustees of the settlement of the 17th of October, 1849, would not be entitled to it. But it is bad as ultra vires. As the testator has exceeded his power, the appointment to Robert T. Crawshay takes effect, and the expression of confidence in him by the testator does not invalidate it: Blacket v. Lamb, 14 Beav. 482. Failing the latter appointment, the fund is included in the appointment of the residue to Robert T. Crawshay: Carter v. Taggart, 16 Sim. 423; In re Harries' Trust, Joh. 199, 7 W. R. Ch. D. 205. Easum v. Appleford, 10 Sim. 274, and the older cases are not now law. [R. F. Norton was stopped by the court.]

Everitt, Q.C., and J. W. Cunliffe, for the trustees of the settlement of the 17th of October, 1849.—The testator's daughter Jessy Crawshay took the fund absolutely under the appointment in her favour, and the provisions of the will made with a view of compelling her to agree to the settlement of it are void: Wallgrave v. Tebbs, 4 W. Seward Brice, Q.C., and *R. F. R. 803, 3 Ch. D. 429. [They referred to Wright v. Goff, 4 W. R. 522, 22 Beav. 207; Birley v. Birley, 6 W. Cas. 32, 55.] The £10,000 is bound by the declaration of trust of Robert T. Crawshay, and did not pass to the trustees of the settlement of the 17th of October, 1849.

North, J., read the provisions of the will above set out, observing that the sum of £35,000 was not a fund requiring conversion or capable of increase or reduction, but a definite sum which the testator had bound himself to pay upon his death at which date the appointment took effect, and proceeded:—The £10,000 is to be paid by the executors to the special trustees and not to Jessy, and, when it is to be paid to the special trustees, it is to be held by them upon the same trusts as are declared of the legacy of £150,000, which include a larger class of persons than the settlement of 1828, and also powers not comprised therein. Jessy is not to receive the money and then to proceed to settle it, but the money which the testator gives to Jessy he gives to her by means of this direction, that it is to be paid to trustees named by him and to be held by them upon the trusts thereinbefore declared of the legacy, under which Jessy takes only a life interest. The testator also appoints another £10,000 in a similar way to his daughter Amelia, and he appoints that the residue of the £35,000 shall go and belong to his son Robert T. Crawshay absolutely.

Now, stopping there, we have the gift to Jessy followed by a direction, that what is given to her is to be paid to trustees to be held upon certain trusts under which her interest is only a limited one; and, if the will had stopped there, it might have been said that as, under the first words of the gift, Jessy took absolutely, subject to the trusts afterwards created, if those trusts failed the original gift remained untouched as in Lassence v. Tierney, 1 Mac. & G. 551; Carver v. Bowles, 2 Russ. & My. 304; and many similar cases. But the will does not stop there, for the testator goes on to say, "And in case I have exceeded my power in not appointing" Jessy's £10,000 "unconditionally, but in directing the settlement thereof as aforesaid." That shows that he thought that in doing what he had previously done he might possibly be held by construction of law to have exceeded his power. In what way? Because he had not given the £10,000 to Jessy absolutely free from any condition. This shows that, in his view at any rate, the only gift to her was as part of the arrangement, and for the purpose of the arrangement, for effecting a settlement of the £10,000, and it shows also that, considering there was some doubt as to his power to do what he had done, he thought it necessary to provide what was to be done in case the law should prevent what he had already attempted to do from taking effect, as he hoped that it would take effect.

Then he says, "In case I have exceeded my power in not appointing the fund unconditionally"—in other words, "If what I have done cannot take effect, and the £10,000 is undisposed of, and in case my daughters Amelia, Jessy, . . . respectively, or their respective husbands or others having any right or power to object to the settlement thereof as aforesaid, shall so object or shall not confirm such settlement thereof if required so to do," which comes to this: "If I have exceeded my power, and if, by reason of an objection on the part of any person entitled to object, that which I have attempted to do cannot be confirmed, then something else is to be done." It is clear that there cannot even now be any confirmation by all the persons who would be interested in the fund in default of appointment. It is true that Jessy Crawshay did all she could to confirm the appointment by him, but unfortunately she did not possess an absolute interest in the fund. In my opinion the testator was dealing with failure by reason of some invalidity in the previous appointment by him and the absence of confirmation by all persons whose consent would be necessary to make the appointment valid. He contemplates the possibility of not being able to procure a confirmation from every person interested in disputing it, and goes on to deal with the fund in a different way. If that is so, he says that Jessy's £10,000 (as I call it for the sake of brevity) "shall also go and belong to my son Robert T. Crawshay absolutely." That is a disposition of the £10,000 which he had already appointed in a way which he treats as possibly invalid. Now Robert T. Crawshay was an object of the power, and, so far as I have yet gone, the gift to him is good. It is suggested that it is bad by reason of what follows. But pausing here there is a gift to him of the £10,000 in an event which the testator contemplated as possible and which has actually happened, and, in my opinion, he takes the £10,000 under that gift, and not under the gift of the residue of the £35,000. I do not think it necessary to consider whether, supposing there had been no express gift to Robert T. Crawshay in the event which has happened, of the £10,000 settled upon Jessy, that sum would, in case the prior dispositions thereof had failed, have passed to Robert T. Crawshay under the gift to him of the residue of the £35,000. But, in my opinion, he cannot, in the event which has happened, take Jessy's £10,000 under the appointment of the residue, because it is clear that the testator did not consider that in that event it would go to him under the gift of residue, for in that event the testator gives to him the £10,000 in express words. I hold that the £10,000 cannot go to Robert T. Crawshay as part of the residue of the £35,000, as there is an express gift of it to him, which is inconsistent with its passing under the gift of residue.

Then arises the question whether Robert T. Crawshay can take the £10,000 at all, by reason of the words which follow. The direction is, first, that the £10,000 s to go and belong to Robert T. Crawshaw absolutely, and then follow these words, "but who will, I am assured, settle the same voluntarily in the manner in which I have attempted to settle the same as aforesaid, so as thereby to carry out my wishes"; and this is entirely inconsistent with the notion that under the first gift to Jessy she had taken an absolute interest in the £10,000. I think it is quite clear that she did not.

Then the only question is, whether the £10,000 thus given to Robert T. Crawshay is so given to him for the purpose of his applying it for the benefit of persons who are not objects of the power, that the gift must fail. The phrase, "who will, I am assured, settle the same voluntarily," is capable of different meanings. It may mean "I feel certain, not because he has ever said anything to me, or I to him on the subject; but I know that is what he will do with it." That is one natural and simple meaning of the words. But the words "I am assured" may also mean, "as he assures me," or "as my solicitor tells me." If the words mean "as he assures me," that is, if they show that there was a bargain between the two, that, though this fund was given to Robert T. Crawshay absolutely with a statement that he may settle it voluntarily if he chose to do so, he had really bound himself to settle it according to the testator's wishes, then, in my opinion, the appointment would be void. But if, on the other hand, the fund is really given, as it purports to be, to Robert T. Crawshay absolutely, not subject to any trust, but that he might do what he liked with it, and if the word "voluntary" is truly used, then, if he does settle it as the testator says he should like him to do, and as he endeavoured to do himself, that would be an entirely voluntary act on Robert's part, and the appointment to him would be valid. There is no evidence of any conversation, or arrangement, or bargain, or even of any understanding between father and son, or that the son had any knowledge that there was any such provision in the will, before the will was opened after the testator's death and the contents made known to the family, and, even if the son did know of the provisions in the will before the testator's death, yet, unless it was made known to him under circumstances which showed that he accepted a trust, and had bound himself to carry out his father's wishes, I do not think his knowledge would make the gift invalid. In my opinion, the real meaning of the words is, not that Robert was bound to settle the fund, but that it was given to him absolutely, and that the testator, having shown what he wished done by trying to do it himself, and having on this hypothesis failed in doing it, left it entirely to the son whether he would or would not settle the fund upon the daughter. In point of fact, the son has settled it; but that is immaterial, if it was absolutely free to him to deal with the fund as he pleased.

A number of cases have been cited, one or two of which seem to me material. In Pryor v. Pryor the law was, no doubt, correctly laid down, and Knight-Bruce, L.J., said:—"The donee of a limited power of appointment may well execute it in favour of an object of the power, though he believes and knows that the appointee will at once dispose of the property in favour of persons who are not objects of the power. But if, besides this belief and knowledge, there is a bargain between the appointor and appointee that the appointee shall make a disposition in favour of persons not objects of the power, and the just result of the evidence is, that the appointment would not have been made but for the bargain, then the appointment is bad. The question is, to which of these two classes of cases the present case belongs."

That is precisely the question in the present case. The conclusion to which I come upon the will is that which I have already stated. There is no evidence whatever, and I have to get as best I can at the intention of the parties as it is shown upon the face of the will. I confess that In re Marsden's Trust did appear to me at first to create some little difficulty, but even in that case Kindersley, V.C., said:—"Unless it can be shown that the trustee having the discretion" (meaning for this purpose the person having power to appoint)

"exercises the trust corruptly or improperly, or in a manner which is for the purpose not of carrying into effect the trust, but defeating the purpose of the trust, the court will not control or interfere with the exercise of the discretion. There may be a suspicion that the trust has been exercised in a particular manner and from a certain motive, which, if it could be proved, would be held not to be a proper motive; but if it be mere suspicion—though suspicion is ground for jealous investigation—if it be mere suspicion, and not matter amounting to a judicial inference or conviction from the facts, the court will not act upon it. But if, on the other hand, it can be proved to the satisfaction of the judicial mind that the power has been exercised corruptly or for a purpose which defeats, instead of carrying into effect, the purpose of the trust, then the court will not permit such an exercise of the power to prevail."

Now in the present case there is no evidence to introduce any element even of suspicion, or, indeed, anything which is not to be found in the will itself. I have no materials for coming to the conclusion that the will is not honestly framed and expressed for the purpose of giving effect to it, and there is nothing behind it for me to consider.

In In re Marsden's Trust the facts were very peculiar. It has been treated by other judges as a somewhat exceptional case, and I think it is so for this reason. There a mother, who had under a settlement a power of appointment among children, desired to make a provision for the father out of the settled fund, his circumstances being such that she thought he ought to be assisted in that way. This intention was openly discussed. The father was not an object of the power, and therefore he could not take any part of the settled fund under an appointment. A solicitor was consulted, and he advised that an appointment could not be made to the father, and that project thereupon dropped. An arrangement was then made between the father and the mother that the whole fund should be appointed by the mother to the eldest child, a daughter who was at that time an infant, and who did not require any immediate provision to be made for her, with this object, that, when the mother was dead, the father might tell the daughter that the whole fund had been appointed to her, under an arrangement between her father and mother, with the object of enabling the daughter to provide for her father. One cannot help seeing what an influence would have been brought to bear on the daughter when the father told her that, and that it would be practically impossible that she should resist doing that which it was the intention of her father and mother that she should do, and the doing of which, under the influence thus exercised upon her, would be an entire perversion and misapplication of the fund—taking it away from the persons in whose favour it ought to have been appointed, and giving it to a stranger. If an appointment of that kind is obtained by means of undue influence, of course it cannot stand, and that is shown by the later cases which have been referred to. That, I think, is the true explanation of In re Marsden's Trust, and I do not think that case is in any way inconsistent with the law as stated in Pryor v. Pryor, and I think that the same conclusion is to be drawn from Roach v. Trood.

I come to the conclusion that an absolute appointment to Jessy was never made; that the only gift to her was by means of the direction that the trustees of the other settled fund were to hold the sum appointed to her and upon the same trusts; and that such a settlement was beyond the power of the testator. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that it was open to him to appoint the fund absolutely and unconditionally to Robert, and I think that is what he did, so that the words which were relied upon as showing that it was really appointed to Robert conditionally do not lead to that result, and do not, therefore, operate to make the prior appointment to him bad.

Mortgage — Administration — Costs out of estate — Harbour commissioners—Action to ascertain charges on commissioners' property—Costs of commissioners—Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 16), s. 60.

The plaintiffs were solicitors, who had recovered judgment against the defendants, the commissioners, for the amount of their bill of costs incurred in litigation on their behalf, and who, in this action, which was brought to enforce the judgment, had obtained the appointment of a receiver and an order for inquiries as to the commissioners' property and debts and the priorities of incumbrancers. The chief clerk had made his certificate, and the plaintiffs, on further consideration, asked for their costs of the action out of funds in court in priority to those of other parties. The funds were derived from rates and tolls, and formed part of the property mortgaged to the various incumbrancers.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled, in priority to other parties except the commissioners, to their costs of the action so far as they had been incurred for the benefit of the other parties except the commissioners.

The commissioners were constituted by special Acts of Parliament, one of which incorporated the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847.

Held, that, under section 60 of that Act, the commissioners were entitled to their costs of the action as between solicitor and client out of the funds in court in priority to the claims of all the other parties.

Further consideration.

There were two questions of costs in this case: first, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to their costs of the action in priority to other incumbrancers; and, secondly, whether the commissioners ought, under the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, to have their costs out of the funds of which they were mortgagors in priority to all other parties.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs to enforce a charge upon the defendants' undertaking in respect of a judgment which they had obtained against the defendants for their bill of costs as solicitors in litigation carried on on their behalf.

On the 29th of January, 1886, the plaintiffs obtained the appointment of a receiver, and, subsequently, an order for inquiries as to the defendants' property, their debts and liabilities, the charges upon the undertaking, or upon the tolls arising thereout, and as to the rights and priorities of the persons holding such charges.

In 1863 the Dartmouth Harbour Commissioners were constituted by a special Act of Parliament (26 & 27 Vict. c. 104) confirming a provisional order of the same year, which empowered them to execute works and borrow money.

In 1870 another Act was passed (33 & 34 Vict. c. 82) for similar purposes.

(a.) Reported by H. C. ROPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1882 an Act was passed (45 & 46 Vict. c. 200) authorizing the defendants to construct a quay and improve the harbour. This Act incorporated the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847.

The defendants commenced and eventually completed the works, and from time to time borrowed money from different associations for the purpose.

On the 3rd of August, 1889, the chief clerk made his certificate, stating (inter alia) that the plaintiffs and defendants had attended; that £664 3s. 9d. was due to the former for principal and interest, and that they were entitled to a charge for that amount on the tolls, rates, and charges receivable by the defendants and on their property, subject to certain incumbrances and in priority to others; and that the property of the commissioners consisted of various items, including a sum in Consols and funds in court derived from rates and tolls.

The action now came on on further consideration, and the plaintiffs asked for their costs out of the funds in court in priority to other parties, and the defendants asked for their costs, charges, and expenses out of the same funds.

Section 45 of the private Act of 1882 provided that the commissioners should apply rates, dues, and other income in paying, first, the costs of passing the Act; secondly, salaries, "and all other current expenses of the commissioners"; thirdly, interest on borrowed money; fourthly, in providing a sinking fund; and, fifthly, in paying the cost of the works, and "the other expenses incurred in the improvement of the harbour, or otherwise under this Act."

Section 60 of the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, provided that commissioners were not to be personally liable for acts done in the capacity of a commissioner, and that "The commissioners respectively, their heirs, executors, and administrators shall be indemnified out of the rates and other moneys coming to the hands of the commissioners by virtue of this and the special Act for all payments made or liability incurred in respect of any act done by them, and for all losses, costs, and damages which they may incur in the execution of the powers granted to them."

Millar, Q.C., and Mulligan, for the plaintiffs, asked for their costs of the action out of the funds in court in priority to those of other parties: Ford v. Lord Chesterfield, 21 Beav. 426, 5 W. R. Dig. 73; Wright v. Kirby, 5 W. R. 391, 23 Beav. 463.

Marten, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the commissioners.—We are in the position of trustees, and are entitled under the special Acts and the general Act to our costs, charges, and expenses out of the funds in court in priority to other parties: Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 15 W. R. 325, L. R. 2 Ch. 201.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for incumbrancers.—The plaintiffs have acted for their own benefit only, and are not entitled to priority. The commissioners cannot have their costs out of the funds. The special Acts do not help them, and the indemnity clause in the general Act applies only to individuals, not to corporations: In re The Dominion of Canada Plumbago Co., 33 W. R. 9, 27 Ch. D. 33; Johnstone v. Cox, 30 W. R. 114, 19 Ch. D., 17.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for other parties in the same interest.

M. Ingle Joyce, in support of the same contention, referred to In re Birt, Birt v. Burt, 31 W. R. 334, 22 Ch. D. 604.

Fitzgerald, Upjohn, and Bakewell, for other parties.

KEKEWICH, J.—Two questions of costs which have to be decided on the same application are of considerable difficulty. I will deal with Mr. Millar's point first, because it is freshest in my mind, having been last argued. He desires to put his claim on Ford v. Earl of Chesterfield, but I think I may leave Ford v. Earl of Chesterfield out of consideration for the moment, because Wright v. Kirby was decided by the same judge, Lord Romilly, and in Wright v. Kirby he stated the principles by which the court ought to be guided and the rules in such cases, and expressly stated that it was in accordance with these rules that he decided Ford v. Earl of Chesterfield. I do not propose to read the rules except to point out this, that the Master of the Rolls places an action by an incumbrancer in which the plaintiff gets his costs on the footing of an administration action, and gives him his costs as in an action of that character. That seems to me at once to let in the discretion of the court to see what is and what is not proper administration, and what costs have been properly incurred for the purpose of administration. The case is to some extent new to me, and I am dealing with it at some disadvantage, but from what I have seen and heard I do not think it at all clear that the plaintiffs have throughout acted for the benefit of those other incumbrancers, whose title to some extent certainly they were disputing. On the other hand there can be no doubt that whether they intended it or not, they have done much good to them. They have obtained the appointment of a receiver and have got a fund brought into court, and an inquiry has been directed and answered, so that the parties entitled to the fund have been ascertained. So far certainly they have laboured for the advantage of others.

Mr. Millar has said that they are therefore entitled to all their costs of the action. That, to my mind, does not follow. They may be entitled to all their costs. I do not say they are not; but it is probable that some of the costs have been incurred on their own behalf only, and with a view solely to their own interests. I think I ought to give them those costs which come within Wright v. Kirby, but I think I ought not to give them those costs which, in the result, may be ascertained not to be within the doctrine of that case. I shall direct the taxing master in taxing the costs of the plaintiffs to distinguish the costs of which the other parties, except the commissioners, have had the benefit in securing the fund in court and determining the rights of the parties to it. These costs, I think, they are entitled to in priority, and, as Mr. Millar pointed out, they must be distributed over the three funds. As regards the rests of the costs the plaintiffs must add them to their security in the usual way as mortgagees. That disposes of the plaintiffs.

Then, as to the costs of the commissioners there is also a question of some little difficulty. Priority for them is claimed under the general Act, the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, and also under the special Acts. I shall call them special Acts because, although they are in fact provisional orders, they are confirmed by Act of Parliament, and have the force of Acts of Parliament, and really are Acts of Parliament being scheduled to Acts. As regards the special Acts, I do not see myself any ground for according to Mr. Marten's argument. I think that the costs and expenses there mentioned do not mean costs or expenses of litigation, but only ordinary expenses—that is those necessarily or properly occasioned by managing their undertaking and doing the work which the Act of Parliament throws upon them. I will not go through all the different clauses of the Acts of 1863 and 1870 because I turn to section 45 of the Act of 1882, which I think, is strongest in favour of the commissioners' view, because, under section 45, sub-section 2, the moneys are to be applied in paying the costs of passing the Act and paying salaries "and all other current expenses," and that is a phrase stronger than I find in any of the other Acts. I do not think it can extend to the costs of litigation such as this; but that it points to ordinary expenses incurred by the commissioners in discharging their ordinary duties, and I do not think anything has been said which supports the contrary view. Therefore, as regards those Acts, I decide against the commissioners, but after some consideration I have come to a different conclusion as regards the general Act. Mr. Renshaw argued that sections 60 to 64 of the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, are only applicable to the commissioners personally, and not to a body incorporated such as are the commissioners in the present case. I cannot think that the Legislature could have intended that, especially when we find that the word "commissioners" means, by the interpretation clause, "the commissioners, trustees, undertakers, or other persons or body corporate constituted by the special Act," and I do not think the words are necessarily limited to persons. The set of sections to which sections 60 and 64 belong are introduced by the words "with respect to the liabilities of the commissioners and to legal proceedings by or against the commissioners," and I see nothing there to limit it to commissioners not incorporated. That is my view. It is rather that there is nothing to limit it than that there is anything to extend it.

By section 60 commissioners are exempted from personal liability, and that provision is no doubt more applicable to persons than to a corporation; but after thus exempting them from liability the section contains the following indemnity clause:—[His lordship read that part of the section, and continued:—] They are to be indemnified against liabilities, and although it may be impossible to issue execution against them individually and get payment of the costs, still the commissioners, as a corporation, are liable for any costs they may be ordered to pay so as at any rate to establish a debt. The commissioners might, I suppose, have the ordinary order for taxation made against them on the retainer given by them, and in that way there is a liability to pay costs. Against that it seems to me they are idemnified. Why should I construe this section differently from the construction of the ordinary indemnity clause in a settlement? It is in every settlement now by Act of Parliament. According to the old form the trustees are indemnified against all liabilities incurred by them in the execution of the trusts, and supposing, in the administration of their trusts, it becomes necessary to inquire what mortgages have been made and what incumbrancers there are, the parties claiming through cestuis que trust can only take subject to that indemnity. It seems to me I ought to apply the same sort of principle, and that the commissioners, being trustees against whom nothing has been said as regards the propriety of their conduct, must be entitled to be paid out of their trust fund before anybody else who is interested in it, notwithstanding that they are in the position of mortgagors. It is not a perfect settlement, because, as has been said, the commissioners are at the same time trustees and mortgagors. But I think that I am bound to regard them substantially as trustees instead of mortgagors, and to give them the indemnity. But then it is suggested that what they are entitled to have is money coming into their hands, and that what we are dealing with is money which has been brought into court through the receiver, and that as against that, they have no priority. I referred to a case the name of which I could not recollect, but by referring to the case of In re Birt, Birt v. Burt, mentioned to me by Mr. Ingle Joyce, I find that the case I was thinking of was Richmond v. White, 27 W. R. 878, 12 Ch. D. 361, which has recently been followed in In re Jones, Calver v. Laxton, 34 W. R. 249, 31 Ch. D. 440. What was decided in the last mentioned case was that the executor's right of retainer was taken away by the appointment of a receiver, and that as the moneys taken by the receiver were not moneys in the hands of the executor, he could not insist on his right of retainer.

Richmond v. White is an example of a different kind, because there the money was paid into court by an insurance company, and that was said not to have taken away the right of retainer. But I do not think that that applies to this case, because an executor's right of retainer is a very peculiar, though well recognized, right. Here I have a distinct statement of a statutory right to have these costs paid, and I do not think the substance of the clause is that costs are to be paid, or liabilities on their part discharged, by means of moneys in the hands of the commissioners, so much as by moneys which may come to them by virtue of the Act for rents and tolls, and the use of the words "moneys coming to the hands" is for the purpose of pointing out that to which they would resort. I think it would be a narrow construction to say that it only meant the amount actually received. I think what it means is money receivable for tolls or rents by virtue of the provisions of the Act. I therefore think that it is clear on that clause, that the commissioners are entitled to their costs as between solicitor and client in priority to the other parties, who, except the plaintiffs, who will have their costs subject to the direction I have mentioned, will add their costs to their securities.

Practice—Interrogatories—Power to strike out part of a set—Ord. 31, r. 7.

Under ord. 31, r. 7, there is no power to strike out part of a set of interrogatories. The objection that any particular interrogatories are prolix and unnecessary must be taken in the affidavit in answer.

Appeal from an order of Hawkins, J.

The action, which was for breach of contract, was brought in the District Registry at Cambridge. The plaintiff obtained leave to deliver interrogatories for the examination of the defendant. A set of eight interrogatories having been delivered, the defendant took out a summons under rule 7 of order 31. The district registrar made an order that interrogatories 1 and 8 should be struck out, and interrogatory 2 partly struck out, on the ground that such interrogatories were prolix and unnecessary. This order was affirmed by Hawkins, J., at chambers.

The plaintiff appealed.

E. E. de Witt, for the plaintiff.—Under rule 7, which differs from the corresponding provision in the rules of 1878 (ord. 31, r. 5), the district registrar has no power to go through the interrogatories, allowing some and striking out others; he ought either to have set aside the whole set, or to have left the defendant to take his objections to any particular interrogatories in his affidavit in answer: McIlroy v. Duncan, W. N., 1884, p. 48.

J. W. Cooper, for the defendant.—The order was rightly made. Either all or any of the interrogatories may be struck out under the latter part of rule 7: see Annual Practice, 1889-90, p. 518.

Grantham, J.—There can be no doubt about this case. The rule was purposely altered to obviate the

By section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, it is provided that, "in all prosecutions under the principal Act" (the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875) "the summons to appear before the magistrates shall be served upon the person charged . . . within a reasonable time, and in the case of a perishable article not exceeding twenty-eight days, from the time of the purchase from such person for test purposes of the food or drug, . . . and the summons shall not be made returnable in a less time than seven days from the day it is served upon the person summoned."

A complaint was made before two justices against the appellant for having sold adulterated milk, and a summons was granted, but not signed. The summons was afterwards signed and issued by a magistrate who had not heard the complaint. The appellant appeared on the return day under protest, and was convicted.

Held, that the summons was void, and that, the period of twenty-eight days having expired at the date of the hearing, the magistrate had no jurisdiction to hear the case, and the conviction must be quashed.

Reg. v. Hughes, 4 Q. B. D. 614, 27 W. R. Dig. 67, distinguished.

Special case.

The facts were as follows:—

On the 10th of October, 1889, a complaint was laid before two justices by the respondent, the inspector for the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, that the appellant had, on the 20th of September, 1889, sold adulterated milk. A summons was granted, but not signed. On the 14th of October the summons was signed by another justice who had not heard the complaint. The return day named in the summons was the 23rd of October, and on that day the appellant appeared before the stipendiary magistrate for the borough and protested that the summons was irregular, it not having been signed by the magistrates who had heard the complaint, and that there was therefore no jurisdiction to hear the case.

The magistrate was of opinion that if there had been any irregularity in issuing the summons the same was cured by the presence of the appellant in court, and that he had jurisdiction.

He convicted and fined the appellant, and stated this case for the opinion of the court, the questions being—

1. Whether there was an irregularity in the issue of the summons.

2. If there was, whether the same was cured by the appearance of the plaintiff in court on the day of hearing under the circumstances stated.

3. Whether the magistrate had jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter.

Montague Lush, for the appellant, stated the facts.

H. T. Kemp, for the respondent.—Irregularity in the process used for bringing an offender before the court has no effect upon the jurisdiction: Reg. v. Shaw, 13 W. R. 692; Reg. v. Hughes, 4 Q. B. D. 614, 27 W. R. Dig. 67; Gray v. Commissioners of Customs, 48 J. P. 343; Reg. v. Fletcher, 19 W. R. 781, 1 C. C. R. 320. These cases show that if the offender is before the court, no matter by what means he has been brought there, the court has power to hear and determine the case.

Lush, in reply.—This case is distinguishable from those cited, for in them no protest on behalf of the defendant was made at the hearing. Then, by section 10 of the Act of 1879, the summons must be served within twenty-eight days of the offence. Here there was no good summons at all, and at the date of the hearing it was too late to serve one.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is a case which has rightly occupied a considerable time in argument, for it has very important bearings. The facts are simple enough. The appellant was convicted, and as far as the facts go I am bound to assume properly convicted, before the stipendiary magistrate at Hull, under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling adulterated milk. The offence was committed on the 20th of September, the hearing took place on the 23rd of October, 1889. At the hearing an objection was raised on behalf of the appellant that the magistrates had no jurisdiction. It appeared that the information was laid before two justices of the borough of Hull, but they did not sign the summons; the summons was taken to another magistrate, Mr. Robson, and he signed it. It was objected at the hearing, and before us, that this was no summons at all, since it was not issued by the justices who heard the information. Apparently a practice has risen up all over the country of magistrates' clerks drawing up summonses and taking them to be signed by any magistrate, thus rendering a man liable to be convicted and perhaps heavily fined for some offence as to which the magistrate who signs the summons is completely ignorant whether there is any primâ facie case against him. A looser practice, and one more likely to lead to injustice and wrong, I cannot imagine. Had the magistrate who signed this summons heard the information it is quite possible that he might have found that there was no case against the defendant, and declined to let it go any further. I cannot repair a thing issued in defiance of Jervis's Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, as a summons under that Act. The Act says (section 1) that it shall be lawful for "such justices" to issue their warrant—that is, the justices who have heard the complaint. It seems to me that a summons which does not conform to the provisions of this Act is no summons at all. This Act is studiously framed for the protection of persons charged, and I should have thought that its provision ought to be obeyed. But it seems that that is not the law. In Reg. v. Shaw, which was decided in 1865, Erle, C.J., says, "In my opinion if a party is before a magistrate, and he is then charged with the commission of an offence within the jurisdiction of that magistrate, the latter has jurisdiction to proceed with that charge without any information or summons having been previously issued unless the statute creating the offence imposes the necessity of taking some such step." That decision does not stand alone: there are several other cases to the same effect, and in particular the important case of Reg. v. Hughes, which was decided by eight judges after a second argument, and is absolutely binding upon us. These cases seem to me to establish that when a man is before justices who have jurisdiction over the offence of which he is accused, they may try him for that offence without inquiring how he was brought before them, whether it was by force or by fraud. That being the law it is impossible for us to struggle against it.

But this case is not, in my opinion, within these decisions. There are two distinctions which seem to me to sever it from them. In the other cases there was no protest on the part of the person who was charged before the magistrates, and it was held that rules of procedure are rules which the person sought to be affected may waive if he appears and elects to take the chances of a trial. That is an old and sound rule, and I should be sorry to depart from it. But here there was a strong protest made at the time. When the case was called on it was objected on behalf of the defendant that there was no summons and no information, and that the whole proceedings were irregular, and that therefore there was no jurisdiction to hear the case. I think that this marks off the present case from the others. I do not, however, feel strong enough to decide the case upon that point alone, although it certainly does seem to me that it is a very different case where a man protests in the first instance. But the language used in Reg. v. Shaw and Reg. v. Hughes shows, as I cannot disguise from myself, that the judges assumed that a protest would be of no avail. I therefore do not decide upon that point, although I think it a very important one.

But another point was taken as to section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879. [His lordship then read the section, and continued:—] Now that section appears to me to enact that, as a condition precedent to the trial of offences under the principal Act, the summons shall be served within a reasonable time, and in the case of perishable articles within twenty-eight days of the purchase for the test purposes of the article complained of, and that the return day shall be not less than seven days after the service of the summons, time being thus secured for the person accused to prepare his defence. The times there mentioned cannot be disregarded; they are essential, and the provision is framed in the strongest way. Unless we were to extend the principle of Reg. v. Hughes it is impossible to deny that this section has been violated. The Act of Parliament has said that, as a condition precedent to the trial of the defendant before the magistrate he must be treated according to the provisions of section 10. Now in this case, as I have said before, there was, in my judgment, no summons at all. The period of twenty-eight days had expired before the date of the trial. The man was there and they attempted to try him for an offence committed more than twenty-eight days before. I think it is essential to the jurisdiction that it should be exercised according to the provisions of the Act. That was not so here, and therefore the conviction must be quashed.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. The summons is a citation which states that the magistrate thinks there is a primâ facie case against a man. If the magistrate who issues the summons is not the magistrate who has heard the case it might as well be signed by any person not a magistrate at all. But it is said the information need not be in writing, the man was there and the magistrates had jurisdiction to try him. But the defendant was entitled to say, "You cannot hear the case, because section 10 imposes a limit on your authority, and if a fresh summons were now issued it would be too late." For these reasons I think the conviction should be quashed.

STUBBS v. DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS. (a.)

Criminal law—Bill preferred under Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 17)—Intervention of Director of Public Prosecutions — Acquittal — Liability for costs of accused person—30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, s. 2—Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 22), s. 7.

It is provided by section 7 of the Prosecution o Offences Act, 1879, that, where any criminal proceeding is undertaken by the Director of Public Prosecutions, it shall not be necessary to bind over any person to prosecute, "and, if any person is so bound over, or has given security for costs, he shall, upon the Director of Public Prosecutions undertaking the case, be released from such obligation, and the security shall be deemed to have been cancelled, and the Director of Public Prosecutions shall be liable to costs in lieu of such person."

In a prosecution for conspiracy, the justice had refused to commit; the prosecutor was bound over to prosecute, but no security for costs was given. On the finding of a true bill the Public Prosecutor undertook the case. The defendants were acquitted.

Held, that the above section only transferred to the Public Prosecutor the burden of the costs (if any) for which the original prosecutor was liable under his security, and that an order made against the Public Prosecutor to pay the costs was invalid.

Special case.

The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment of Cave, J.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 13.—CAVE, J.—The question in this case was whether an order of the Central Criminal Court of October 25, 1886, as amended by another order of January 31, 1887, is a good order. The court thereby orders the Director of Public Prosecutions to pay to Messrs. Stubbs and Irving a sum of £164 17s. for their costs of defence upon an indictment for criminal conspiracy. This order, it is said, is properly made under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, s. 2 In November, 1885, a Mr. Gostling charged Messrs. Stubbs and Irving with criminal conspiracy. The Lord Mayor, who heard the charge, declined to commit. Thereupon Mr. Gostling entered into his recognizance under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17, and preferred a bill of indictment against Messrs. Stubbs and Irving at the Central Criminal Court, on the 3rd of May 1886, which bill was found. After the finding of the bill the Director of Public Prosecutions undertook the prosecution, and on the 3rd of August, 1886, Messrs. Stubbs and Irving were tried and acquitted. Mr. Gostling had given no security for costs. On the 13th of September, 1886, the recorder made the order dated the 25th of October, 1886, ordering the prosecutor or other person by or at whose instance the indictment was preferred to pay Messrs. Stubbs and Irving the costs, and on the 31st of January, 1887, he amended the order by ordering the Director of Public Prosecutions to pay them.

For the plaintiffs it was contended by Mr. Finlay that the order was good under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, s. 2, and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 27, s. 7. By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17, entitled "An Act to prevent Vexatious Indictments for Certain Misdemeanours," no indictment for (amongst other offences) conspiracy is to be presented to any grand jury, unless (among other alternatives) the prosecutor has been bound over to prosecute the accused, where the magistrate has dismissed the charge. By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, s. 2, it is enacted that, "Whenever any bill of indictment shall be preferred to any grand jury under the provisions of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17 against any person who has not been committed to or detained in custody, or bound by recognizance to answer such indictment, and the person accused thereby shall be acquitted thereon, it shall be lawful for the court before which such indictment shall be tried, in its discretion, to direct and order that the prosecutor or other person by or at whose instance such indictment shall have been preferred shall pay unto the accused person" his just and reasonable costs, to be taxed. By 42 & 43 Vict. c. 22, s. 7: "Where any criminal proceeding is instituted, undertaken, or carried on by the Director of Public Prosecutions, such director shall not be bound over to prosecute or conduct such proceedings or required to give security for costs, and it shall not be necessary to bind over any person to prosecute or conduct such proceeding, and if any person is so bound over or has given security for costs, he shall, upon the Director of Public Prosecutions undertaking the case, be released from such obligation, and the security shall be deemed to have been cancelled, and the Director of Public Prosecutions shall be liable to costs in lieu of such person." Now, it is clear that in this case no order such as that in question could have been made on the Director of Public Prosecutions under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35 alone, seeing that he was not the person by or at whose instance such indictment was preferred. 42 & 43 Vict. c. 22, s. 7, is quite general, and is not confined to cases coming under the Vexatious Indictments Act. Where the Director of Public Prosecutions undertakes the prosecution it releases the prosecutor who has been bound over from his obligation, and where he has given security for costs the security is to be deemed to have been cancelled. So far there is no indication of any intention to relieve the prosecutor from any costs he may be ordered to pay under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, s. 2. The concluding words of the clause are relied on for this purpose: they are, "and the Director of Public Prosecutions shall be liable to costs in lieu of such person." Looking, however, at the grammatical construction, I think these words must be read to impose no more liability on the Director of Public Prosecutions than that from which the original prosecutor is relieved by the preceding words—that is, the costs for which he is liable under his security.

But for the words "the Director of Public Prosecutions shall be liable to costs in lieu of such person," no one would have been liable for the costs for which security has been given, and it seems more natural to read these words as imposing on the Director of Public Prosecutions the liability, from which the original prosecutor had, by the preceding words been released, rather than to construe them as imposing a liability on the Director of Public Prosecutions greater than that from which the original prosecutor had just been released, and so to give the original prosecutor an immunity that there is nothing in the preceding words to show that he was intended to have. If it had been intended by the last clause that the Director of Public Prosecutions should bear the costs which might be ordered to be paid under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35 in such a case as this, I should certainly have expected to find in the preceding words some indication of an intention that the original prosecutor should be relieved from them. If, then, this is the natural interpretation of the language of the section, is it also the reasonable one?

It is said that it is unreasonable that the original prosecutor should remain liable for the costs when he has lost all control over the conduct of the prosecution. There would be more force in this observation if the liability to the costs followed automatically on the acquittal of the accused. But this is not so. The court is to make the order in its discretion; and, considering that the object of the section giving the court power to order the prosecutor to pay the costs was to discourage vexatious indictments too frequently preferred for purposes of extortion, it seems far more consonant with reason that in such a case as the present the liability should remain on those who originally started the prosecution and preferred the indictment, rather than it should transferred to the Public Prosecutor, whose action in undertaking a prosecution already commenced and taking up a bill already found the Legislature cannot reasonably have intended to discourage. If the defendant has been acquitted by reason that the prosecution was vexatious in its inception, there seems no adequate reason why the original prosecutor should be relieved from the burden of paying costs simply because, in the interests of justice, the Director of Public Prosecutions has thought it right to intervene.

If the prosecution was not vexatious in its inception, but has failed by reason of the difficulty of proving the case, or even by reason of the intervention of the Director of Public Prosecutions, those seem reasons, not why the Director of Public Prosecutions should pay the costs, but why the defendant should not get his costs, and unless it was shown that the prosecution was vexatious—that is, begun or continued without reasonable and probable cause—or frivolous, I imagine that the court, in the due exercise of its discretion, would decline to give the defendant the costs of the trial.

It is not necessary in this case to consider the wider question, whether an order under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35 can in any case be made on the Director of Public Prosecutions. It is enough to say that in this case, for the reasons given above, such an order could not be made, and therefore our judgment must be for the defendant, with costs.

I should like to add for myself, that of course we have not had before us the merits of the case, and are deciding simply on the point of law, but I find it very difficult to conceive what the circumstances could be which would justify such an order being made on the Director of Public Prosecutions.

A. L. SMITH, J.—It is clear that the Director of Public Prosecutions in the circumstances of this case could not be ordered to pay costs by reason of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, s. 2, for the simple reason that he was not the person who had preferred the indictment. But it was alleged that he could be made to pay by reason of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 22, s. 7, the last words of which section enact that in certain cases "the Director of Public Prosecutions shall be liable to costs in lieu of such person"—that is, in lieu of the original prosecutor: and I own, for myself, that it is a captivating argument, and one likely to lead to the conclusion which was wanted unless we look carefully into the section to see what that section in fact provides.

That section, as it seems to me, is perfectly clear when its phraseology is closely scrutinized. It is a section under which, in certain events, the Public Prosecutor may incur certain responsibilities, but in my opinion the Public Prosecutor is only to incur under that, responsibility from which the original prosecutor has been relieved.

The section says that "nothing in this Act shall interfere with the right of any person to institute, undertake, or carry on any criminal proceeding. Where any criminal proceeding is instituted, undertaken, or carried on" (in this case it has been undertaken) "by the Director of Public Prosecutions, such director shall not be bound over to prosecute or conduct such proceeding, or required to give security for costs"—the meaning of that is obvious, because the Public Prosecutor is there as an officer of State, and it would not be necessary to bind him over or to make him give security for costs—"and it shall not be necessary to bind over any person to prosecute or conduct such proceeding"—that is, when the Public Prosecutor intervenes—"and if any person is so bound over"—as the original prosecutor, Mr. Goetling, was in this case bound over to prosecute—"or if any such person"—that is, the individual prosecutor—"has given security for costs"—which he had not to give in this case, because it was not a case in which security could be called for—"he"—that is, the original prosecutor—"shall, upon the Director of Public Prosecutions undertaking the case, be released from such obligation"—that is, the obligation which he entered into by reason of his recognizance to prosecute and being bound over, and he shall also be released from any security which he had given, or in the words of the statute, "and the security" for costs "shall be deemed to have been cancelled."

So far, of course, the Public Prosecutor is not touched; but the original prosecutor is released, and he is released from two things, namely, from his obligation to prosecute and from his obligation as to security for costs, if and when he has given them. Then the section goes on, and it says, "and the Director of Public Prosecutions shall be liable to costs in lieu of such person." Liable to what costs? The meaning of that, in my judgment, is plain. What the original prosecutor is released from the Director of Public Prosecutions comes under obligation to, no more and no less. And what the original prosecutor has been released from here is his obligation to prosecute, which was undertaken by the Public Prosecutor, and his obligation as to security for costs, if any had been given, and as to those costs only does the Public Prosecutor come into the responsibility.

It seems to me that on this reading of the section the case is clear, and that the second order, at any rate, even if it could have been made in the court in which it was made, is not an order which should have been made by the learned recorder. For these reasons I think that the judgment should be for the defendant.

App. Bankruptcy. April 18, 25, 28.

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Discretion of court in granting discharge—Conduct of debtor—Breach of promise of marriage—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 24, 28, sub-sections 2, 3, 5, 6.

The court is entitled, in exercising its discretion as to the granting of an order of discharge to a bankrupt under section 28, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to take into consideration any conduct of the bankrupt connected with or relevant to the bankruptcy, and is not limited to the matters mentioned in sub-section 3 of section 28, or in section 24, of the said Act.

Decision of the Divisional Court in Ex parte Jones, In re Jones, ante, p. 429, affirmed.

Ex parte CONSTABLE. In re BARKER.

This was an appeal against an order of Mr. Registrar Giffard granting the debtor Barker an unconditional discharge.

The debtor had been the defendant in an action for breach of promise against whom a verdict and judgment for £1,000 had been entered. This, with the costs, was the main debt, upon the failure to pay which the debtor had presented his own petition in bankruptcy. There were practically no assets, but the debtor admitted that he had won, and was likely to win, sums of money as a jockey. The chief creditor, Miss Constable, the plaintiff in the breach of promise action, opposed the discharge, and asked for a judgment of £200 to be entered up against the debtor for the judgment debt in the action under the provisions of section 28, sub-section 6, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The registrar held that he had no power to impose such a condition on the debtor's discharge, as the debtor had not committed any of the offences mentioned under section 28, sub-section 3, and granted an unconditional discharge.

The creditor, Constable, appealed against this discharge.

Muir Mackenzie, for the creditor.—The registrar had ample discretion under section 28, sub-section 2, to grant, or refuse, or impose a condition on the discharge. His discretion is only limited from granting an unconditional discharge when the debtor has committed a certain trade offence under sub-section 3. The registrar thought himself bound by In re Betts and Block, 35 W. R. 530, 37 Ibid. 259, 19 Q. B. D. 39, 13 App. Cas. 570, and In re Bullen, Ex parte Arnaud, 36 W. R. 836, 5 Morr. Rep. 243. The registrar is not bound by the official receiver's report, but may receive evidence, and take into consideration other misconduct than trade offences: In re Jones, ante, p. 429. The cases do not go so far as to bind the registrar to consider only the debtor's affairs. He may consider his general conduct: Ex parte Shackleton, ante, p. 288, 6 Morr. Rep. 304.

H. Reed, for the debtor.—It has been the practice since the decision in In re Betts and Block to grant a debtor his unconditional discharge unless he is shown to have committed any offence mentioned in section 28, sub-section 3, or under section 24: In re Mew and Thorn, 10 W. R. 790.

Ex parte JONES. In re JONES.

Appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.), reported ante, p. 429, upholding an order of his Honour Judge Lloyd, sitting at the county court of Wrexham.

The facts of the case were as follows:—In July, 1885, the bankrupt was defendant in an action for breach of promise of marriage, in which the plaintiff recovered judgment for £500. In January, 1886, the bankrupt's father died, leaving real and personal property valued at £4,000. By his will, made five days before his death, all his children took substantial benefits except the bankrupt, to whom a legacy of £10 only, payable on his mother's death, was left. On April 11, 1889, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt on his own petition. The assets were practically nil, and the only creditor was the plaintiff in the said action for £596 for damages, costs, and interest on the judgment debt. Shortly before the petition was filed an offer of £250 had been made to the plaintiff by the bankrupt's family, which offer was refused. Upon those facts the judge gave the bankrupt his discharge subject to his consenting to a judgment for £250 being entered up against him under the powers given to the court by section 28, sub-section 6, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, such judgment to be deemed to be satisfied if the bankrupt paid the official receiver £200 within a month.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND and F. G. RUCKER, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and F. C. Willis, for the appellant.—The court has no jurisdiction to impose a conditional discharge upon the bankrupt unless some of the facts mentioned in sub-section 3 of section 28 are proved against him. It cannot inquire into his conduct or affairs in any other matters than these. It must act upon the facts found in the report of the official receiver, and confine itself to the financial affairs and conduct of the bankrupt. The wide discretion and quasi-penal jurisdiction given to the court in regard to the grant or refusal of the discharge under the Bankruptcy Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), was restrained by the Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), and could not have been intended to be restored under the Act of 1883. If the court had jurisdiction it was wrongly exercised in imposing a penal judgment on a pauper.

Lankester, appearing for the plaintiff in the action for breach of promise, was not called upon.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Muir Mackenzie, for the respondent, the official receiver, were not called upon.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 28.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—This judgment is given in respect of both cases. In both the main question is the same. In both the bankruptcy was the result of a judgment in an action for a breach of promise of marriage. In both the bankruptcy was upon the petition of the debtors themselves on account of the judgment debt under these actions. In both the judgment debt was the only debt, or was the main and practical cause of the bankruptcy. In the first case the registrar granted an unconditional discharge, and the appeal against such discharge was based on the ground that it was not warranted by the conduct of the bankrupt in respect of the breach of promise. In the second case the county court judge granted a conditional discharge upon the entry of a judgment for the reduced amount of £250 against the bankrupt, to be only carried into effect upon application to and by leave of the court at any time. Against this order the appeal was made on the ground that the judge had no right to consider the conduct of the debtor in respect of the breach of promise at all; and, secondly, that if he had any such discretion he had wrongly exercised it. The question in both cases depends on the construction of section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Does that section give the registrar, in the first case, or in the second case, the county court judge, the power, in granting a bankrupt his discharge or in refusing it, to consider any other facts than those mentioned in the section, or can he consider any other "conduct" or state of "affairs" than those mentioned? Can he act upon any such consideration? If so, is any restriction as to the conduct or state of affairs of the debtor placed by the proviso of the section upon such consideration?

First, Can the registrar consider any other conduct or state of affairs than those mentioned in the section? It is perfectly clear that he may. The section first gives power to the debtor to apply for his discharge and continues:—"On the hearing of the application the court shall take into consideration a report of the official receiver as to the bankrupt's conduct and affairs." "Shall" is imperative. But the section does not state that the court shall act on that report only, but only that the court "shall" consider it, "and," it continues, "may either grant or refuse an absolute order of discharge, or suspend the operation of the order for a specified time, or grant an order of discharge subject to any conditions with respect to any earnings or income which may afterwards become due to the bankrupt." Had the section stopped there there could hardly be a doubt, upon the ordinary grammatical construction of the words, that this section did not enact that the registrar must only act upon such consideration, but that he had a discretion so to act. He may grant or refuse or do several things. The section gives a wider discretion, in fact, than is often given. It is almost indefinite. Then comes the proviso. The ordinary business of a proviso is to limit a general discretion in certain questions, though sometimes I am aware it enlarges such discretion. Still, that is not the regular purpose of a proviso. This proviso runs as follows:—"Provided that the court shall refuse the discharge in all cases where the bankrupt has committed any misdemeanor under this Act, or Part II. of the Debtors Act, 1869, or any amendment thereof, and shall, on proof of any of the facts hereinafter mentioned, either refuse the order, or suspend the operation of the order for a specified time, or grant an order of discharge, subject to such conditions as aforesaid." Sub-section (3) then goes on to enumerate the facts upon proof of which the court is required to act in either of the three ways just specified.

In any of these cases mentioned an unconditional discharge is not possible, while in the general instance it is within the discretion of the court. No facts mentioned in this proviso, however, apply to either of the cases before us. Clearly the discretion in such cases, not being restricted to the facts mentioned in the proviso, is unlimited, while in cases coming under the terms of the proviso, it is limited. Other parts of the statute, such as sub-section (6), under which the judge acted in the second case before us—namely, by imposing an assent to a judgment for a reduced amount—clearly imply an unlimited discretion. I have no doubt that in both the cases before us the court had full discretion to grant, or refuse, or impose any conditional or unconditional discharge, and was entitled to consider the judgment in the breach of promise action and the failure to comply with such judgment. May the court, then, take into consideration everything in a man's life? No; but only some things. It may not inquire into or consider conduct of the debtor which had nothing to do with the bankruptcy, and which could not have produced or affected it—for instance, a breach of promise of marriage under which the debtor had been made liable for damages years before, and subsequently to which he had entered or carried on a trade in the course of which trade he had become bankrupt. It is only where the result of an action for a breach of promise could and must have had an effect on the subsequent bankruptcy that it can be taken into consideration. In both the present cases it is admitted that the adverse judgment in such actions was the direct cause of the bankruptcy, and was the main or only debt upon which the debtors had themselves petitioned. A judgment of my own has been cited in support of the appellants' contention, that conduct in matters not directly subject to the bankruptcy law is not conduct which can enter into the consideration of the court upon an application by a bankrupt for his discharge. I do not profess to give my judgments in words of literary accuracy or in beautiful phrases of general application. I only seek to give a businesslike decision in each particular case. The words cited from my judgment in In re Betts do not carry the meaning attempted to be attributed to them. I merely gave instances of conduct in other matters than those appertaining to the bankruptcy in the case cited. They only mean what I say now, and said then, that conduct in affairs which had no relation to the bankruptcy, which could not have affected or produced it, is outside the court's consideration. Here in both cases the non-payment of judgments in the actions for breach of promise manifestly did produce the bankruptcies. If so, the registrar in the one case, and the county court judge in the other case, had a right to consider the conduct of the debtors in relation to these actions, and had a complete discretion to act upon such consideration.

Whether such discretion was rightly exercised is the only remaining question for us. In the first case I see no reason why we should overrule the discretion of the registrar in granting an unconditional discharge. In the second case there are circumstances which lead me to think that the judge exercised a very shrewd discretion in imposing a judgment for the reduced amount of £250 as a condition of the debtor's discharge. It was a Welsh case. The debtor belonged to a well-to-do farmer's family at the time of the judgment. The father subsequently died, leaving to all the other members of his family, except the debtor, a substantial amount of property or interest in different farms. But it is said that the debtor was left without a shilling, and was only acting as bailiff on his mother's farm at £15 a year. He is shown to have given orders for agricultural machinery, which, it is alleged, was for his mother's use. I cannot help suspecting that a Welshman's innate desire to get the better of the law lies at the bottom of all these transactions, and that somehow, some day, the debtor may find himself in a position to satisfy this reduced judgment. The judgment cannot be put into force unfairly; it can only be by leave of the court. On these grounds I hold that the discretion was rightly exercised. The appeals in both cases are, therefore, dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—It is obvious that there has been considerable difference of opinion among county court judges as to the construction of section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It is important to note the statutory course of proceedings to be taken. An application for a discharge is not to be heard until the public examination of the bankrupt is concluded. That is important as denoting that the facts disclosed on the public examination are to form materials for consideration on the application for discharge. The question now to be determined is whether the court before whom such application is made may consider all relevant circumstances, or only such bankruptcy misdemeanours as are mentioned under sub-sections (2) and (3). The tenor of the whole section, taking the sub-sections together, is to show that the Legislature intended that the facts deducible from the public examination of the debtor were the material upon which the court might act at its discretion, at any rate such facts were to form a part of the consideration on which the court was left at liberty to act. By sub-section (2) the court also shall take into consideration a report of the official receiver as to the bankrupt's conduct and affairs. These latter are very large words. They must imply not merely all conduct and affairs material and relevant to the matters before the court, but all conduct and affairs tending to assist the discretion of the court so far as they are matters upon which the official receiver may report. But after the consideration of the report there is a further discretion bestowed upon the court. The court may do four things, it may give an absolute discharge, or it may suspend the discharge, or give a conditional discharge, or refuse a discharge altogether. The court is obliged to take one or other of these four courses, but has an absolute discretion as to which course it may adopt. Then comes a double proviso. (a) If the debtor has committed any of the misdemeanours under the Act its discretion is taken away and it is bound to refuse the discharge. (b) If, again, any facts mentioned under sub-section (3) are proved to the satisfaction of the court the discretion given by the first part of sub-section (2) is so far limited that it cannot give the debtor an absolute discharge, but is still at liberty to adopt any of the three remaining courses. In a particular contingency the section takes away a particular discretion. This is not for the purpose of limiting its general discretion over the facts to be taken into consideration, but only its exercise of its discretionary power in the event of certain specified facts being proved before it.

The enactment in sub-section (5) is a further evidence of this discretionary power of consideration, where it is enacted that the court, on the application for a discharge, "may put such questions to the debtor and receive such evidence as it may think fit"—i.e., may receive any such evidence as it may think fit for the purpose of exercising its discretion. The only limit to such evidence would seem to be its relevancy to the bankruptcy, and so far as it may reasonably tend to bear upon the question of the bankrupt's possible discharge or non-discharge. Then comes sub-section (6), under which the court "may as one of the conditions referred to"—i.e., as one of the terms which may be imposed on a conditional discharge—"require the bankrupt to consent to judgment being entered against him for any balance of the debts provable under the bankruptcy." But this condition is not confined to cases of misdemeanours referred to in sub-section 2, or malpractices mentioned under sub-section (3). It is of general application, and can be imposed whenever the court thinks it equitable and just to do so. The power is not fettered by any previous words in the section, and the discretion of imposing such a condition is complete in any case where it is open to the court to apply this discretion.

As to the second point, that the discretion in the second case has been wrongly exercised. In the first case, I think there are no circumstances to cause us to interfere, though the registrar rather took the view that he was bound to give an unconditional discharge, if any. With regard to the second case, I take much the same view as the Master of the Rolls. I think that the debtor was guilty of bad conduct in trying to evade the consequences of his breach of promise, and was carrying out a scheme to defeat the judgment found against him, and, judging from the circumstances of the official receiver's report as to the real state of the debtor's affairs, I think the county court judge exercised wise discretion in granting him only a discharge subject to a condition which he is likely at some subsequent time to be easily able to fulfil.

LOPES, L.J.—If section 28 is read without any desire to refine the ordinary meaning of the words I do not think it is difficult to construe. By the first part an absolute discretion is given to the court to be exercised in one or other of the four ways provided. Then comes a proviso fettering that discretion in the cases mentioned where the bankrupt has committed certain misdemeanours or malpractices, but its consideration is not limited to the particular cases mentioned, nor is the general discretion given in the first part of the section limited in cases other than those mentioned. As to In re Betts, that case does not assist us. It merely decides that the particular conduct of the bankrupt in not submitting himself to medical examination was not such conduct as the official receiver was entitled to consider in his report. The expressions quoted from my judgment do not bear out the construction which counsel has endeavoured to place upon them, nor do I see any reason to prevent my adhering to them. I said: "In my opinion the word 'conduct' in section 28 does not include what I will call general misconduct. For instance, it could not, I imagine, include immoral conduct. . . . Nor, again, in my opinion, would it include a breach of an obligation not connected with the bankruptcy, such, for instance, as a breach of promise to marry."

The instance of a breach of promise was cited as something which might have had nothing to do with the bankruptcy in question. It would be in such a case conduct altogether outside the bankruptcy proceeding, and so not coming within the purview of the court at all. Here the debtors' conduct in respect of the breach of promise actions is the direct cause of the bankruptcy. I think in the first case the registrar, and in the second the county court judge, had a discretion and exercised it rightly.

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Petition—Substituted service—Debtor departed out of the jurisdiction for the purpose of avoiding service—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 141, 154, 156.

Rule 154 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, which provides for substituted service of a bankruptcy notice or a petition where the debtor is keeping out of the way to avoid personal service, applies to the case where the debtor has gone out of the jurisdiction for that purpose.

Fry v. Moore, 37 W. R. 565, 23 Q. B. D. 395, distinguished.

Appeal from the refusal of Mr. Registrar Giffard to rescind a receiving order.

The debtor, a domiciled Scotchman, resided and carried on business in London. In September, 1889, he left this country and went to Scotland. On the 8th of January, 1890, the petitioning creditors issued a bankruptcy notice against him. Being unable to effect personal service of the notice, they applied for an order for substituted service; and the registrar, being satisfied that the debtor was keeping out of the way to avoid service, made an order for service by registered letter addressed to the debtor at his last known residence in London. Such substituted service, having been effected, and the debtor failing to comply with the notice, the creditors presented a petition against him. Substituted service of the petition was effected in the same way under a similar order.

On the 13th of February a receiving order was made. The debtor applied to have the receiving order rescinded on the ground that the bankruptcy notice and the petition had not been properly served, and that the proceedings were invalid.

The registrar refused the application, and the debtor appealed.

Firminger, for the debtor.—The substituted service in each case was ordered under rule 154. But the proviso to that rule only applies to cases where the debtor, if he could be found, might be served personally. It does not apply where the debtor is out of the jurisdiction. Fry v. Moore, 37 W. R. 565, 23 Q. B. D. 395, shows that there can be no substituted service of a writ if at the time the writ was issued it could not be served personally. The proper course here was for the creditors to proceed under rule 156, which provides that "where a debtor petitioned against is not in England, the court may order service to be made within such time and in such manner and form as it shall think fit."

Wace, for the petitioning creditors, was not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case it is said that the registrar had no jurisdiction to order substituted service of the bankruptcy notice, because at that time the person to be served was not in England. It is argued that substituted service cannot be effected under rule 154 unless, if it was known where the debtor was, he could be served personally. But there is nothing in the rule confining it to cases where the debtor is avoiding service within the jurisdiction. If he has gone abroad to avoid service, and he has a place of business in England, there is nothing in the rule to show that service cannot be made at that place. And there was evidence before the registrar which satisfied him that the debtor had gone abroad to avoid service. In Fry v. Moore there was no suggestion that the defendant had gone abroad for the purpose of avoiding service; the irregularity there consisted in issuing a writ against a defendant who was out of the jurisdiction without the leave of the court, and the obtaining an order for substituted service was considered an evasion of the rules as to service out of the jurisdiction. That case is not in favour of the proposition for which it is cited. The same remarks apply to the service of the petition. I think that all the objections to the receiving order fail, and that the receiving order was rightly made.

FRY, L.J.—I agree.

LOPES, L.J.—I also agree. In Watt v. Barnett, 26 W. R. 400, 3 Q. B. D. 183, Mellor, J., said that the object of the High Court rule providing for substituted service was to obviate the difficulties that the plaintiff might be exposed to by reason of the defendant's going abroad to avoid personal service. I think that rule 154 has the same object.

Appeal dismissed.

ELDER v. CARTER. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Order for production of documents before trial by person not a party to action—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 37, r. 7.

The court has no jurisdiction under rule 7 of order 37 to order the production before trial of documents by persons not parties to the action.

The object of the rule was not to increase rights as against third persons, but to give further facilities for enforcing rights which already exist.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Huddleston, B., and Grantham, J.) reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Huddleston, B., and Grantham, J.).

On the 23rd of February, 1888, Carter obtained a judgment for £4,000 against Haldeman, and shortly afterwards Carter, under section 14 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, obtained a charging order upon 37,5000 shares alleged to belong to Haldeman in the Slide and Spur Gold Mines (Limited). Those shares were standing in the name of Elder, but it was alleged that he was a mere trustee for Haldeman. Shortly afterwards an injunction was granted by a divisional court restraining the transfer of, or any dealing with, these shares until after the trial of an interpleader issue for the purpose of determining what interest Haldeman had in them.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 28th of May, 1889, an issue was directed to be tried between the plaintiff and the defendant to ascertain whether Haldeman had any, and what, interest in these shares, or any and which of them.

A summons was then taken out by Carter in this interpleader issue, which was still pending, and had not been tried, asking for an order directing the attendance of the company by their secretary, or other proper officer, for the purpose of producing their books, writings, or documents containing any entries relating either to registration, transfer, or ownership, or other dealings with the shares numbered 1 to 375,000, and for inspection of them. The only party to this summons besides Carter was the company.

The summons was referred by the master to Denman, J., by whom it was referred to the Divisional Court.

The Divisional Court (Huddleston, B., and Grantham, J.) made an order for the production by the company before the master in chambers of their books, and that the defendant should then be at liberty to inspect the books, and make copies or extracts therefrom.

The company appealed.

Johnston Edwards, for the appellants.—The court has no jurisdiction to make an order like the present against persons who are not parties to the issue. If rule 7 of order 37 purports to give this jurisdiction it is ultrà vires.

He referred to the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 17; Central News (Limited) v. Eastern Telegraph Co., 32 W. R. 493; Rishdon v. White, 5 Times Rep. 59; Straker v. Reynolds, 37 W. R. 379, 22 Q. Vennell, for the respondent.—There is jurisdiction under rule 7 to make this order. The rule provides that the court may "at any stage of the proceedings" order the attendance of any person for the purpose of producing any writings or other documents. [LINDLEY, L.J.—That means before or after the trial.] The object of the rule was to facilitate inquiries, to assist litigants, and to save judicial time. The rule gives an enlarged power to the court, and is not limited to the case of witnesses.

He referred to ord. 37, rr. 8, 9; Central News (Limited) v. Eastern Telegraph Co.; Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879.

Edwards was not called upon to reply.

LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts, and continued:—The question is, whether that order made by the Divisional Court is right or wrong, and whether it can be supported. I confess that when it was first read to me it appeared to me to be one the like of which I had never seen or heard of before, and the more the matter is reflected upon the more difficult it is to support that order. Let us see exactly how the matter stands. This company is no party whatever to the interpleader issue. I do not say in point of fact, but in point of law, the company has no more to do with it than I have or any stranger has. One of the parties to the issue says this:—"Somebody has got some books which I should like to see for the purpose of enabling me to go into court and try my case upon that issue. There is ord. 37, r. 7, which enables the court to order anybody to produce anything if it thinks fit at any time, and I can apply to the court and get an order to see those books." That, to my mind, is a very startling application. It is contrary to principle as far as I understand it. Putting aside the facts of this particular case, and looking at it as a general proposition, the general proposition is this, that if any litigant wants to see books or documents held by anybody else who is not a party, and thinks they will be useful to him, he can go and get inspection of those books or documents from such person. That is entirely contrary to every rule relating to discovery which has ever existed either on the common law side or the equity side of the court. It is a well established rule now (the origin of it I do not recollect) that you cannot get discovery except from a party to the action, and there is sense in that rule. There is another rule equally old and equally well established, that you cannot make a mere witness a party in order to get discovery out of him. That would be abusing the doctrine of production and discovery. This particular application infringes both these rules. The inconvenience and danger of granting such an application as this must be apparent, I think, to anybody who considers it. But then reliance is placed on ord. 37, r. 7, which runs thus:—[His lordship read the rule, and also rules 8 and 9 of the same order, and continued:—] Now on considering rule 7, wide as the language is, it does not say at what time or at what place or for what purpose this order is to be made except for the purpose of producing documents. The rule is simple enough. There were difficulties in obtaining the attendance of witnesses and production of documents at common law except on the trial of actions, and there were statutes passed to remove these difficulties—the Statute of 1 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 5, and the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 46, and when the rules had to be recast so as to apply not only to common law actions, but also to chancery and all other actions in the High Court, it became necessary to modify and change the words so as to make them applicable to all proceedings in all courts. That is the history of this rule, and there is no question at all that it is a most useful rule.

But the question is, whether we are to construe it as introducing a practice entirely unheard of before, and contrary, as I have endeavoured to show, to all principle and all justice. Now the answer to Mr. Vennell's argument is this, that you must look at this rule with reference to the purpose for which it was introduced; and that purpose was not to give the litigant a right to discovery against anybody not a party to the action. So to construe it would be to abuse the rule. The object of it was to remove the difficulties which existed in compelling production of documents at various stages of the proceedings, both before and after the trial, at the hearing of motions, petitions, summonses, and examination of witnesses, and the like; and that is the real, legitimate object of the rule, though it is not necessarily confined to production on the hearing of any motion or petition, because there may be some proceeding before an official referee, or an examiner, or a commission to take evidence, to which this rule would apply, and I am not at all desirous of doing more than say that the rule cannot be construed so as to enable a litigant to obtain discovery from any person who is not a party, which is the object of this application. I have no doubt whatever that what I have stated is the true view to take of the rule; and I think when the authorities are looked at, and they are very few, there is no authority which is adverse to that view. The view of Mathew, J., as expressed in the case of Central News (Limited) v. Eastern Telegraph Co., is clear that this rule does really no more than incorporate the preceding statutory enactments to which I have referred; and I think that is so with this explanation, that the language is made a little more general so as to extend it to all proceedings in the High Court. When that case came on on appeal from the decision of Mathew, J., before the Divisional Court, Watkin Williams, J., suggested, and I think very justly, that if the rule were to bear the construction contended for it would be a very serious question whether it was not ultrà vires; and I concur in that view. If it is to be so construed as to give any litigant the right to see the books of anybody who is not a party to the litigation, I should say that that rule would be ultrà vires; though I am satisfied that that is not the true construction of it nor the true meaning.

Then Mr. Vennell says that upon the facts this company, although not a party to this proceeding, is really so interested in it that there would be no injustice done in this particular case. I think that is so. Without going into the merits, I think it is very likely that in this particular case there would not be any particular injustice done. I will assume that; but the principle involved in that line of argument is a dangerous one, and I for one cannot be the first to sanction such a proceeding as is contended for. It appears to me that principle is entirely against this order. Therefore the appeal will be allowed, and the order will be discharged.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Rule 7 of order 37 is not intended to enlarge the rights of a litigant to discovery against third persons who have nothing to do with the action, nor to enlarge his rights to production of documents against them. The rule is one of practice and procedure, and therefore is and can only be, a rule which is intended to enlarge the facilities of obtaining production when production is necessary for the purpose of justice.

Now in the present instance the production of the document at the present moment cannot be necessary for the purpose of justice. Whoever heard that there was a right on the part of a litigant, at a time when there was no pending motion and no pending trial, to obtain inspection of a document which belongs to a third person, unless indeed in the possible case where production of such a document was necessary to carry out an order which had already been obtained. The truth is that no judge has a right to think the production of such a document fit at this particular moment, inasmuch as it is interfering with rights of third parties at a moment when there is no evidence being taken in the cause and when the presence of the document is not necessary for the purpose of carrying out or completing any order which has been made.

The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 46, introduced at common law a very valuable means of obtaining production of documents on the hearing of motions and summonses. At common law the ordinary subpœna was a subpœna ad testificandum, and required the witness to be present in court for the purpose of giving evidence to be used at the trial. The Common Law Procedure Act gave judges the power of compelling the attendance of witnesses to be examined, and of directing that documents should be produced upon the hearing of motions and summonses. Then came rule 7 of order 37, the object and scope of which (as has always been said with regard to the Judicature Act) is not to increase rights as against third persons, but to give further facilities for enforcing rights which already exist. That rule does to a certain extent go further than the Common Law Procedure Act, because it abstains from making it a condition precedent that an order should be made upon the hearing of a motion or a summons. It says that an order may be made at any stage of the proceedings whenever production is proper. I do not think we ought to try to define the cases exhaustively in which production may be proper. It is sufficient to say that I can conceive a case in which production of a document might be proper though there was no motion or summons pending; for instance, if an order had already been made and the non-production of the documents by the third person would defeat the rights which had already been declared and defeat the order which had already been obtained.

But I am as certain as one can be of anything with regard to practice, that it is not intended to enact that at any stage of a proceeding a judge may make, subject to his discretion, an order on a third person for the production of a document which belongs to the third person, unless the production of it at that moment is a thing to which the parties are entitled for the purpose of justice; and a person is not entitled for the purpose of justice, at any moment during a suit, simply because he is a litigant, to see what is in the possession of a third person and to have production of it. Such a thing was never heard of. I do not believe it was ever dreamt of until rule 7 was submitted to the ingenuity of counsel. An attempt has been made to extract out of a rule which simply refers to practice and procedure in an action a power of obtaining inspection from a third person outside the action. If such a power exists it is most inquisitorial, and might be used for purposes of infinite oppression. In this particular case I dare say it would work no oppression at all; but we have to construe the rule. The order will be discharged, with costs here and below.

Contract — Illegal purpose — Partial performance — Action to recover money paid.

Taylor v. Bowers, 24 W. R. 499, 1 Q. B. D. 291, discussed, and distinguished.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Huddleston, B., and Stephen, J.).

On the 2nd of July, 1886, a receiving order was made against one William Clark, on the petition of Frederick Baynes, and on the 15th of July he was adjudged bankrupt.

On the 6th of October, 1887, the plaintiff, who was a friend of Clark, called upon the defendants, who were acting as the solicitors to Baynes, and offered to pay Baynes £40 towards the costs to which he had been put provided that he would not appear on the public examination of Clark, nor oppose his order of discharge. The defendants agreed to accept this offer, and, accordingly, received from the plaintiff the sum of £40, for which they gave a receipt, which stated that in consideration of the sum of £40, "we waive all our claim for costs, and undertake not to appear at the bankrupt's public examination, nor to oppose his order of discharge."

On the 7th of October, 1887, the public examination of the bankrupt was held, at which neither the defendants nor Baynes appeared.

On the 3rd of August, 1888, the bankrupt not having applied for his order of discharge, the plaintiff demanded from the defendants the return of the £40, and upon their refusal he brought the present action to recover it, on the ground that it had been given for an illegal consideration.

Field, J., at the trial left the parties to move for judgment, which the Divisional Court entered for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Crump, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 31.—FRY, L.J.—In the judgment that I am about to deliver the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls concur.

The facts are shortly these. [The Lord Justice stated the facts, and continued:—] Now the tendency of such a bargain as that entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants is obvious. It tends to pervert the course of justice. Although the defendants were under no obligation to appear, they certainly were under an obligation not to contract themselves out of the opportunity of appearing. The case of Hall v. Dyson was cited in support of the suggestion that this was an illegal agreement, and it was not argued on the other side that it was legal. It must, therefore, I think, be taken to be an illegal agreement. As a general rule, when a plaintiff cannot get at the money which he seeks to recover without setting up an illegal contract he cannot succeed. The rule in such a case is potior est conditio possidentis. There is another general rule—namely, that where there is a voluntary payment of money it cannot be recovered back. It follows, therefore, that in this case the plaintiff cannot recover back the £40, because he cannot do so without setting up an illegal contract. In Collins v. Blantern Wilmot, C.J., says, "Whoever is a party to an unlawful contract, if he hath once paid the money stipulated to be paid in pursuance thereof he shall not have the help of the court to fetch it back again. You shall not have a right of action when you come into a court of justice in this unclean manner to recover it back. Procul o procul este profani."

To that general rule there are undoubtedly several exceptions, or apparent exceptions. One of them is the case of oppressor and oppressed, in which the oppressed party may usually recover from the oppressor. In such case the maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis does not apply, because the illegality, the delict,] is not the same. There are other exceptions where there are illegalities arising or statutes passed for the protection of classes of persons, and where the person seeking to recover is a member of the protected class—for instance, contracts void for usury. In such cases the one wrongdoer may recover from the other, although both have been parties to an illegal contract. In the present case a third exception to the general rule is suggested on the authority of the judgment of this court in Taylor v. Bowers. In that case Mellish, L.J., said, "if money is paid or goods delivered for an illegal purpose, the person who has so paid the money or delivered the goods may recover them back before that purpose is carried out." Now it is remarkable that that proposition is to be found in no earlier case than Taylor v. Bowers, and I cannot help saying for myself that I think, notwithstanding the high authority of Mellish, L.J., that that case may, at some time hereafter, require consideration by a higher tribunal, and in this view I have the entire concurrence of the Lord Chief Justice. But, even assuming that exception to exist, does it apply to the present case? What is the condition of things if the illegal purpose has been carried out in a material part? In the present case the contract was not to appear at the public examination, as well as not to oppose the order of discharge. The first part has been performed, though the last remains still unperformed. Can it be contended that, if the illegal contract had been carried out in part, the money can still be recovered because part remains to be performed? In my judgment it cannot. Suppose A. pays B. £100 on a contract that B. shall murder C. and D. B. murders C. but not D. Surely it cannot be said that A. can recover back the £100.

I hold, therefore, that, where there has been a partial performance of an illegal purpose in a substantial manner, it is impossible to recover the money paid under the illegal contract, although part still remains unperformed. We have been pressed with the observations of the Master of the Rolls in Herman v. Jeuchner, and it was said that he had laid down that, as long as any part of the contract remained imperfectly performed, the money could be recovered. I do not think that his language will bear that construction, and in that case the court were of opinion that the contract had been fully performed. Whatever the construction of his words may be, I have his authority for stating that he concurs in the views I have now expressed. The appeal, therefore, in our opinion, fails, and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Divorce — Practice — Suit for nullity of marriage — Alleged insanity of wife — Insanity disputed — Appointment of guardian ad litem—Divorce and Matrimonial Rules and Regulations, r. 196.

An order ought not to be made, under rule 196 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Rules, appointing a guardian ad litem to a person alleged to be of unsound mind where there is a substantial and bonâ fide dispute whether such person is or is not of unsound mind.

Order of Butt, J. (15 P. D. 25), affirmed.

Semble (per Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), that the power given by rule 196 to appoint a guardian ad litem to a person of unsound mind is only exercisable where such person has been so found by inquisition.

Appeal from Butt, J.

Mr. Fry married Mrs. Routh in June, 1889. In November following, E. Stanley Routh, a son of Mrs. Fry by her former marriage, obtained an order from the registrar, under rule 196 of the Rules and Regulations in Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, appointing him his mother's guardian ad litem for the purpose of promoting a suit to declare her marriage with Mr. Fry null and void, on the ground that she was insane at the time it was solemnized.

In December, 1889, Mrs. Fry applied to discharge that order, adducing evidence of her sanity.

Rule 196 is as follows:—"A committee duly appointed of a person found by inquisition to be of unsound mind may take out a citation and prosecute a suit on behalf of such person as a petitioner, or enter an appearance, intervene, or proceed with the defence on behalf of such person as a respondent; but if no committee should have been appointed, application is to be made to one of the registrars, who will assign a guardian to the person of unsound mind for the purpose of prosecuting, intervening in, or defending the suit on his or her behalf: provided that if the opposite party is already before the court when the application for the assignment of a guardian is made, he or she shall be served with notice by summons of such application."

Butt, J., discharged the registrar's order, on the ground that such an order ought not to be made where there is a bonâ fide and substantial dispute as to the sanity of the party.

E. S. Routh appealed.

Willis, Q.C., and Searle, for the appellant.—The petitioner alleges that the lady was of unsound mind, and consequently incapable of contracting a marriage. The present question arises under rule 196 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Rules and Regulations. It is contended against us that rule 196, so far as it gives power to appoint a guardian ad litem to a party of unsound mind, does not apply until the party has been found a lunatic by inquisition. [COTTON, L.J.—My impression is that the rule does apply to a case where there has been no inquisition, but not to a case where the lunacy is disputed. LOPES, L.J.—I cannot help thinking that the inquisition is a condition precedent to the appointment of a guardian under the rule.] In Hancock v. Peaty, 15 W. R. 719, L. R. 1 P. & D. 335, the case was tried with only a guardian ad litem, though the sanity was in question. The jurisdiction of the court cannot be ousted by the mere allegation of the lady that she was sane. Her sanity is a question to be determined by the court. It cannot, surely, be necessary to have an inquisition in every case in order to stop or avoid the marriage of a person of unsound mind not so found. This lady is so insane that she is in the habit of sending food and wine to her son's grave in the cemetery. It would be very inconvenient if no one could get a decree of nullity without an inquisition. There had been none held in Lord Durham's case, 10 P. D. 80, 33 W. R. Dig. 96; Cannon v. Smalley, 10 P. D. 96, 33 W. R. Dig. 96; or Hunter v. Edney, otherwise Hunter, 10 P. D. 93, 33 W. R. Dig. 96. The present question is whether the lady is insane now, not whether she was insane at the time of the marriage, and if the court is not satisfied with the affidavit evidence there ought to be some means of deciding it without having an inquisition.

They also referred to Mordaunt v. Mordaunt, 18 W. R. 845, 20 Ibid. 553, L. R. 2 P. & D. 109, 382.

Reid, Q.C., and Middleton, for the wife, and Inderwick, Q.C., and Bargrave Deane, for the husband, were not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal against an order of Butt, J., discharging an ex parte order of the registrar appointing a guardian ad litem to a lady alleged to be of unsound mind, and who had not long been married. I will not give any opinion as to whether she was of unsound mind at the date of her marriage, or whether she is so now, because I shall not base my decision on any such considerations. In my opinion an order of this kind, under rule 196, ought not to be made where there is a bonâ fide dispute at the time of the application as to the insanity of the party. The question is, whether the court shall give someone else the conduct of the suit, on the ground that the person who wishes to have the conduct of it says that this lady cannot act for herself because she is of unsound mind. In my opinion the court ought not to do so where there is an honest and substantial dispute whether she is now, or was at the time the order was made, of unsound mind. I am not at present inclined to assent to the view of Lopes, L.J., that an inquisition must have been held before a guardian can be appointed under this order. As the rule applies to parties defending as well as to parties petitioning, it might occasion serious inconvenience to hold that where a person of unsound mind is defending, no defence can be put in till such person has been found lunatic by inquisition. But where there is a bonâ fide dispute as to the insanity, I do not think a guardian ought to be appointed. In my opinion there is an honest and substantial question raised in the present case as to whether this lady is not now of sound mind, though I say nothing as to what she was at the time of the marriage. I think, therefore, the order made by Butt, J., discharging the order of the registrar, was right, not on the ground that the registrar was wrong upon the materials before him, but on the ground that the evidence before the judge showed that the case was not one in which it was right to make such an order.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case an ex parte order was obtained from a registrar appointing a guardian ad litem to a married woman, the object being to enable him to present a petition in her name to have her marriage declared void, on the ground that she was of unsound mind at the time of its solemnization. She denies that she is of unsound mind, and brings medical evidence of considerable weight to support her denial. It would be monstrous that a self-appointed guardian—that is, one appointed ex parte—should be allowed to go on with such a petition when a defence of that nature is put forward. What ought to be done, in my opinion, is to let Mr. Routh get an inquisition, if he pleases, and then, if the lady is found lunatic, her committee can petition; but if no committee is appointed, a guardian can be appointed for the purpose of petitioning.

Upon the true construction of rule 196 I am bound to say I think an inquisition must have been held before a guardian under the rule can be appointed. But I desire to base my decision, not on that ground, but on the ground that, even assuming the rule to be applicable where the party has not been found lunatic by inquisition, a guardian ought not to be appointed under it where there is a bonâ fide and substantial question whether the party is of unsound mind at the time.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of opinion that this order of the registrar should be rescinded, and that Butt, J., was right, on two grounds, in rescinding it:—First, on the ground that the rule does not apply to the case of a party who has not been found lunatic by inquisition; and, secondly, on the ground that even if it does so apply, an order ought not to be made under it where there is a bonâ fide dispute as to the insanity of the party. The first point arises on the construction of rule 196, and I entertain a confident opinion that that rule is only applicable where an inquisition has been held and the party has been found of unsound mind. That I firmly believe was the intention of those who framed this rule. Then, if a committee is appointed after the inquisition, he is the proper person to petition or defend; but if a committee has not been appointed to the person so found by inquisition to be of unsound mind (for that, I think, is the reasonable way of reading the rule) then a guardian ad litem may be appointed. I do not think it was intended that the question of insanity should be discussed before the judge or before the registrar. It is true that the rule is in one way an enabling rule, as it enables a guardian ad litem to be appointed, but on the other hand, while it is enabling, it is also restrictive in this way, that it only gives the conduct of the suit to another person on strong and firm evidence that the party is unfit to have the conduct of it herself. It is not, therefore, to be construed so liberally as if it were a purely enabling rule.

With regard to the second point, assuming that the rule is applicable to cases where there has been no inquisition, I agree with the rest of the court that a guardian ought not to be appointed under it where there is a bonâ fide dispute as to the sanity of the party.

I think, therefore, the order of Butt, J., was right.

Francis v. Bruce. (a.)

Promissory note — Renunciation — Note payable on demand—Maturity—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 62, 89.

A testator, having lent a niece £2,000, secured by a promissory note payable on demand, made a codicil to his will, by which he had bequeathed to her a sum of £6,000, and recited the existence of the loan, which he wished to be considered an advance on account of the legacy of £6,000, and directed that, if the sum of £2,000 should be due and owing at his death, such moneys should be deducted from the said legacy, and that the said legacy should be reduced accordingly, in satisfaction of the moneys due. About two hours before his death he expressed a desire to destroy the promissory note and to forgive the debt. The note could not then be found, and a stranger present wrote a memorandum of his wishes, which was not signed by him.

Held, that there was no absolute and unconditional renunciation in writing under the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 62. A promissory note payable on demand is at maturity as soon as made.

Norton v. Ellam, 2 M. & W. 461, followed.

By his will, dated the 6th of July, 1887, Thomas Wellington George appointed W. Bruce, A. Kershaw Francis, and R. G. Brook, the defendants, executors thereof. Among other legacies he bequeathed to his niece, the plaintiff M. A. Francis (or her children, in the event of her predeceasing him, which did not happen), the sum of £6,000.

By a codicil, also dated the 6th of July, 1887, after reciting that by his will he had bequeathed to the plaintiff the before-mentioned legacy of £6,000, and reciting that he had lent to the plaintiff the sum of £2,000, which he wished to be considered as an advance on account of the legacy of £6,000, he continued:—"Now I hereby declare that if, at my decease, the said sum of £2,000, or any part thereof, or any interest thereon, shall be due and owing from the said Margaret Anne Francis or her representatives to me, then and in such case all moneys due to me as aforesaid shall be deducted from the said legacy of £6,000 which I have by my said will bequeathed to or for the benefit of the said Margaret Anne Francis and her children. And I direct that in such case the said legacy shall be reduced accordingly in satisfaction of the moneys due to me as aforesaid."

The sum of £2,000 referred to in the said codicil was lent to the plaintiff by the testator on the 6th of September, 1886, and a promissory note payable on demand, for that amount, together with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the date thereof, was signed by the plaintiff.

On the 30th of August, 1889, the testator, two or three hours before his death, directed the promissory note to be brought to him that he might destroy it. Search was made, but the note could not be found. The testator then declared that he wished to give the £2,000 to the plaintiff, and to forgive her the debt. He also said that he wished the note to be destroyed, and the following memorandum of his intentions and wishes was written down at the time at his instance:—

"30th August, 1889.—It is by Mr. George's dying wish that the cheque (sic) for two thousand pounds money lent to Mrs. and Mr. Francis be destroyed as soon as found. Mr. George is perfectly conscious and in his sound mind.—(Signed) Nurse Travers."

The testator died on the 30th of August, 1889, and his will and codicil were duly proved by all the defendants.

The promissory note was found shortly after his death by two of the defendants in a safe in the testator's house.

On the 8th of January, 1890, the plaintiff took out an originating summons asking for a determination of the following questions: (1) Whether, in the events which had happened, the sum of £2,000 mentioned in the codicil was owing at the decease of the testator, and whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to the payment in full of the legacy of £6,000? (2) Whether, if the court should be of opinion that the sum of £2,000 was not owing, the plaintiff was chargeable with the apportioned interest up to the time of the determination of the indebtedness?

Romer, Q.C., Upjohn, and J. Bolt, for the plaintiff.—This is not a donatio mortis causâ, nor is it a revocation of the codicil, but a renunciation of the debt. Before the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, a simple contract might before breach be waived or discharged without a deed, and without consideration; after breach, by deed, or for consideration. Bills of exchange were exceptions to the general rule, and could be waived by parol: Byles on Bills, 11th ed., p. 6. Promissory notes are and were on the same footing as bills of exchange: Foster v. Dawber, 6 Ex. 851, Byles on Bills, 11th ed., p. 196, 14th ed., p. 265. By section 62 of the Act of 1882 renunciation must be in writing. Section 89 makes (with the necessary modifications) the Act applicable to promissory notes. In this case the renunciation was not signed by George, but that does not affect its validity; section 62 does not say "signed," but only "in writing," and the nurse was his amanuensis. Besides, the words in section 62 are "at or after its maturity": this note, being "upon demand," was never really "at maturity," for a sum payable upon demand is not mature until a demand is made. [Chitty, J.—It seems clear that a promissory note payable on demand is a present debt, increasing day by day with interest: Rumball v. Ball, 10 Mod. 38; Collins v. Benning, 12 Mod. 444; Norton v. Ellam, 2 M. & W. 461; Garden v. Bruce, 16 W. R. 366, L. R. 3 C. P. 300. Days of grace are not allowed on a bill payable on demand: Christie v. Fonsick, Selwyn N. P. 13th ed., 301.] [Byrne, Q.C., referred to Capp v. Lancaster, Cro. Eliz. 548.] There is writing enough to satisfy the statute, but the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of the testator's intentions on the ground also that, if the writing is not sufficient, there was the clear intention to deliver up the note "to the acceptor." The plaintiff is in that position, and the actual delivery up was only prevented by the fact that the note could not be found at that moment. The intention was final, it was his dying wish.

Byrne, Q.C., and J. W. Dunning, for the defendants.—Section 62 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, covers the case. There was no renunciation in writing, the writing by the nurse was a mere note of what had been said. The intention so expressed is without value if there was no actual delivery up. [CHITTY, J.—The intention of destroying is not sufficient.] The testator could have altered his expressed intention at any time before his death, he had a locus penitentiæ. [CHITTY, J.—I do not want to hear any argument as to the note being at maturity.] Had George even signed the writing himself it would not have prevented his revocation of such writing, that would not have been final.

Romer, Q.C., in reply.

CHITTY, J.—The testator has bequeathed to the plaintiff a legacy of £2,000, which he wished to be considered as an advance. This is clear from the terms of the codicil. The question is, was the promissory note discharged or not discharged in the lifetime of the testator. The promissory note, which was dated September, 1886, is a promissory note to pay on demand the sum of £2,000. It has been argued for the plaintiff that, this being a promissory note, payable on demand, it did not come to maturity until a demand was made, and the debt at common law could be waived by parol, and that section 62 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, which made an alteration in the law, does not apply to the waiver of a bill or note before maturity. Section 89 of the Act makes the provisions of the statute apply to promissory notes, with the necessary modifications, and the section in question, section 62 (1), runs as follows:—"When the holder of a bill at or after its maturity absolutely and unconditionally renounces his rights against the acceptor the bill is discharged. The renunciation must be in writing, unless the bill is delivered up to the acceptor." The first point is simply this, when is a bill or note payable on demand at maturity. This has often been considered, but not perhaps just in the present form. I select one case, which seems to be the most direct in point: Norton v. Ellam. In that case the note was in this form, "I promise to pay £400 on demand, with lawful interest"; and the question was whether the Statute of Limitations ran from the date of the note or the time of the demand. Baron Parke said (at p. 464), "It is quite clear that a promissory note, payable on demand, is a present debt, and is payable without any demand, and the statute begins to run from the date of it."

Therefore the result is that I must hold in this case that the note was mature when made, and falls within section 62 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The second point is, was there a renunciation in writing within the same section, which I have read. I entertain no doubt as to the truthfulness and integrity of the witnesses, and I am satisfied that the testator intended to discharge the note, and to forgive the debt, for it is clear to my mind that he would have destroyed it had he had it in his possession at that particular moment. I must, however, be on my guard not to allow my sympathy for the plaintiff to influence me in giving my decision, for the question whether the note was actually discharged depends upon whether or not the provisions of the Act have been complied with. It is plain that the note was not delivered up to the maker, so the point is, was there a renunciation in writing. It is clear that what must be in writing must be an absolute and unconditional renunciation. That must be the effect of the document, which must not be a mere note of the intention, but must be the record itself of the renunciation. I am not called upon to say whether or no a signature is necessary to make a renunciation valid. That I leave wholly in doubt, and the section says nothing about it. I now take the written document, and compare it with the evidence of the nurse. The note could not be found, in spite of the search instituted by the directions of the testator, and taking the evidence as to what exactly occurred, it amounts to this, that the testator intended to destroy the note, and the memorandum of the nurse was meant to be evidence of his intention. It was an authority to those concerned to destroy the note if it could be found in his lifetime, but is that an absolute and unconditional renunciation in writing. Mr. Romer's argument on this point was shortly this, it was a final direction to immediately destroy the note, and that it was therefore an absolute and unconditional renunciation by the testator, who used the nurse as his amanuensis. But the real question is, is a written direction to destroy a note as soon as found an absolute and unconditional renunciation? I assume, in favour of the plaintiff, that this is a writing by the testator, and a record of intention, but could not the testator have revoked this intention if he had changed his mind before the note was destroyed. He could, I think I am bound to say, have done so, and I hold, therefore, that the document was not an absolute and unconditional renunciation. I hold that any sum due under the promissory note at the death of testator is still owing. The costs of all parties will come out of the residuary estate.

OLIVER v. HUNTING. (a.)

Contract—Statute of Frauds—What is sufficient memorandum—Parol evidence to connect two documents, when admitted—Specific performance.

H. signed a memorandum of agreement between him and O. for the sale by him to O. of a freehold property for £2,375. The memorandum contained all the terms of the contract, except stating what was the property agreed to be sold. Two days later O. sent to H. a cheque for £375 as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase-money of £2,375. H. answered by letter as follows:—"I beg to acknowledge receipt of cheque value £375 on account of the purchase-money for the F. Estate."

Held, that the circumstances under which the letter was written might be explained by parol evidence; and, as such evidence undoubtedly showed a connection between the letter and the memorandum, the two documents might be read together, and together constituted a sufficient memorandum under the Statute of Frauds.

Trial of action.

The plaintiff, Emma Oliver, a married woman possessing separate estate, in August, 1888, entered into negotiations with the defendant Hunting for the purchase of a freehold property known as the Fletton Manor House Estate. As the result of such negotiations she agreed to purchase it for the sum of £2,375, and on the 7th of September, 1888, Mr. Hunting signed and sent to Mrs. Oliver a document in the following terms: "Memorandum of terms of agreement between Mr. Hunting and Mrs. Oliver. Price £2,375. Vendor to make good title. Purchaser to pay for her own conveyance. Fixtures included in purchase. Purchase to be settled as soon as possible. Possession on 25th of September. Deposit to be paid on the 10th."

(a.) Reported by C. HERBERT BROWN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

On the 12th of September, 1888, Mr. Hunting wrote and sent to Mrs. Oliver a letter in the following terms (omitting formal parts): "I beg to acknowledge receipt of cheque value £375 on account of the purchase-money for the Fletton Manor House Estate."

Mr. Hunting refused to complete the purchase, whereupon Mrs. Oliver commenced proceedings against him, claiming specific performance of the agreement of the 7th of September, 1888. In her statement of claim she alleged that the sum of £375 was paid by her on the 10th of September, 1888, in pursuance of the said agreement, as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase-money, and submitted that the memorandum of the 7th of September and the letter of the 12th of September, 1888, formed a valid contract binding under the Statute of Frauds. It appeared from the evidence that no other money than the £375, part of the £2,375 was payable by her to the defendant, as the balance, £2,000, was to be paid to a mortgagee of the estate. The £2,000 was to be found for the plaintiff by her solicitor.

Neville, Q.C., and Dunning, for the plaintiff.—The two documents show an agreement to purchase, and parol evidence is admissible to show what that agreement was. The agreement is proved to be none other than that contained in the two documents, which together constitute a sufficient memorandum within the Statute of Frauds.

They referred to Baumann v. James, 16 W. R. 877, L. R. 3 Ch. 508; Cave v. Hastings, 7 Q. B. D. 125, 29 W. R. Dig. 92; Studds v. Watson, 33 W. R. 118, 28 Ch D. 305; Long v. Millar, 27 W. R. 720, 4 C. P. D. 450; Ridgway v. Wharton, 5 W. R. 804, 6 H. L. Cas. 238.

Warmington, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the defendant.—The memorandum must contain all the terms of the agreement, and there must be a connection between all the documents, if more than one. Parol evidence is admissible only to explain an ambiguity, but not to connect documents which have not on the face of them any connection with each other. In this case there is no ambiguity.

They referred to Warner v. Willington, 4 W. R. 531, 3 Drewry, 523; Boydell v. Drummond, 11 East, 142.

KEKEWICH, J.—There can be no doubt about the elementary proposition that the memorandum to be signed by the party sought to be charged need not, in order to bring the case within the Statute of Frauds, be on one piece of paper, nor a complete document signed by the party at one and the same time. It may be contained in two or more documents, but they must be so connected that they can be read together so as to form one memorandum of the contract between the parties. Directly you go beyond that you get into difficulty. The old rule was different from the present rule. I take it from the original edition of Lord Blackburn on the Contract of Sale, cited by Williams, J., in North Staffordshire Railway Co. v. Peek, 8 W. R., at p. 366, E. B. & E., at p. 1001, where, after referring to Hinde v. Whitehouse, 7 East, 558, and Kenworthy v. Schofield, 2 B. & C. 945, he says:—"The principle of these cases seems to me to be well stated in the same work by my brother Blackburn, as follows: 'If the contents of the signed paper themselves make reference to the others so as to show by internal evidence that the papers refer to each other, they may be all taken together as one memorandum in writing; but if it is necessary, in order to connect them, to give evidence of the intention of the parties that they should be connected, shown by circumstances not apparent on the face of the writings, the memorandum is not all in writing, for it consists partly of the contents of the writings and partly of the expression of an intention to unite them, and that expression is not in writing.'" The old case of Boydell v. Drummond and some others may be consistent with that rule; but of late a different rule has been introduced; and it is one consistent with the convenience of mankind because if you were to exclude parol evidence to explain a doubtful reference the result might, in many cases, be to work injustice. Now it seems to me that in a case of that kind you may give parol evidence to show what the document referred to was. And I take it that you may go further than that, and if you find a reference to something which may be a conversation or may be a written document, you may give evidence to show whether it was a conversation or a written document, and, having proved that it was a written document, you may put that written document in evidence and so connect it with the one already admitted or proved. So far there is no difficulty: Ridgway v. Wharton.

The later cases have gone further than that; and Long v. Millar, followed in Cave v. Hastings, does establish a large series of exceptions. In Long v. Millar Bramwell, L.J., gives an illustration which seems to me to go to the root of the matter. He says:—"Suppose that A. writes to B. saying that he will give £1,000 for B.'s estate, and at the same time states the terms in detail, and suppose that B. simply writes back in return, 'I accept your offer.' In that case there may be an identification of the documents by parol evidence, and it may be shown that the offer alluded to by B. is that made by A. without infringing the Statute of Frauds, s. 4, which requires a note or memorandum in writing." If that is sound, which I take it to be according to other cases, it is difficult to say where parol evidence is to stop; but, substantially, it never stops short of this, that wherever parol evidence is required to connect two written documents together, parol evidence is admissible. You are entitled to rely on a written document which requires explanation. I think that the principle upon which parol evidence of this kind is admitted is, that you are always entitled, with regard to the construction and meaning of a written document, to inquire into the circumstances under which it was written, not to find an interpretation by the writer, but to ascertain from the surrounding facts and circumstances with what intent, and with reference to what, it must have been written.

Turning to the case before me, I find a letter of the 12th of September, 1888:—[His lordship read the letter.] There are two things here perfectly clear—namely, first, that there is a property called the Fletton Manor House Estate, the subject of a purchase, and therefore of a sale; and, secondly, that £375 is part of the purchase-money for that house. Beyond that I have no terms of a contract. This being so, I am entitled to consider the circumstances under which the letter was written, not to add terms to it, but to ascertain what its meaning must be, having regard to the facts and circumstances; and having got the evidence which I have in this case, I conclude that it certainly refers to a previous memorandum of terms of agreement under which Mrs. Oliver becomes the purchaser of this property for £2,375, on account of which the cheque for £375 was sent. Having thus got in evidence sufficient to establish the connection between the two documents, and being, therefore, entitled to read them together, I have a distinct memorandum of contract specifying all the terms, the second document supplying what the first, curiously enough, omitted—namely, the property intended to be purchased and sold. The objection, therefore, that there is no memorandum within the Statute of Frauds, fails.

Under these circumstances I think that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for specific performance, and, of course, to the costs of the action.

CRANE v. LAWRENCE. (a.)

Adulteration of food—Margarine—Exposure for sale—Margarine Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 29), s. 6.

Section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887, enacts that "if such margarine be exposed for sale by retail, there shall be attached to each parcel thereof so exposed, and in such manner as to be clearly visible to the purchaser, a label marked in printed capital letters, not less than one and a half inches square, 'Margarine.'"

Where a customer asking for margarine had been served from a parcel of margarine then in the shop and unlabelled but which was placed behind a screen so as not to be visible to customers,

Held, that such margarine was not "exposed" for sale within the meaning of the above section, because it was not exposed in the shop so as to be visible to customers and so as to induce them to buy it without knowing that it was margarine; and, accordingly, that a summons against the vendor for exposing it for sale without a label, contrary to the provisions of the above section, had been rightly dismissed by the magistrate.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate under provisions of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49.

The respondent was summoned before the magistrate for unlawfully exposing for sale by retail a parcel of margarine, there not then being attached to such parcel so exposed a label marked "Margarine," contrary to sections 4, 6, and 7 of the Margarine Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 29). Upon hearing the evidence the magistrate dismissed the summons, but agreed to grant a case under the Act above referred to. The case stated, so far as material, was as follows:—

1. The appellant is an inspector appointed by the vestry of St. Mary's, Battersea, for the purpose of enforcing the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and the Margarine Act, 1887.

2. The respondent carries on business as a retail dealer in butter, margarine, and other things at his shop in the parish of Battersea.

3. On the 24th of January, 1890, the appellant entered the respondent's shop and asked the respondent's wife, who was then in charge, to serve him with half a pound of margarine.

4. She complied, cutting the portion required from a parcel of margarine which was then in the shop, and placing such portion in a paper wrapper upon which was printed the word "Margarine" in all respects as required by the Act.

5. This parcel of margarine from which the half pound was taken is the parcel with reference to which the alleged offence was committed. At the time of the purchase it was placed on the counter behind a screen similar to those used in butter shops for the purpose of the butter, &c., being prepared for sale. Before making the purchase the appellant did not see, nor could he see, the parcel of margarine from the side of the counter on which he stood, nor was it open to the view of any of the customers, unless they went behind the counter, where they were not, in fact, allowed to go.

6. The parcel was not in any case or package, and no label or mark of any kind was upon it to indicate that it was margarine; and it was obvious that, even if such label had been upon it, it could not have been seen by the customers so long as they remained upon their side of the counter.

7. There was no evidence that the parcel was placed behind the screen for the purpose of evading the Act or except in the ordinary way of business.

8. On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the respondent had by placing the parcel of margarine in his shop for the purpose of being forthwith sold by retail exposed the same for sale by retail.

9. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that inasmuch as the said parcel of margarine was not, and would not, and could not be seen by customers or other persons using the shop unless they went behind the counter, the same was not exposed for sale.

The magistrate was of opinion that to constitute exposure for sale, the margarine should be in a position in which it could be seen by customers standing in their usual place in the shop, and he accordingly dismissed the summons.

The inspector appealed.

Earle, for the appellant. — The having the margarine upon the premises for sale, constituted exposing it for sale within the meaning of the section.—Section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887, runs as follows:—"Every person dealing in margarine in the manner described in the preceding section shall conform to the following regulations: Every package, whether open or closed, and containing margarine, shall be branded or durably marked 'Margarine' on the top, bottom, and sides, in printed capital letters, not less than three-quarters of an inch square; and if such margarine be exposed for sale by retail, there shall be attached to each parcel thereof so exposed, and in such manner as to be clearly visible to the purchaser, a label marked, in printed capital letters not less than one and a half inches square, 'Margarine,' and every person selling margarine by retail, save in a package durably branded or durably marked as aforesaid, shall in every case deliver the same to the purchaser in or with a paper wrapper, on which shall be printed in capital letters, not less than a quarter of an inch square, 'Margarine.'"

No one appeared for the respondent.

CAVE, J.—I think that the objection raised by the appellant in this case cannot be sustained. The Act is a penal one, and as such must be construed strictly in reference to the conduct which shall expose the subject to penalties under it. The words "exposed for sale" are the vital words in this application. It is obvious the word "exposed" may have differing meanings under different circumstances. A thing may be exposed to the air or water, or it may be exposed to view. Here it implies that the article in question, margarine, is to be so exposed to the view of customers in the shop that they may have the opportunity of refusing to take it instead of butter. This is explained by the words "in such manner as to be clearly visible to the purchaser." These words apply to the label to be attached, but beyond question they interpret also the meaning of the word "exposed"—namely, as being "visible to the purchaser." To hold the contrary would be to put an unnatural meaning on the word, which we ought not to do. Merely having a stock of margarine for sale kept upon the premises, or even behind the counter in a place where it is not visible to customers, is not exposing it for sale within the meaning of this section, all the provisions of which apply to prevent the case of margarine being left without a label visible to a customer, so that he might point to it and say he would have a pound or half-a-pound of it without knowing what it really was. A dealer might not have room for a stock of margarine in his shop, and might keep it in a cellar where no customer could see it. Could it be said that it was nevertheless "exposed for sale," and must be labelled or kept in a marked cask? The meaning of this section is that if the stuff is exposed in a shop for sale so as to induce persons coming into, or looking into, the shop to buy, the brand or mark or label must be such, as to show to such persons what the stuff really is.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I think the magistrate was right. The labelling of the article only comes into play where it is exposed for sale, and it is exposed for sale when it is exposed so as to be visible to customers in the shop. Either the margarine is exposed for sale by being kept in the marked casks in the shop, or, if taken out of these casks, and exposed in the shop so as to be visible to customers, it must be labelled, so that it may be clearly shown to be what it is.

Appeal dismissed.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN GALLOP AND THE CENTRAL QUEENSLAND MEAT EXPORT CO. (a.)

Practice — Award — Application to set aside—Time—Ord. 64, r. 14.

A notice of motion to set aside the award of an arbitrator is an "application" within the meaning of ord. 64, r. 14, and is in time if given before the last day of the sittings next after such award has been made and published, although the motion cannot be heard until after the expiration of those sittings.

In re Corporation of Huddersfield and Jacomb, 23 W. R. 100, L. R. 10 Ch. 92, and Smith v. Parkside Mining Co., 29 W. R. 154, 6 Q. B. D. 67, followed.

Motion to set aside an award.

The award of the arbitrator was made and published to the parties on the 27th of February, during the Hilary Sittings. Notice of motion to set aside the award was given by the company to Gallop on the 20th of May for the 23rd of May, which was the last day of the Easter Sittings. On the 23rd of May the motion was not in the paper for hearing, but application was made to the court on behalf of the company for an extension of the time for making the application. The court granted the application, but subject to any objection which might be raised at the hearing.

On the motion coming on for hearing on the 9th of June,

Vennell, for Gallop, objected that it was out of time.—By ord. 64, r. 14, "an application to set aside an award may be made at any time before the last day of the sittings next after such award has been made and published to the parties." That means that the motion itself must come on for hearing before the last day of such sittings.

Pollard, for the company.—It is sufficient if the notice of motion is given within the prescribed time: Smith v. Parkside Mining Co., 29 W. R. 154, 6 Q. B. D. 67, and In re Corporation of Huddersfield v. Jacomb, 23 W. R. 100, L. R. 10 Ch. 92.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

DENMAN, J.—I think that this application was made in time. On the 20th of May, which day was within the time prescribed by ord. 64, r. 14, a notice to set aside the award was given. If that notice was an application under ord. 64, r. 14, it was in time, and the proper step was taken to set the award aside. I think that if the ratio decidendi in Smith v. Parkside Mining Co. and In re Corporation of Huddersfield v. Jacomb, in which the Court of Appeal supported the ruling of Malins, V.C., is to be applied, the notice of motion is the application. The difficulty in adopting this construction is that at first sight it seems inconsistent with ord. 52, r. 1, which provides that "where by these rules any application is authorized to be made to the court or a judge, such application, if made to a divisional court or to a judge in court, shall be made by motion"; from this it would seem that the application and the motion were one. But I think that although this rule says that the application is to be made by motion, it does not mean that the application and the motion are for all purposes the same thing. In my opinion the notice of motion is a sufficient application under ord. 64, r. 14, for the purpose of launching the proceedings. That step is taken in time if taken before the last day of the sittings next after the publication of the award; that step has been taken here and no extension of time is necessary. I will only add, inasmuch as order 64 is relied on to show that the application is out of time, that an extension of time might be granted under rule 7 of that order. But I do not rely on the power of the court to extend the time, for I think upon the construction of the rules, assisted by the decisions under 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, s. 2, that this application is in time and no extension is necessary.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

The motion was then heard on the merits, and ultimately remitted to the arbitrators.

Appeal from the Brompton County Court.

The action was for assault. The defence set up was that the plaintiff had obtained a summons against the defendant for the same assault, and that the complaint had been dismissed and a certificate of dismissal granted to the defendant under section 44 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, which certificate it was said was (by virtue of section 45) a bar to further proceedings.

It appeared that the plaintiff, after obtaining the summons, had given notice in writing to the defendant that he did not intend to proceed with the charge, and accordingly on the day appointed for the hearing he did not attend or offer evidence. The defendant appeared and made a statement to the magistrate, who dismissed the complaint and granted a certificate of dismissal. The county court judge held that there had been no hearing upon the merits, and that the certificate was granted without jurisdiction and was no bar to the action. The jury awarded damages to the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

Horace Avory, for the appellant.—The summons being dismissed the defendant had a right to the certificate of dismissal. He ought not to be prejudiced by the non-appearance of the complainant. [He was stopped by the court.]

John Rawlinson, for the respondent.—The certificate was altogether bad. The magistrate had no jurisdiction to grant it except after a hearing "upon the merits." Those words are important; they are expressly inserted in this section although they are not to be found in the corresponding section of the earlier Act: 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27. Here there was no sworn evidence, and therefore no hearing on the merits, and the magistrate, although he could dismiss the complaint, could not grant the certificate: Nicholson v. Booth, 57 L. J. M. C. 43, 36 W. R. Dig. 107. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—At common law could there be an action for damages after a summons had been issued? Is not that contrary to the maxim Nemo pro eadem causa bis vexari debet?] Yet in many cases it has been held necessary to obtain a conviction before a civil action can be maintained: Wellock v. Constantine, 2 H. & C. 146, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 7; Wells v. Abrahams, 20 W. R. 659, L. R. 7 Q. B. 554; Ex parte Ball, 27 W. R. 566, 10 Ch. D. 667, per Baggallay, L.J., at p. 674. If the criminal proceedings were a bar to the action by the common law this enactment would not have been required.

Avory, in reply.—The county court judge had no jurisdiction to go behind the certificate and inquire into the circumstances under which it was granted. It is admitted that the magistrate had power to dismiss the complaint; that done, the granting of the certificate was merely a ministerial act, and one which the accused person had a right to demand.

He cited Hancock v. Somes, 7 W. R. 422, and R. v. The Justices of Wiltshire, 8 L. T. N. S. 242.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 28.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The action was one to recover damages for an assault; the assault was disputed by the defendant, but was found by the jury to have been committed. The defendant put forward as a defence to the action a certificate given by a magistrate under the provisions of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 44, and the county court judge received evidence, apparently without objection, as to the circumstances under which the certificate was granted. It appeared that the plaintiff had originally laid an information for the same assault, and had obtained a summons against the defendant, but that, before the summons case on for hearing, the plaintiff had given the defendant notice that he did not intend to proceed with it. The defendant did what had been done under a previous statute—he went before the magistrate and stated his case to him, and asked for a certificate of dismissal of the summons. This the magistrate gave him, and the question for us is whether it was competent for him to do so. That he had jurisdiction to dismiss the summons is not denied; but he also gave the certificate of dismissal; and we have to say, firstly, whether he had any jurisdiction to give that certificate; and, secondly, whether, if he had no such jurisdiction: the county court judge was entitled to go into the circumstances under which it was given with a view of deciding whether the magistrate was right in holding that the case came within the purview and operation of the statute.

The first question depends on the construction of the statute, which is not a mere consolidation Act, but has made sundry alterations in the law contained in former Acts of Parliament relating to criminal law. The language of section 27 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, is less precise than that of the section under consideration. It says that "upon the hearing" of a case of assault the justices are in certain circumstances to dismiss the complaint, and to give a certificate of dismissal to the party against whom the complaint is made; and upon that section and those words two cases were decided.

In Tunnicliffe v. Tedd, 5 C. B. 553, the circumstances were substantially the same as in the present case. An information was laid and a summons obtained for an assault; but upon the case being called, and the defendant pleading not guilty, the prosecutor declined to offer any evidence or proceed further with the information, and thereupon, although no evidence had been given, the justices, upon the defendant's application, granted him a certificate of dismissal. An action having been brought for the same assault, the Court of Common Pleas held that what passed before the justices constituted a hearing under section 27, and was therefore, under section 28, a complete bar to the action. That appears to me rather a technical and strict interpretation of the section; but the decision was approved in Vaughton v. Bradshaw, 9 W. R. 120, 9 C. B. N. S. 103, where the facts were on all-fours with those in this case. The prosecutor took out a summons, but before the day of hearing gave notice to the defendant not to attend, and also gave notice to the magistrate's clerk that he (the prosecutor) should not attend. The defendant attended, the summons was dismissed, and a certificate of dismissal granted, notwithstanding the prosecutor's absence: and the Court of Common Pleas held that the certificate was rightly granted, and was a bar to a subsequent action in the county court for the same assault

Coming to the later Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, we find that the language of section 44 is in a very important respect different. It gives a like power to justices to grant a certificate of dismissal, but it is to be exercised "upon the hearing of any such case of assault or battery upon the merits." How are these additional words "upon the merits" to be interpreted? Can we say that the new section which contains them means the same thing as the old section where they were omitted? Speaking for myself, I cannot help thinking that the strict interpretation which had been placed on section 27 of the Act of Geo. 4 had been brought to the attention of the Legislature, and that those words were advisedly inserted, the intention being that if the dispute between the parties were really fought out upon the hearing of the summons and the charge dismissed, the certificate should be given and should bar all further proceedings; but that if the charge were withdrawn, so that there was no real trial, it should be left open to the person who laid the information to be remitted to his common law rights, and to maintain an action for the assault notwithstanding the dismissal of his complaint. If that be so, no certificate of dismissal can be given under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 44, unless the parties are present before the justices, and the case is argued, and is decided, upon the facts, or upon the law applicable to the facts.

In my opinion that is the correct view of the law, and the magistrate had, therefore, no jurisdiction to grant this certificate.

We have also to consider whether the county court judge was entitled to consider the circumstances under which the certificate was given, or whether he was bound by the mere production of the certificate—in other words, whether the only mode of getting rid of the certificate was not by getting it quashed upon certiorari. The point is a technical one. Looking at the two cases which I have already discussed, it seems that in Vaughton v. Bradshaw the county court judge did take evidence of what passed before the justices upon the granting of the certificate; while in Tunnicliffe v. Tedd evidence was received at nisi prius upon the point whether the justices acted within their jurisdiction; and it seems to me that the courts have recognized the right of the court trying such an action for assault to inquire whether the facts are such as to give it jurisdiction to hear the case. I think, therefore, that the county court judge had jurisdiction to inquire whether the certificate was properly given; and as he was right upon both points, this appeal must be dismissed.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I have come reluctantly to the same conclusion. Upon the first point I entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls; it is impossible, without exercising an unreasonable amount of subtlety, to say that the hearing of a case and the hearing of a case upon the merits are the same thing, and to disregard the insertion of those very important words. I think there is a clear difference in meaning between the two sections, and that the later statute requires a more complete and substantial hearing of the charge than the earlier one did, and therefore, although the two cases referred to by the Master of the Rolls were an authority upon the old Act of Parliament, they are no longer an authority, and cannot affect the interpretation of the new Act.

Upon the second point I feel very much more doubt, and I confess that I rather yield to the opinion of the Master of the Rolls than express any clear opinion of my own to the effect that the county court judge had power to go behind the certificate of a magistrate of competent jurisdiction and to inquire whether, in face of the certificate, there was jurisdiction in the magistrate to grant it. I am unable, however, to deny that there have been cases where that has been done, and I do not feel at liberty to differ from the view which has been expressed by the Master of the Rolls.

Appeal dismissed.

"THE CASHMERE." (a.)

County court—Admiralty—Jurisdiction—Appeal—No appeal from interlocutory decree or order without leave—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 26—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120—Costs of witnesses not called—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 50, r. 16.

There is no appeal from any interlocutory decree or order of a county court having admiralty jurisdiction in an admiralty cause without the permission of the judge of the court appealed from, where the decree or order appealed from, is not made at the hearing of the suit.

The 120*th section of the County Courts Act,* 1888, providing for the manner in which, and the conditions subject to which, appeals may be brought from the judgment, direction, or decision of a county court judge where any party is dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, has not given a right of appeal from interlocutory orders made in admiralty actions previous to or after the hearing of the suit.

Semble, ord. 50, r. 16, of the County Court Rules, 1889, directing that "the costs of witnesses, whether they have been examined or not, may, unless otherwise ordered by the judge, be allowed, though they have not been summoned," is not to be construed as authorizing a judge of county courts to order, as a general rule of practice, that in admiralty actions the costs of witnesses not called shall be disallowed, unless it be otherwise ordered by himself.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the county court of Glamorganshire, holden at Cardiff. By the decision appealed from, the judge of the court below had upheld the decision of the registrar of that court, whereby he had, on taxation, disallowed certain items in the plaintiffs' bill of costs in an action of damages instituted on behalf of the Great Northern Steamship Fishing Co. against the owners of the vessel Cashmere.

The following statement of facts was agreed on, for the purposes of the appeal, between the respective solicitors for the plaintiffs and defendants.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

1. The appellants, the plaintiffs, appeal against the decision of the judge of the above-named county court, upholding the decision of the registrar, disallowing certain items in the plaintiffs' costs.

2. This was a suit for damage by collision. Judgment was given for the plaintiffs, with costs. The plaintiffs' solicitors made no application to the judge of the county court on the hearing of the action in respect of the witnesses' costs or allowance of their expenses.

3. The registrar, on taxing the plaintiffs' costs, disallowed the expenses of all the witnesses who were not actually put into the box and examined.

4. The registrar disallowed the expenses on the grounds as certified by him in the following words:—"The practice in this court is, by direction of his Honour, to allow the costs of witnesses called—if it be desired to have witnesses allowed who have not been called, application should be made to the judge for their allowance."

5. The plaintiffs filed objections to the taxation.

6. The plaintiffs appealed against such disallowance to the judge.

7. The judge dismissed the plaintiffs' appeal, with costs, on the ground that no application was made at the trial for the allowance of these witnesses' costs and expenses, and on the ground that it was agreed at the time of the hearing that only two witnesses should be called on each side.

8. The circumstances under which it was agreed that only two witnesses should be called on each side at the trial appear from the affidavit of H. W. Nelson, sworn in support of the appeal to the judge.

9. In the event of the Divisional Court of Appeal deciding in favour of the plaintiffs it is agreed between the parties that the items disallowed by the registrar and named in the plaintiffs' objections are correct, and shall be allowed without any further reference to the registrar.

The affidavit referred to in the above statement of facts stated, inter alia, that six witnesses on behalf of the plaintiffs were in attendance at the hearing of the action; that, in accordance with a suggestion made in court and assented to by the solicitor for the defendants, only two of such witnesses were called; that it was intimated to the court at the time that the remainder of such witnesses were in attendance and could be called if the suggestion to only call two witnesses was not accepted; and that the charges for the proofs of all the witnesses in attendance but not called, and all the expenses of such witnesses, had been disallowed on the ground that such witnesses had not been called.

March 10.—The appeal now came on to be heard before a divisional court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (The President and Butt, J.).

Pyke, on behalf of the respondents, the defendants in the court below, took a preliminary objection that this court had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal; no leave to appeal having been given by the judge of the court below, and the order appealed against, being an interlocutory order against which no appeal lay in the absence of any such leave.—The right of appeal without leave from county courts having admiralty jurisdiction was, by section 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, expressly confined to appeals from the final orders or decrees of such courts, and that section has not been repealed or even modified by the County Courts Act of 1888, which latter Act is, for the most part, merely a consolidation Act, and the 120th section of which does not confer a right of appeal from interlocutory orders any more than the corresponding section of the County Courts Act of 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 14) did.

He referred to Mitchell v. Simpson, 37 W. R. 798, 23 Q. B. D. 373, as showing that where in a consolidation Act an enactment occurs in similar terms to a repealed enactment no greater effect is to be given to the new enactment than was given to the repealed enactment when in force, and to The Conservators of the Thames v. Hall, 16 W. R. 971, L. R. 3 C. P. 415, in support of the principle that a prior enactment having special reference to a particular subject-matter is not impliedly repealed by a subsequent enactment not expressly referring to such subject-matter.

Sir Walter Phillimore, for the appellants, contrd.—The County Courts Act of 1888 is as applicable to admiralty actions in the county courts as to all other actions instituted there, and section 120 of that Act is wide enough to apply to appeals from interlocutory orders, and has impliedly repealed all sections of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, inconsistent with its provisions: Jonas v. Long, 36 W. R. 315, 20 Q. B. D. 564.

After hearing the arguments of counsel on the point of jurisdiction the court intimated that before giving judgment it would hear the appeal de bene esse on the merits. The appeal on the merits was accordingly then argued by the same counsel, the court on the conclusion of the hearing delivering the following judgments:—

HANNEN, P.—Whatever decision we may come to on the preliminary question of jurisdiction, the learned judge of the court below would in future be influenced by the opinion we may express here on the other points of the case. It is from that point of view that I think it necessary, before we give judgment on the preliminary question, to state the opinion we have arrived at upon this appeal, supposing it can be entertained.

It appears that a practice has prevailed in the court below which is the direct opposite to the provisions of ord. 50, r. 16, of the County Court Rules, 1889, a rule which has been framed by the proper authority, and it is obvious that the learned judge has not the right to establish a practice of that kind, and that such a local practice cannot remain as against the general rules laid down by the County Court Rules of 1889. It is plain that the registrar of the county court based his judgment solely upon the local practice which has thus prevailed, and, in our opinion, that was an insufficient reason upon which to base his decision. Then, when the question came on before the judge of the court below, he dismissed the plaintiffs' appeal, with costs, on two grounds, one of which was that "no application was made to him at the trial for these witnesses' expenses." Well, that is a re-assertion of his own local practice as against the general rule by which he ought to have been governed. The other ground put forward in support of the decision appealed against is "that it was agreed at the time of the hearing that only two witnesses should be called on each side." But what has that to do with the question of what costs and what witnesses should be allowed? The parties said, "We will not trouble the court with a great number of witnesses on the one side or the other, and will each be content with two." How does that prove that the parties were not quite right in bringing down other witnesses than those two men whom they called? Therefore, this last ground is no reason at all, and has no bearing on the question in this appeal.

For these reasons, unless we are of opinion that we have no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, we must allow it.

BUTT, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. If witnesses are summoned and brought down to a county court, and their expenses are not to be allowed because they have not been called, it involves this—that a solicitor who has a number of witnesses present, even if his case is substantially proved, will go on calling his witnesses, feeling that if he does not he will not get the costs in respect of such witnesses. That leads to a great waste of time, and is most objectionable, and I think, on that ground, the appeal, if we have jurisdiction to hear it, should be allowed.

We reserve our judgment on the question of jurisdiction.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 28.—The following judgment was delivered on the question of jurisdiction:—

BUTT, J.—This is the case of an appeal from the decision of the judge of the county court of Glamorganshire on a question of costs. The registrar of that court had disallowed the costs of certain witnesses who were in attendance on the trial of the cause, but were not called to give evidence. From that disallowance there was an appeal for a review of that taxation, but the learned judge refused to allow the costs claimed. Thereupon this appeal was brought here, and came before us on the 10th of March last. We came to the conclusion that the learned judge of the court below was wrong in refusing to allow the costs in question, and as the case involved a question of principle my lord thought, and I entirely concurred, that we should then state the opinion that we had then formed on the legal question whether the learned judge had rightly decided, and we did so; but a preliminary objection had been taken by the respondents that there was no jurisdiction in this court to hear an appeal from a decision of the county court judge on a mere question of costs, and upon that preliminary point we reserved our judgment.

The objection taken before us was that the appeal was against an interlocutory order of the county court judge, and that no leave had been obtained from him to appeal; and the 26th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), was relied upon by the respondents as supporting this objection. That section is as follows:—"An appeal may be made to the High Court of Admiralty of England from a final decree or order of the county court, and by permission of the judge of the county court from any interlocutory decree or order therein, on security for costs being first given, and subject to such other provisions as general orders shall direct." As far as that section of that Act of Parliament is concerned it would seem clear that there is no appeal from a decision of a judge of county courts upon such a matter as this without his leave; but then it was said, as I understood the argument, that the County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), alters that, and section 120 of that Act was relied upon. The material part of that section is as follows:—"If any party in any action or matter shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision, or order of the judge may appeal from the same to the High Court in such manner, and subject to such conditions, as may be for the time being provided by the Rules of the Supreme Court regulating the procedure in appeals from inferior courts to the High Court." Then there are certain provisions which it is not necessary to consider for the present purpose.

Now I should have been inclined to think that, inasmuch as the first of the two Acts to which I have referred was an Act having special reference to the admiralty jurisdiction of the county courts, and the later Act was a general county court jurisdiction Act, even if the words of that latter Act would, if they stood alone, in themselves give a right of appeal from interlocutory orders without leave of the judge appealed from, they still would not repeal or alter the provisions of the 26th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868; but whether or not this be the correct view, I am of opinion that the words of the second Act upon which the respondents rely apply to proceedings at the trial and to an appeal from the final judgment of the court below, and have no reference to interlocutory orders at all. And I find that in the case of Carr v. Stringer, E. B. & E. 123, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 31, the Court of Queen's Bench held that the words of the 14th section of the earlier County Courts Act of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, which are almost similar and entirely analogous to the words of the Act of 1888, which I have just read, only gave an appeal in cases of final judgment, and had no reference whatever to the interlocutory orders of a judge. Indeed, this decision would seem to me to be conclusive on the case.

Such are the views I have taken upon considering the Acts referred to, and I am authorized to say that my lord agrees in that view, and therefore our judgment will be that the appeal must be dismissed, but as the appellants really succeeded on the merits of the appeal, we think there should be no costs given.

Patent—Mortgage—Mortgagor suing infringer without joining mortgagee as co-plaintiff—Practice—Patents, &c., Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 23, 46, 85, 87 —R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 11.

The assignee of a patent, whose name was entered on the register of patents as assignee, mortgaged the patent by way of assignment, and the name of the mortgagee was entered on the register as mortgagee.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.). that the mortgagor was entitled, on general equitable principles, to sue for infringement without joining the mortgagee as co-plaintiff, and that there was nothing in the Patents Act, 1883, to disentitle the mortgagor doing so, having regard to the mode in which the entries were made on the register.

Fairclough v. Marshall, 27 W. R. 145, 4 Ex. D. 37, approved.

The practice of the comptroller is, not to register a mortgagee, even though the mortgage be by way of assignment, as assignee of the patent, but as mortgagee only, and this is the correct practice.

Under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 11, the mortgagee may at any time be added as a co-defendant, if it appear to the judge, either of his own motion or on an application in that behalf made by the defendant, that the presence of the mortgagee is necessary for the purposes of justice.

Appeal from the judgment of Kekewich, J., reported 59 L. J. Ch. 292.

The action was for an injunction and damages in respect of an alleged infringement of a patent for improvements in apparatus for separating substances by means of sieves, and in the mode of operating parts of the same. The plaintiff company were assignees of the original patentee, and the name of the plaintiff company was, on February 22, 1886, entered in the register of patents as assignees of the patent by virtue of such assignment, and the deed of assignment itself was duly filed at the Patent Office.

On the same day, February 22, the name of the Halifax Joint-Stock Banking Co. was entered in the register as mortgagees of the patent under a mortgage from the plaintiff company dated December 31, 1885. This mortgage was by way of assignment, subject to redemption, with a proviso that the mortgagor should not be at liberty to grant licences. The names of other mortgagees of the plaintiff company were, at various subsequent dates, entered on the register as mortgagees of the patent, and these mortgages also were by way of assignment. The various mortgage deeds had also been filed at the Patent Office.

Section 87 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, enacts that: "where a person becomes entitled by assignment, transmission, or other operation of law to a patent . . . the comptroller shall, on request, and on proof of title to his satisfaction, cause the name of such person to be entered as proprietor of the patent . . . in the register of patents. . . . The person for the time being entered in the register . . . as proprietor of a patent shall, subject to any rights appearing from such register to be vested in any other person, have power absolutely to assign, grant licences, or to otherwise deal with the same. . . . Provided that any equities in respect of such patent . . . may be enforced in like manner as in respect of any other personal property."

Section 23 of the same Act enacts:—"(1) There shall be kept at the Patent Office a book called the Register of Patents, wherein shall be entered the names and addresses of grantees of patents, notifications of assignments, and of transmissions of patents, . . . and of amendments, extensions, and revocations of patents, and such other matters affecting the validity or proprietorship of patents as may from time to time be prescribed. (2) The Register of Patents shall be primâ facie evidence of any matters by this Act directed or authorized to be inserted therein. (3) Copies of deeds, licences, and any other documents affecting the proprietorship in any letters patent, or in any licence thereunder, must be supplied to the comptroller in the manner prescribed for filing in the Patent Office."

Kekewich, J., at the trial of the action, held that the plaintiff company were not the registered proprietors of the patent, and could not, suing as sole plaintiffs, maintain an action for alleged infringement of the patent without having the mortgagees joined as co-plaintiffs, and, the mortgagees having refused to join as co-plaintiffs, he accordingly dismissed the action.

The plaintiff company appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Bousfield (Aston, Q.C., with them), for the appellant company.—The plaintiff company are mortgagors in possession, and in equity they are the owners of the mortgaged property, subject to the mortgage. Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiff company, as mortgagors, were "strictly fettered owners," and were not in a position to act for themselves so as to assert any rights of ownership. That is contrary to the principles acted on in courts of equity for the last 300 years; it has never, before this case, been held that the fact of the existence of a mortgage disentitles the mortgagor to sue alone for the protection of the mortgaged property. Even if it were necessary, therefore, for the plaintiff company, in order to maintain the action, to bring themselves within the definition of "patentee" given in section 46 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, I submit they have in fact done so. But the Act does not say that only the registered proprietor of a patent can sue for infringement. It is said that the defendants might have to fight the question of validity of the patent in another action brought by the mortgagees if the latter are not joined in this action, but objections as to the validity of a patent can be taken by way of defence only, and the nature of the defence cannot affect the abstract right to sue. One of several co-owners of a patent has a right to sue alone for infringement without joining the other co-owners as plaintiffs: Sheehan v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 29 W. R. 69, 16 Ch. D. 59; Dunnicliff v. Mallett, 8 W. R. 260, 7 C. B. N. S. 209. The case of Fairclough v. Marshall, 27 W. R. 145, 4 Ex. D. 37, decides that a mortgagor in receipt of rents and profits has, upon the general principles of equity, sufficient interest in the mortgaged property to enable him to maintain an action to restrain an injury done to it without joining the mortgagee. Under the Patent Act of 1852, s. 35, it was provided that, until the entry of an assignment of a patent on the register should have been made, the original patentee should be deemed the sole proprietor, and in Chollet v. Hoffman, 5 W. R. 573, 7 E. & B. 636, it was held an assignee could not sue at law until his assignment had been registered, though registration after action brought, but before trial, was held sufficient in equity, Hassall v. Wright, 18 W. R. 821, L. R. 10 Eq. 509; but this provision is not contained in section 23 of the Act of 1883.

They also referred to the Patent Rules, 1883, rr. 64.77.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Warmington, Q.C., Moulton, Q.C., Carpmael, and Roskill, for the respondent company.—The mortgages are by way assignment, and the legal interest in the patent is absolutely vested in the mortgagees; there is no reservation to the mortgagor of any power to grant licences. The mortgagees' names are entered on the register, and, that being so, they are, under the Act of 1883, the proprietors, and can sell the patent or grant licences of it. The mortgagee assignee may, in equity, be a trustee for the mortgagor; but section 85 of the Act of 1883 provides that the comptroller shall not take any notice of trusts or cestui que trusts. Section 87 of the Act of 1883 effects a statutory alteration of what would otherwise, on the general principles of equity, be the rights of the mortgagor with respect to strangers to the patent, though, as between mortgagor and mortgagee themselves, those equitable rights are preserved. The defendants are entitled to have on the record as plaintiffs all the persons who together are entitled to the full ownership of the patent, otherwise the defendants would be liable to be sued in a fresh action by the mortgagees. But, assuming that it was not necessary to have the mortgagees joined as plaintiffs, nevertheless, the mortgagees were necessary parties, and it was the duty of the plaintiff company to have had the suit properly constituted as to parties. [Cotton, L.J., referred to R. S. C., ord. 16, r. 11]. The question as to parties was raised in the court below, and the plaintiff company declined to make any application to the court to have the mortgagees joined either as co-plaintiffs or co-defendants.

They referred also to Bergmann v. Macmillan, 29 W. R. 890, 17 Ch. D. 423.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., in reply.—[Cotton, L.J.—Do you object to the mortgagees being added as co-defendants?] They may be proper parties, but they are not necessary parties, and if the other side want them as parties it is the other side that must apply. [Cotton, L.J.—You must argue the question whether the mortgagees are necessary parties.] The mortgagees cannot be damnified by anything taking place in this action: Fairclough v. Marshall. If the plaintiff company succeed, the mortgagees are in fact benefited. The mortgagees could not assist the court at the trial of any question of injunction or damages; no counsel appearing for the mortgagees at the trial would be heard. The fact of the mortgagees being made co-defendants would not prevent them suing for infringement, the present defendants, in a fresh suit. When the accounts come to be taken it may be proper to have the mortgagees made parties, but they are not necessary parties, at all events, up to the trial of the action. I object to this point as to parties being taken by the defendants at this stage: Werderman v. Société Générale d'Electricité, 30 W. R. 33, 19 Ch. D. 246, and I ask for the costs thrown away by the appellant company by reason of the action not being tried when it came on for trial.

He also referred to ord. 16, r. 12, and Keill v. Butcher, 32 W. R. 378, 25 Ch. D. 750.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Kekewich, J., who decided that the plaintiffs had no right of suit unless they joined as co-plaintiffs the mortgagees, and he dismissed the action on that ground; for although the plaintiffs had been given an opportunity to amend by making the mortgagees parties as plaintiffs, yet the first mortgagee on being applied to would not consent to that being done, and Kekewich, J., therefore dismissed the action.

That, in my opinion, was clearly on this ground, that as there was in fact a mortgage, the plaintiffs, as assignees of the patent, had no right of action at all against an infringer unless they joined as co-plaintiffs the mortgagees.

Now (subject to the question as to the effect of section 87, which I will refer to presently), there is nothing in the Act which in any way prevents a patentee who has granted a mortgage of his patent from suing. The Attorney-General relied on sections 46 and 87. Now section 46, in my opinion, really does not bear upon it, because it says, "Patentee means the person for the time being entitled to the benefit of a patent," and if we are to look to the general law, I should say that the assignee of a patent, although he has granted a mortgage, is entitled to the benefit of the patent. It is very true he has given a mortgage upon it which may have the effect, by foreclosure or sale under the powers contained in the mortgage, of depriving him of his right to the patent; but in equity the mortgage is looked on merely as a security for the debt, and, that being so, it is not considered in equity that a mortgagor is not entitled to the benefit of his patent. He is entitled, subject to the charge which he has created, and to those rights which he has given his mortgagee.

But section 87 was much relied on. The register of patents was produced before Kekewich, J., by an officer from the Patent Office, and it has been found that on the register the plaintiffs are mentioned as assignees. The plaintiffs are registered as assignees, and the date is February 22, 1886. The entry shows that the plaintiffs are registered as assignees of the patent by two assignments, one by the original patentee, and the other by a mortgagee of that patentee.

Then on the same date, February 22, 1886, there is an entry on the register, of the mortgage to the banking company, the first mortgagees, but that registers them, not as assignees (although the mortgage was by assignment in the usual terms of such a mortgage), but as mortgagees. The officer from the Patent Office told Kekewich, J., that that was an intentional difference of language, that the official in the Patent Office did not register a mortgagee, even though he took by assignment, as assignee of the patent, but only as mortgagee. I think that is a right practice, for if the mortgagee had been registered as assignee it might have been contended that under section 87 he was treated as the proprietor of the patent, whereas, as I have said, a court of equity does not consider the mortgagee as the proprietor of that which is comprised in his mortgage. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the argument of the Attorney-General on section 87, because whatever powers are thereby given independently of what the general law may be, they are given only to the person who is on the register as proprietor, and the Attorney-General, in pressing his argument upon us, did not know what was really the intention of the officers in the Patent Office in making this entry on the register in the way they have done.

Section 87, therefore, cannot be relied on. What we have is simply a registration of the instruments affecting the title under section 23, which section does not say anything like that which is contained in section 87. [The Lord Justice then read section 23, and continued:—] Section 23, therefore, leaves it to the court to decide, when the matter is brought before it, what the interests are, having regard to the general law, and what is the position of those who are so registered. If we had to deal with the argument of the Attorney-General that section 87 makes such a tremendous alteration as to put the mortgagee in the position of proprietor as against his mortgagor, I should have hesitated very much in acceding to that argument; but I need not consider that now, because, as I have said, the banking company are not registered as proprietors.

It is a question, therefore, of what is the general law. In the present case the assignee of a patent is on the register. No difficulty, therefore, as to not being on the register arises. But there is also on the register an assignment by way of mortgage, and a copy of that deed is also on the register or with the registrar. It was urged that this gave certain rights to the mortgagee, which would very much interfere with any action brought by the assignee of the patent—I will call him the "patentee" as a short term. What is the general law? Is a man who has mortgaged his interest, either in land or in that which is personal estate, prevented from asserting his right to prevent someone else injuring the thing which is the subject-matter of the mortgage? I assume for the present—it will have to be decided hereafter whether the defendants have done so or not—that there has been an infringement of the patent rights vested by assignment in the plaintiffs and mortgaged by them. To my mind it would be contrary to all the principles of equity and to all the previous decisions on the general law to say that under these circumstances a mortgagor cannot assert and protect that interest which is vested in him as mortgagor for the purpose of preventing an infringement and a violation of the rights which—although he holds as mortgagor—he still has, subject, it is true, to any rights which the mortgagee may exercise under, and in proper accordance with, his mortgage. If section 87, therefore, does not give a special right to the mortgagee here—as in my opinion it does not, having regard to the circumstances I have stated—the mortgagor can, and ought to be at liberty to, vindicate as against a wrongdoer the right which he still has, and which a court of equity recognizes as a substantial right, to the property which he has mortgaged.

It has been decided (Sheehan v. Great Eastern Railway Co.) that the assignee of part of a patent can bring an action; that answers a good many of the objections urged by the Attorney-General and Mr. Warmington against allowing a mortgagor to bring an action because the person entitled to the other portion of the patent rights might bring an action in respect of those, and then the person who was said to be infringing might have to again vindicate what he was doing by alleging that there was no infringement or that the patent was bad altogether, because if it were bad in part that would vitiate the whole of the grants contained in the patent.

In the case of Fairclough v. Marshall, although the plaintiff there was not even in as beneficial a position as a mortgagor, yet the Court of Appeal properly treated him as being in the same position as if he were the mortgagor, and held that he was entitled to bring his action without making the person in whom the legal estate was vested a plaintiff, or bringing him before the court in any way, and that as the defendant was violating rights which were vested in the plaintiff, the fact that there was another person in whom those rights were to a certain extent vested did not deprive the then plaintiff from preventing an infringement of the rights which he had, but had also together with the person whom the court considered as his mortgagee.

In the present case Kekewich, J., took an entirely different view. I cannot but see that the real and the only point which he decided was, that as there was an assignment by way of mortgage it must be considered that the assignee, though by way of mortgage only, was the only person who could protect the patent, the subject of the mortgage, against an infringer; and he dismissed the action.

Now, in my opinion, if he was not right in that view, it was wrong to dismiss the action, because ord. 16, r. 11, says that no cause shall be dismissed for misjoinder, or want of joinder, of parties. If he had not thought that ground which I have mentioned, was the ground for dismissing the action, but simply that the mortgagee ought in some way to be before the court, he would not have dismissed the action, but would simply have given a direction that the mortgagees should be added as defendants or as parties. We disagree with the view taken by Kekewich, J., and, in my opinion, as regards the costs, the respondents ought to pay the costs of the appeal, and the costs incurred by reason, or thrown away in consequence, of the decision of Kekewich, J., preventing the case, when the matter came before him, being tried on the merits as between the plaintiffs and the defendants. It was said we ought not to do so, because the order shows that there was full opportunity given to the plaintiffs to apply for any amendment which they thought desirable. In my opinion, however, that is a wrong reading of the order. It is true that it is in terms to that effect, but as Kekewich, J., has decided that the mortgagors—i.e., the plaintiffs—could not bring an action, it would have been useless to apply to have the mortgagees added as defendants when the court had expressed an opinion and decided that the plaintiffs could not bring any action at all without joining other persons, not as defendants, but as plaintiffs.

Then, as to the objection made on behalf of the defendants, that the action cannot go on unless the mortgagees are added as defendants. The plaintiffs do not in any way require the mortgagees as defendants. What they seek in the action will in no way interfere with or be injurious to their mortgagees, on the contrary, it will be for the benefit of the mortgagees as well as themselves. The banking company, who are the first mortgagees, have declined to allow their names to be added as plaintiffs and to join in bringing this action, and that goes strongly to show that it is in the highest degree improbable that any real difficulty will be caused to the defendants by the fact that the mortgagees are not here.

If there is any substantial difficulty or danger, what ought to be done? The defendants may, under ord. 16, r. 11, at any time apply for an order that the mortgagees, or any of them, should be made defendants. If the defendants can satisfy the court that they have any reasonable ground for supposing or suggesting that there will be any danger to them in consequence of the mortgagees not being defendants—we decide that they need not be plaintiffs—they may apply at any time to the judge for an order that the mortgagees, or any of them, be made parties to the action, and our order will be expressly without prejudice to any such application.

If the matter comes to the taking of an account, then I can see that the presence of the mortgagees—or the first mortgagee at any rate—would be necessary in order to bind him by those accounts, but I do not say that the defendants will not be able to make out any case for making the mortgagees parties before that time, though I cannot see how they will.

I think the order we ought to make is this. Reverse the order of Kekewich, J.; the plaintiffs to have the costs of the appeal, and the costs below of any proceeding or evidence which has been thrown away by the order made by Kekewich, J.; liberty to the defendants to make at any stage of the action such application as they may be advised to have the mortgagees, or any of them, made defendants in the action.

Lindley, L.J.—I agree. The proposition involved in the judgment of Kekewich, J., is so serious, so startling, and so novel, that I will say a few words about it. If his judgment is right, the mortgagor of a patent, unlike the mortgagor of any other property, can obtain no relief against anybody who is destroying the mortgage property, unless he can induce his mortgagees to join with him, or unless he can redeem the mortgage and get rid of it. That is a very startling proposition, and to me entirely new; the question is, is it sound? It certainly is unsound if tried by the ordinary principles of equity. I think it would startle anybody who is acquainted with the doctrines of equity relating to mortgages, to be told that a mortgagor by the fact of making a mortgage hands over the mortgage property so as to be precluded from protecting it from destruction unless he can pay off his mortgage. Such a doctrine is contrary to principle, because, in the view of a court of equity, the mortgagor does not cease to be the owner of the property mortgaged; he remains the owner subject to the security, and he has rights available in equity to protect the subject-matter of that security in which he is so seriously and greatly interested.

Then it is said that there is something in the Patent Act which places the mortgagor of a patent in a worse position than the mortgagor of any other property. I cannot see that. I have looked in vain through the various sections which have been referred to, and even if these mortgagees were registered as proprietors under section 87—which they are not—I should still very much hesitate to come to the conclusion that a mortgagor was incapable of getting redress unless he could induce his mortgagees to join with him, or unless he could redeem them. I can find nothing in the Act which warrants such a contention. It appears to me that the mistake which has been made is an extremely serious one. It is not merely making a mistake as to the course to be pursued in consequence of the absence of proper parties, but it is holding as a proposition of law that a mortgagor, in the position in which I have assumed him to be, is incapable of getting redress in a court of equity. That appears to me to be utterly wrong. I will say no more. I agree with the form of the order which Cotton, L.J., has suggested.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that nothing can be clearer than that a man does not lose his right to protect his property against wrongdoing by a stranger simply because he has mortgaged his property; and nothing that has been said as to the consequences of the opposite doctrine can be too strongly said.

In the present case the mortgagee, whom, it is said, ought to be made a co-plaintiff, is not a registered proprietor under section 87. We have not therefore, strictly speaking, to decide how far section 87, as regards mortgagees whose names are registered as those of proprietors under it, disturbs the general law of this court. We have not got to consider or decide that; we have only, in the present case, to go by the general law. It is clear that a mortgagor does not lose his right to protect what is his own because he has created a debt and secured the debt by a mortgage; and, further, if I required authority—which I do not know that it would—to make good the decision at which we have now arrived, the case of Fairclough v. Marshall, in the reasoning of it, appears to me to cover the present ground.

As I understand what Kekewich, J., intended to be was this—he thought that, in the first place, a mortgagee was either a necessary co-plaintiff or, at all events, that he must be made a defendant in the suit. I am not so clear as my learned brother is, that he took the first line alone; if he did, then from what we have said I obviously disagree with him; but from the offer which he made to the plaintiffs to allow them to add the mortgagees as co-defendants, it strikes me that he thought that that was a possible way of curing the defect. I do not say that it would have cured the defect, but it strikes me that he thought so. But if he had thought that the defect could be cured by adding the mortgagee as a defendant, I am strongly of opinion that it was his bounden duty to add him himself under ord. 16, r. 11, for it is of the essence of the procedure since the Judicature Act to bear in mind that an action shall not be defeated by the nonjoinder of right parties, and if the judge sees that a mortgagee's presence is necessary for the purpose of doing justice, he ought not to allow an action to be defeated, but ought himself to join the mortgagee.

That is my view, and as Kekewich, J., did not take that course I think he was wrong there, too—that he was wrong in the first instance in his view of the law, and wrong also, in the second instance, if his view was what it strikes me it may have been—in not curing the defect if he thought it could be cured in the way in which, as it strikes me, he thought it could be cured.

With regard to the costs, it seems to me that the order which has been indicated by my learned brethren is the right order to make.

Appeal allowed.

EDDOWES v. ARGENTINE LOAN AND MERCANTILE AGENCY CO. (a.)

Practice—Affidavit—"Before me" omitted in jurat—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 38, rr. 6, 14.

The words "before me" were omitted in the jurat of an affidavit purporting to be signed and sealed by a British vice-consul in a foreign country. Blanks in the affidavit had been filled up and alterations initialed in apparently the same handwriting as the signature, the handwriting being peculiar.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J., upon an application to take the affidavit off the file), that the proper and reasonable inference to be drawn from the facts, in the absence of proof to the contrary, was that the affidavit had been in fact sworn before the vice-consul and everything rightly done; and as to the omission of the words "before me,"

Held, that ord. 38, r. 14, was applicable, and ought to be applied to the cure of such a mere formal defect or irregularity, and that the affidavit ought, therefore, to be received under that rule, and the application refused.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

This was an appeal by the defendant company from a decision of Kekewich, J., refusing to order an affidavit sworn by the plaintiff to be taken off the file for irregularity.

The chief irregularity alleged consisted in the omission of the words "before me" in the jurat, which was in the following words:—"Sworn at Rosario de Santa Fé, Argentine Republic, in the British Vice-Consulate, this 20th day of January, 1890.—(Signed) H. M. MALLETT, British Vice-Consul."

The seal of the vice-consul was affixed to the document, and some blanks in it had been filled up, and the initials "H. M. M." affixed to some alterations had been written, in what appeared to be the same handwriting as the signature.

The plaintiff resided in the Argentine Republic, and the affidavit in question contained her answers to interrogatories administered by the defendant company.

Ord. 38, r. 14, is as follows:—"The court or a judge may receive any affidavit sworn for the purpose of being used in any cause or matter, notwithstanding any defect by misdescription of parties or otherwise in the title or jurat, or any other irregularity in the form thereof, and may direct a memorandum to be made on the document that it has been so received."

Kekewich, J., refused to direct the affidavit to be taken off the file.

The defendant company appealed.

Channell, Q.C., and Glenn, for the appellants.—The omission of the words "before me" has always been held fatal in previous cases. There is nothing to show that the affidavit was sworn before the vice-consul himself: Reg. v. Bloxham, 6 Q. B. 528; Graham v. Ingleby, 1 Ex. 651; Pilkington v. Himsworth, 1 Y. & C. Ex. 612. The affidavit was made under ord. 38, r. 6. Rule 14 cannot have been intended to apply to an irregularity of this sort, but merely to irregularities in immaterial details, such as are dealt with in rules 7 and 8 of the same order. The statutes dealing with the subject are 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86 (s. 22), and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 42. [LOPES, L.J., referred to the Act of 1889 (52 Vict. c. 10).] The words I rely on are re-enacted in section 6 of the Act. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Empey v. King, 13 M. & W. 519.] There the affidavit was stated to have been sworn at the chambers of the judge who signed it.

Warmington, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the respondent.—The Act 52 Vict. c. 10 now makes the matter clear, whatever may have been the case previously. Section 5 shows what is required to be stated in the jurat, and section 6 makes certain provisions on the subject, and the words "before me" do not seem to be now essential under those sections. Here there can be no doubt the oath was, in fact, administered by the vice-consul. If not, the affixing of his seal and signature would have been a scandalous impropriety. The object of administering the interrogatories was only to gain time and delay the plaintiff. The alterations made in the vice-consul's handwriting show that he went carefully through the affidavit, and there can be no doubt, therefore, that he did administer the oath himself. Assuming there is any irregularity, which we deny, rule 14 applies. The cases cited on the other side were decided before these rules were in force.

Channell, Q.C., in reply.—When the Act provides that so and so shall be done, that does not show that nothing else need be done. By section 6 the affidavit must have been sworn "before" the person authorized. Empey v. King was distinguished in Graham v. Ingleby, on the ground that in the former case the affidavit was sworn before a judge at chambers, and that a judge is on a different footing from an inferior officer, the oath being usually administered before the judge, but not by him. [COTTON, L.J., referred to Cheney v. Courtois, 13 C. B. N. S. 634, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 25]. In Reg. v. Bloxham it was clear that the oath had been, in fact, administered by the person who signed the jurat, but that was not held sufficient. Rule 14 only applies to misdescription or defects of form. [COTTON, L.J., pointed out that the alterations and initials in the vice-consul's handwriting clearly showed the affidavit to have been, in fact, sworn before him.] Probably it was, but that is not enough.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., refusing, upon an application by the defendants, to order this affidavit to be taken off the file on the ground of there being no sufficient proof of its having been properly sworn.

The jurat of the affidavit states that it was sworn at Rosario in the Argentine Republic on a certain day, but it does not say that it was sworn "before me"—that is, before the vice-consul whose signature appears at the foot of it. It would, no doubt, have been better if those words "before me" had been inserted in the jurat (as in the ordinary form adopted by commissioners), but they were not. It does not, however, follow that the affidavit ought to be taken off the file. Rule 14 of order 38 says:—[His lordship read the rule, which is set out above, and proceeded:—]. That was intended, in my opinion, to cure a defect such as this. If it is shown to our satisfaction that this affidavit was, in fact, sworn before a person who had authority to administer the oath in the place where the affidavit was sworn, we are authorized, notwithstanding the defect in the form of the jurat, to direct it to be placed, or allowed to remain upon the file.

What one sees is this—the affidavit is signed by the vice-consul, and his handwriting is a peculiar one. But that is not all. There are a considerable number of alterations in the affidavit which are verified by his initials, evidently in the same handwriting.

Besides this, not only are there alterations made by someone else identified by his signature, but there are also additions to the affidavits, blanks filled up by him in his own handwriting, and I feel satisfied that it was, in fact, sworn before him personally. Therefore, I have no hesitation in saying that in this particular case, notwithstanding the informality in the jurat, we both can and ought to order that this affidavit shall remain on the file, and we will do whatever is necessary for the purpose of remedying the defect. [His lordship then disposed of several other objections, and concluded that the appeal must be dismissed.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With respect to the defect in the jurat, it is quite true that the vice-consul omitted the expression "Sworn before me." What he has said is, "Sworn at Rosario de Santa Fé, Argentine Republic, in the British Vice-Consulate, this 20th day of January, 1890." That is followed by his signature. There are indications upon the document that the vice-consul looked through it, and looked through it carefully. But it is suggested that it might have been sworn before his clerk, or some other official. That may possibly have been so, but what is the reasonable inference? It seems to me that the reasonable inference is all in favour of everything having been rightly done. It would, in my opinion, have been a gross impropriety and breach of duty if he had signed and sealed that document without having had it sworn before him. Then it was said that there are cases which decide that an affidavit which omits these words must be bad. No doubt there are such cases, and a vast amount of expense and injustice has been caused by rejecting affidavits like this by reason of some defect or omission by some clerk or official before it was sworn. It was to cure that very thing that rule 14 was introduced into order 38, and addressed to the curing of that very defect. [His lordship read the 14th rule of order 38, pointing out that it was for civil purposes only, and had nothing to do with criminal procedure.] What is this but some defect or irregularity in form? The jurat is defective in form. Is there the slightest reason to suppose that anything seriously wrong was done—that the affidavit was not in fact sworn before the vice-consul? There is none whatever. It appears to me that that rule (judging from its language) was put in for the very purpose of curing such a defect as this, and though the words omitted ought to have been in the jurat, in my opinion that rule applies. I think this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—This is an application by the defendants that the plaintiff's affidavit may be taken off the file, on the ground that it is defective in form in omitting the words "before me" which ought to precede the vice-consul's signature.

Now, having regard to the cases which have been cited, I express no opinion as to what might have been the result of this application but for ord. 38, r. 14. But, in my opinion, that rule covers the present case, and that appears to be clear when we come to consider certain circumstances connected with the affidavit. On looking at the affidavit we find that it is signed in the right place by the vice-consul, that there are alterations in various places initialed by him in his handwriting, and that there are blanks, which have been filled up by him, also in his handwriting. Now, having regard to these facts, can any reasonable person doubt that the affidavit was sworn before him, although the words "before me" are not expressed?

Then does rule 14 apply? I think it does. I believe the intention was to give the judges a discretion to admit affidavits where, in their opinion, the defects in them were not, having regard to the surrounding circumstances, defects of substance. I think that was the object of the order, and a very useful object too, because there can be no doubt that injustice has very often been done by the rejection of an affidavit on the ground of some defect which has not been a defect of substance. In my opinion the omission of these words in this case is a defect, but a curable one, and not a defect of substance. I think, therefore, that the appeal fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ATKINSON v. BRADFORD THIRD EQUITABLE BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Statute of Limitations—Money deposited on loan—Conditions as to repayment—Conditions precedent—Death of depositor—Time from which statute runs against administrator.

A sum of money was deposited with the defendants by way of loan, upon certain conditions contained in a loan pass-book, which was handed to the depositor at the time of the loan. Those conditions were that notice of withdrawal was required, that the money was payable according to the terms stated when the notice was given, and that no money would be paid out except on production of the pass-book, and the depositor must either attend personally or send a written authority. The depositor having given notice of withdrawal, the defendants sent him a memorandum stating that the sum would be payable on or after a certain day, between 10 a.m. and 5 p.m., and that the memorandum and pass-book must be produced when the money was applied for. Upon the day named in the memorandum for repayment the depositor died intestate, without having applied for or received the money. The plaintiff, who had taken out letters of administration to the estate, brought an action to recover the amount of the deposit more than six years after the date named in the memorandum for repayment, but within six years from the grant of the letters of administration.

Held, that the conditions contained in the pass-book were conditions precedent to any liability in the defendants to repay the money, and that, as these conditions had not been fulfilled by the depositor, no cause of action accrued to him in his lifetime, and the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until the letters of administration had been taken out.

Held, also, by Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley, L.J., that, even assuming the conditions—except that as to notice—were not conditions precedent, in the absence of proof by the defendants that the depositor died after the hour named for the repayment, it was not proved that a cause of action accrued to him in his lifetime, and therefore the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until letters of administration had been taken out.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., in favour of the plaintiff, at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiff as administrator of the estate of Thomas Atkinson, deceased, to recover £214 15s. 6d. deposited with the defendants by way of loan. The defence, so far as material to the present report, was that the claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3).

By rule 29 of their rules the defendant society were authorized to receive loans at such rate of interest, not exceeding five per cent., and on such conditions as the directors might decide.

It appeared that in March, 1877, Thomas Atkinson deposited the sum of £200 with the defendants by way of loan at interest, and at the time of the deposit he received a loan pass-book from the defendants which contained, amongst others, the following printed terms upon which they received loans:—"Loans are received and paid daily at the central office only, 48, Market-street. Rate of interest £4 per cent. per annum. No commission or charge of any kind. £20 may be withdrawn any day without notice at intervals of not less than a week. Larger sums are payable on the day after the first and second Mondays in the month, and require notice according to terms stated when the notice is given. No money will be paid out except on production of the investor's book, and he must either attend personally or send a written authority. Forms of authority may be obtained at the office. The directors request that depositors will be careful to keep their pass-books in their own possession, as the society will not be responsible for any money paid to any person not legally entitled or authorized to receive it."

On the 18th of December, 1878, Thomas Atkinson gave notice to the defendants of his intention to withdraw the deposit of £200, which, with the interest due, amounted to £214 15s. 6d., and on the same day the defendants gave Atkinson the following memorandum in writing:—"The sum given notice for will be payable on the 14th of January between ten in the morning and five in the evening, or on any subsequent day between ten and five, except on Saturdays, when the office is closed at one. The person in whose name the money is invested must sign his or her name at the foot of this paper, which must be produced with the pass-book when applying for the money, or it cannot be paid. N.B.—No loan account can be kept open with less than £1 in it besides the interest." At the foot of the paper was the following:—"To the secretaries of the Bradford Third Equitable Benefit Building Society. Pay myself or bearer on presenting my pass-book the sum for which I have given notice as above."

On the 14th of January, 1879, the day fixed for the repayment of the deposit, Thomas Atkinson died intestate, without having applied for or received the money. On the 16th of January, 1879, a person representing himself to be Thomas Atkinson applied at the defendants' office for payment of the deposit, and produced the pass-book and the above memorandum. The defendants accordingly paid him the amount of the deposit upon his signing the name of Thomas Atkinson in a receipt-book kept by them, but without requiring him to sign at the foot of the memorandum, the custom of the defendants being not to require such signature if the depositor attends in person.

On the 3rd of May, 1889, letters of administration of the estate of Thomas Atkinson were granted to the plaintiff, and on the 18th of May, 1889, the present action was brought. At the trial no evidence was given as to the hour on the 14th of January at which Thomas Atkinson died, nor as to who the person was who received the deposit on the 16th of January, 1879. Mathew, J., held that it was a condition precedent to the liability of the defendants that the depositor should attend personally at the defendants' office with his pass-book, or give an authority to someone to attend with the pass-book for him, and receive the money, and that, as this condition precedent had not been performed, no cause of action accrued on the 14th of January, 1879, and the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until the grant of the letters of administration on the 3rd of May, 1889. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Montagu Lush, for the defendants.—The Statute of Limitations ran from the 14th of January, 1879, when the notice of withdrawal came into operation. There was then a debt due to the depositor, though he had to go through certain formalities before the money could be paid to him. The production of the pass-book by the depositor, or by someone authorized by him, was not a condition precedent to the debt accruing. Its production was only necessary for the purpose of identification. It is like the case of a banker and customer with a current account. There is a debt due to the customer from the time of deposit, and the statute runs from that date, though the money is only payable upon presentation of a cheque. Again, a solicitor cannot sue until a signed bill of costs is delivered, but the statute runs from the date on which the work is done. In the same way here the money was due on January 14, though it was only payable on production of the pass-book. If the plaintiff had shown that Thomas Atkinson died before the money was due on that day, then the statute would not have begun to run.

They referred to Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas. 28; Pott v. Clegg, 16 M. & W. 321.

Henn Collins, Q.C. (Percy Gye with him), for the plaintiff.—This is not like the case of a solicitor's bill of costs, as in that case the debt is due, but the statute adds a condition before the solicitor can bring an action. Nor is there any analogy between this case and the common law relation between a banker and his customer. This case depends upon the special terms on which the deposit was made. The conditions in the pass-book cannot be split into two parts. It is admitted that notice of withdrawal is a condition precedent to the cause of action accruing. The remaining conditions, as to production of the pass-book, &c., must also be conditions precedent.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This case turns upon the contract between the deceased man and the defendant society, which was made when the money was deposited with the society. When a deposit by way of loan is made, the society gives to the depositor a loan pass-book, in which the amount is entered, and which contains certain stipulations in writing. It is clear that the contract is contained in that book. The book is given to the depositor as containing the terms upon which the society receives the money. The terms relating to repayment are that larger sums than £20 are payable on certain days, "and require notice according to the terms stated when the notice is given." There is no liability to repay, and no cause of action accrues to the depositor, until that stipulation has been fulfilled. Therefore notice of withdrawal is a condition precedent to the accrual of a cause of action. The terms go on: "No money will be paid out except on production of the investor's book, and he must either attend personally or send a written authority." In my opinion the depositor has no cause of action until those stipulations are fulfilled. Those stipulations are, therefore, also conditions precedent. It is admitted that they were not fulfilled in Thomas Atkinson's lifetime, and so no cause of action accrued during his lifetime. It is said that the pass-book has never been produced by the administrator, and that, therefore, one of the conditions has not been fulfilled. The defendants, however, have got the book, and when the present plaintiff brought this action they had the book. Hence the condition has been fulfilled. In my opinion, therefore, no cause of action accrued to the deceased in his lifetime, and the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until the letters of administration had been granted, no cause of action accruing to the administrator until then. That is sufficient to dispose of the case. I cannot see that this case is like the case of a customer having a current account with a banker, in which case the money becomes due at once. I cannot see any analogy between such a case and this one. Whether it is like the case of money being placed on deposit with a banker I do not say, as that all depends upon the terms on which the money is deposited. Nor, in my opinion, is it like the case of a solicitor suing upon a bill of costs. The contract between the parties there is that the client will pay the solicitor for the work when it is done, and the liability to pay is then in existence. The statute steps in and imposes a condition before the solicitor can bring an action.

But, further, even assuming that, though the stipulation as to notice is a condition precedent, the stipulation as to the production of the book is not, still, in my opinion, the defence of the Statute of Limitations has not been made out. The whole burden of proving the plea, and every element of the plea, lies upon those who set it up. They must prove it strictly. The liability to pay did not accrue until the time stated in the memorandum of December 18. If a creditor dies intestate on the day upon which the debt becomes payable, and there is no evidence to show whether he died before or after the hour on which the debt becomes payable, the statute does not begin to run until letters of administration have been taken out. In the present case there is no evidence to show at what hour on January 14 the deceased man died. The defendants, therefore, have not proved their plea. In either view, therefore, the judgment was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The contract upon which the money was deposited governs the rights of the parties in this case. The terms of the contract are contained in the loan pass-book, and are totally different from the terms upon which a person lends money to a banker. The special contract prevents a depositor from claiming his money until he complies with the terms as to notice and production of the pass-book. When we look at those terms as expanded by the memorandum issued on December 18, it is clear that there is here a special contract which distinguishes this case from that of a banker and customer. Not only must notice of withdrawal be given, but the pass-book must be produced by the depositor or by someone authorized by him at or after the date named in the memorandum as the date of repayment. In my opinion these are conditions precedent to the accrual of any cause of action against the defendants for the recovery of the deposit. These conditions were not fulfilled in the lifetime of the deceased. Unfortunately the defendants paid the money to some person who produced the book but who had no authority to do so, and they did not take the precaution of seeing that the memorandum was signed. No cause of action, therefore, accrued in the lifetime of the deceased, and the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until the letters of administration had been granted.

But assuming that these conditions can be divided, and that the stipulation as to notice is a condition precedent to any liability accruing, but that the production of the pass-book and the other conditions are not, still, by the terms of the memorandum of the 18th of December, the money was not payable until 10 a.m. on the 14th of January, and there was no liability to pay until that time. Thomas Atkinson died intestate on that day, and there is no evidence to show at what hour. I am of opinion that if a creditor dies intestate on the day a debt becomes payable to him, and there is no evidence to show whether he died before or after the moment when the debt became payable, the statute does not run against his administrator until administration is taken out. No case on this exact point is to be found, but on principle I believe the law to be as above stated. Here the cause of action accrued at 10 a.m. on the 14th of January, and Thomas Atkinson died intestate on that day. It has not been proved that he was alive when the money become payable, and therefore it seems to me that the cause of action accrued to him in his lifetime. Therefore, from whatever point of view the case is looked at, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

Lopes, L.J.—In my opinion, no cause of action accrued in this case until notice of withdrawal was given, the pass-book was produced, and the depositor either attended personally or sent a person with a written authority to receive the money. That being so, no cause of action accrued to the deceased man. All those matters seem to me to be conditions precedent to any cause of action accruing. If Thomas Atkinson had lived, he would have had no cause of action until he had complied with those conditions. He died intestate without having complied with them, and some years elapsed before the present plaintiff took out letters of administration. The statute, under those circumstances, does not operate as a bar until six years after the grant of the letters of administration. It was argued that, though the condition as to notice might be a condition precedent, the other conditions were not. I am unable to sever the conditions. They all seem to me to be conditions precedent. I rest my judgment upon the ground that these are conditions precedent necessary to be complied with before a cause of action could arise, and I desire to express no opinion as to the other point.

Appeal dismissed.

*Poor law—Removability—Child having no other settlement than parent's—Girl over the age of sixteen living with her father as part of his family—Derivative settlement—Emancipation—*11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, s. 1 —Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.

The meaning of section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 is that, where a child lives with its father or mother as part of his or her family, and has no settlement other than one derived from the parent, the removability of such child depends on the removability of the parent.

A girl lived with her father as part of his family for a period during which he acquired by residence a settlement in the M. Union. Before she attained the age of sixteen they went to live in the W. Union. After she had attained the age of sixteen, but before they had lived twelve months in the W. Union, she became chargeable. After they had lived twelve months in the W. Union, and the father had become irremovable, an order was made removing the girl to the M. Union.

Held, that the settlement which, by virtue of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, the girl retained on reaching the age of sixteen, was still a derivative settlement after she passed that age; and therefore she came within the meaning of section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, and, her father being irremovable, she was irremovable also.

Case stated by J. R. Bulwer, chairman of the quarter sessions for the County of Norfolk.

At the general quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Norfolk, holden at Norwich on the 2nd of January, 1889, an appeal against an order of two justices of the peace for the county of Norfolk was heard and determined. The order was dated the 24th of October, 1888, and was an order for the removal of a pauper from the Wayland Poor Law Union to the Mitford Poor Law Union.

The grounds of removal set up a derivative settlement from the pauper's father, who was therein stated to have acquired a settlement by residence in the parish of Shipdham in the Mitford Union.

The grounds of appeal set up that the pauper's father was irremovable from the Wayland Union, and that she was so too, inasmuch as she was unemancipated and had no other settlement than her father's, and was, therefore, not removable.

The pauper is the legitimate daughter of her father, and was born on the 29th of February, 1872. She became chargeable to the Wayland Union on the 13th of August, 1888, being then over sixteen years of age, and she so became chargeable in consequence of paralysis, producing permanent disability. The relief given was given to her in her own name. The pauper's father resided in the parish of Shipdham, in the Mitford Union, from July, 1874, to October, 1887, without a break and without relief, and thereby acquired a settlement by residence in the parish of Shipdham. On the 11th of October, 1887, he removed to the parish of Hockham, in the Wayland Union, in which parish he has since resided, and is now residing.

The pauper always, up to the time of her becoming chargeable, resided, and is now residing, with her father as part of his family.

At the date of the order for removal, the pauper's father had resided in the parish of Hockham, in the Wayland Union, for twelve months in such manner as to render him irremovable from the said union.

For the Mitford Union it was contended that the pauper, being an unemancipated child residing with her father, and suffering from permanent disability, and having no settlement but her father's, was irremovable under the provisions of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, notwithstanding that she was over sixteen years of age, and (inter alia) Reg. v. St. Mary Arches, Exeter, 10 W. R. 268, Reg. v. St. Olave's Union, 22 W. R. 75, L. R. 9 Q. B. 38, were cited; and it was further contended that there was no express enactment to deprive her of her right of irremovability.

For the Wayland Union it was contended that the pauper, when she attained sixteen years of age, had and took her father's settlement in Shipdham, in the Mitford Union; that the common law doctrine of emancipation as it existed prior to the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, could no longer prevail; that the pauper, who had attained the age of sixteen, and received relief in her own name, was emancipated at that age and was removable to her settlement, though her father might not be removable, and in support of this view were cited 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 3, and Dorchester Union v. Poplar Union, 36 W. R. 706, 21 Q. B. D. 88.

The court of quarter sessions determined that the pauper, being unemancipated, was a child within the meaning of section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111; that she had no other settlement except that of her father, with whom she resided, and that she was, therefore, irremovable, and that the order for removal should be quashed. The order was accordingly quashed, with costs, and the question for the opinion of the court is whether the pauper is or is not removable from the Wayland Union.

H. D. Greene, Q.C., and Thorne, for the appellants, the Wayland Union.—Here is an emancipated pauper of seventeen years of age, and why should she not be removed to her own settlement? In the Act of Parliament the word "child" means a child under sixteen years of age, and, if so, the proviso in section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 has no application to the present case as here the child is over sixteen. A child of sixteen now, by the effect of the recent legislation, attains its own status. The case of Reg. v. St. Olave's Union is a totally different case, as in that case the pauper was unemancipated, and, therefore, had no settlement of her own.

Poland, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the respondents, the Mitford Union.—The father, by a year's residence in the Wayland Union, acquired a status of irremovability, but the child did not reside there for a sufficient time to acquire a status of her own. She acquired her father's status of irremovability. By the proviso in section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, whatever be the status of the head of the family such is the status of the child. There is no question that that was the law up to the time of the passing of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, and that statute has not changed the law on the point. It is said that under that statute emancipation takes place at the age of sixteen; it does for some but not for all purposes, and fixing the age of emancipation does not oust the operation of the proviso in section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111. [They were stopped.]

Greene, Q.C., replied.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of opinion in this case that the respondents are entitled to our judgment.

The facts are clearly stated to us in the case, and they are, shortly, these:—The father had acquired by long residence a status, possibly a settlement, but at any rate a status of irremovability in the respondent parish, and he then moved into the appellant parish, and at the time of the order being applied for he had acquired a status of irremovability, although not a settlement in that parish. The settlement was a settlement in the respondent parish. The status of irremovability had been acquired in the appellant parish, and he had a child, the subject-matter of the present order and appeal. That child, having lived with the father during the whole time he was living in the respondent parish, had acquired a settlement, if it was necessary for her to acquire a settlement, in that parish, and, at all events, by her father's residence she had acquired his settlement, and, if he was settled there, she, having done no other act to acquire a settlement, was also settled there; and by the Acts 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 it is perfectly clear that she had also acquired a status of irremovability in the respondent parish. Then she leaves with her father, the respondent parish, and comes to live with him in the appellant, parish, and before the order is applied for and before he had acquired a status of irremovability in the appellant parish, she became sixteen. These are the only material facts to consider in this case.

Now it is not disputed that if this matter had arisen before the Act of 1876 she would have been irremovable, because the course of legislation has been to substitute for five years in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 36 a single year's residence, and to confer the status of irremovability which five years' residence conferred under the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66.

Therefore, it could not have been disputed, if this matter had taken place prior to 1876, that the child would have been irremovable because the father was. But the statute of 1876 enacted that "emancipation,"—a term not used in Acts of Parliament, but one well-known in the courts—is to take place at the age of sixteen. Heretofore it might have taken place at any age, before sixteen or after sixteen, and no doubt very difficult and embarrassing questions often arose as to whether emancipation had taken place, depending, in point of fact, on the facts of each case. Therefore, in 1876, it was enacted that at the age of sixteen years persons should be emancipated. The old poor law, unless it was altered by statute, would have been that such a person with a settlement of her own under 9 & 10 Vict. and 11 & 12 Vict. would be removable, whether the father or mother was removable or not; the moment she became chargeable to the parish to which she could not acquire a settlement herself, she would be removable into her own parish. That was when removals were common, and when it was the everyday practice to remove persons, even if they were of tender years, the moment they became chargeable, if they had acquired a separate settlement, to the parish of settlement. There were many modes of acquiring a separate settlement which might give a person a settlement long before the age of sixteen.

Upon that state of the law these two statutes, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, are enacted to operate, and they operated, as it seems to me, broadly and clearly to enact that, where the head of the family, whether father or mother, was removed, then the children should be removable as long, of course, as they were living together. Upon these statutes several decisions have taken place. The provisoes in these statutes are, as it seems to me, perfectly clear, and the object of them is, as I have said, that children should not be, or a child should not be, removed unless the father or mother were removed. That was the state of the enactments furthering that which had been the general bearing of the courts and of the Legislature also—namely, to keep families together, and although there might be necessary removals those removals should be made as few as possible, and that they should be, as far as possible, of whole families together or not at all, so that families should not be divided when it was necessary to remove them. That has been the general policy of the law. Upon that state of the law it has been argued by Mr. Greene that the statute of 1876 has produced this consegence, that it has at once, in the case of children of sixteen, repealed the whole of the law, and gone counter to the whole of the principles which had been laid down by the courts over and over again. Of course, if Parliament had deliberately said so in plain terms, we should have nothing to do but to give effect to the words of the Act of Parliament, but I think it has been very satisfactorily pointed out that these statutes may well stand together. The statute of 1876 does put an end to questions arising upon emancipation, and does fix for the purpose of emancipation, and for that purpose only, a time at which as a general rule the emancipation shall be held to take place, and where no other unrepealed Act of Parliament intervenes it is plain that an emancipated child, if he or she becomes chargeable, will and must be sent back to the parish of settlement. But then the Act of 1876 does not repeal those earlier Acts. Those earlier Acts create for the first time that which has not heretofore existed in the poor law, the status of irremovability. Formerly, if you could show a settlement you at once showed a case for removal, and however long a person might have resided in another parish, if he had not fulfilled the necessary requirements of the law and gained a settlement in the other parish, he might be torn up by the roots and sent off to any distance.' In order to remedy that, the status of irremovability was created, and in the statutes creating the status of irremovability the provisoes occur with which we have to deal.

The proviso applying to the status of irremovability enacts that children shall not be removed except where the head of the family is removed, and shall be removable. It seems to me, therefore, that when we are dealing with statutes which for the first time create a status, and annex as an incident to that status that which shall affect the children whatever their settlement may be, and whatever the father's settlement may be, and when we know that at that time a child might very easily acquire a settlement long before it was of an age to be able to live apart from its father, and when, consequently, having acquired a separate settlement, it may still be a member for all practical purposes of its father's family, then we can see upon that state of things that the 3rd section had a complete and useful operation, and that it carried the matter so far as to make the child irremovable, not only from its father or mother, but from its stepfather or stepmother, and still more from its reputed father. When we recollect all that, and when we see that those sections and those provisoes are left entirely unrepealed by the Act of 1876, which deals solely with the question of emancipation, I come to the conclusion that they may well stand together, and that this child is within—not the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, because that is gone—but the re-enacted provisoes of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111.

I think, therefore, that the court of quarter sessions quite right in holding under these circumstances that was the pauper was irremovable, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

Mathew, J.—I am of the same opinion. The construction of section 35 of the Act of 1876 which Mr. Greene invites us to adopt, would involve us in the renunciation of the old-established rule that a family is not to be scattered. The earlier statutes plainly indicate that intention of the Legislature, and nothing would have been easier than to have repealed those statutes if that rule was intended to be rescinded. The statute of 1876 is silent on the subject of repeal. We ought, therefore, to construe the earlier statute and this statute together, if we can do so consistently. There is no difficulty about that if we treat the statute of 1876 as relating to a settlement in the strict sense of the term.

As regards the earlier statutes they are confined to the question of irremovability. Reading the statutes in that way it seems to me that the argument of Mr. Poland is right, and this judgment must therefore be affirmed.

The Wayland Union appealed.

May 2.—H. D. Greene, Q.C. (Thorne with him), for the Wayland Union.—The pauper is not within section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, so as to be irremovable. Some limitation must be put on the meaning of the word "children" in that section. The proper limitation would be to confine it to children under the age of sixteen. This would make the proviso consistent with section 3 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. It is true that in Reg. v. St. Mary Arches, Exeter, and Reg. v. St. Olave's the paupers were over sixteen; but the ground of the decision in each of those cases was that the pauper was unemancipated. Section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, has now done away with all nice questions as to emancipation, and has fixed the age of sixteen as the age when every child shall cease to follow its parent's settlement: Guardians of Reigate Union v. Guardians of Croydon Union, ante, p. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465. In this case the girl, on reaching the age of sixteen, retained as her own the settlement which she had derived from her father: Guardians of Dorchester Union v. Guardians of Poplar Union, 36 W. R. 706, 21 Q. B. D. 88. There is no reason why she should not be removed.

Lumley Smith, Q.C. (Poyser with him), for the Mitford Union.—The word "child" in the Removal Acts cannot be limited to a child under sixteen. It means a child who continues to be a member of the family. This is shown by Reg. v. St. Mary Arches, Exeter, and Reg. v. St. Olave's. The law is not altered in this respect by the Divided Parishes Act. Section 35 of that Act deals with setttlement only, and not with the status of irremovability. The pauper is within the proviso of section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, and cannot be removed.

H. D. Greene, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the pauper is a girl over the age of sixteen living with her father as part of his family in Hockham parish, in the Wayland Union. His settlement, when she attained the age of sixteen, was not in this parish; neither is it now, but he has become irremovable from this parish. The pauper has become chargeable, and the parish insist, that though the father is not removable, yet they are entitled to an order removing her to the parish of her settlement (Shipdham parish, in the Mitford Union)—that is to say, the parish in which she has a settlement derived from her father. The question is not which is her settlement, but, assuming that parish to be her settlement, whether she can be removed there.

This question depends on the proper construction of the proviso in section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, and on that of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, and on the application of the one section to the other.

Before the statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, where a parent and child had different settlements, but were living together, and both became chargeable in the place where they lived together, they might be removed to their different places of settlement. That appeared to the Legislature to be hard and cruel, and these statutes, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, were passed with the object of preventing the separation of a family so long as it continued to live together as one family.

Section 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, after reciting section 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, enacts as follows:—"Provided always, that whenever any person should have a wife or children having no other settlement than his or her own, such wife and children should be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would be removable, notwithstanding any provisions of the said recited Act, and should not be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would not be removable by reason of any provision in the said recited Act." I think that applies to every person having a wife or children living with him or her as part of his or her family, and the words "having no other settlement than his or her own" mean having no other settlement than a settlement derived from him or her. In such a case the statute says the members of the family are not to be separated.

Then section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act was passed, with the object of getting rid of the difficulty which was experienced in giving proof as to derivative settlements. The section abolishes derivative settlements with two exceptions, the case of a wife and that of a child under sixteen. The section proceeds to state what is to happen in the case of a child under sixteen. Such child is to take the settlement of its father or widowed mother up to the age of sixteen, and, when it is sixteen, is to retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another. What settlement is it which the child is to retain the moment it reaches sixteen? Clearly, the settlement which it had the moment before—that is, the settlement derived from its parent.

Then, to apply these sections to one another and to the facts of the case, the result is that this child, being over the age of sixteen, has the settlement which, when under that age, she derived from her father; and as she is also living with him as part of his family, and he is irremovable, she is irremovable also. Therefore the appeal fails.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 had for its object to prevent the removal of any person from a parish in which he had lived for a certain length of time. The statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111 introduced a proviso which applies to every husband or parent whose wife or child has no other settlement than that derived from him or her, and enacts that in such case the wife or child is not to be removed unless the husband or parent is removable. I agree that that can only be held to apply to children so long as they continue to live with their parent as part of his or her family.

Then the effect of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act is that a child, while under sixteen, is to take the settlement of its father or widowed mother—that is to say, a derivative settlement—and that derivative settlement varies as the settlement of the father or mother may vary; and when the child attains the age of sixteen it is to retain the derivative settlement which it then has till it acquires another. It is still a derivative settlement, but no longer liable to vary with the parent's settlement; it is to be retained permanently by the child till it acquires another. A child can have no other settlement than its parent's until it has reached the age of sixteen, and, after reaching that age, has acquired a settlement of its own.

Therefore the present case comes within 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, and, as the father is irremovable, the child cannot be removed.

LA BANQUE DE PARIS ET DES PAYS BAS v. SAME.

LA BANQUE DE FRANCE v. SAME. (a.)

Practice—Interpleader—Payment of charges of applicant—Ord. 57, rr. 2, 15.

The court has power, under ord. 57, r. 15, to order one of the parties to an interpleader issue to pay the charges of the person claiming the interpleader, although such charges were incurred before the interpleader issue was directed.

Appeals from the decisions of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Fry, L.J.).

The defendants, acting as agents for the Société des Métaux, had deposited with Logan a large quantity of copper, and had received from him delivery warrants for the same, made out in their names and given subject to the wharfinger's charges. These warrants they indorsed and forwarded to the société, from whom they came into the hands of the several plaintiffs.

In May, 1889, the defendants sued Logan for the delivery of the copper, and on the 18th of June the plaintiffs claimed the copper as holding the warrants. Logan applied to interplead, and issues were directed, the action against Logan being stayed. Subsequently the defendants relinquished their claim to the copper, and on the 29th of January, 1890, an order was made at chambers directing that the issues should be discharged, and that the charges for wharfage of the copper from the 18th of June to the date of the order should be paid by the defendants.

The Divisional Court affirmed the order, and the defendants appealed.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Barnes, Q.C., and Hugh F. Boyd, for the defendants.—The court had no power to order the payment of these charges.

They cited Attenborough v. St. Katharine's Dock Co., 26 W. R. 583, 3 C. P. D. 450; Dabbs v. Humphries, 3 Dowl. 377; Cotter v. Bank of England, 3 Moore & Scott, 180.

Pollard, Wood Hill, and English Harrison, for the respective plaintiffs.

Loehnis, for Logan.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case it is said that the judge had a right only to deal with the costs of the wharfinger, and not with his charges. By ord. 57, r. 2, the applicant for an interpleader must satisfy the judge that he claims no other interest in the subject-matter than for costs and charges. By rule 15 of the same order the judge is to make such order "as to costs and all other matters as may be just and reasonable." What can those other matters be if they do not include the charges of which the applicant has informed the judge under rule 2. I think it is clear, therefore, that the judge had jurisdiction to deal with these charges. The case of Attenborough v. St. Katharine's Dock Co. is a direct authority in this court for dealing with such charges, and if any reasoning is required to justify that decision, such reasoning is supplied by the rules. There was, therefore, jurisdiction to make the order, and as the judge exercised his discretion wisely in making it, I think that the appeals must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—When rules 2 and 15 of order 57 are looked at, it is plain that there was jurisdiction to make this order. The applicant disclaims all interest in the matter except for charges and costs. Then the judge is to make an order "in and for the purposes of the interpleader" as to costs "and all other matters." It is impossible not to see that that includes the charges before mentioned. I agree that the appeals must be dismissed.

Will—Legacies given out of sale moneys—Deficiency—Lapse of one legacy—Abatement.

A testatrix made a bequest of jewels and ornaments to trustees upon trust to sell for the best price obtainable, and to pay thereout two legacies of definite amounts, but the will contained no gift of surplus sale moneys. One of the legacies lapsed. The price obtained was insufficient to pay both in full.

Held (distinguishing Page v. Leapingwell, 18 Ves. 463), that the legacy which did not lapse was not liable to abate in favour of the residuary legatee.

Adjourned summons.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A testatrix by her will gave and bequeathed to trustees certain diamond ornaments upon trust to sell and dispose of the same for the best price or prices that could be obtained for the same, and upon trust, by, with, and out of the proceeds to arise from such sale, to lay out and expend a sum not exceeding in the whole £600 in repairing a parish church, and also upon trust to lay out and expend the sum of £700 in building six labourers' cottages on the Warnford Estate, which was described as being then in the possession of E. Sartoris.

The will contained also a residuary bequest. The ornaments had been sold, but had realized only about £900. At the testatrix's death the Warnford Estate had ceased to be in the possession of E. Sartoris, and the court had already declared that the gift of the £700 had accordingly failed, and that this sum fell into the residue.

The residuary legatee took out this summons for a declaration that, on the true construction of the will, and in the events which had happened, the whole of the proceeds arising from the sale of the ornaments fell into the residue. He also asked, alternatively, for a declaration that the proceeds of sale of the ornaments, being insufficient to provide for the two sums of £600 and £700, the former sum ought to abate in the proportion of £900 to £1,300, leaving the balance to fall into the residue. It is upon the latter point only that the case calls for a report.

Romer, Q.C., and S. Dickinson (Rigby, Q.C., with them), for the applicant, argued that the sums given ought to abate, each legatee taking a proportion: Page v. Leapingwell, 18 Ves. 463.

Sir A. Watson, Q.C., and P. F. Wheeler, for the vicar and churchwardens, the legatees of the sum of £600, referred to Currie v. Pye, 17 Ves. 462.

G. A. Watson, for the trustees of the will.

Romer, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J., after deciding that the gift of the £600 was effectual, continued:—But there is a further point raised. The residuary legatee says that as the gift of £700 out of the proceeds of sale of the diamonds has failed, this lapse has taken place for her benefit. The diamonds did not produce £1,300, but only about £900, and the residuary legatee contends that the £600 legacy must abate, that legatee taking six-thirteenths only of the £900. It is plain that, as between the legatee of the £700, had that legacy taken effect, and the other legatee, the legacies must have abated in the proportion stated, but it does not follow, therefore, that the residuary legatee can, in the existing circumstances, claim seven-thirteenths of the £900. It is clear that if a specific property be given in trust for A. and B. as tenants in common in equal shares, and B. dies in the testator's lifetime, A. takes only one-half of the property. It is equally clear that the same result follows whatever be the fractions in which the property be divisible among the specific legatees. And it is equally clear that if property be given upon trust for sale, with a direction to divide the proceeds into aliquot portions, the gift intended in each case is that of a specific portion only of the proceeds. And the argument on behalf of the residuary legatee proceeds on the assumption that, on the true construction of this will, there is a gift to these two legatees of £700 and £600 of aliquot portions of the proceeds of sale. But, in my opinion, on the true construction of this will that is plainly not the true interpretation. It is not as if the direction had been to sell the diamonds for not less than a sum of £1,300, and the testatrix had then proceeded to give thereout the legacies; that would have amounted to a gift of the fund in specific proportions. The residuary legatee's argument is founded on the well-known case of Page v. Leapingwell, where the sum of the gift, to put it quite shortly, was, "distribute £10,000 in aliquot proportions among certain named legatees, with a gift over of the overplus moneys to A.," and, on the question of the construction to be put on this term "overplus," Sir W. Grant held that it meant a sum of £2,200, being the fractional remainder of the sum of £10,000, for the testator having directed a sale for not less than £10,000, the gift was considered as being, in substance, a division of that sum in specific or aliquot portions among the legatees who were to take as tenants in common in the proportions named. It followed that if any one of them died in the lifetime of the testator, or if for any other reason the gift to any of them failed, such event did not increase the benefits intended to be given to the others. But that decision has no application to the present case. To my mind, on the construction of the will, it is not open to argue that the gifts here are of aliquot proportions of the produce of sale. The will contains no statement of the amount of the fund to be disposed of, nor of the sum for which the diamonds are to be sold, nor is there, in terms, any gift of the overplus in the event of their fetching more than £1,300, and it is only by the general law that such overplus, being undisposed of, would have fallen into the residue. And it is clear that, if these diamonds had sold for, say, £2,000, the persons entitled to the sum of £600 would not have taken six-thirteenths of the £2,000. In the result the gift here is simply equivalent to a gift by a testator of the Consols which he may be possessed of at his death upon trust to sell and raise thereout £600 to be paid to A. and £700 to be paid to B., in which case, there being no priority between the two, if the Consols turn out to be insufficient, abatement would be necessary. But in reality such gifts amount to charges on the Consols, and as such, must be paid before the residuary legatee can claim anything thereout. In the present case the residuary legatee is attempting to creep into the shoes of the legatee of the £700 as if that legacy had taken effect, but this legacy is gone, and the residuary legatee is entitled to claim, not the legacy of £700, but only so much of the produce of sale as will, but for the legacies bequeathed thereout, fall into the residue. And none of it does so fall until the specific gift of the £600 has been discharged. It is unnecessary for me further to consider the authorities. I hold the £600 must be paid in full before the residuary legatee can take any part of the fund.

The sheriff, before the presentation of a winding-up petition, entered the premises and took possession of the chattels of a company, and after the commencement of the winding up received moneys paid by the public for admission to the premises.

Held, that the execution was, as to these moneys, put in force after the commencement of the winding up, and was void under section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862.

Adjourned summons.

(a.) Reported by JAMES H. BAKEWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 5th of February, 1890, an order was made for the winding up of the Opera Co. (Limited) upon a petition which was presented on the 18th of January. The company carried on a theatre, and on the 16th of January the sheriff, under a fi. fa. issued by a judgment creditor of the company, took possession of the chattels at the theatre, consisting of the scenery and dresses. The sheriff continued in possession till the 8th of February, when he withdrew in pursuance of an order of the court made in the winding up, and whilst in possession, and after the presentation of the petition, received the moneys paid by the public for admission to the performances at the theatre, and paid thereout the execution creditor his debt and costs. This was a summons by the official liquidator in the winding up claiming the moneys which had been thus received and paid by the sheriff.

Marten, Q.C., and Manby, for the official liquidator.—As regards the moneys received by the sheriff from the public, the execution was put in force after the commencement of the winding up, and is therefore void under section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862.

They cited In re Liverpool Civil Service Association, Ex parte Greenwood, 22 W. R. 636, L. R. 9 Ch. 511; In re Vron Colliery Co., 30 W. R. 388, 20 Ch. D. 442.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Rose-Innes, for the sheriff.—The execution was put in force when the sheriff entered: In re London and Devon Biscuit Co., 19 W. R. 943, L. R. 12 Eq. 190; the Companies Act, 1862, ss. 85, 87; In re Withernsea Brick Works, 29 W. R. 178, 16 Ch. D. 337. In receiving these moneys from the public the sheriff was continuing to enforce the execution which he had already "put in force." Having seized the goods of the company the sheriff might have sold everything and prevented the company from receiving any of these moneys; they are, therefore, the fruit of his forbearance, and he is entitled to apply them in discharge of the judgment creditor.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion the official liquidator is entitled to have an account from the sheriff of the moneys which he has received, and the sheriff is not entitled to be allowed the amount which he has paid to the execution creditor. All these moneys were received by the sheriff after the commencement of the winding up; he was putting the execution in force when he actually received the money.

The money paid by the public for entrance to the theatre belonged to the company; the spectators had no right to it when they had paid it. If it had not been the property of the company the sheriff could not have received it at all; it was only because it was paid to the company that he did receive it.

Section 163 of the Companies Act provides that any execution put in force after the commencement of the winding up shall be void to all intents; as to these particular moneys the execution was put in force after the commencement of the winding up; it is, therefore, void, and the liquidator is entitled to the money.

The order will be without prejudice to any right which the sheriff may be able to establish against any property of the company of which he took possession before the commencement of the winding up.

Summons.

This was a summons taken out by C. H. Carlisle and J. W. Carlisle, two of the defendants to the action, asking for a stay of proceedings on the ground that the matters in dispute had been agreed to be referred to arbitration.

Under a partnership deed, dated the 3rd of February, 1879, H. Carlisle, W. Clegg, W. H. Clegg, and G. Kirby carried on business together. The deed contained the usual clause for reference of differences and disputes between the partners or their representatives in relation to the affairs of the partnership to two arbitrators or their umpire, pursuant to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

W. Clegg died on the 24th of August, 1887, and the plaintiffs and two of the defendants were his executors and trustees. The business was continued by the surviving partners. H. Carlisle died on the 10th of March, 1889, and after his death the two surviving partners continued the business. The plaintiffs commenced this action in November, 1889, and by their statement of claim alleged that, under a general account and valuation of the assets and liabilities of the partnership in June, 1887, the amount due to the executors of W. Clegg on the day of his death in respect of his share and interest in the partnership was £30,119, and that £28,341 still remained owing to them, and the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the surviving partners and the executors of H. Carlisle, deceased, were jointly and severally liable for such sum, or, in the alternative, to have an acount taken.

Hornell, for the summons.—It is no answer to an application for stay of proceedings, in cases where the deed has agreed to refer to arbitration, that the question in dispute is one of law only: Randegger v. Holmes, L. R. 1 C. P. 679, 15 W. R. Dig. 6, decided on section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which is replaced by section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the plaintiffs.—The court has a discretion in the matter: Lyon v. Johnson, 37 W. R. 427, 40 Ch. D. 579.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Bruce, for other defendants.

NORTH, J.—At the present stage of these proceedings it appears to me that the only question arising is a question of law. It would be absurd to refer such a question to an arbitrator, who would probably come to the court for its opinion under section 19.

Section 4 gives me a discretion, and in my opinion the best course will be, in the first place, to try the question of law. The summons must stand over until the defences are delivered, when the point of law will be raised, and any of the parties can apply for me to decide it. If, after the decision, any question of account remains, it can go to an arbitrator to fix the amount.

REG. v. JUDGE OF THE CITY OF LONDON COURT AND THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP "MICHIGAN." (a.)

County court—Admiralty jurisdiction of—Action in rem for wages—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-section 2.

The mate of a vessel who had finished his articles and been paid off, but who remained on board as her chief officer and superintended the unloading of the cargo, and generally looked after the vessel while in port, is entitled to proceed in rem in the county court against the vessel for his remuneration.

Rule nisi for a mandamus to the judge of the City of London Court to hear and determine the cause. It appeared that the plaintiff, who was employed as mate on board a vessel called The Michigan, had brought an action in rem in the City of London Court for wages earned by him as chief officer after he had finished his articles and been paid off, and while the vessel was in port unloading her cargo. The judge of the City of London Court held that he had no jurisdiction to try the case, on the ground that the plaintiff was not at the time employed as a seaman, and was not therefore entitled to proceed in rem.

Aspinall, shewed cause.—The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, has been construed to confer on county courts the same jurisdiction that the Admiralty Court had at the time of the passing of that Act. By section 3, sub-section 2, of the Act it is provided that the county court shall have jurisdiction to try any claim (inter alia) for "wages." At that date the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court over wages was restricted to seamen's wages. The question, therefore, is, Was the plaintiff at the time of his employment a seaman within the meaning of the Act? By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 149, the engagement as seaman commences from the time of his signing the articles. Here the old articles had expired and no new ones had been entered into; and the plaintiff had been paid off. The case of The Great Eastern, 1 L. R. Adm. 384, 5 Aspinall M. C. N. S. 511, 34 W. R. Dig. 180, is distinguishable, as in that case the seamen were engaged for the next voyage, and the services were mere preliminaries to the signing of the articles.

Nelson, for the plaintiff, in support of the rule.—The plaintiff was performing all the duties which as mate he ought to perform. There is no distinction between this case and that of The Great Eastern. By the interpretation clause of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, "seaman" includes every person employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship, and section 181 gives such a person a right to his wage. It is true this is not a proceeding to enforce a maritime lien, and this man had no maritime lien, yet he had a right to proceed in rem.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 11.—Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I have consulted Butt, J., a judge of the Admiralty Division, and in deference to his authority I have come to the conclusion that the judge of the City of London Court was wrong in holding that he had no jurisdiction in this case. My first opinion was the other way, but I now think that the judge had jurisdiction, and that he must therefore hear and determine the case on its merits. It appears that according to the practice in Admiralty persons in the position of the plaintiff have been in the habit of maintaining actions of this kind in that court. That determines the case, because the question depends upon what was the admiralty jurisdiction transferred by the Act of Parliament to the county court.

WILLS, J.—I concur, not merely in deference to the authority of my brother Butt, but also because it is my own view of what the judge's authority was in this case.

Practice—Interrogatories—Penal action—Fraudulent removal of goods by tenant—Action by landlord for double value under 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3.

An action brought by a landlord under 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3, to recover double value against a tenant for fraudulently removing his goods to avoid a distress for rent, and against others for wilfully and knowingly aiding the tenant in such removal, is a penal action, and the plaintiff is not entitled to administer interrogatories to the defendants.

Jones v. Jones, 37 W. R. 479, 22 Q. B. D. 425, followed.

Case referred to the court by Hawkins, J., at chambers, upon the question whether, in an action by a landlord, under 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3, to recover against the tenant double the value of goods alleged to have been fraudulently removed to avoid distress, interrogatories can be administered by the plaintiff to the defendant.

The plaintiffs brought their action under 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3, to recover against both the defendants double the value of goods which it was alleged that the defendant Myers, the tenant, had fraudulently removed to avoid distress, and which it was alleged that the defendants Hudson & Co. had wilfully and knowingly aided the tenant in removing.

The plaintiffs had delivered interrogatories; the defendants, Hudson & Co., had declined to answer, on the ground that the action was a penal action, and that the answer might tend to criminate them. The plaintiffs then applied to a master to order an answer; upon this application the master made no order, and on appeal Hawkins, J., referred the matter to the court.

W. Graham, for the plaintiffs.—The question is whether the action for double value under the Act 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3, is a penal action. I submit it is not so: where the main object is to compensate the party aggrieved, then the action is not a penal action, and interrogatories may be administered; but where the object is to punish the defendant, then interrogatories are not allowed. There is no distinction between the present case and the case of Adams v. Batley, 35 W. R. 437, 18 Q. B. D. 625, where interrogatories were allowed. The question is not whether this is a penalty in the sense of the party having to pay more than the damage actually suffered, but whether it is an action to compensate, and, if so, interrogatories are allowed. The case of Martin v. Treacher, 34 W. R. 315, 16 Q. B. D. 507, and Jones v. Jones, 37 W. R. 479, 22 Q. B. D. 425, are different from the present. The object of the action, as shown by the statement of claim, is to compensate the landlord for the injury he has received for what is described as a fraud, and, that being so, he was entitled to ask what goods the defendant had got or where they were, and what goods they had got which had been removed. If there was any objection, then the objection ought to be taken on oath in the affidavit in answer.

Duke, for the defendants Hudson & Co., was not heard.

GRANTHAM, J.—I have no doubt on the authorities that interrogatories cannot be administered here. The question was decided in Jones v. Jones, for whether the action is for recovery of double value or treble value the principle is the same. I think therefore that there is no authority for saying that interrogatories can be administered in cases of this kind. I am of opinion we are bound by Jones v. Jones, and under these circumstances this appeal ought to be dismissed.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case is decided by Jones v. Jones, and I may add that I concur with that case.

HUBBARD AND ANOTHER v. GOODLEY. (a.)

County court—Jurisdiction—Sum claimed exceeding £50—Claim reduced below £50 by sum not admitted by defendant—"Admitted set-off"—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 57.

Section 57 of the County Courts Act, 1888, gives the county court jurisdiction to try a case "where the debt or demand claimed consists of a balance not exceeding £50, after an admitted set-off of any debt or demand claimed or recoverable by the defendant from the plaintiff."

Held, that a set-off, to be an "admitted set-off" within the meaning of this section, must be a set-off admitted by both parties, so that, in a claim above £50, a plaintiff cannot, by giving credit for a sum which is not admitted by the defendant, reduce his claim below £50, so as to give the court jurisdiction to try the case.

Appeal from Wisbeach County Court.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, the landlords, against the defendant, as tenant of a certain farm, for breaches of covenant by the tenant, and in the particulars the plaintiffs allowed a set-off in respect of manures. The plaintiffs claimed in their particulars the sum of £56 9s. 11d., and they gave the defendant credit for a set-off of £14 9s. 11d., which reduced the claim to £42.

This set-off was not admitted by the defendant, and as soon as the case was called on and the jury sworn, the objection was taken, on behalf of the defendant, that the county court had no jurisdiction, as the claim was one above £50, and that it could not be reduced so as to bring it within the jurisdiction by a set-off which was disputed by the defendant, and that such set-off was not an "admitted set-off" within the meaning of section 57 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

The learned judge upheld this objection, and he nonsuited the plaintiffs, on the ground that the county court had no jurisdiction to entertain the case, as the plaintiffs' claim exceeded £50, and that it was not reduced below that amount by an "admitted set-off" within the section.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Section 57 of the County Courts Act, 1888, enacts: "Where in any action the debt or demand claimed consists of a balance not exceeding £50, after an admitted set-off of any debt or demand claimed or recoverable by the defendant from the plaintiff, the court shall have jurisdiction to try such action."

W. J. Brooks, for the plaintiffs.—The question is whether this sum of £14 9s. 11d. is an admitted set-off within the meaning of the section. In section 57 of the Act a set-off is sufficient if it be admitted by the plaintiff. Walesby v. Goulston, 14 W. R. 899, L. R. 1 C. P. 567, appears to be against me, but there is a later case of Percival v. Pedley, 35 W. R. 566, 18 Q. B. D. 635, which extends the meaning of "admitted set-off" in Walesby v. Goulston to cases where the set-off is admitted by the plaintiff before action. The only difference between Percival v. Pedley and the present case is that Percival v. Pedley was a case remitted to the county court under section 7 of the County Courts Act, 1867. That, however, makes no substantial difference. In Walesby v. Goulston the plaintiff did not admit the set-off, whereas in the present case it is admitted by the plaintiff, as it was in Percival v. Pedley, which is an authority upon the present point and governs the case.

Horace Brown, for the defendant.—The case of Walesby v. Goulston was decided on the 24th section of the County Courts Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108), and the words of that section are identical with the words of the present section. Walesby v. Goulston is therefore an authority precisely in point in the present case. The answer to the case of Percival v. Pedley is that that was a decision on a remitting Act under a section which remitted actions from the High Court, and not under a section which gave jurisdiction ab initio. In addition to this, the words of the present section are different from the words of the section of the Act of 1867 under which Percival v. Pedley was decided, for the words in the present section are "claimed or recoverable," which do not occur in the section of the Act of 1867.

Brooks replied.

HUDDLESTON, B.—We have now to give our judgment upon one question, and upon one question only—whether, when the set-off is admitted by the plaintiff, but not admitted by the defendant, the judge has a right to say that there is no jurisdiction to try the case. That is the real question in the case. The plaintiffs claim £56 9s. 11d., and in their particulars they give the defendant credit for £14 9s. 11d., leaving a balance of £42.

It was said that this sum of £14 9s. 11d. is an admitted set-off within the meaning of the section, and if so, then the county court judge had jurisdiction to try the case. But if the defendant had a right to say I will not admit the set-off, then the amount claimed would be above £50, and there would be no jurisdiction. The question then is simply this, can a plaintiff give himself credit for a sum which will reduce the claim below £50. We must look at the section: what is the meaning of the word "admitted" in the section? Is it "admitted" by both parties, or by the plaintiff alone? In my opinion, "admitted" in that section means admitted by both parties, and the case of Walesby v. Goulston is, in my opinion, conclusive on the point. It is true that the case of Walesby v. Goulston was decided under a different Act of Parliament, but it was an Act where the words were precisely the same as in the present Act, for the words there, as in the present case, were "after an admitted set-off of a debt or demand claimed or recoverable by the defendant from the plaintiff." Not only is there a decision on the point in Walesby v. Goulston, but there are some strong expressions of opinion on the matter by Erle, C.J., which were acquiesced in by the other judges.

I must say that in my view the set-off must be admitted by both parties. It is true that there is the case of Percival v. Pedley, but that case was under a different Act of Parliament, and raised the question whether the plaintiff can bring his case within the Act of Parliament by giving credit for a certain sum which may not be admitted by the defendant. In the argument of Percival v. Pedley the case of Walesby v. Goulston was not referred to, and I don't think Percival v. Pedley applies to the present case. Looking at the words of the Act itself, we see that there are words in section 57 of the present Act which were not in the Act under which Percival v. Pedley was decided. The 57th section has the words "claimed or recoverable," which were not in the earlier Act. The set-off must be an admitted set-off of a sum "claimed or recoverable" by the defendant. Here there has never been any sum claimed by the defendant, and there was no evidence to show that there was any sum recoverable by him.

The question for us is whether a plaintiff can, by giving credit for a certain sum, bring his case within the section; I do not think he can, and under these circumstances this appeal should be dismissed.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs here rely on Percival v. Pedley, but not only is that a decision under a different Act, but it is under an Act where the same language is not used, for in the section under which that case was decided, there is not a word about a debt "claimed or recoverable" by the defendant. That decision may be right, as that had reference to remitting actions to county courts. Here if the plaintiffs are right the defendant has no voice at all in the matter, and the superior court no voice at all. The facts do not bring the case within the section as an admitted set-off, and the judge had no jurisdiction to try the case.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF GLAMORGANSHIRE. (a.)

Justices—Quarter sessions—Practice—Appeal from conviction—Recognizance out of time—Estreat of, for costs—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 31, sub-section (3).

An appellant from a conviction of a court of summary jurisdiction to a court of quarter session had entered into the recognizance specified by section 31, sub-section (3), of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, but not, as that section requires, within three days after the day on which he gave notice of appeal. The appeal was accordingly dismissed, with costs.

Held, that the recognizance was not void, and might be estreated by the court of quarter sessions for non-payment of the costs awarded upon the dismissal of the appeal.

(a.) Reported by G. K. PALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rule nisi calling on the justices of Glamorganshire to show cause why a certiorari should not issue to bring up, for the purpose of quashing it, an order of quarter sessions estreating a recognizance.

On July 3, 1889, a conviction was obtained at Cardiff Petty Sessions against one John Elliott for selling beer by retail without a licence. He gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions on July 6, but did not enter into the recognizance required by section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, until July 12. The recognizance was entered into by Elliott in a sum of £50, and by two sureties in a sum of £25 each. When the appeal came on for hearing objection was taken that, the recognizance being out of time, the court had, under sub-section (3) of section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, no jurisdiction to hear the appeal.

The objection was allowed, and the appeal accordingly dismissed, with costs, which were taxed at £21 8s. 9d. On the application of the respondent, on December 31, the court of quarter sessions ordered the recognizance to be estreated.

The recognizors then obtained a rule nisi for a certiorari.

W. D. Benson, for the justices, showed cause.—The recognizance can only be avoided by performance of all the conditions contained in it, and one of these conditions is that the appellant shall pay such costs as the court may award. This he has failed to do, and the recognizance may accordingly be estreated.

Abel Thomas, in support of the rule.—The consideration in respect of which the recognizance was given—viz., the right of appeal—has wholly failed, and therefore the bond itself is void.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of opinion that this recognizance was not void, and that the quarter sessions had jurisdiction to estreat it. A recognizance is stated in Burn's Justice, tit. Recognizance, to be "a bond of record testifying the recognizor to owe a certain sum of money to some other." The form of a recognizance taken by justices of the peace as a condition of appeal is that given in Archibald's Quarter Sessions, 4th ed., p. 665, and it provides that if the recognizor "personally appear at the next general quarter sessions of the peace . . . and there try such appeal and abide the judgment of the said court of quarter sessions thereupon, and pay such costs as shall be by the said court awarded, then this recognizance to be void." It is only to be avoided if the appellant performs all three of the above conditions. But here he never performed the last condition—that of payment of the costs of the appeal; therefore the recognizance held good. The appellant, knowing that he had made default in the matter of the recognizance, and that he consequently had no right of appeal, thought he would take his chance of the objection being taken, and would go to the quarter sessions to get rid of his conviction if he could, and then, if the objection were taken, would turn round and say that the recognizance was void, and so escape liability for the costs of the unsuccessful appeal. That he cannot be permitted to do.

GRANTHAM, J., concurred.

COOKE v. SMITH. (a.)

Creditors' deed—Assignment by debtor of business upon trust for creditors—No express trust of surplus after payment of debts in full—Resulting trust.

A trading firm, by a deed, which recited the inability of the firm to pay its creditors in full, assigned the business and all the estate and effects of the firm to trustees on trust in their discretion either to carry on the business or at any time to sell the same, and to divide the clear residue (after payment of all costs incurred in the execution of the trusts) of the profits of the business while carried on, and of the moneys arising from the sale when sold, among the creditors of the firm, in rateable proportions according to the amounts of their debts; and the creditors, whose names were scheduled to the deed and who were parties to and executed the deed, thereby released the assignors from all debts and claims of such creditors. The deed contained a declaration that the trustees might pay off in full, or compromise with, any of the creditors whose debts or claims were under £30. There was no express declaration of trust as to any ultimate surplus remaining after all the creditors had been paid in full.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that, on the true construction of the deed, there was a resulting trust of such surplus in favour of the assignors.

Appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J., sitting for Kay, J.

The action was brought by H. Cooke, one of the partners, and Rachel Swinnerton, the executrix of J. F. Swinnerton, a deceased partner of the firm of Cookes & Swinnerton, iron manufacturers, as plaintiffs, against the trustees of a deed of assignment of the business of the firm, for the purpose of paying the debts of the firm. The plaintiffs claimed that the sale of the business made by the defendant trustees to the Barrow Hæmatite Co. might be set aside as fraudulent, and that the trustees might be ordered to account to the plaintiffs for receipts and payments.

The deed of assignment in question was made on the 29th of December, 1876, between the plaintiff H. Cooke and the defendant J. Cooke of the first part, the plaintiff R. Swinnerton of the second part, the defendants J. T. Smith and T. Storey of the third part, and the several creditors mentioned in a schedule whose names and seals were subscribed to the deed of the fourth part; it contained recitals that the parties of the fourth part were creditors of the firm of Cookes & Swinnerton; that the firm being unable to pay its creditors in full, an agreement was in process of arrangement at the time of the decease of J. F. Swinnerton (who had died on the 15th of May, 1876) for the making of an assignment, and for the granting of a release to the said firm similar to that thereinafter contained; and by the operative part of the deed, the parties of the first and second parts assigned to the defendants Smith and Storey the business then lately carried on by the firm, and all other the personal estate and effects of the firm, to hold the same on trust in their absolute discretion either to carry on the business or at any time after to sell the business and premises thereby assigned, and out of the profits of the business if carried on, and out of the moneys to arise from such sale, to pay the costs, charges, and expenses to be incurred or become payable in or about the execution of the trusts, and to pay and divide the clear residue of the profits and moneys unto and among all and singular the creditors of the firm in rateable proportions, according to the amount of their several and respective debts, subject, nevertheless, to the covenants and provisions thereinafter contained; the scheduled creditors further released the assignors of all debts and claims. Then followed a declaration that the trustees in their absolute discretion might pay off in full or compromise with creditors whose debts were under £30. The deed contained no express declaration of trust as to any ultimate surplus that might remain after paying all the creditors in full.

The scheduled creditors who executed the deed were eighteen in number, some of whom were creditors whose debts were under £30, but among the remaining ten or twelve were several creditors claiming large sums, including the Barrow Hæmatite Co. and the Lancaster Banking Co.

The defendant trustees, in December, 1883, sold the business and premises to the Barrow Hæmatite Co., with the consent of the other creditors, in consideration of that company paying the other creditors the full balance due to them. In 1889 the plaintiffs instituted the present action.

On the application of the defendant Smith, one of the trustees, and of the Barrow Hæmatite Co., who were also defendants in the action, an order was made that a preliminary point of law—viz., whether the plaintiffs had any title to maintain the action—might be argued before the action was tried.

Kekewich, J., held that, on the true construction of the deed of assignment, the plaintiffs had no title to maintain the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Neville, Q.C., and T. E. Mansfield, for the appellants.—On the true construction of the deed there is a resulting trust to the plaintiffs, the assignors, of any surplus that remains after the payment of the debts in full. The deed is a creditors' deed, and as all the debts have been paid, the plaintiffs, as the original owners of the business, are entitled to the residue. The clause in the deed as to the payment in full of creditors under £30 is inconsistent with the view taken by Kekewich, J., that it was intended by the deed that the creditors were to take the residue for their own benefit.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Farwell, for the respondent Smith and the Barrow Hæmatite Co.—The bargain on the face of the deed was an assignment of the property of the debtor firm to the creditors in satisfaction of their debts, and in consideration therefor they released the debtors from the whole of their liability. The recital as to the inability of the debtors to pay their debts in full is only that they were unable to do so at the time of J. F. Swinnerton's death—non constat that they were unable to do so at the date of the deed—and it was really only inserted to protect Swinnerton's executrix. The common form of such deeds is that there is either an express trust of the surplus for the assignor or for distribution among the creditors according to the laws of bankruptcy. [FRY, L.J., referred to a form of assignment in trust for creditors given in Forsyth on Compositions with Creditors, 3rd ed., p. 230.] There is a similar form given in Davidson's Precedents, 3rd ed., vol. v., Part II. at p. 532, and these two forms, no doubt, do not contain any express trust as to the ultimate surplus; but, on the other hand, the forms given in Davidson, 3rd ed., vol. v., Part II., at pp. 521 and 542, do contain an express ultimate trust for the assignor. The object and intention of this deed was to transfer the business to the creditors; it was to be taken over by them in satisfaction and in lieu of their debts, and they had to run the risk of its proving insufficient. The idea was that the business should be carried on for some time, and the trusts as to the distribution of the proceeds were to take effect from time to time and not uno flatu merely. The fraction of interest that the creditors under £30 would receive of the profits while the business was being carried on would be so small that it was desirable to insert the stipulation that they might be bought out. [BOWEN, L.J.—There was no valuation made of the property assigned.] The parties to the deed were, probably, well aware of its value.

J. M. Solomon and L. Sanderson, for the defendant Storey.

COTTON, L.J.—Though this deed follows, as far as I can see, the exact terms of a precedent inserted in Mr. Davidson's book, the question arises as to what trusts are implied after all the debts are paid. In my opinion this is a deed intended to provide for payment, either in full, or partly, as far as the estate goes, of creditors; and although it is true that the parties did not contemplate that there would be a surplus—or else, I suppose, they would have provided for that—yet as there is, in fact, a surplus after payment of all the creditors in full, the question arises whether there is a trust for the assignors. In my opinion there is. It is true that there is no express provision on this point in the deed, but when property belongs to a debtor who assigns it for the purpose of paying his creditors the whole amount of their debts as far as the property will go, if those creditors are paid, then, in my opinion, there is a resulting trust—though not expressed—for the debtor. It is said when this deed was executed by the debtors and assented to by the creditors, that then the debtors had no longer any interest in this property, that the trustees were trustees only for the creditors, and that if the assignors by a stroke of good luck got the means of paying off their creditors, they could not have said to the creditors, "Take all the money that is due to you, release us from it, and we require you or your trustees to reassign the property to us." It is true that the deed contains a direction to divide all the proceeds arising either by the profits or the sale of the property amongst the creditors, and it was said that this direction was intended to cover everything, and therefore excluded the assignors from any interest in the property. But, to my mind, that is only a direction for payment of the creditors as long as they are creditors—that is, so long as their debts which they thereby release are not paid in full, but not a direction as to what is to be done with the surplus arising from this property when that has been done. In that event it would not, in my opinion, be right for the trustees to hand the surplus to the creditors, but it must go back to those who were the debtors, and who were released in consequence of the assignment which they made. Though this deed does not contain a clause directing the trustees to hold the surplus, after the payment of all the creditors in full, on trust for the assignors, yet, in my opinion, that is not necessary, because I can see clearly that the object intended to be provided for by this deed was payment or satisfaction of the debt due by the assignors; and when that was done any portion remaining, must go back to the person from whom it came to the trustees for that purpose. I differ from the view of Kekewich, J., but I cannot myself have any doubt on the subject.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Had it not been for the judgment of Kekewich, J., whose experience I respect, I also should have said that I had no doubt on the subject. It must be taken that this deed does not contain words which would have prevented this question arising. In order, however, to construe the clause, the construction of which is really the matter of our decision, one must make up one's mind as to what is the object of this deed. Is it the true object of this deed to pay the debts of the assignors and devote so much of the property of the assignors to that purpose as may be necessary—in which case as soon as the object is satisfied there would be a resulting trust to the assignors — or is it the true object of the deed, as the respondents contend and as the learned judge appears to have thought, that the assignors should get rid of their property, and as a consideration therefor should at the same time get rid of their debts? Those are the two alternative views. We start with this, that the deed is a deed which contains a schedule of the various creditors to whom, or for the benefit of whom, the assignment is made; and when we look at the schedule we find it consists of some eighteen firms and individuals, and after deducting a certain number of them whose debts are under £30, there are still some ten or twelve creditors remaining, among whom are the Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co. and the Lancashire Banking Co. The first recital, upon which I think stress ought to be laid, is a recital that the assigning firm are unable to pay their creditors in full—or, rather, that some months before, at the time when the negotiations were first entered into, they were unable to pay their creditors in full. I think, however, one can hardly read that recital without deriving from it the conviction that all the parties to this deed, at the date of its execution, regarded the assignors as unable to meet their engagements. Then comes the clause we have to construe. After assigning the business to the trustees on trust, at their discretion, either to carry on the business, or to sell immediately, or at any time afterwards, and after paying out of the profits of the business carried on, and out of the moneys to arise from the sale, if sold, the costs, charges, and expenses to be incurred or become payable in or about the execution of the trusts, there is a provision that the trustees shall pay and divide the clear residue of the profits and moneys unto and among all and singular the creditors of the said firm in rateable proportions according to the amount of their several and respective debts, subject nevertheless to the covenants and provisions thereinafter contained. I think it is doing no violence to that clause or to the deed, to allow the words of that clause to be read by the light of the previous recital of the inability of the firm to pay their debts; and I think that the language of the clause "to divide in rateable proportions according to the amounts of their several and respective debts" is to be accounted for by the fact that at that moment it was supposed that the property would not do more than satisfy in full the claims of the respective creditors. Then comes a further clause, which I think is also material, which gives the trustees the power, at their own discretion, to pay in full and make arrangements with creditors whose claims are under £30.

If the true effect of this deed were that the entire property was to pass to, and vest for ever in, the trustees for the benefit of the creditors whose names are scheduled, it seems to me almost incomprehensible that the deed should contain a provision which gave the trustees a power, at their discretion, to pay off or compromise debts under £30. The truth is that there is nothing at all in this deed inconsistent with the idea that its object is to pay the debts, and only to divide so much of the property of the assignors as is necessary for that purpose, unless it be that the absence of an express direction as to what is to be done with the surplus, and the somewhat limited language of the direction as to division (which I think is amply to be accounted for by the state of circumstances at the time the deed was made) are inconsistent with that idea. Having regard, however, to the fact that the number of scheduled creditors who have signed and sealed this deed at the time were, and are now, carrying on every kind of business, and together constitute a multifarious group, I cannot help feeling satisfied that it is far more reasonable and business-like to suppose that this deed was intended to protect them, and to devote to them so much of the property as was necessary to pay their debts, than to assume that they were buying a business, and intended, through the medium of their trustees, to embark in a new and—as far as several, at all events, of their businesses were concerned—a heterogeneous venture.

I confess that, reading this deed by one's ordinary natural lights, I should not have doubted that it was simply intended to be an assignment in payment of debts, and that there was implied in it, what equity always does imply after the object of the deed is obtained, a trust for the settlors.

FRY, L.J.—The question we have to decide is—What is the true nature of this deed? Is it a deed by which the firm agreed with their creditors upon a certain mode of satisfying their debts, and nothing more? in which case there would plainly be a resulting trust for the benefit of the assignors; or is it a deed by which the firm sold their business to their creditors, or by which they agreed to give up their business by way of satisfaction and accord to their creditors? in either of which two latter cases the creditors, and they alone, are the owners of the business.

Now I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that it is a deed of the first kind, and is what is commonly known as a creditors' deed—that is, a deed by which the creditors either extinguish or suspend certain of their rights as creditors in consideration of certain provisions to be made for the payment of their debts.

We start with this, that the deed throughout describes the persons who are of the fourth part as being creditors of the firm, and we find the usual recitals of inability to pay which are common in deeds of that description. We find no recital indicating an intention to sell the business; we find no recital indicating any intention to give up all interest in the business by way of accord and satisfaction of the debts of the several creditors; but we do find the assignment in the usual terms. Then come the words of the declaration of trust, which no doubt are not very felicitous, and which would create some little doubt if they stood by themselves. The declaration is that the trustees "shall pay and divide the clear residue of the said profits and moneys unto and among all and singular the creditors of the said firm in rateable proportions, according to the amount of their several and respective debts, subject nevertheless to the covenants and provisions hereinafter contained." Now, I think it is not unduly straining the language of that clause to hold that the words "according to the amount of their several and respective debts" have a double function; that they describe the ratio in which the division is to take place, and that they also determine the limit to which the payment is to be made. In other words, you are not paid according to the amount of the debt if you exceed the debt or go beyond the debt. That, I think, is the meaning which may be fairly put on those words to give effect to what, in my judgment, is the plain and obvious intention of the deed in its ordinary scope.

Then comes the clause as to the payment of creditors under £30, which, I think, is very material. It gives the trustees an absolute right and power to pay off all creditors under £30. Does that leave a creditor under £30 still a cestui que trust under the deed? If not, it is remarkable that these creditors, being, according to the view of the respondents, purchasers of the business, may be excluded from their share in the business, even although it is turning out a flourishing concern, at the will and discretion of their own trustees. That is a possible arrangement, but it is a highly improbable one. I think, therefore, that the true meaning of the deed is, that it is only a deed for the benefit of the creditors, and consequently there is a resulting trust, and that we must make a declaration accordingly, and remit the matter to the judge. The order of Kekewich, J., was, "This court doth declare that, upon the true construction of the said indenture, dated the 29th of October, 1876, the plaintiffs have no title to maintain this action." I think it should run in this way, "According to the true construction" of that deed "a trust resulted for the benefit of the assignors."

In re UXBRIDGE AND RICKMANSWORTH RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company—Parliamentary deposit—Company having no assets—Abandonment of railway—"Ordered to be wound up"—Respective rights of landowners, creditors, Crown, and depositors against deposit—Notice to treat—Compulsory powers—"Injury or loss."

A railway company's private Act of Parliament, passed in 1881, incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and provided (by section 34) that the parliamentary deposit should not be repaid to the depositors if the railway was not completed and opened to the public by a specified time, and (by section 35) that, in such case, the deposit should be applicable towards compensating landowners or other persons whose property had been interfered with or rendered less valuable by the commencement, construction, or abandonment of the railway, or who had been "subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company" by that Act, and, if no such compensation was payable, or any balance of the deposit remained after paying such compensation, the deposit or such balance thereof should either be forfeited to the Crown or, in the discretion of the Chancery Division, if the company was insolvent and had been "ordered to be wound up" or a receiver had been appointed, should be paid to such receiver or to the liquidator of the company, or be "otherwise applied as part of the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors thereof."

In 1888 a private Act was passed for the abandonment of the railway in a form commonly used for such Acts, and provided (by section 4) that where, before the passing of that Act, any contract had been entered into or notice given by the company for the purchase of land, the company should be released from all liability to complete such purchase, but that full compensation should be made by the company to the owners and occupiers, or other persons interested in such land, for all injury or damage sustained by them respectively by reason of the purchase not being completed pursuant to the contract or notice. Section 5 provided that, "subject to the provisions of this Act, and of section 35 of the Act of 1881, with respect to compensation to landowners and other persons injured, and for the protection of creditors," the court might and should order the deposit to be repaid to the depositors. Section 6 was as follows:—"Forthwith after the passing of this Act the company shall proceed to wind up their affairs, and shall pay, satisfy, and discharge all their debts, liabilities, and engagements."

At the dates of the passing of the private Acts of 1881 and 1888 there was in existence no general Act under which the Chancery Division could order a railway company incorporated after 1866 to be wound up in the ordinary way, as apparently contemplated by section 35 of the Act of 1881.

Held (reversing the decision of Stirling, J.), that the effect of section 6 of the Act of 1888 was that the company had been "ordered to be wound up" within the meaning of section 35 of the Act of 1881; that section 5 of the Act of 1888 took away incidentally any claim to the deposit money which the Crown previously had under section 35 of the Act of 1881; and, consequently, that, subject to the priority of landowners and other persons injured who might be entitled under section 35 to compensation out of the deposit, it was applicable to the payment, as creditors, pari passu with other creditors, of any landowners proving injury or damage under section 4 of the Act of 1888; but

Held (affirming the decision of Stirling, J.), that, by the words "in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company," in section 35, what was meant was, "in consequence of the exercise of" such powers, and that service of a notice to treat did not of itself, or even if a contract resulted, amount to an exercise of compulsory powers, so as to give the landowner any claim in priority under that section against the deposit; and

Held, lastly, that, even if service of notice to treat were an exercise of compulsory powers, the incurring of costs by a landowner to his solicitors and surveyors by reason of such notice, even though there resulted therefrom an agreement to purchase, which ultimately failed owing to the abandonment, did not amount to such injury or loss as was contemplated by section 35.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

The Uxbridge and Rickmansworth Railway Co. was in 1881 incorporated by its special Act (44 & 45 Vict. c. clxxv.), and was thereby authorized to construct a short line of railway between the places named, and to raise the capital necessary for that purpose, and the said Act also incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts.

Sections 34 and 35 of the special Act, which were in the common form then in use for such Acts, are the only sections of that Act which are material to the present case.

Section 34 recited that a sum of £5,838 £3 per cent. Consols had, in pursuance of the statute and standing orders in that behalf, been deposited in court, but that, one of the proposed railways having been struck out, the sum of £5,233 (part of the before-mentioned sum) was therein referred to as "the deposit fund," and provided (inter alia) that the said deposit fund should not be paid or transferred to, or on the application of, the depositors, or the majority or survivors of them, unless the railway should be opened for public use within the period limited by the Act.

Section 35 provides that if the railway should not be so opened within the period so limited, "the deposit fund, or as much thereof as shall not have been paid to the depositors, shall be applicable, and after due notice . . . shall be applied, towards compensating any landowners or other persons whose property has been interfered with or otherwise rendered less valuable by the commencement, construction, or abandonment of the railway or any portion thereof, or who have been subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company by this Act, and for which injury or loss no compensation or inadequate compensation has been paid, and shall be distributed in satisfaction of such compensation as aforesaid, in such manner and in such proportions as to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England may seem fit; and if no such compensation is payable, or if a portion of the deposit fund has been found sufficient to satisfy all just claims in respect of such compensation, then the deposit fund, or such portion thereof as may not be required as aforesaid, shall either be forfeited to her Majesty . . . or in the discretion of the said Chancery Division, if the company is insolvent and has been ordered to be wound up, or a receiver has been appointed, shall wholly or in part be paid or transferred to such receiver, or to the liquidator or liquidators of the company, or be otherwise applied as part of the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors thereof; provided that, until the deposit fund has been repaid to the depositors, or has become otherwise applicable as hereinbefore mentioned, any interest or dividends accruing thereon shall from time to time, and as often as the same shall become payable, be paid to, or on application of, the depositors."

In 1886 the company obtained a further Act, which authorized certain deviations in their line, and the raising of further capital, and also extended the time for the exercise of their compulsory powers.

The company having afterwards determined to abandon the undertaking, the Uxbridge and Rickmansworth Railway Abandonment Act, 1888, was passed which provided that the company should abandon the construction of the railways, and, "except only as is by this Act otherwise expressly provided," should "be absolutely freed and discharged from all obligations with respect to the making and maintaining of the railways."

Section 3 provided that the abandonment should not prejudice or affect the right of the owner or occupier of any land to compensation for damages occasioned by entry for taking levels or setting out the lines of railways, or for loss, damage, or injury sustained by him through any temporary occupation of his land, or through the exercise of any of the powers contained in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, or the Act of 1881, or that of 1886.

Section 4 provides that "where, before the passing of this Act, any contract has been entered into or notice given by the company for the purchase of any land for the purposes of, or in relation to, any portions of the railways or works authorized to be abandoned by this Act, the company shall be released from all liability to purchase or to complete the purchase of any such lands, but notwithstanding full compensation shall be made by the company to the owners and occupiers, or other persons interested in such lands, for all injury or damage sustained by them respectively by reason of the purchase not being completed pursuant to the contract or notice, and the amount and application of the compensation shall be determined in manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, as amended by any subsequent Act," &c.

Section 5 provides that: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, and of section 35 of the Act of 1881, with respect to compensation to landowners and other persons injured, and for the protection of creditors, the High Court of Justice may and shall, at any time after the passing of this Act, on application by the depositors mentioned in section 34 of the Act of 1881," order the deposit to be paid or transferred to the depositors, and thereupon the deposit should be paid or transferred accordingly.

Section 6 is as follows:—"Forthwith after the passing of this Act the company shall proceed to wind up their affairs, and shall pay, satisfy, and discharge all their debts, liabilities, and engagements."

Section 7 provided that when all the debts, liabilities, and engagements of the company should be paid, satisfied, or discharged, and the affairs of the company should be wound up, the company should be by that Act dissolved, and should thenceforth forthwith wholly cease to exist, and the Acts of 1881 and 1886 should be by that Act repealed.

The above Act was in a form in common use for private Abandonment Acts.

The Abandonment of Railways Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 83), applied only to railway companies authorized by Act of Parliament passed prior to the passing of that Act.

The Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), s. 31, extended the application of the Act of 1850 to all companies authorized to make railways by Act of Parliament passed before the then present session.

Section 31 of the Act of 1850 and section 31 of the Act of 1867 together, therefore, enabled a shareholder of any company to which those Acts applied to present a winding-up petition under the Companies Act, 1862.

The Abandonment of Railways Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 114), contained further provisions for the winding up of railway companies authorized to abandon their railways, and section 3 thereof provided that that Act should be construed as one with the Act of 1850, as amended by the Act of 1867; the result, therefore, was that the Act of 1869 applied only to railway companies authorized to make railways before the session in which the Act of 1867 was passed.

Section 199 of the Companies Act, 1862, excepts railway companies from being wound up under it, so that only such railway companies as section 31 of the Act of 1867 expressly provides may be wound up under the Act of 1862 can be so wound up.

There is no general Act providing for the winding up of railway companies incorporated during or since the session of 1867, though the common form in use in private Abandonment Acts passed since that date appears erroneously to assume the existence of some general statutory provisions for the winding up of railway companies without reference to the dates of their incorporation.

After the present company had abandoned the construction of their railway, the depositors applied for payment out to them of the deposited fund, and thereupon inquiries were directed as to any prior claims upon the fund of landowners and creditors, and leave was given for persons interested to apply in chambers for distribution of the fund after the result of the inquiries should be known.

In the result four separate claims, which were stated to be representative cases, were carried in by persons claiming a right to be paid in priority to the depositors, the claimants being a judgment creditor of the company and three landowners. The applications were adjourned into court to be argued as test cases.

The first case was that of John Macintyre, the judgment creditor, who had been the company's engineer, and had got a judgment against them for £2,144 6s. 2d., the amount of his charges for work done and costs. The company had practically no assets.

The second case was that of Benjamin H. W. Way, who was a landowner, and claimed compensation and damages on account of the company's non-completion of the purchase of some land from him at £300 per acre under a provisional agreement between himself and the promoters of the company, confirmed by a subsequent agreement between himself and the company, and also under a notice from the company that they required to purchase 15a. 2r. 13p. of his land. Mr. Way claimed the difference between the £300 an acre and the present market value of the land, and also his costs and charges incurred to his solicitors and surveyor consequent upon the said agreements and notice.

The third case was that of Grainge, who was also a landowner, who had had notice to treat served on him by the company under section 18 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and had accordingly delivered a claim for a fixed sum as purchase-money and compensation. The company had done nothing further, and Grainge now claimed for costs and charges incurred by him to his solicitors and surveyor consequent upon the notice to treat.

The fourth case was that of Messrs. Harman, who had been served by the company with notice to treat in respect of land of which they were co-owners, and had delivered particulars of their claim. As the company failed to accede to their claim, or to take any steps to summon a jury to assess the compensation, Messrs. Harman brought an action against them in the Queen's Bench Division for a mandamus to compel the company to take the necessary steps to have the compensation assessed, but the action was compromised, and the company agreed to purchase the lands at a fixed price, and to pay Messrs. Harman a sum for their solicitors' preliminary charges, the costs of the action and motion, a sum for surveyor's charges, and their solicitors' costs of the agreement. The company never completed the purchase, and Messrs. Harman now claimed for compensation, and for costs incurred to their solicitors and surveyor consequent upon the agreement.

Stirling, J., held in Macintyre's case that the company had not "been ordered to be wound up" within the meaning of section 35 of the company's 1881 Act, and, therefore, the deposit was not applicable for the benefit of the creditors.

In Grainge's and Harman's cases he held that the mere service of a notice to treat did not amount to an exercise of compulsory powers within the special or general Acts, that there had been, in fact, no such exercise in these cases, and that, therefore, the claimants had not been "subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers conferred upon the company" by the special Act of 1881, and that section 4 of the Abandonment Act of 1888 did not entitle the claimants to be paid out of the deposited fund, but that their remedy was merely against the company.

In Way's case he held that the depositors had no claim to a return of the deposit, which, subject to being applied for compensation in proper cases, was liable to be forfeited to the Crown, and that, no winding-up order having been made, it was not liable to be applied as a part of the company's assets for the benefit of their creditors; that the remedy of the applicants was only against the assets of the company, and section 4 gave them no claim against the deposited fund.

The four claimants appealed.

Hastings, Q.C., and Farwell, for Macintyre.—Our client is entitled, concurrently with other creditors of the company, to payment out of the deposit, of his judgment debt and costs, subject to prior payment of any sums found due, under section 35 of the company' special Act of 1881, to landowners or other persons injured by the construction or abandonment of the railway, or in consequence of the compulsory powers of the company. The Abandonment Act of 1888 provides what is in effect a statutory order to wind up the company, and therefore the deposit may be applied as part of the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors thereof under section 35 of the company's special Act of 1881. Otherwise what could have been the object of section 6 of the Act of 1888? In In re Birmingham and Lichfield Junction Railway Co., 29 W. R. 908, 18 Ch. D. 155, on which Stirling, J., relied, there was nothing of that kind. The two Acts here deal with the same subject-matter, and must be read as one. Where there are earlier Acts relating to the same subject-matter the later Acts should be construed by the light of the earlier: Maxwell on Statutes, 2nd ed., p. 40. Looked at thus, the Legislature must have intended by the later Act to supply the winding-up order contemplated in the earlier, the later provision being otherwise meaningless. At the time the Act of 1881 was passed there was no statutory provision for the winding up of railway companies incorporated during or since the session of 1867, and this fact must be taken to have been within the knowledge of the Legislature, who consequently provided for it in the case of this company by section 6 of the Act of 1888. The deposit was specially intended for the protection of landowners and meritorious creditors like Mr. Macintyre, and such creditors are entitled to be paid in priority to landowners claiming under section 4 of the Abandonment Act: In re Bradford Tramways Co., 25 W. R. 88, 4 Ch. D. 18.

Hastings, Q.C., and Gaselee, for Way.—Way claims compensation and damages, under the Act of 1888, for alteration of his land, and his solicitors' and surveyor's costs incurred in consequence of the agreement to take his land. The amount claimed is payable out of the deposit. A fourth of the line was to pass through Way's land, and when the Bill was before Parliament the promoters agreed to pay him £300 an acre for the land required belonging to him, and he accordingly supported the Bill, and it was passed. The agreement was confirmed by the company. They afterwards served notice on Way that they required to take about fifteen and a half acres of his land, and thereupon abstracts of his title were delivered, and other expenses incurred, and the relation of vendor and purchaser was thus constituted. Then section 4 of the Abandonment Act released the company from their liability to complete the purchase, but provided that they should pay compensation for "injury or damage sustained" "by reason of the purchase not being completed pursuant to the contract or notice." The company having no assets, we are entitled, therefore, to be paid out of the deposit. Section 5 makes the repayment of the fund to the depositors "subject to the provisions of this Act" (that includes section 4) "and of section 35 of the Act of 1881 with respect to compensation to landowners and other persons injured." Therefore, if the company fail to compensate the landowners, the deposit becomes liable to their claims.

S. B. L. Druce, for Grainge.—Grainge claims for costs incurred in consequence of the notice to treat served on him. Such costs are payable out of the deposit. Notice to treat is the first step in the exercise of the compulsory powers. "Compulsory powers" mean powers to be put into operation for the purpose of taking lands otherwise than by agreement. [Lopes, L.J.—The effect of the notice to treat is simply to put the landowner into the position of a vendor whether he likes it or not.] The assumption that notice to treat is an exercise of the compulsory powers runs through the whole case of Loosemoore v. Tiverton and North Devon Railway Co., 31 W. R. 130, 32 W. R. 929, 22 Ch. D. 25, 9 App. Cas. 480, so that I do not rely so much on the actual judgments there given as on the entire case. Guest v. Poole and Bournemouth Railway Co., 18 W. R. 836, L. R. 5 C. P. 553, is distinguishable, for even accepting the general proposition that notice to treat is not necessarily an exercise of the compulsory powers, it must have been so in the present case, and Guest's case, therefore, does not apply. But that notice under section 18 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is an exercise of the compulsory powers appears by the case of Marquis of Salisbury v. Great Northern Railway Co., 17 Q. B. 840. Grainge has sustained damage by the non-completion, of which damage the costs incurred are the measure. He has a further claim to come in, under section 35, as a landowner who has been subjected to loss in consequence of the compulsory powers conferred on the company. In the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, service of notice to treat is provided for by section 18, which comes under the heading of "Purchase of Lands otherwise than by Agreement".

and that is equivalent in the Act to compulsory purchase.

Grosvenor Woods, for Messrs. Harman. — Messrs. Harman had a contract with the company to sell them their property at a fixed price. That, of course, is rescinded by section 4 of the Act of 1888. But In re Harman and Uxbridge and Rickmansworth Railway Co., 31 W. R. 857, 24 Ch. D. 720, decided that Messrs. Harman had made out a good title. They therefore ask for their surveyor's and solicitor's costs, and the costs incurred for the purpose of getting the mandamus against the company to have the compensation assessed, and other costs. I adopt Mr. Hastings' arguments upon section 4. Upon section 5, I avail myself of the arguments of Mr. Druce. Messrs. Harman have sustained loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of the company, as, but for such powers, they should not have entered into the agreement, or taken steps to obtain the mandamus. Section 35 does not say "subjected to injury or loss in consequence of 'the exercise of' the compulsory powers," but "in consequence of the compulsory powers." That section ought to be construed liberally in favour of a landowner who has suffered loss in consequence of the compulsory powers. What was decided in Guest v. Poole and Bournemouth Railway Co. was that notice to treat was not necessarily "an exercise of" the compulsory powers, so that that case need not be overruled in order to decide in favour of Messrs. Harman.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the depositors.—The company's creditors have no claim against the deposit. The decision in Guest v. Poole and Bournemouth Railway Co. was upon the ground that, though the company, not having fulfilled the condition precedent prescribed by the Legislature, could not have enforced their notice to treat, yet, as against the landowner who had no means of knowing whether the condition precedent had been fulfilled or not, the company, having served the notice to treat, could not be heard to contend that it had no effect. Here section 35 of the company's special Act of 1881 provides for compensation being given, first, to landowners whose property has been interfered with, or made less valuable by the construction or abandonment of the line; and, secondly, to persons who have been subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking land conferred on the company by the Act. That must mean, as held by Stirling, J., "in consequence of the exercise," and not "in consequence of the existence," of those powers. A special Act was necessary to enable the company to be wound up, as in the case of the Potteries, Shrewsbury, and North Wales Railway Co., 32 W. R. 300, 25 Ch. D. 251, 254. There is nothing in the Abandonment Act here to make the deposit liable to creditors. In re Bradford Tramways Co. is distinguishable. In Marquis of Salisbury v. Great Northern Railway Co. all that was decided was that notice to treat, places the landowner and the company in the position of vendor and purchaser. Here, Macintyre is merely a general creditor, and, as such, can only claim under section 35, and that is subject to the condition that the company must have been ordered to be wound up, or a receiver appointed. It has, accordingly, been contended that the company has been ordered to be wound up by section 6 of the Abandonment Act of 1888, and that that is a compliance with the condition in section 35 of the earlier Act. But section 35, having regard to the context, clearly means "ordered by the court to be wound up" in the usual manner, and with the usual incidents, of winding up by the court under the Companies Act, 1862. The 6th section of the Abandonment Act of 1888 merely says, "The company shall proceed to wind up their affairs." That is not such a compulsory winding-up order as is required. Section 5 of the Abandonment Act of 1888 cannot be intended to extend the benefit of the deposit to creditors who could not come in under section 35 of the Act of 1881, and merely preserves rights existing in virtue of that section, or of other sections of the Act of 1888. If the Legislature had meant section 6 to be a compulsory winding-up order, particular directions would have been given as to the manner of carrying out the winding up.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 25.—COTTON, L.J.—These are four appeals which raise, though in a somewhat different way as to one or two of them, the question as to what ought to be done with regard to the fund which there is in court, and which was deposited there under the parliamentary rules when application was made for the Act to incorporate the Uxbridge and Rickmansworth Railway Co. The railway has now been abandoned, and the value of its assets seems to be five shillings—or to have been so some time ago—but that we have not now to deal with.

In the year 1888 an Act was obtained for the abandonment of the railway, and the question turns really on section 35 of the Act of 1881 and the sections to which I shall presently refer of the Act of 1888.

Under the Act of 1881 there was a parliamentary deposit which is referred to in section 34, and section 35 directed what was to be done with that money. It was not, of course, in any way assets of the company, but only a deposit which was required to be made when application was made to Parliament to give this company parliamentary powers; and that section did direct what was to be done with the deposit in the event of the company not carrying its undertaking into execution. At the time when the Act of 1881 was passed there had been an Act or Acts of Parliament enacting that railway companies who had been authorized to abandon their railway might have applications for a winding-up order made against them, but before the Act of 1881 was passed the Board of Trade had come to the conclusion not to grant the necessary certificate to enable application to be made for a winding-up order as regards companies which were formed after 1867, I think, or, at any rate, before the Act of 1881. Whether they were right or wrong we have not to consider, but in fact it was known at the time the Act of 1881 was passed, and still remained the fact at the time the Act of 1888 was passed, that the Board of Trade had come to that conclusion.

Now, what we have to determine is, whether or not, independently of the right to compensation in terms given to landowners by section 35, there is any claim maintainable by the company's creditors as against this deposit? Section 5 of the Act of 1888 I think is material. [His lordship read section 5 of the Act of 1888, and proceeded:—] This Act does interfere in some way with the provisions of section 35, because section 35, after providing that compensation out of the fund shall be made to landowners injured by the action taken by the company under their compulsory powers, did direct an alternative—namely, that what remained after making provision for that compensation should either be forfeited to the Crown, or, in the alternative, if a receiver had been appointed or a winding-up order had been made, the Chancery Division might apply it for the purpose of paying the creditors by payment to the receiver or to the liquidator, or otherwise apply it as assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors. Those are the terms of section 35, but I think I need not read the whole of that section in detail. It first provides for compensation to be paid out of the deposited fund for compensating any landowner whose property has been interfered with, or who has been subject to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers for taking property. Then when that is done, and after that compensation is made, what remains shall be forfeited to her Majesty, or at the option of the Court of Chancery if the company is insolvent. I had better read this part in detail: "If the company is insolvent, and has been ordered to be wound up, or a receiver has been appointed, shall wholly or in part be paid or transferred to such receiver or to the liquidator or liquidators of the company, or be otherwise applied as part of the assets of the company." Undoubtedly up to that time, unless there is an order so to apply it, the deposit is not assets of the company, and all the claims creditors can have must be under the special powers of the Act, they not having, apart from the Act, any claim as against the deposit, although they are creditors of the company. Then, practically, it comes to this, What is the effect of the Act of 1888? Does it contain a provision ordering the company to be wound up? Undoubtedly section 35 does contemplate a winding up in the ordinary way by an order of the court when an application is made under the winding-up Act, because there is a reference to the liquidator, and that points to someone being appointed under a particular winding-up order in order to distribute the assets of the company. But is the section confined to that? If we can find anything in the Act of 1888 which ought to be construed as an order to wind up the company, although it is not that kind of order to wind-up which is primâ facie contemplated by section 35 of the Act of 1881, yet, in my opinion, it would be wrong for us to hold that that does not come within the provisions of the Act of 1881, and is, therefore, not an order to wind up the company which enables us to say that the company has been ordered to be wound up. I think it would be wrong, by deciding in that way, to deprive the creditors of that which primâ facie Parliament intended to give them —namely, a claim against the deposit as assets of the company. I have already shown that section 5 of the Act of 1888 does interfere with the claim of the Crown. I think Stirling, J., considered that it did not do so; but undoubtedly it does, because when the provisions of that Act and of section 35 of the Act of 1881 for the protection of creditors have been complied with, it says that, subject to those provisions, the court "may and shall" order what remains of this fund, after paying compensation to the landowners, to be handed over to the depositors, thus leaving no room for any claim by the Crown. There the depositors do get a benefit. Do they get that benefit without making provision for the creditors of the company? That is answered by the words in section 35 with respect to compensation to landowners and other persons injured, and providing for the protection of creditors, and it is subject only to that being duly performed that the depositors can claim. There is in section 5 an express reference to the protection of the creditors, and, of course, that means payment to them of that which primâ facie section 35 of the Act of 1881 gives them, and it is only subject to that payment that the depositors have a right to this fund.

But it would have been strange if, when Parliament knew, at the time the Act of 1888 was passed, that without special legislation no petition could be presented under the Companies Act, 1862 so as to get a winding-up order against a railway company, there had not been in this Act something which would enable the creditors to get the benefit of that provision without a petition being presented and order made upon it —if there had not been, in fact, something equivalent to an order for the winding up of the company. Then is not section 6 something which enables us, and requires us, to say that the company has been ordered to be wound up? "Forthwith after the passing of this Act the company shall proceed to wind up their affairs, and shall pay, satisfy, and discharge all their debts, liabilities, and engagements." In my opinion that would not enable the company, or a creditor of the company, to present a petition under the Companies Act, 1862, for obtaining the winding-up order which is pointed at and, primâ facie, contemplated by section 35; but, in my opinion, that is a section which enables creditors of the company to say that the company has been ordered to be wound up. It is very true it does not say in terms that the company shall be wound up, but it does say that the company shall proceed to wind up their affairs, and shall pay, satisfy, and discharge all their debts, liabilities, and engagements. That is not in terms an order that the company shall be wound up; but, in my opinion, it would be too narrow a construction to put upon this section, to make a distinction between that and an order or an enactment for the company to be wound up, and to say: "No, it is not an order for the company to be wound up; it is only an enactment that the company shall wind up its affairs." It orders the company to do that which, if it were wound up under the Companies Act, 1862, and a liquidator were appointed, would be done by the liquidator. But here it is left to the directors of the company to do that which they are ordered to do, and which would be what would have to be done by the liquidator if the company were wound up by a common order. In my opinion, having regard to what must be taken to have been in the minds of the Legislature at the time this Act was passed, seeing that they recognize as still existing in section 35 of the Act of 1881 some provision for the protection of creditors, we ought to give to this section (section 6) of the Act of 1888 the meaning which I give to it—that there is a protection for the creditors in section 35 of the Act of 1881, but which exists only if the company is ordered to be wound up, as has in fact been provided for by section 6.

One must remember that at this time, without special parliamentary authority, there could be no winding up under the Act of 1862 by any order, because, as I say, the Board of Trade had refused to give, as regards railway companies incorporated at the time of this company's incorporation, any such certificate as would enable application to be made for a winding-up order. In my opinion, therefore, the proper conclusion to arrive at—not forcing the meaning of section 6 at all, but giving to it what, under the circumstances known to Parliament, is a proper and reasonable construction—is to treat it as an order made by Parliament, and not by the Court of Chancery, that this company should be wound up.

Therefore, in my opinion, the provisions of section 35 do apply, and the protection for the creditors exists which would not exist if there was no order to wind up, and none could be obtained. It does exist here, because in my opinion the company has been ordered to be wound up, and there is, therefore, power for the Court of Chancery, which I think it ought to exercise, to order that this sum shall be applied in satisfaction of the creditors of the railway company.

Of course there will be a question here arising as to the different claims which we have now before us, because some of them, it is said, will have priority over others. As I stated before, compensation under section 35 to landowners must be paid before the fund is so cleared that it may in the discretion of the Court of Chancery, under section 35 of the Act of 1881, be applied in payment of creditors.

Now let us look at these different claims. The first is Macintyre's claim. He was simply a creditor of the company, and not in any way a landowner. He had obtained judgment, and, that being so, it is not necessary for us to say anything about the rights of a meritorious creditor. He is a creditor who had obtained judgment against the company. He has no claim under the first part of section 35, but in my opinion he will come in under the latter part of the section as a creditor against this fund, with the other creditors who are entitled (after provision has been made for proper compensation to landowners), to take their debts rateably out of what remains of this fund.

Then we come to the other claimants, and I think I may say practically that the other claimants appear to be creditors of the company in respect of any loss or damage that they may have sustained either by reason of the contracts entered into by the company with them, or in consequence of any notice to treat which has been given to them. I need not read the words, but section 4 of the Act of 1888 does say that compensation is to be made to the owners and occupiers or other persons interested in the land for any injury or damage sustained by them by reason of the purchase not being completed pursuant to the contract or notice—that is, the notice to treat. Therefore these claimants must have a claim as creditors in respect of any loss they have sustained in consequence of the contract not being completed, or in consequence of notice to treat having been served upon them. But it was urged that they were entitled to something more than that; because they say "we come under the first part of section 35, which gives us a right to be paid in priority out of this fund, before it comes to be divided between the creditors of the company." The only thing they rely upon is really this notice to treat, because nothing was done in exercise of the compulsory powers—if there was an exercise of the compulsory powers by the railway company—beyond notice to treat. In my opinion it cannot be said that a mere notice to treat is an exercise of the compulsory powers.

It was argued that it was not necessary that there should be any exercise of compulsory powers, the words being, "subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company." I cannot take that view. The mere fact that compulsory powers have been conferred upon the company is, I think, not even what is here referred to. Here, in the first place, we have compensation given to "any landowners or other persons whose property has been interfered with, or otherwise rendered less valuable by commencement, construction, or abandonment of the railway, or any portion thereof." That does not mean because compulsory powers have been granted, but because there has been an exercise of them; and I think, as regards what follows, that it would be wrong to say that "in consequence of the compulsory powers" means simply in consequence of the existence of those compulsory powers. If that were so, directly the Act was passed powers would have been granted, and compensation might therefore be claimed, though the powers could not be exercised until the capital had been subscribed. In my opinion it would be quite wrong to hold that if any loss or damage had been incurred, a landowner could come and say, "This loss was thrown upon me because the Act of Parliament was passed." That is not it. In my opinion there must be some actual exercise of the compulsory powers to enable landowners to come in under section 35. One must remember, as I have said before, that this deposit fund is in no way an asset of the company. The only effect of the section is that certain rights are given to certain persons as against the depositors and against the fund which they deposit.

Then has there been an exercise of the compulsory powers? In my opinion there has not. It is very true the power to give notice to treat is included in that bunch of clauses in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which are headed, "And with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows." Then there follows the clause which provides for giving the notice to treat. But, although that is brought within that group of clauses, there may never be any step taken as regards the exercise of compulsory powers, because, if the company have not got their capital subscribed, they cannot exercise any compulsory powers, and the notice to treat, as was the case in one instance here, may be merely the beginning of an agreement with the landowner, and intended to ascertain whether he is willing to make the contract with the railway company, the company thereby saying, in effect, "We want that land—will you sell it us?" In my opinion it cannot be said that that alone amounts to an exercise of compulsory powers. We are not deciding this for the first time, because there is a decision which was given in 1870 in the case of Guest v. The Poole and Bournemouth Railway Co. that notice to treat was not an exercise of the compulsory powers. It was contended that that was not necessary to the decision of the case—that it was only that the company could not give the notice—but all the judges (and they were judges of considerable authority) in their judgments say that serving the notice was not necessarily an exercise of the compulsory powers. And in the events which have happened here it is shown not to have been an exercise of the compulsory powers. It is very true it is a step towards the exercise of the compulsory powers—that is to say, the compulsory powers, as regards the purchase of land, cannot be exercised until the notice to treat has been given, but neither can they be exercised unless the capital has been subscribed. Subscribing the capital is not an exercise of the compulsory powers, although it is a necessary step towards the exercise of those powers; and, similarly, a notice to treat is not an exercise of the compulsory powers, though it is a step that must be taken before the compulsory powers can be exercised and put into force. So, in my opinion, all these persons here—the three separate claimants—can only come in under section 4, and cannot come in at all except so far as they can show, just as the judgment creditor Macintyre can show, that they have suffered loss. He is simply a creditor, and they can only come in as creditors if they can show that they have suffered loss in consequence of the notice to treat, or in consequence of an agreement to purchase not having been completed by the railway company.

I differ, therefore, from the judgment of Stirling, J., in the opinion which he has expressed upon this part of the case. In my opinion the construction I have adopted is the right construction of these Acts of Parliament. It is very true—and I ought to have mentioned it before—it would have been very much plainer if the Legislature had said in the Act of 1888: "After this any creditor or shareholder may present a petition without any certificate from the Board of Trade." But Acts of Parliament are not always as plain as they might be, and the true construction of this Act is, in my opinion, what I have expressed.

I think, therefore, we ought to make a declaration letting all these persons come in—the judgment creditor and the others—the judgment creditor as a creditor of the company by reason of his judgment; the other persons as having a right, upon showing injury or damage within section 4, to become creditors of the company, provision then being made for payment of creditors of the company out of the surplus of this fund.

In my opinion, therefore, the appeals should succeed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The case before us raises two questions—first of all, whether these claimants are to be paid out of the money which is in court, and represents what is called the parliamentary deposit; and, secondly, supposing they are to be paid, whether they, or any of them, are entitled to any priority of payment over each other, or over other persons who have not made claims on the fund. Both these questions turn upon the construction of two Acts of Parliament, one of which, to say the least of it, is anything but clear. The parliamentary deposit is a fund which does not belong to the company.

The creditors of the company have no more right to be paid out of the deposit than any other creditors, except by Act of Parliament. There is no à priori right on the part of the creditors of the company to be paid out of money provided by the depositors, and they must look to the words of the statute or statutes upon which they rely to give them any claim at all upon that fund. The mere fact that they are creditors of the company will not do. That is not ad rem.

The Acts before us, to which the Lord Justice has adverted, do give them certain rights, and the question is, what rights? Under the first Act of 1881 the parliamentary deposit is applicable in this way. First of all, those landowners and persons who have really sustained injury by reason of the compulsory powers, or the works done by the company, were entitled to be paid in priority to everybody else. That is under section 35, which I will not read at present. Then, subject to that, the rest of the fund was dealt with in this way. It was in the discretion of the court to hand it over to the Crown, but if the court was of opinion that it would not be just to hand it over to the Crown, then the court could, if the company was insolvent and ordered to be wound up, apply the deposit in payment of the creditors of the company. The governing idea there was this, that, subject to the payment of those who were entitled to priority, the balance of the fund was to be handed over to the Crown, or to the creditors of the company if the company was insolvent. That is the governing idea. The language used is, "If the company is insolvent and has been ordered to be wound up"—which was one method of disposing of the assets of insolvent companies. But there can be no question that when those words were used, what was contemplated by anybody would be an order to wind up, in the ordinary sense of that expression. There was only one sort of order familiar to lawyers or to draftsmen of Acts of Parliament, and that was an order made by the Chancery Division under the Companies Act, 1862. It was overlooked that such an order could not be made in the case of a railway company incorporated after 1866 without a special Act of Parliament, and when we come to 1888, when the Legislature passed an Act enabling this railway company to abandon this undertaking, the same thing was overlooked. Now in 1888 the position of affairs was this. The railway company was not a registered company under the Companies Act, 1862—whether it could be is well known to be one of those thorny points which have not been decided. It was not registered, anyhow, and, not being registered, there was no possible procedure by which it could be wound up at all. It could not present a petition under the Companies Act, 1862—no creditor could do it—no shareholder could do it—it could not be done. Now in 1888 the Legislature was in this position—it intended the affairs of this company to be wound up, but overlooked the fact that it could not be done. It orders it to proceed to wind up its affairs.

Now, what does that mean? We are driven to this, that we must either say that this means nothing, or that it is a legislative order to wind-up substituted for the order referred to in section 35. There is no alternative. We must either say that the Act of Parliament is meaningless and utterly useless and not workable; or we must say that this is a statutory order to wind-up, substituted for the one contemplated by the previous Act. The latter, I do not hesitate to say, under those circumstances, is the true construction and meaning of it. In other words, when we come to look at these two Acts of Parliament, and work them together, as we must, we must hold that this company has been ordered to be wound up. It is insolvent enough, beyond all doubt, and the time has come, and the contingency has occurred, for paying the creditors of the company out of the deposit.

As I understand the judgment of Stirling, J., he seemed to be under the impression that it was still in the discretion of the judge to hand over the balance of this fund, after paying those who were entitled in priority to it, to the Crown. I cannot say that that is so on reading the section, because section 5 of the Act of 1888 does not say merely "subject to the provisions of section 35 of the Act of 1881," but it says that, subject to the provisions of that section "with respect to compensation to landowners and other persons injured, and for the protection of creditors," that fund is to go to the depositors. That seems to me to exclude the Crown entirely. Therefore, the net result seems to me to be this—that this parliamentary deposit is to be applied in the first place in payment of those persons who are entitled to priority under section 35 of the Act of 1881, and subject to that, it goes to the creditors of the company. That lets in the whole of these claimants. They were all excluded by Stirling, J., but I am of opinion that they should all come in.

Now I pass to the second question, whether any of them are entitled to priority. They are creditors of the company, and are entitled to come in and claim against this particular fund—which is not an asset of the company—by the joint operation of sections 4 and 5 of the Act of 1888 to which the Lord Justice has alluded. But for those sections they could not come in at all. Now are they entitled to priority? Section 4 gives them no title at all to priority. The sections together give them a title to be paid as creditors pari passu with other creditors. To make out their claim to priority, they must make out that they are amongst the class of people entitled to priority under section 35 of the Act of 1881. The persons so entitled are formed into two classes—first of all, landowners and other persons whose property has been interfered with, or otherwise rendered of less value by the commencement, construction, or abandonment of the railway. None of these claimants come under that class. But the three landowner claimants say they come under the next class, who are thus described, "or who have been subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company by this Act, and for which injury or loss no compensation or inadequate compensation has been paid." I do not think they do. In the first place the language is peculiar, and I think it is rather forcing the words to say that any of these gentlemen have been subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company. I think that is straining the language. But when we look upon the interpretation which has been put upon the expression "compulsory powers" in Guest v. Poole and Bournemouth Railway Co., and acted upon invariably and without hesitation ever since, it appears to me that these gentlemen are excluded from the benefit conferred upon that class of people by the section, and I do not think they can make out satisfactorily that they do come within the words "persons subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company by this Act."

That being so, the net result is this—that they are all entitled to claim against this fund as creditors, but subject to the prior rights of such persons, if any, as may be entitled to priority under section 35.

LOPES, L.J.—I have had an opportunity of talking this case over with the rest of the court. I entirely agree with what has been said, and I have only one observation to make, which is this—it is an observation with regard to priority of landowners—that, in my opinion, even if notice to treat is an exercise of the compulsory powers, which I do not think it is, I do not think any injury or loss has accrued to any of these claimants in consequence of the notice to treat. I quite agree with the rest of the court that this appeal should be allowed.

Cotton, L.J.—I ought to say that I concur with what Lopes, L.J., has said. I had intended to mention it in my own judgment, but had forgotten it in dealing with more important matters.

Lindley, L.J., also expressed his concurrence.

From Q. B. Div. April 24.

London Steamship Owners' Mutual Insurance Association v. Grampian Steamship Co. (a.)

Marine insurance—Lloyd's "running-down clause"—Further "protecting clause"—"Liability to pay"—Collision where both ships to blame.

The defendants insured their ship at Lloyds on a policy containing a running-down clause to the effect that the underwriters should pay three-fourths of any sum which the shipowners might become liable to pay, and might pay, to the owners of any other vessel for damage caused by a collision. They then insured with the plaintiffs against damage to any other vessel, so far as not covered by the running-down clause in the Lloyd's policy. Subsequently the defendants' ship came into collision with another vessel, both being to blame. Both vessels were injured, but the damage done to the defendants' ship exceeded that sustained by the other. The owners of the other ship therefore paid to the defendants the difference between half the damage sustained by their ship and half the damage sustained by the defendants' ship.

Held (affirming the decision of the divisional court, ante, p. 190, 24 Q. B. D. 32), that the defendants had not incurred any liability to pay to the owners of the other ship half the damage sustained by her, and therefore that they could not recover a proportion of that sum from the plaintiffs under the policy.

Appeal from the decision of a Divisional Court (Mathew and Wills, JJ.), reported ante, p. 190, 24 Q. B. D. 32.

The facts are fully set out in the report in the court below.

The defendants, the owners of the steamship Balnacraig, claimed to retain against the plaintiffs, a mutual marine insurance association, certain moneys which they had received to their use, under the following circumstances, which were stated in a special case for the opinion of the court:—

The Balnacraig was insured by a Lloyd's policy with a running-down clause in the following terms:—"And it is further agreed that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay, any sum or sums not exceeding the value of the said vessel hereby insured, we, the assurers, will severally pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of the sum so paid as our respective subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the said ship." The defendants then insured The Balnacraig with the plaintiffs against loss or damage to any other vessel so far as such loss or damage was not covered by the running-down clause in the Lloyd's policy.

On the 10th of December, 1886, The Balnacraig came into collision with The Karo. Both vessels were to blame, and both sustained damage, but the damage sustained by The Balnacraig largely exceeded that done to The Karo. In accordance with the admiralty rule, the owners of The Karo paid to the defendants a sum equal to the difference between half the amount of the damage sustained by The Karo and half the amount of the damage sustained by The Balnacraig, that being the sum for which the defendants, as owners of The Balnacraig, would have been entitled to issue a monition if a decree of the Admiralty Division had been obtained. The defendants alleged that they were entitled to recover from the plaintiffs under the policy their proportion of half the damage done to The Karo, since, as they contended, they had become liable to pay it, although it was in fact deducted from the amount paid to them by the owners of The Karo. The Divisional Court held that half the amount of damage to The Karo was not a sum which the defendants had become liable to pay, and had paid, within the meaning of the running-down clause, and, therefore, that they could not recover a proportion of it from the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Barnes, Q.C., and Arthur Russell, for the appellants.—The defendants must be considered as having paid to the owners of The Karo half the damage sustained by that vessel. The decision in The Khedive (Stoomvart Maatschappy Nederland v. Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co.), 31 W. R. 249, 7 App. Cas. 795, had no reference to the rights and liabilities of underwriters.

Cohen, Q.C., and B. A. Cohen, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The sole question in this case is as to the meaning and application of the Lloyd's policy to the state of things which has happened. It is true that the decision in The Khedive was not directed to the rights of underwriters under any policy, but the House of Lords in that case laid down a principle as to the liability of shipowners when two ships come into collision and both are to blame which is applicable here. They said that when two vessels came into collision, both being injured and both to blame, only one liability resulted, and that that must be determined by the Admiralty rule. That is to say, the amount of damage done to each ship is to be first ascertained. If those amounts are equal they cancel each other, but if one is larger than the other, then the owner of the vessel which has sustained least damage has to pay to the owner of the vessel which has sustained most damage the difference between half the damage sustained by the vessel which has sustained least damage, and half the damage sustained by the vessel which has sustained most damage. There is only one liability and only one compulsory payment, and it is ascertained by a simple process of arithmetic as soon as the amounts of damage have been ascertained, whether they have been ascertained in the same or in different inquiries. Now, applying that law to the present case, it is plain that there was neither any liability to pay nor any actual payment by the owners of The Balnacraig to which the running-down clause can apply. The underwriters undertook to make good to the defendants any sum which they might have to pay to the owners of another vessel. There has been no such payment and no such liability here, and therefore the owners of The Balnacraig cannot recover against the underwriters.

Fry, L.J.—I agree. The suggestion of the appellants is that they became liable to pay to the owners of The Karo half the damage sustained by that vessel. That is, I think, the very opposite of the principle laid down in The Khedive. It was there determined that there was only one liability in such cases—namely, to pay the difference between the respective halves of damage. Therefore, in this case, the defendants have not been under a liability to pay, nor have they paid, and there is nothing to which the policy can attach. The Divisional Court were therefore right in their conclusion, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Solicitor — Costs — Taxation after payment — Special circumstances—Delivery of bill—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.

Solicitors to trustees delivered to their clients in the years 1883 and 1884 bills of costs for work done for them as trustees, which were paid without taxation, the solicitors not having informed their clients that, if administration proceedings were subsequently brought and the bills were moderated in those proceedings, the trustees would have to pay out of their own pockets the amounts by which the bills were reduced on moderation. The solicitors also delivered to the manager of an asylum carried on by the trustees as part of the trust estate, other bills of costs for work done for the trustees. It was admitted that the bills delivered to the trustees were honest, and not excessive.

Held, as to the bills paid without taxation, that the fact of the solicitors not having given such information to their clients was not a special circumstance justifying taxation after payment; and, as to the bills delivered to the manager of the asylum, that delivery to him was not, in the absence of proof that he was authorized to receive bills for the trustees, delivery to the trustees.

In re F———, 16 W. R. 749, distinguished.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons by the trustees of the will of Dr. Harold Owen, asking that Messrs. Layton, Steele, & Co., who had formerly acted as their solicitors, might be ordered to deliver to them all such bills of costs as had not been already delivered, and that those bills and all other bills of costs which had already been delivered to them might be taxed.

Dr. Harold Owen, who died in 1883, was the proprietor of a private lunatic asylum, and the trustees, acting under a power contained in his will, had since carried on the business of the asylum, which was under the superintendence of a manager. Messrs. Layton, Steele, & Co. had acted as solicitors to the trustees from 1883 to July, 1889, when the trustees changed their solicitors; and the costs in question were for work done by the trustees during that period.

Several bills of costs had been delivered by Messrs. Layton, Steele, & Co. The three earliest in date were delivered to the trustees in the years 1883 and 1884, and had been paid without having been taxed; the solicitors, when delivering these bills, had not informed the trustees that if the bills were paid without being taxed, then, in the event of subsequent administration proceedings, if these bills should be moderated by the chief clerk in such proceedings, the trustees would have to pay out of their own pockets the amount by which the bills were reduced on moderation. But it was admitted that the three bills were fair and did not contain excessive charges. Of the subsequent bills, which had not been either taxed or paid, four had been delivered to the manager of the asylum instead of the trustees, who alleged that the bills had not been delivered to them.

The evidence with respect to the duties of the manager of the asylum did not show that he had any authority to accept the delivery of solicitors' bills as agent for the trustees.

C. Church, for the trustees.—With regard to the three bills delivered in 1883 and 1884, which had been paid without taxation, it was the duty of the solicitors to inform their clients, the trustees, that if they paid the bills without having them taxed, then, if administration proceedings should be subsequently commenced and the bills were moderated at the instance of the cestui que trust, the trustees would have to pay out of their own pockets the amount taken off the bills. The solicitors, however, did not fulfil this duty to their clients, and this is a special circumstance justifying the taxation of these bills after payment. This is supported by In re F———, 16 W. R. 749, in which Lord Romilly considered the continuance of the relation of solicitor and client after the delivery of the bill a special circumstance, and referred the bill for taxation. [He also referred to In re Boycott, 29 Ch. D. 571, 33 W. R. Dig. 68; In re Norman, 34 W. R. 313, 16 Q. B. D. 673; the Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 37.] As to the bills delivered to the manager of the asylum, that does not amount to a delivery to the trustees, as the manager had no authority to act as agent for the trustees with respect to solicitors' bills.

Bardswell, for the solicitors.—There was no duty on the solicitors to make any such communication as suggested to the trustees concerning the three bills paid without being taxed; and there is no special circumstance to warrant taxation after payment. The decision in In re F——— is not applicable to the present case. With respect to the bills delivered to the manager, who had the management of the whole establishment, the delivery to him operates as a delivery to the trustees.

C. Church replied.

North, J.—In this case the first three bills were delivered in 1883 and 1884 respectively; the other bills are of subsequent dates. Although the first three bills were delivered six or seven years ago, and have been paid, they are said to be liable to taxation because the solicitors are said to have omitted their duty to their clients in not telling them that, unless the bills were taxed, if the bills should be afterwards moderated at the instance of third parties in case of subsequent administration proceedings, their clients, in their accounts with their cestuis que trust, might have to pay out of their own pockets the amount which might be taken off the bills; and the decision in In re F——— has been cited as an authority for this contention. It is said that these bills ought to be taxed by reason of this special circumstance. But it is begging the question to say that the solicitors omitted their duty to their clients in not giving them that information unless it is shown that the bills are excessive and would be reduced on moderation, which is different from taxation. There is no evidence that there is a single item which would be taken off on moderation. Mr. Church admits that his clients looked through the bills and did not find anything excessive. There is nothing to show that the solicitors omitted any duty.

The case of In re F——— is not applicable to the present, as it appears from the report that the bills in that case had been before the chief clerk, who thought that they contained items which ought to be struck out. Here there is no evidence that any item would be reduced, and it is admitted that the bills are honest bills. I do not think that In re F——— is an authority in this case, whatever it might be where the facts were the same as they were there. As to the first three bills, the summons must be dismissed. With respect to the other bills, which were delivered to the manager of the lunatic asylum, they must be taxed. They were not delivered to the trustees, but to the manager of the asylum, who had no authority to accept solicitors' bills for the trustees, or to decide whether the bills should be taxed or not. The manager might have been constituted agent to receive solicitors' bills for the trustees; but in the absence of evidence that he was such agent I cannot hold that he had authority to receive solicitors' bills for the trustees. The trustees say that these bills have not been delivered to them. Therefore, there must be an order for the delivery of those bills, and the bills must be taxed. But there will be no costs to either party of the adjournment of the summons into court.

GUARDIANS OF TENDRING UNION v. DOWTON AND SLIMON. (a.)

Local government—Street improvement—Expenses of metalling and paving—Charge upon premises—Charge upon whole proprietorship—Premises subject to restrictive covenant—Sale to satisfy charge free from covenant—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 150, 257, 276.

The charge upon premises for expenses for improvements created by the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 257, is a charge upon the whole proprietorship of the land, and not merely a charge upon the estate in fee simple.

Premises subject to a restrictive covenant against building, which become liable to such a charge, may, for the purpose of satisfying the charge, be sold free from the covenant.

Motion for judgment upon admissions in the pleadings.

The plaintiffs were the guardians of the poor of the Tendring Union, in the county of Essex, and were the rural sanitary authority within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, for the area of that union. The parish of Great Clacton was one of the parishes in the union, and was a contributory place within the meaning of the Act, and by an order of the Local Government Board, dated the 30th of September, 1884, and made pursuant to section 276 of the Act, it was declared that the provisions of section 150 of the Act, except so far as they related to sewering, should be in force within certain streets, including one called Anglefield-road, situate in Great Clacton.

On the 20th of March, 1886, the plaintiffs served notices on the owners or occupiers of land and premises abutting upon Anglefield-road, including the then owner or occupier of the piece of land (in this report called Anglefield), the subject of this action, which adjoined the road, such notices being under section 150 of the Act, requiring them to level, pave, metal, flag, and channel the road within two weeks from that date. The road was then a street, not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large within the meaning of section 150.

This notice was not complied with, and the plaintiffs executed the works therein mentioned, which were completed on or about the 5th of February, 1887, at which date the defendant Dowton was the owner of Anglefield.

On the 16th of September, 1887, notice was duly served on the defendant Dowton stating that the proportion of the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in the execution of such works, which was payable by him as owner of, and in respect of, Anglefield, was £131 1s. 9½d. The defendant Dowton did not, within the statutory period of three months (section 257) after service of such notice of apportionment, dispute the same.

On the 18th of March, 1889, an order was made by a court of summary jurisdiction that the defendant Dowton should pay to the plaintiffs the sum of £131 1s. 9½d., with interest at 5 per cent. per annum and costs. A warrant of distress was issued, but no goods of the defendant Dowton could be found to satisfy such warrant.

In the year 1872 William Grimwade was the owner in fee simple of Anglefield, and also of the land opposite to two sides of Anglefield, which was of a triangular shape, on the other side of Anglefield-road. In 1872 Grimwade sold and conveyed to different purchasers such land in building plots, and entered into a covenant with each of such purchasers to the effect that he, his heirs and assigns, would not build or cause to be built any permanent erection of any kind upon Anglefield, and that in the event of any trees being planted upon Anglefield the same should not be allowed to grow beyond the height of six feet.

The defendant, William Slimon, was the owner of certain of the plots of land sold by Grimwade, and was entitled in respect thereof to the benefit of the covenant before mentioned, as against Grimwade and his assigns.

By an indenture dated the 21st of March, 1876, Grimwade conveyed Anglefield unto and to the use of J. Harman and T. Young in fee simple, subject to a covenant therein contained, whereby Harman and Young covenanted to the effect above mentioned with respect to buildings or erections and trees upon Anglefield.

By an indenture dated the 28th of January, 1884, Harman and Young conveyed Anglefield in fee simple to the Clacton-on-Sea and General Land Building and Investment Co. (Limited), subject to the covenant above mentioned, and by an indenture dated the 1st of October, 1886, that company conveyed Anglefield, subject to such covenant, to the defendant Dowton in fee simple.

The plaintiffs commenced the present action in August, 1889, claiming that the sum of £131 1s. 9d., with interest thereon, might be declared a charge upon Anglefield, and that, for the purposes of satisfying such charge, Anglefield might be ordered to be sold free from the covenant above mentioned, and that out of the proceeds of such sale the sums claimed, with interest and costs, might be paid.

By an order of the 10th of February, 1890, made in this action by Stirling, J., it was ordered that the defendant William Slimon, should be appointed to represent all other persons interested in the benefit of the said covenant for the purpose of deciding the question whether the charge claimed by the plaintiffs should override such covenant.

The defendant Dowton did not enter an appearance in the action; the defendant Slimon put in a defence, admitting the several allegations contained in the statement of claim, and above shortly stated, for the purposes of this action only, and for no other.

It was stated, though not in evidence, that if Anglefield was sold subject to the covenant, the proceeds of the sale would be merely nominal.

The sections of the Public Health Act, 1875, so far as they are relevant to this report, are:—Section 4. "'Owner' means the person for the time being receiving the rack rents of the lands and premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack rent."

"Section 150. Where any street within any urban district (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) . . . is not sewered, levelled, paved . . . and made good . . . to the satisfaction of the urban authority, such authority may, by notice addressed to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, levelled, paved . . . require them to sewer, level, pave . . . or make good . . . the same within a time to be specified in such notice. If such notice is not complied with, the urban authority may, if they think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises."

"Section 257. Where any local authority have incurred expenses for the repayment whereof the owner of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred is made liable under this Act, or by any agreement with the local authority, such expenses may be recovered, together with interest at a rate not exceeding five pounds per centum per annum, from the date of service of a demand for the same till payment thereof, from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred, and until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred."

Alexander Macmorran, for the motion.—These expenses are expenses which come under section 257. The charge which is given by the Act is a charge on the actual land, not upon any one particular interest: The Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, 29 W. R. 36, 15 Ch. D. 378, followed by Jessel, M.R., in The Corporation of Birmingham v. Baker, 17 Ch. D. 782 (see page 785, referring to the judgment of James, L.J., in the first-named case).

Edward Beaumont, for the defendant Slimon.—The plaintiffs practically propose to cut off the defendants' view of the sea. As to The Corporation of Birmingham v. Baker, it is probably clear enough that where there is a house subject to any number of mortgages or charges in succession, the charge for improving the property comes in front of them all. That is not the case here, where Slimon has only an easement over the property and a restrictive covenant. I admit I must argue to some extent by analogy. If this were the case of a school board or a railway company buying under compulsory powers it would not be necessary to give notice to Slimon to treat; he would not have an ownership in land, but would be a person having interests injuriously affected, and would have to be compensated: Clark v. School Board for London, 22 W. R. 354, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 120; Duke of Bedford v. Dawson, L. R. 20 Eq. 353, 24 W. R. Dig. 236. Where the Legislature means to give a public body power to destroy and put an end to easements, that is done in plain and unmistakable language: Artizans' Dwellings Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. 36), s. 20. It is not in accordance with the true construction of the Act that the premises should be dealt with free from these negative restrictions; the land can only be sold as the local board find it. Besides, this is not an improvement to the land such as a road or a sewer would be to building land, for by the nature of the land it cannot be built upon. Then how can anyone who has only a negative easement redeem a charge upon land, supposing the charge came under mortgage or any other way? If the authority entitled to the charge had a statutory power to sell, they could not sell free from easements. The fact that Slimon has paid his share on the other half of the road on his own side is, of course, conceded.

Macmorran was not called upon to reply.

STIRLING, J.—I have no doubt this application raises a new point, but it seems to me to be governed in principle by the decision which I have been referred to in The Corporation of Birmingham v. Baker. Under the powers conferred by the Public Health Act of 1875, the local board, who are the plaintiffs in this case, have made a public road which runs to a considerable extent along a piece of land belonging to the defendant Dowton. The defendant Dowton is entitled to this land, called Anglefield, in fee simple, subject to certain restrictive covenants, which prevent him from building upon it, and as I am told, subject to those covenants, this piece of land is really worth little or nothing. The cost of making the road is £131, or rather the proportion of it which is attributable under the Act to this piece of land is £131—a substantial sum—and the plaintiffs, the sanitary authority, are unable to recover that from Dowton personally. That being so, section 257 applies. Turning to section 4, the definition of "owner" to be found there amounts to this, that any person for the time being receiving the rack rent of premises is the owner. That I believe has been held to be so, even though he may have no title at all and another person is the real owner; and he is so according to the terms of the Act, whether he is receiving it on his own account or as agent of another person, so that it may be recovered from the agent of a person who is actually in receipt of the rack rent of the property. That being the very wide sense in which the word owner is used, what is the language of section 257 with reference to the charge? "Until the recovery of such expense and interest, the same shall be a charge on the premises," not on the interest of the owner in the premises, but on the premises themselves. That means in the land itself, and it accordingly has been held by Jessel, M.R., in the case of The Corporation of Birmingham v. Baker that a charge, under section 257, extends to what he terms the whole proprietorship in the land, not in any particular section or portion of the proprietorship, but on the whole, and in that particular case he held the charge thus created took precedence of a mortgage on the land in respect of which the charge was sought to be enforced.

It is said that this charge does not take precedence of these restrictive covenants. I am unable to accede to that. If I did so I should be holding in this particular case that the charge was constituted, not on the land itself, but on the interest of the particular person who happens to be the owner in fee simple. I cannot accede to that argument, and it seems to me to be contrary to the decision which was given in The Corporation of Birmingham v. Baker.

I think, therefore, that I must declare the plaintiffs are entitled to their charge upon the land, and that for the purpose of satisfying the said charge the premises called Anglefield may be ordered to be sold free from the covenant in question.

Practice—Service out of jurisdiction—Sequestration—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 90, 107, 111, 117—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, rr. 1 (f), 2.

In an action to restrain infringement of the plaintiffs' trade-marks, the defendants being a company having their principal place of business in Belfast, and supplying customers, but having no agents in England, an order made ex parte, giving leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction, was discharged.

The fact that a motion on behalf of the plaintiffs to rectify the register by striking out the defendants' trade-mark is pending is not material in considering the balance of convenience to the parties.

Motion.

This action was commenced to restrain the infringement of the plaintiffs' registered trade-marks.

The defendants were a company having their principal place of business in Belfast, and having a considerable business in Ireland and elsewhere, but supplying comparatively few customers in England, and having no agents in England.

The plaintiffs had obtained an ex parte order giving leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction, and had given to the defendants notice of motion to rectify the register by striking out the defendants' trade-marks.

This was a motion on behalf of the defendants to discharge the order for service out of the jurisdiction.

Benshaw, Q.C., and Whinney, for the defendants.—An injunction could not, if granted, be rendered effectual against the defendants by sequestration, since they have no goods within the jurisdiction; leave should not therefore have been given to issue the writ: Marshall v. Marshall, 38 Ch. D. 330, 36 W. R. Dig. 161; Burland v. Broxburn Oil Co., 37 W. R. 470, 41 Ch. D. 542. The courts in Scotland and Ireland have jurisdiction to rectify the register; the plaintiffs could, therefore, have brought their motion to rectify before the court in Ireland, and cannot say that their motion and action should be tried together on the ground of convenience: Patents Act, ss. 90, 107, 111, 117.

Marten, Q.C., and Willis Bund, for the plaintiffs.—Sending goods to private customers in this country with the plaintiffs' trade-marks is a passing off of their goods by the defendants as much as sending them to agents. The plaintiffs could enforce an injunction by seizing the defendants' goods at the Custom House. It is doubtful whether there is jurisdiction in the courts of Scotland and Ireland to rectify the register. Section 111 of the Patents Act does not confer jurisdiction. The motion to rectify and this action should be tried together on the ground of convenience, since the same evidence will be required in both proceedings.

Kekewich, J.—This jurisdiction requires to be carefully watched and carefully exercised, and the court has a right to review the exercise of its discretion when additional facts are brought to its notice. The present case is that of traders carrying on business in Ireland, and the ground on which service out of the jurisdiction was applied for was that an injunction was claimed to restrain the sale of goods with certain trade-marks.

Where are those goods sold? It is sworn that the defendants have no business premises and no agents in England; but they do supply occasional customers in England, and they have a large business in Ireland and elsewhere. It is said that an injunction could be enforced in this country by sequestration of the defendants' goods, but no goods of the defendants ever come to this country, the goods come to customers; there is, therefore, nothing of the defendants in this country to proceed against.

As regards the business of the defendants carried on elsewhere than in Ireland and England, it must be treated as immaterial; there is no reason to prefer England or Ireland as the forum.

But as regards the Irish business the action ought to be an Irish action, the witnesses are in Ireland and discovery must be had in Ireland. Under R. S. C., ord. 11, r. 2, the comparative cost and convenience of both parties, and the dispatch of business have to be considered, and also the residence of the defendants, which is in this case in Ireland.

With regard to the argument founded on the motion to rectify the register, there was a motion of that character in Marshall v. Marshall, and there is no substantial difference between the motion in that case, which was to place a mark upon the register, and that in the present case, which is to strike out a trade-mark.

I am not satisfied, therefore, that that motion ought to interfere with the balance of convenience, and the order must be discharged, with costs.

Local government—Executive committee of county council—Delegation of powers to sub-committees—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 74)—Local Government Act, 1888 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 41), s. 28.

A county council, as the local authority for carrying out the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, had appointed an executive committee, who had delegated to a sub-committee, as authorized by schedule 6 (5) (6) of that Act, the exercise of powers under that Act. Subsequently an Order in Council was issued, calling upon the local authorities to take steps against rabies under the powers given them by the Act of 1878, and the executive committee thereupon issued regulations against rabies on their own authority, for breach of which regulations the appellant had been fined.

Held, that the executive committee had the right to issue such regulations, since, in delegating their powers, under the Act of 1878, to a sub-committee, they had in no way parted with their original powers as local authority under that Act.

Case stated by the justices of Sussex sitting at petty sessions at Chichester.

The appellant had been convicted and fined for letting his dog out "unmuzzled and not under proper control" against the provisions of an Order of Council in 1887 and recently extended to the county of Sussex by an order of the Executive Committee of the County Council of Sussex in March, 1890. By the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 3 (xiii.), county councils become the local authority empowered, among other things, to carry out the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, against rabies. The county council of Sussex appointed an executive committee, and in October, 1889, the executive committee delegated to a sub-committee their powers for carrying out the provisions against the spread of rabies under the said Act of 1878. In March, 1890, the executive committee, however, issued the order against un-muzzled dogs. It was contended that, having delegated their powers under the Act of 1878, the executive committee had deprived themselves of power to issue this particular order affecting rabies in dogs.

(a.) Reported by James H. Bakewell, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Gill, for the appellant.—The sub-committee was the only proper authority to issue such an order. The executive committee having delegated their powers in this respect to the sub-committee without limit of time, they could only recover their powers by revoking the authority given to the sub-committee.

Gore, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—By the incorporation of the Act of 1878 in the Local Government Act of 1888 the county council in this case have become the duly constituted local authority in this district to exercise the powers given to such local authority under the Act of 1878. In the county council there have been properly formed sub-committees to whom the executive committee may delegate such powers (other than rating powers) as they may think fit under the provisions of schedule 6 (6) of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, including, of course, all the powers given them under that Act, or by subsequent Orders in Council for the prevention of diseases such as rabies. As a matter of fact, this county council of Sussex did, in October, 1889, delegate to a sub-committee such powers. Subsequently an Order in Council affecting rabies in dogs was extended to the county of Sussex, and the local authority was called upon to take steps to carry out this order. Thereupon, in March, 1890, the executive committee issued the order against dogs going about unmuzzled and not under control, under which the appellant was prosecuted and fined. There were no regulations issued by the sub-committee upon this subject, such as might have been made under the powers delegated to them. The regulations made by the executive committee have not been contravened by any other authority. It is, however, suggested that because there did exist another authority, such as the sub-committee, which might have issued regulations inconsistent with those issued by the executive committee, there must be assumed to have been no power in the executive to issue those regulations. But delegation does not imply denudation of original powers. Those delegated powers might be resumed if the executive committee thought fit. Such an act of delegation expressly implies that the authority which is the subject delegated, can always be resumed, unless there is something in the act of delegation inconsistent with such resumption. In every other case there is impliedly a liability to the resumption of the original powers by the delegating authority. There is here no conflict of jurisdiction at all. I am of opinion that the executive committee had the right to exercise this power and issue the regulations, and that the magistrates were entitled to convict under them.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. What is the meaning of the word delegate? There is an instance of its use for nearly thirty years under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 53 as a term for those who hand in votes at university elections, and one which illustrates its ordinary and popular meaning. The word does not imply in any sense a parting with the power delegated, but only a conferring of authority upon another person, which authority the giver might, if he chose, exercise himself. The maxim delegatus non potest delegare undoubtedly conveys this signification of the word. It is never used in text-books so as to convey the meaning that the person delegating the power impliedly parts with the right to exercise that power. In matters, for instance, of contract, the expression only implies the relationship of principal and agent.

By clause 6 of schedule 6 of the Act of 1878 the executive committee shall have all the powers of the local authority, except the power to make a rate, and in their delegation of these powers or any of them to a sub-committee there is nothing to restrict the exercise by the executive committee of the original powers so given them.

Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 51)—Divorce—Order for alimony—Writ of sequestration—Registration—Power to vacate registration.

Where a writ of sequestration has been issued and duly registered under the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888, there is no power under the Act or inherent in the court to order the registration to be vacated, even by consent of all parties concerned, and although the writ is satisfied by payment.

This was the hearing of a summons adjourned from chambers into court calling on the petitioner to show cause why two writs of sequestration issued in the cause should not be discharged and the registration thereof vacated upon payment into court by Wm. Hall Warren of the sum of £132 19s. 2d. or such other sum as might be found due to the petitioner. The writs of sequestration were issued to enforce payment of alimony pendente lite, and taxed costs, which the respondent had been ordered to pay, and on the 7th of March, 1889, they were both registered at the office of the Land Registry under and in pursuance of the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888. Pending proceedings in the Chancery Division, the respondent assigned his interest in the premises, and subsequently, on the 19th of December, 1889, Kay, J., made an order, which inter alia directed that upon payment into court by the said W. H. Warren of the sum of £250, the petitioner in this cause should do and concur in all necessary acts for the discharge of the sequestrators named in the two writs of sequestration. The £250 was paid into court, and the petitioner, in pursuance of the before mentioned order of Kay, J., applied to the officials of the registry to vacate the registration, but was informed that Bowen, L.J., and other judges at chambers had refused similar applications on the ground that there is no provision in the statute for vacating any writ or order affecting land.

Cluer, for the respondent, stated that, although no one appeared for the petitioner, both sides were agreed as to the order if the court had power to make it.—By section 14 of the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act,

(a.) Reported by J. Gerard Laing, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1888, any "land charge" may be vacated by the order of a court or judge. Rule 7 of the Land Charges Rules, 1889, gives the registrar power to modify or cancel entries, and under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 115, s. 2, there was power in the Court of Common Pleas to enter satisfaction of Crown debts and judgments, and there is inherent jurisdiction in every court to revoke anything done by its authority.

BUTT, J.—I understand that Bowen, L.J., sitting in chambers, has held that he had not the power to grant a similar application, and I am reluctantly compelled to agree with him. I am willing to assist you as far as I can, and will grant that part of the application which orders the discharge of the two writs of sequestration, but it is clear that the Act has omitted to provide for the vacation of their registration.

In re HEAD'S TRUSTEES' AND MACDONALD'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Contract—Title—Sale by trustees of real estate—Power of trustees to sell estate, arising on death of tenant for life—Concurrence of beneficiaries.

A testator devised his real estate to trustees upon trust to pay the rents to his wife, and after her decease to sell the property and hold the income in trust for all his children equally, and he authorized his trustees to adjust and pay all claims made upon his estate. The estate being insolvent, the trustees contracted to sell the real estate, with the consent of the life tenant, but the purchaser declined to accept the title. The trustees subsequently offered to obtain the consent of all the beneficiaries to the sale of the estate.

Held, that the trustees had no power of sale under the will during the life of the testator's widow.

Held, further (following In re Bryant and Barningham's Contract, ante, 469, 44 Ch. D. 218), that the purchaser could not be compelled to accept a title other than that for which he had contracted.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

The testator, William Henry Head, by his will, gave and devised all his real estate to Philip Head and John Walker upon trust to receive and pay the rents to his wife, Martha Head, during her life, and after her decease upon trust to sell his said real estate, and to invest the proceeds of such sale, and to hold the resulting income in trust for all his children equally. And he authorized his trustees "to release or compound any debts owing to me or to my estate, or to give time for payment, or to take such security for payment, and to adjust and pay all claims made upon my estate, and generally to act in the premises, as my said trustees or trustee shall in their or his discretion think fit." The two trustees were appointed executors of the will.

The testator died on the 7th of November, 1889, and, the will having been duly proved by them, the executors found the estate insolvent, and with the consent of the tenant for life, Mrs. Head, who survived the testator, they put up the trust property for sale by auction on the 17th of December, 1889. A portion was then purchased by J. Macdonald, who paid a deposit, the 24th of January being the date fixed for completion. The purchaser objected to the title of the trustees, on the ground that they had no power of sale during the lifetime of Mrs. Head, and on the 21st of January the purchaser definitely refused to complete the contract, and demanded the return of his deposit. The trustees, on the 29th of January, offered to obtain the consent of the other beneficiaries; but the purchaser declined to accept the title, and took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, for a return of the deposit and a declaration that a good title had not been made out by the trustees. Chitty, J., made the order asked for.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the appellants.—The estate being insolvent, the trustees had a power of sale under the authority to adjust and pay all claims upon the estate. At all events, they could make a good title with the consent of all the beneficiaries.

Romer, Q.C., and Strickland, for the respondent.—The will merely gave authority to the trustees to manage the estate and settle any claims there might be upon it; and there was no trust for sale. The beneficiaries have not even now consented, and even if they have, the purchaser cannot be forced to accept a different title from that which he contracted for.

They referred to Forrer v. Nash, 14 W. R. 8, 35 Beav. 167; Brewer v. Broadwood, 31 W. R. 115, 22 Ch. D. 105; In re Bryant and Barningham's Contract, ante, p. 469, 44 Ch. D. 218.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply, cited Brown v. Higgs, 4 Ves. 708.

COTTON, L.J.—The first question in this case is, whether there is, under the terms of the will, a charge on the real estate which gives the trustees a power of sale. In my opinion there is not. There is simply an authority to pay debts, and no case has been cited which holds this to be a charge. The trustees, under this clause, have merely power given them to decide what are to be recognized as debts, which they could not otherwise do, and have no enlarged power of sale given them.

But then it is said that, even if the first point fails, the trustees can make a good title to this property by obtaining the consent of the seven beneficiaries, who are all sui juris. First of all, it is not even now ascertained that they will concur; and, even if they do, their title must be investigated. Then, the case of In re Bryant and Barningham's Contract in the Court of Appeal is in point to show that a purchaser cannot have a new and different title put upon him in place of the one he contracted for.

FRY, L.J., after reading the material parts of the will, proceeded as follows:—The words of what is commonly known as the "management clause" do not constitute a charge on the real estate. They only enable the trustees to determine what are proper debts, which they can only pay out of the funds on which they are properly chargeable. No case has been produced to show that this authority is equivalent to a charge.

Then, as to the second point. If this consent of the beneficiaries had been obtained in a reasonable time before the purchaser's solicitor had given notice that he had put an end to the contract on his client's behalf, possibly the vendors might have enforced it. This, however, was not so; and even now their consent has not been actually obtained. Therefore the trustees fail in their appeal, and cannot make out a title to this property.

LOPES, L.J.—In this case there is no charge of debts on the real estate, and no immediate power of sale given to the trustees. They are merely authorized to settle claims, but are not directed to sell; nor is there any enlargement of the fund out of which the debts are properly payable. The consent of the beneficiaries, by which it is proposed to make a good title, has not been clearly proved; and, even if it were, it would be necessary to inquire into their title, which they may have incumbered or otherwise dealt with. This appeal must fail.

Appeal dismissed.

Building society—Instrument of dissolution—Statutory majority of members—Withdrawing members—"Cease to take part in the affairs of the society"—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 20, 32.

Section 32 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, provides that a society under that Act "may be dissolved (inter alia) by dissolution, with the consent of three-fourths of the members . . . testified by their signatures to the instrument of dissolution."

The rules of a building society formed under the Act provided that a member wishing to withdraw should give three months' notice in writing to the secretary to repay the subscriptions standing to his credit, and that members having given notice of withdrawal should, "from the date of such notice, cease to take part in the affairs of the society." Sixty-nine members had given notice of withdrawal, but had not been paid off, when an instrument of dissolution was executed, which was signed by fifty-seven out of the seventy-four remaining members, but by none of the sixty-nine withdrawing members.

Held (affirming the decision of North, J.), that, upon the true construction of the rules (which would otherwise conflict with the Act), withdrawing members were merely precluded from taking any part in the affairs of the society as a going concern, but that they were still "members" within the meaning of section 32 of the Act, and must therefore be taken into account in determining whether the instrument of dissolution had been signed by the requisite statutory majority of the members.

In re Sheffield and South Yorkshire Permanent Building Society, 22 Q. B. D. 470, 37 W. R. Dig. 29, explained and distinguished.

Appeal from North, J.

This action was brought against the trustee of the East Dulwich 295th Starr-Bowkett Building Society and the society itself, by a withdrawing member, on behalf of himself and other withdrawing members, for a declaration that a deed of dissolution of the society was void, on the ground that it was not signed by a statutory majority of the members (the withdrawing members, who had not been paid the amounts due to them, not having been taken into account), and for an injunction to restrain the dissolution of the society.

Section 20 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, provides that "any certificate of incorporation or of registration or other document relating to a society under this Act, purporting to be signed by the registrar, shall in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be received by the court and all courts of law and equity and elsewhere without proof of the signatures."

Section 32 provides that "a society under this Act may terminate or be dissolved" (inter alia)—"(1) Upon the happening of any event declared by its rules to be the termination of the society; (2) By dissolution in manner prescribed by its rules; (3) By dissolution with the consent of three-fourths of the members, holding not less than two-thirds of the number of shares in the society, testified by their signatures to the instrument of dissolution"; and that "the instrument of dissolution and all alterations therein shall be registered in the manner provided for the registration of rules, and shall be binding upon all the members of the society."

Rule 3 of the society's rules provides that:—"The taking up or subscribing for one or more shares shall constitute membership on payment of four weeks' subscriptions."

Rule 6 provides (inter alia) that any member, not having executed a mortgage to the society, who may continue to neglect the payment of his subscriptions until the fines incurred and any other charges due are equal to the amount of subscriptions already paid by him, shall have notice of arrears sent him by the secretary, and four weeks from the date thereof (unless the amount due shall be previously paid) "shall then cease to be a member, and forfeit all the moneys paid in respect of the shares."

Rule 18 provides that a member wishing to withdraw shall "give three months' notice in writing to the secretary to receive back subscriptions standing to his credit, less all fines due and unpaid, and 1s. 3d. per share per annum for working expenses"; and also that "in case of any loss to the society, from whatever cause, the member withdrawing shall have deducted from his account a fair portion with other members, if such loss happens before his notice to withdraw has been received by the secretary"; and that "all notices of withdrawal shall be preserved and entered by the secretary in the book for that purpose in the order they are received, and the withdrawing member be paid in the same order of rotation"; and that "the secretary shall inform the member in writing when the money is ready for him"; and that "members being thirteen weeks in arrear (unless out of employment or sick, as per rule 6), or having given notice of withdrawal, shall, from the date of such notice, 'cease to take part in the affairs of the society,' but may cancel such notice at the discretion of the board of management"; and that "on the return of subscriptions the withdrawing member shall cancel his pass-book and surrender it to the society."

Sixty-nine, out of a total of 143 members, had given notice of withdrawal, but had not been repaid their subscriptions at the date when a deed of dissolution under section 32 of the Act was executed, which deed was signed by fifty-seven out of the seventy-four remaining members, who had not given such notice. None of the withdrawing members had signed it. The instrument of dissolution had been registered, and a certificate of registration obtained from the registrar.

North, J., held that a member who had given notice of withdrawal did not cease to be a member until he had been paid off; that, consequently, the instrument of dissolution was not signed by the necessary statutory majority of the members, and that such instrument, being, therefore, invalid under the Act, could not be made valid by the certificate of registration.

The defendants appealed.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, for the appellants.—In determining whether there was a statutory majority, the withdrawing members ought not, having regard to the society's rules, to be taken into account. Otherwise, this society cannot be dissolved, as the withdrawing members are nearly equal in number to the other members, and are precluded by the rules from taking part in the affairs of the society. [LINDLEY, L.J.—The rules cannot override the Act, and you must construe them with reference to it. COTTON, L.J.—You can take the dissolution in one of the alternative ways.] The withdrawing members have no stake in the society, and ought not to have a voice in the matter. Section 16 of the Act makes it obligatory to set out in the rules the terms as to withdrawing. The notice to withdraw is irrevocable, and directly it is given the rights of the parties are fixed, and are not affected by the mere fact that the withdrawing members have not been paid off: In re Blackburn, &c., Building Society, 32 W. R. 159, 24 Ch. D. 421. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Walton v. Edge, 33 W. R. 417, 10 App. Cas. 33.] Here the withdrawing members are the only creditors, and if there were five or six more of them they could, if North, J., is right, stop all proceedings for a dissolution in any way. On withdrawal of their shares the holders cease to be members of the society: In re The Sheffield and South Yorkshire, &c., Society, 22 Q. B. D. 470, 37 W. R. Dig. 29. [LINDLEY, L.J.—That turned on section 14.] The two cases together show that notice is the operative fact, and not repayment. The same view is involved in the decision in Auld v. Glasgow, &c., Building Society, 35 W. R. 632, 12 App. Cas. 197. In Walker v. General Mutual Building Society, 36 Ch. D. 777, 36 W. R. Dig. 26, the point decided was that a dispute between the society and any member, or person claiming on account of any member, was to be referred to arbitration under the rules there, and that for that particular purpose a withdrawing member must be deemed to be a member. The point decided in Wright v. Deeley, 4 H. & C. 209, was much the same. The real question here is, what is the meaning of the word "members" in section 32 (3)? It must mean members who have all the rights of members. After notice to withdraw, a member becomes simply a creditor. It is clear on rule 18 that he has no more right to a voice on the question of dissolution than as to any of the other affairs of the society. It makes no difference to him what is done with the society; in any case he must be paid the full amount due to him out of the first money available: Walton v. Edge. It could not be contended that withdrawing members would have a voice in deciding on an amalgamation or transfer of engagements under section 33 of the Act.

Farwell (Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., with him), for the respondent.—The signatures of three-fourths of the members are, by section 32 (3), required to the instrument of dissolution. The amount standing to the credit of "members" in the society's books includes the amounts to the credit of withdrawing members, thus admitting them to be "members." The fact that they are also creditors does not make them the less members: Walker v. General Mutual Building Society; Wright v. Deeley. Rule 18 does not say they shall "cease to be members," but that they shall "cease to take part in the affairs of the society," though the expression "cease to be a member" does occur in rules 6 and 32, where it expresses the undoubted intention. That shows that they know how to use it when they mean it. The words "cease to take part" do not deprive the withdrawing members of the right to take part in such a vital transaction as a dissolution. In the Sheffield and South Yorkshire case the expressions used are to be construed only with reference to the facts of that case. [He was stopped.]

Bramwell Davis, in reply.—The withdrawing members are clearly treated as creditors in the schedule. For the purposes of section 32 they are creditors only, and not members. Rule 6 deals with a totally different set of circumstances. By that rule a defaulter ceases to be even a creditor, and, à fortiori, ceases to be a member. In Walker v. General Mutual Building Society all that was decided was that a withdrawing member might remain a member for the purposes of being bound by the rules affecting withdrawing members. In the Sheffield and South Yorkshire case there was a clear decision that upon withdrawal a member ceases to be a member so far as regards liability.

COTTON, L.J.—In this case an injunction has been granted to restrain the society from acting on a deed of dissolution. It will be necessary for us to look both at the Act and at the rules of the society in order to determine whether these withdrawing members are to be considered as being still members. I will deal with the rules first, and endeavour to find out how the position and qualification of membership is to be maintained, and also what is to be done by the members. [His lordship read the material part of rule 6, as stated above, and proceeded:—] I notice that, because it is the rule which definitely states when the contract of membership is to be put an end to, and that, in a certain event, a member "shall cease to be a member."

Now, is there anything like that in rule 18—the rule relating to withdrawal? It provides that the member wishing to withdraw is to give three months' notice in writing to the secretary to receive back subscriptions standing to his credit. I do not discuss the question whether his status is affected immediately upon his giving the notice of withdrawal, or not until the end of the three months, because I do not quite see how that is material to the question we have to decide. The rule goes on to provide that all notices of withdrawal are to be preserved and entered in a book kept for the purpose in the order in which they are received, and that the withdrawing members are to be paid off in the same order, and that the secretary is to inform each member in writing when the money is ready for him. This provision was much relied on, and, in my opinion, the withdrawing member remains a member after he has given the notice, and even after the three months have expired. He is to receive his money in rotation as a member, and as a member he is to be informed when it is ready for him. [His lordship next read that part of rule 18 which provides that a member shall cease, from the date of his notice of withdrawal, to take any part in the affairs of the society.] That has been very much relied on; yet it is to be observed that it applies, not only to withdrawing members, but also to members who are in arrear with their payments, who, though not expelled, and though their shares are not forfeited, are to cease to take any part in the affairs of the society. If they were expelled or ceased to be members by the forfeiture of their shares, it would clearly be unnecessary to provide that they should cease to take part in the affairs of the society.

Then it is said that, as these withdrawing members are not to take part in the affairs of the society, they are no longer members. I cannot assent to that, as, for the reasons I have given above, it is clear to my mind that they must still be members of the society. But it is next contended that, as they cannot take part in the affairs of the society, they cannot sign this deed of dissolution, and therefore it cannot be signed by the prescribed majority. But, in my opinion, the proper meaning of the expression is that they shall cease to take part in the affairs of the society as a continuing business. It does not prevent their doing that which, according to my view, the Act of Parliament requires them to do, if they are in favour of the dissolution of the society—that is, to show their assent by signing the deed. I do not think that is taking part in the affairs of the society within the fair meaning of this rule, but it is doing something which the Act requires to be done for the purpose of dissolving the society. It is argued that withdrawing members are not members whose assent is required by section 32 of the Act, which must refer only to members who have the full rights of members. But, in my opinion, that is erroneous, because, though they are prevented from taking part in the affairs of the society as a going concern, that is not inconsistent with their remaining members and continuing to hold their shares, and the fact of their continuing to hold their shares necessarily involves that they are entitled to exercise the rights in respect thereof of which they are not expressly deprived by the rules. In order to support the contention of the appellants it would be necessary to give different meanings to the word "members" in different parts of the rules. In some parts, as, for instance, in the later paragraphs of rule 18, money standing to the credit of the members has reference, not only to members who have not given notice of withdrawal, but also to those (to whom the rule is then referring) who have given such notice. Then, under sub-division (b) of paragraph 3 of section 32 of the Act, the deed of dissolution is to set forth "the number of members, and the amount standing to their credit in the books of the society," and in my opinion the officers of the society cannot be absolved, by putting a different construction upon the rules, from taking into account what is required under that sub-division of section 32.

Then it is said the cases are against the withdrawing members being still considered members of the society. But the only case on which I think the appellants can in any way rely is Sheffield and South Yorkshire Building Society, and that gives no real support to their contention, because the decision there was on an entirely different point. The county court judge had held, and properly held, that certain members who had given notice of withdrawal after the whole of their payments had been made, were not liable; but, as regards certain other members who had withdrawn before their shares had matured, and before they had paid the full amount payable on those shares, he had held that, under section 14 of the Act, they were liable in the winding up for the amount unpaid on their shares. I cannot see, looking at section 14, how the decision of the county court judge on that point could have been right. However, the grounds relied upon by the appellants here were certain expressions used by the judges in the Divisional Court in giving judgment in that case. I think the explanation given by Mr. Farwell of those expressions is the correct one—that is, that they were intended to be applicable to those members who had given notice of withdrawal, and were to be paid off as soon as any funds were available for the purpose, and that as soon as that payment was made, then the connection of those members with the society was completely severed. That, I think, is the fair meaning of what was said by Cave, J., in his judgment in 22 Q. B. D., at p. 475.

In my opinion, therefore, this decision of North, J., was right.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I have no doubt the decision of North, J., is right. The question, to my mind, turns upon the construction of an Act of Parliament which is less obscure than usual.

First of all, I will refer to this instrument of dissolution. I cannot myself obtain much light from that document, because it is plain to me that the word "members" is there used sometimes in one sense and sometimes in another. When it speaks of the "number of members" it excludes the withdrawing members; when it speaks about "the amount standing to the credit of members" it includes the withdrawing members. That gives one no help, one way or the other.

Then, as regards the rules, they are made pursuant to the Building Societies Act, 1874, s. 16, clause 4 of which provides that the rules are to regulate the terms upon which shares may be withdrawn, and upon which mortgages may be redeemed; and clause 14 provides that they are to regulate "the manner in which the society . . . shall be terminated or dissolved." Accordingly, the rules of this society were made pursuant to that enactment, and the first question is as to the meaning in those rules of the word "members," of which the Act gives no interpretation. [His lordship referred to rules 3 and 6, and proceeded:—] Then we come to the rule relating to withdrawals (rule 18) which is important, and the case really turns upon the construction of that rule taken in connection with the Act of Parliament. You may construe a rule by reference to the Act of Parliament, but you can hardly construe an Act of Parliament by reference to a rule; and if rule 18 does conflict with the Act, that is so much the worse for the rule, not so much the worse for the Act. I do not think it does conflict. What it says is this:—[His lordship shortly gave the effect of the earlier parts of the rule, and proceeded:—] Then it continues, "the secretary shall inform the member in writing when the money is ready for him"—treating, therefore, the person who has given notice, and who has been entered in the book, as a member. Then it says, "Members being thirteen weeks in arrear, or having given notice of withdrawal, shall, from the date of such notice, cease to take part in the affairs of the society, but may cancel such notice at the discretion of the board of management."

Now what is the position of a member who has given notice of withdrawal, but who has not been paid back the amount due to him for his subscriptions? It is contended on the one hand that he is a member, and on the other that he is a creditor. I take it the true way of describing him is as a member who has given notice of withdrawal and is a creditor. That he is not an ordinary creditor is plain. He cannot come into competition with outside creditors. On the other hand, as between himself and the continuing members, he is entitled to be paid the amount due to him before they can divide the assets. In that sense he is a creditor; and that was decided in the Blackburn and District Society's case, which afterwards came before the House of Lords under the title of Walton v. Edge.

But does he cease to be a member before he is got rid of altogether under these rules? It seems to me he does not. He is not to take part in the affairs of the society; but neither is a person who is thirteen weeks in arrear; yet the latter does not cease to be a member until he is got rid of, and no more does the person who withdraws. I take it the words "he shall cease to take part in the affairs of the society" mean that he shall not take part in the affairs of the society as a going concern. If they mean more, the rule is in conflict with the Act of Parliament, which I will refer to presently. I do not think, on a fair construction of the rules, that they mean more than I have said, but if they do, then they conflict with the Act of Parliament, which must prevail over them.

Now what the Act of Parliament says (in section 32) is this:—"A society under this Act may be terminated or be dissolved . . . by dissolution with the consent of three-fourths of the members holding not less than two-thirds of the number of shares in the society, testified by their signatures to the instrument of dissolution."

Now, has this deed or instrument of dissolution been consented to in compliance with this provision of the Act—that is to say, has it been consented to by three-fourths of the members holding two-thirds of the shares? The answer is, "Certainly not." Of course, the contention is that those persons who have given notice of withdrawal (but who, as I read the rules, have not ceased to be members) have ceased to be members. For the reasons I have given I cannot come to that conclusion. Then it is said to be settled by authority that they are no longer members, and in support of that the case of Sheffield and South Yorkshire Permanent Building Society was referred to. But it is quite obvious, when you look at the section of the Act and the rules which the court had to consider there, that as soon as you came to deal with a man who had given notice of withdrawal, even if he had not already been paid out, he was not, under that section and those rules, liable to contribute anything. Section 14 of the Act makes that plain. His liability is to be limited to the amount paid. That does not mean that calls are to be made upon him to the extent of the amount paid. That would be making him pay twice over. If he is in arrear, the amount of the arrears may be called up, but nothing additional can be due from him after notice of withdrawal, whether he has received his money out or not—he has nothing more to contribute. Therefore it is perfectly plain that the decision in that case was right. There were, however, some expressions in that case which look as if the judges treated members who had given notice of withdrawal as no longer members of the society. That is explained by the circumstance that in that particular case these withdrawing members had been paid out, and, therefore, had ceased to be members of the society, and had nothing more to do with it.

The only other case referred to which is at all important is that of Walker v. General Mutual Building Society (the arbitration case), which, as far as it goes, accords with the view we are now taking, that a member who has given notice of withdrawal, but has not been paid out, is still a member.

Therefore, that being so, I think the judgment of the court below must be confirmed, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Lopes, L.J.—The question is whether the plaintiff and certain other persons who are withdrawing members are "members" within section 32 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, and whether they are members for the purpose of the dissolution of this society.

If the withdrawing members are members the deed is bad, but if they are not the deed is good. The question depends on section 32 and on the society's rules. In my opinion the withdrawing members are members of the society, and it is to be observed that in section 32 the word "members" is used without any qualification, the words being "by dissolution with the consent of three-fourths of the members." I cannot see where Mr. Davis found the meaning he sought to put upon it—i.e., members who have the full rights of shareholders."

Now I come to rule 18, which is the important rule in this case. In the course of the argument I have pointed to different parts of that rule which, to my mind, all tend to the same conclusion, which is that what was intended was that the withdrawing members should continue to be members until paid out. As I read the expressions in that rule they are inconsistent with any other construction. It seems to me that Mr. Higgins is not entitled to rely upon the expression which occurs in that rule that withdrawing members "shall cease to take any part in the affairs of the society." That very expression seems to me to recognize the fact that they are still to be members—not, it is true, members who are to take active interest in the affairs of the company as a going concern; but still members, and members for the purpose of the dissolution of the society. Rule 6 is a rule which is worthy of attention, as clearly showing that where the intention was that a member should cease to be a member, the framers knew how to use the apt and explicit term that was used in that rule—viz., "cease to be a member." The Sheffield and South Yorkshire case relied on by Mr. Higgins is clearly distinguishable from the present case, because there the withdrawing members had been paid out. In fact, it seems to me that it is rather an authority in favour of the respondents.

I think, therefore, that this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Mayor, &c., of Salford v. County Council of Lancashire. (a.)

Local government—County council—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70), ss. 90, 97 —Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 74), ss. 4, 37—Local Government Act, 1888, ss. 64, 79.

The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869, enacted that the expenditure of the local authority of each county under the Act should be defrayed out of a local rate, but that the local authority of each borough assessed to the rate should be recouped the proportionate amount contributed by the borough to the expenses incurred under the Act by the local authority of the county.

By the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, the Act of 1869 was repealed, all liabilities under it being preserved, and it was enacted that, for all the purposes of this Act, a local authority might be sued as if they were incorporated.

By the Local Government Act, 1888, the powers, liabilities, and property of the local authority were transferred to the county council.

The plaintiffs having brought an action against the defendants to recover the proportionate amount contributed by them between the years 1869 and 1878 to the expenses incurred by the local authority for the county under the Act of 1869,

Held, that no action would lie against the defendants for the amount claimed, and that the plaintiffs' remedy under the Act of 1869 against the local authority for the county was by mandamus, and not by action.

Appeal from the decision of Grantham, J.

The action was brought to recover the sum of £686 paid by the borough of Salford to the local authority of the county of Lancaster between the years 1869 and 1878 under the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869.

By section 90: "The expenditure of a local authority in compensation for animals slaughtered under Part V. of this Act, or in respect of principal of, or interest on, money borrowed in pursuance of this Act, shall be defrayed out of the local rate, or out of a separate rate to be levied in all respects as the local rate, and included under the term local rate."

By section 97: "Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the local authority of each borough situate within a county and assessed to the county rate thereof shall be recouped the proportionate amount contributed by the borough to the expenses incurred by the local authority of the county in pursuance of this Act (including expenditure in compensation for animals slaughtered, or in respect of principal of, or interest on, money borrowed in pursuance of this Act), so that the burden of those expenses shall be borne wholly by the county, and not as to any part thereof by any borough situate within the county."

June 19.—Kay, J., delivered the following written judgment:—[After stating the facts as set out above, his lordship continued:—] The property not being sufficient to pay both of these mortgages, the question which mortgage is to be first, is important. The case was very well argued by Mr. Scott Fox. It was contended that the plaintiffs' security must be postponed to the defendants', not because of any act done by the plaintiffs, but because they were guilty of negligence, which, it was urged, was sufficient to deprive them of their primâ facie right to priority. The argument rested mainly on a distinction between the position of a first mortgagee who has an equitable estate and that of a mortgagee whose estate is legal. In the latter case the doctrine of the court is thus stated in Plumb v. Fluitt, 2 Anstr. 432:—"Nothing but fraud or gross and voluntary negligence in leaving the title deeds will oust the priority of the legal claimant." This doctrine was accepted by Lord Eldon in Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 174, and was re-stated in like terms by Turner, L.J., in Hewitt v. Loosemore, and has always been recognized as the undoubted law on the subject. In the last-mentioned case Turner, L.J., says, in effect, that such negligence will be imputed to the legal mortgagee if he omits all inquiry as to the deeds, but not if he has inquired and a reasonable excuse is given for their non-delivery. But it was argued that a much smaller amount of negligence was sufficient to postpone a mortgagee whose estate is only equitable. That proposition, stated in other terms, is that a court of equity would deprive a mortgagee of an advantage which is less than the legal estate much more readily and easily than it would deprive him of the legal estate. From the mortgagee's point of view it is difficult to see any justice or reasonable principle for this. He says: "I want my money; whether you take from me the legal estate, or only an equitable estate, the effect is to me precisely the same; you take from me the money I have advanced. If I have the legal estate equity will not deprive me of my money on the ground of negligence unless it be 'gross and wilful.' Why should it deprive me of it for less negligence when I have the first equitable estate, which primâ facie entitles me to priority as much as the possession of the legal estate would do?" The doctrine, however, it was contended, is settled by authority; and reference was made to the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp, where it is said (32 W. R., at p. 626, 26 Ch. D., at p. 487), "The question is not what circumstances may, as between two equities, give priority to the one over the other, but what circumstances justify the court in depriving a legal mortgagee of the benefit of the legal estate"; and again (32 W. R., at p. 629, 26 Ch. D., at p. 494), "the court will not postpone the prior legal estate to the subsequent equitable estate on the ground of any mere carelessness or want of prudence on the part of the legal owner."

From these words, and an observation during the argument that the case of Waldron v. Sloper, 1 Drew 193, was a contest between equitable incumbrancers, the conclusion has been drawn by the defendants' counsel that it was the view of the Court of Appeal that gross negligence must be proved in order to postpone the legal mortgagee, but that a much less amount of negligence, such as "mere carelessness or want of prudence," would suffice to postpone the first of two equitable mortgagees. I do not think that this is the true meaning of that judgment. The court was not dealing with a contest between two equitable mortgagees, nor attempting to define the amount of negligence necessary in such a case, but merely emphasizing the fact that the estate which it was called upon to displace was legal, and not equitable. No doubt courts of equity have always manifested great reluctance to deprive a mortgagee or other purchaser of the legal estate; but so they have also when the attempt has been to displace the first of two equitable mortgagees. I have not found any case of authority in which this has been done on the ground of negligence that was not "gross"—that is, so great as to make the prior mortgagee responsible for the fraud committed on the subsequent mortgagee. This seems to me to be the accurate statement of the rule as between two equitable mortgagees; and for this view of the law there is positive and very high authority.

In Cory v. Eyre Turner, L.J., says:—"Questions of priority between equitable incumbrancers (and the incumbrances both of the plaintiff and of the defendants in this case are equitable, the legal estate being, as has been stated, outstanding) are in general governed by the rule qui prior est tempore potior est jure, and in determining cases depending on the rule we must, of course, look at the principle on which the rule is founded. It is founded, so I conceive, on this principle, that the creation or declaration of a trust vests an estate and interest in the subject-matter of the trust in the person in whose favour the trust is created or declared. Where, therefore, it is sought, as in the present case, to postpone an equitable title created by declaration of trust there is an estate or interest to be displaced. No doubt there may be cases so strong as to justify this being done, but there can be as little doubt that a strong case must be required to justify it. A vested estate or interest ought not to be disturbed upon any light grounds."

In Shropshire Union Railways and Canal Co. v. The Queen, 23 W. R. 709, L. R. 7 H. L. 496, Lord Cairns says (23 W. R., at p. 710, L. R. 7 H. L., at p. 507): "But I conceive it to be clear and undoubted law, the enforcement of which is required for the safety of mankind, that, in order to take away any pre-existing admitted equitable title, that which is relied upon for such a purpose must be shown and proved by those upon whom the burden to show and prove it lies, and that it must amount to something tangible and distinct, something which can have the grave and strong effect to accomplish the purpose for which it is said to have been produced."

In Roberts v. Croft Lord Cranworth, dealing with a contest between two equitable mortgagees, says that "the former, when she took her security, acquired a right which was good against all other merely equitable claimants, unless she was guilty of gross negligence enabling the mortgagor to commit a fraud by holding himself out as unincumbered holder of the property."

In Dixon v. Muckleston Lord Selborne treats the rule that negligence to postpone the mortgagee must be "gross and wilful negligence which, in the eye of this court, amounts to fraud," as applicable between two equitable mortgagees, and he says, in effect, that where deeds were deposited which were stated in writing by the mortgagor to be the title-deeds of a certain property, and to be deposited as security, whether those were all the deeds, or only part of the deeds, or "had not been truly deeds relating to" that estate at all, "as between the mortgagor who had signed such a statement, and those claiming under him" on the one side, and the mortgagee on the other, a good equitable security would be created, which they "would be estopped from at any time whatever disputing," and for this his lordship refers amongst other cases to Hunt v. Elmes, Collyer v. Finch, and to the statement of the law in Hewitt v. Loosemore, all of which were cases of legal mortgages.

These are not obiter dicta, but the carefully-worded reasons on which some of the most eminent of modern judges based their decisions in the cases I have referred to, in the Court of Appeal, in Chancery, and in the House of Lords. Nothing short of a decision of the House of Lords can overrule the law so laid down.

Great reliance was placed in argument upon the judgment in Rice v. Rice, where Kindersley, V.C., says that, "in a contest between persons having only equitable interests, priority of time is the ground of preference last resorted to." In that case the claimant was a vendor who had conveyed the estate without receiving his purchase-money, and was seeking to establish an equitable lien for it against a subsequent mortgagee by deposit of the conveyance, which had upon it a receipt for the purchase-money signed by the vendor, who had thus armed the purchaser with the means of committing a fraud upon the depositee. No one can object to the decision, but the doctrine as above stated by Kindersley, V.C., has not been accepted. The case was cited in each of those from which I have just quoted, and the language used by Turner, L.J., in Cory v. Eyre seems expressly addressed to answer the observations of Kindersley, V.C. It has also been remarked upon in In re Vernon, Ewens, & Co., 35 W. R., at p. 226, 33 Ch. D., at p. 408, and in Union Bank of London v. Kent. In the last-mentioned cases many of the decisions in contests between two equitable mortgagees are discussed and explained. In each of those decisions in which a prior equitable mortgagee was displaced for negligence, the negligence was such as, according to the definition given in the cases I have referred to, would have been sufficient to postpone a mortgagee who had the legal estate. I conclude, therefore, that the negligence necessary to postpone the first equitable mortgagee in such a case as the present must be so gross as to render him responsible for the fraud committed upon the second mortgagee.

The question is, was there sufficient negligence in this case on the part of the plaintiffs? They intended to have, and had every reason to believe they were obtaining, a perfectly good legal mortgage. If the legal estate had passed, it would have been impossible, I think, to deprive them of it at the instance of the defendants. The negligence of which they are accused was omitting to make a requisition as to the property having been at one time owned by Smithson. If they had done this, it is said the forgery of the deed of the 3rd of November, 1882, would have been discovered. But would it? If by requisition is meant exhausting all means of information by applying to Smithson's trustees, inquiring in the neighbourhood, and the like, that might have been the result. But the requisition which a purchaser usually makes is a question asked of the vendor or his solicitors; unless he has reason for suspicion, it is not usual to do more, and if he gets a satisfactory answer he does not inquire further; and he cannot be truly said to be guilty of gross negligence if he is so satisfied. In this case the mortgagor had not a separate solicitor; the question, if asked, must have been asked of him. But it was anticipated, so far as he was concerned, by production of the forged deed, which he produced as genuine, and which the plaintiffs' solicitors had no reason in the world to doubt. Therefore, to my mind, this, if negligence, was not gross negligence; was not such negligence as would have postponed the plaintiffs if the legal estate had passed to them by the deed of mortgage; and was not such negligence as made them responsible in the view of a court of equity for the fraud subsequently committed by the mortgagor upon the defendants.

Lord Selborne, in Dixon v. Muckleston, held that an equitable mortgagee receiving a parcel which the mortgagor stated in writing to contain the title deeds of the estate upon which he by that writing contracted to give security could not be postponed to a subsequent mortgagee by deposit of the real title deeds. Even if the parcel did not contain any of the title deeds, and he, trusting to the mortgagor's statement, never examined it, such negligence would not be sufficiently gross to postpone him.

That would be greater negligence than can be imputed to the plaintiffs in this case.

I think myself bound by principle and authority to hold that the plaintiffs cannot be postponed on the ground of negligence.

Then does the possession of the title deeds confer upon the defendants an advantage, in respect of which they are entitled to plead that they are purchasers for value without notice.

There has been some fluctuation of opinion on this point. Lord Cranworth, in Collyer v. Finch, says that the principle is not confined to cases where the person who sets it up has the legal estate.

In Thorpe v. Holdsworth, 17 W. R. 394, L. R. 7 Eq. 139, Giffard, V.C., thought the question a difficult one, but, having established the priority of the first equitable mortgagee, he directed a sale to raise his charge, and that the second mortgagee, who had the deeds, should produce them for the purpose of such sale.

But in Newton v. Newton, where the claim was to have a trust fund of £2,000 raised out of an estate, in priority to an equitable mortgage by deposit of the mortgage-deed by which the fund had been secured to the trustee, who had advanced the trus money to the mortgagor, the Lord Chancellor held that where the equitable right was established against the defendants having the deeds the decree should go on to order them to be delivered up; distinguishing Wallwyn v. Lee and like cases on the ground that the sole object in them was to recover the deeds, and not to determine the right to the estate; but when the right to the estate was decided it would confer the right to the possession of the deeds.

Another point insisted upon was that the legal estate which the defendants have got in will protect them against the plaintiffs' claim.

But if this was obtained from someone who was trustee for the persons beneficially interested, and who knew of the plaintiffs' claim, it is quite clear it will not protect the defendants.

I have pointed out that by the conveyance by Surtees' trustees to Toward on the 30th of January, 1883, it appears that the contract with them was to convey the fee simple free from incumbrances.

When Surtees' trustees obtained the legal estate after this conveyance there was a duty incumbent upon them to convey it to Toward, or to the assign of Toward, who had the best right to call for it. In that sense they were trustees for such assign. Any conveyance by them to another person would be a breach of such trust, and the defendants could not obtain an advantage by availing themselves of such a breach of trust. I have spoken of trustees. I believe, in fact, there was only one trustee at the time of these transactions.

In Harpham v. Shacklock copyholds had been mortgaged in 1850 by conditional surrender, without admittance, to one Peck. In 1876 the owner of the equity of redemption mortgaged to Pritchard. In 1877 Peck and the owner mortgaged to Shacklock, Peck being paid off. Shacklock deposited this mortgage and the documents obtained from Peck with his bankers to secure an advance, and about the same time he handed some of the other title deeds to the plaintiff, for whom Shacklock was trustee of the mortgage of 1877. After they knew of the plaintiff's claim the bankers procured Peck to be admitted under his conditional surrender of 1850, and he surrendered to them and they were admitted. In the Court of Appeal Sir G. Jessel said: "Then, as regards the legal estate, nothing is better settled than that you cannot make use of the doctrine of tabula in naufragio by getting in a legal estate from the bare trustee after you have received notice of a prior equitable claim. If Peck knew of the claim it was a wilful breach of trust in him to surrender to the bankers, if he did not know of it the bankers did, and knew that they were inducing him to commit a breach of trust by getting him to hand over the legal estate. The appellants' case, therefore, fails, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs."

I must, therefore, hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to priority.

With reference to costs, the case is a very hard one, and I do not think it right to do more than to allow each party to add his costs to his debt without interest upon such costs.

There must be a declaration that the plaintiffs have the first charge, the usual accounts, a decree for sale, and a direction that the costs be added to the debt, but without interest, and that the title deeds be delivered to the plaintiffs.

In re THE CROWN BANK (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Winding up — Shareholder's petition — Business for which company was formed abandoned, and business not authorized by memorandum of association substituted—"Just and equitable" that company should be wound up—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 70.

A company was formed for the purpose of carrying on a banking business in Northamptonshire, but, after about seven months, closed the local bank, changed its name, took an office in London, and carried on a business consisting of speculations in stocks and shares.

Held, on the petition of a shareholder for the winding up of the company, that it was "just and equitable" that it should be wound up.

This was a petition for the winding up of the above-named company, presented by a shareholder holding twenty shares on which £5 per share had been paid up, and supported by other shareholders. It was opposed by the company and by certain shareholders and creditors of the company.

The company was incorporated in 1888 under the Companies Act as a company limited by shares, with a capital of £250,000, divided into 25,000 shares of £10 each, under the name of the Mid-Northamptonshire Bank (Limited). The objects of the company, as defined in the memorandum of association, were the carrying on of the business of bankers in all its branches, with all incidental matters and things connected therewith, and generally all banking and monetary operations, and for the purposes aforesaid, or in common with any of the said objects, the acquisition and holding or resale of real and personal estate, either by way of security, investment, or otherwise, the discounting of bills, and the granting and making of loans on security of almost any kind, and to carry on financial operations of every kind; the borrowing of money and making and issuing mortgages and other securities for money secured on property of the bank, or without security; the investing the moneys of the bank in shares, stock, bonds, &c., and securities of any company, trust, or corporation formed under British, foreign, or colonial law, and upon any other securities; and numerous other objects.

In the prospectus inviting applications for shares which was issued by the directors, the objects were thus stated:—"This bank has been formed for the purpose of extending banking facilities in the county of Northampton, particularly in the Parliamentary Division of Mid-Northampton, where, from the rapidly-increasing manufacturing population in the boot trade and other local circumstances, it is known there is a profitable field for further banking operations."

In January, 1888, the company opened an office for banking business at Rushden, in Northamptonshire, but did little or no business there of any kind, and after a few months that office was closed, as it did not pay its expenses. No other business was carried on by the company in the county of Northampton.

In February, 1889, the name of the company was changed to that of "The Crown Bank (Limited)," and from about that date the only place of business of the company was its registered offices, No. 56, Cheapside, where the company used two rooms on the first floor, but possessed none of the accommodation usually required by bankers.

The petition alleged, among other things, that upon the faith of the prospectus the petitioner and other shareholders subscribed for shares; that there were various misrepresentations and misstatements in the prospectus; that no banking business was done by the company according to the balance-sheet issued by the directors, but only dealings in stocks and shares of a speculative character and loan transactions upon the securities of the bank; that the balance-sheet was not a proper one; that the company was insolvent and unable to pay its debts; and that, under the circumstances, it was just and equitable that it should be wound up.

The allegations in the petition were denied on behalf of the company.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Duke, for the petitioner.—The company ceased from February, 1889, to carry on the business for which it was formed, and it is just and equitable that it should be wound up. It was formed to carry on the business of a local bank, but that business has been entirely given up, and the directors do nothing but speculate systematically in stocks and shares. The funds of the company are being improperly used for purposes which are not justified by the memorandum of association of the company.

They referred to In re Haven Gold Mining Co., 30 W. R. 389, 20 Ch. D. 151; In re German Date Coffee Co., 30 W. R. 717, 20 Ch. D. 169; The Companies Act, 1862, s. 70.

Bramwell Davis, for shareholders supporting the petition.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and A. R. Kirby, for the company.—The objects of the company as set forth in the memorandum of association include and justify the dealings in stocks and shares which have been carried on by the directors. The fact that the banking business has been discontinued, and that the company now engages in speculation on the Exchange is not sufficient to justify a winding-up order.

Everitt, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for shareholders opposing the petition.

P. F. Wheeler, for creditors opposing the petition.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J., after examining the evidence given on the petition, and stating the facts of the case, proceeded:—It appears that the main business which the company was started to carry on was a local banking business, that such business has been entirely abandoned, and that the business which has actually been carried on in London is a speculative business of an entirely different character.

The prospectus of the company, on the faith of which the petitioner and the shareholders supporting the petition have taken their shares, was addressed to the formation of a local bank and nothing more, and I think that it correctly describes what were the real objects of the company. I agree that the prospectus cannot control the objects as defined by the memorandum of association of the company, but I think that the prospectus has placed the true interpretation upon them. It is said that the speculations carried on by the directors are comprised in the objects stated in the memorandum. [His lordship went through the objects, which were very numerous, and continued:—] In my opinion, if the memorandum of a company were to state the objects of the company to be the carrying on of any business whatsoever which the directors might think would be profitable to shareholders, that would not be such a statement of the objects as required by the Companies Act. The objects comprised in this memorandum, if the interpretation put upon them, by counsel for the company, is correct, might authorize a scheme for running a line of balloons between the earth and the moon. If such an interpretation were true the memorandum would not, in my opinion, be within the Companies Act at all. In my view the company could only properly engage in these numerous objects as subsidiary to its main business. The business of the company was that of bankers. It is a business which has been abandoned by the company, and the company ought to be wound up. What the company are now doing, and have been doing for a year past, is something outside the objects for which the company was formed.

It has been urged that if what the directors are now doing is ultrâ vires, there is a well known remedy open to the petitioner and the shareholders supporting him, that they should apply to the court to restrain the directors from doing what is beyond their powers, and that it is in such case to seek an improper remedy if they present a petition for winding up. As a general rule I do not dissent from that proposition; but it must be properly understood and must be limited. If a company were carrying on an illegitimate business and also a legitimate one, a winding-up order would not be the proper remedy, but an injunction would. If the legitimate business had become impossible, and the company were carrying on an unauthorized business, a winding-up order would be the proper remedy.

Take the case of a steamship company established for the conveyance of goods by sea between Liverpool and Dublin. If for the sake of convenience the directors proposed to land the goods before they reached Dublin, and to purchase a railway to carry the goods by land, the purchase of a railway being beyond their powers, there would be a case for an injunction. But if by any chance, by reason of a tunnel being constructed or otherwise, it became practically impossible for them to convey the goods by steamer, and they proposed to buy the railway and carry the goods by that way only, and to carry on a business which was unlawful for them to carry on, instead of their proper business, then I think it would be open to a shareholder to apply for a winding-up order. The ground on which I decide that there ought to be a winding-up order is that the case comes within the class of cases in which it is "just and equitable" that there should be a winding-up order, which is the last and most difficult to define and limit of the several grounds specified in the Companies Act, 1862, for resting a winding-up petition upon. I find these grounds specifically put forward in the petition. There are matters in evidence which I cannot go into. There was, however, one remark made as to the petition. It was said that the presentation of the petition was an attempt to levy blackmail. But what the petitioner has done is to say that the company are not carrying out the objects of the company, and that he desired to have his shares cancelled, and what he has paid returned; and this is no more than he is entitled to.

The parties subsequently came to an arrangement, and, upon application to the court, the petition was dismissed by consent.

Levy v. Walker, 27 W. R. 370, 10 Ch. D. 436, distinguished.

Motion.

The plaintiff, Arthur Thynne, formerly carried on business as a baker and confectioner at 44, Tranquil-vale, Blackheath. On the 27th of March, 1890, he entered into a contract with the defendant to sell to him as a going concern the leasehold house and premises where his business was carried on, together with the goodwill of the business, with certain stock-in-trade and fixtures.

By an assignment dated the 26th of April, 1890, in consideration of the sum of £850, the house or shop and premises, and all the beneficial interest and goodwill of the plaintiff in the trade of a baker and pastrycook there carried on by him, were assigned to the defendant.

Under the conditions of sale the defendant purchased from the plaintiff the stock-in-trade, including a number of paper bags, bill-heads, and cards, all bearing the name of the plaintiff, and also other articles for the sum of £42. After these cards were exhausted, the defendant caused to be printed and issued trade cards, bearing the name of "A. Thynne, baker and confectioner, the Village Bakery, Blackheath (established 1850)," as he alleged, in the ordinary course of business. Such cards did not bear the name of the defendant.

The assignment contained no express authority to use the name of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff commenced the present action on the 16th of May, 1890, claiming by his writ an order for the delivery up to him of all cards, bill-heads, and bags printed by or for the defendant in the name of "A. Thynne," an injunction to restrain the defendant from so using the name of the plaintiff or otherwise trading in his name.

The plaintiff now moved for an injunction in the terms of the writ.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Bradford, for the motion.—The assignee of the business cannot use the plaintiff's name, unless that is expressly authorized. The assignment contains no authority to use the name of "A. Thynne." The assignment of the goodwill does not amount to an irrevocable power of attorney; that would result if the assignee could so act as to make the assignor liable in any way. Levy v. Walker, 27 W. R. 370, 10 Ch. D. 436 (see judgment of James, L.J., at p. 448), and Gray v. Smith, ante, p. 310, 43 Ch. D. 208, take the question of what goodwill includes, as far as it can go.

Buckley, Q.C., and Levett, for the defendant.—The nature of the contract must first be ascertained exactly. The defendant bought a large number of articles bearing Thynne's name, including paper bags and cards. The plaintiff seeks to use his name again in business in Blackheath, after assigning his goodwill. This would seem to follow from his complaint of Shove's reprinting the name. Levy v. Walker and Gray v. Smith are not inconsistent. [STIRLING, J.—There is a difference between using the name in the business simply, and making the plaintiff liable in some way as carrying on the business.] The plaintiff cannot be injured, for Shove buys all goods in his own name. Levy v. Walker decides that the sale of goodwill includes the right to use the name; it is an exclusive right to use the name for the purposes of that business. There is no special virtue in adding to the assignment of goodwill, "together with the right to use the name of"; that is implied, for the business purposes. There is no copyright in a name, the defendant can use Thynne's name as he likes.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—The defendant has no right to use Thynne's name as a trade name; there is a liability if he does so, if I authorize him to trade under my name I may be liable. Levy v. Walker only decides that the name may be used where there is no possibility of any liability being incurred.

STIRLING, J.—I dispose of this motion as the hearing of the action, as that course has been consented to. The question which arises on the motion is an important one, and is not altogether covered by authority. [After stating the facts, and mentioning especially that the assignment contained no express assignment of the right to use the plaintiff's name, his lordship continued:—] Upon the evidence before me, the plaintiff puts his case upon these grounds: "I discovered on the 13th of May that the defendant had issued cards in my name, by which he wished the public to understand that I was still carrying on the business at 44, Tranquil-vale aforesaid. The defendant has no right to use my name, and I strongly object to his so doing, as it will materially injure me if I start in business again at Blackheath."

Now this, taken literally, is far in excess of the plaintiff's rights, for he has assigned the goodwill, and to the extent of carrying on the business in every way the defendant has the right to use the plaintiff's name, except so far as doing any act or using the name in any way so as to hold out the plaintiff as the owner of the business or to render him in any way liable. That is the only limit to the defendant's right to use the plaintiff's name. The defendant, on the other hand, says (paragraph 4): "I deny that the plaintiff can be materially or at all injured, and I deny his right to solicit any of the customers of the said business so purchased by me as aforesaid, and contend that I have a right to use the name of Arthur Thynne as a trade name."

The question is, is he absolutely entitled to use the name of the plaintiff, and this I think he is not entitled to do, so as to expose the plaintiff to any liability. Levy v. Walker has been relied upon. In that case Miss Charbonnel and Miss Walker carried on business in London. Miss Charbonnel married Levy; the partnership was dissolved, and the business and goodwill purchased by Miss Walker, who continued business under the style, as before, of Charbonnel & Walker. Mr. and Mrs. Levy carried on business in Paris under the style of Charbonnel et Cie., and sought to prevent Miss Walker from using the name of Charbonnel & Walker in London, and the relief claimed was refused, partly, it is clear, on the ground that Miss Walker put the plaintiffs under no possible liability by so carrying on the business. James, L.J., gave an opinion upon a point which Jessel, M.R., did not refer to, though he did not say that he held a contrary opinion, I mean that the assignment of the goodwill and business did convey the right to use the name of Charbonnel & Walker, and the exclusive right to use that name as between the vendor and the purchaser of that business.

In that case it is important to observe that the name of "Charbonnel & Walker" was not the name or names of any two persons carrying on the business, but really a fancy name; that is entirely different from a case where a person is exposed to liability, and the point that Miss Charbonnel could not have been liable to any claim was very important. In Gray v. Smith Cotton, L.J., said, "Mr. and Mrs. Levy could not be subjected to any liability by the use of the name of 'Charbonnel & Walker' by the defendant"; on that ground he seems to distinguish that case, so as to imply that no liability could be imposed by the use of the name in Levy v. Walker. In the present case the parties seem to me to have put their respective rights too high. The defendant seems to be entitled to use the name of "A. Thynne" so far as this, that he must not expose the plaintiff to any liability. The proper way to deal with the case will be to restrain the defendant, his servants and agents, from using the name of the plaintiff in such a way as to expose the plaintiff to any liability by holding him out as a person with whom contracts are made, which would impose liability on him. No order as to costs.

MOORE AND ANOTHER v. GAMGEE. (a.)

County court—Defendant residing out of jurisdiction—Leave not obtained for commencement of action—Objection to jurisdiction—Waiver—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 74.

A summons from a county court having been issued at the instance of a plaintiff and served upon a defendant residing out of the jurisdiction without leave for the commencement of the action having been first obtained under section 74 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the defendant appeared, but, after one of the causes of action had been heard and determined against him, objected to the jurisdiction.

Held, that the practice under this section was analogous to that in the High Court in cases requiring leave for notice of service of a writ upon a defendant residing out of the jurisdiction, and that the defendant, having appeared and contested the action, had waived his right to raise any objection to the jurisdiction of the court.

Motion for a writ of prohibition referred to the court by Hawkins, J., at chambers.

The motion was made by the defendant for the purpose of prohibiting the judge of the county court of Brighton from further proceedings in an action by the plaintiff, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction over the defendant, who admittedly resided out of the jurisdiction, but had carried on business in the jurisdiction within six months before action. No leave had been obtained by the plaintiff under section 74 of the County Courts Act, 1888, for the commencement of the action in the court within the district in which the defendant had carried on business within six calendar months next before the commencing of the action. The defendant had appeared by his solicitor on the first day of the hearing at the county court, and had raised no objection to the jurisdiction. The judge had decreed specific performance of the contract sued upon, but adjourned till the next day the question whether there had been any acceptance by the defendant of the plaintiff's title. In the interval the defendant's solicitor became aware that no leave had been obtained for the commencement of the action, though the defendant resided out of Brighton. He thereupon took the objection to the jurisdiction of the court. The judge held as a fact that the defendant had carried on business in Brighton within six months of the commencement of the action, but that, even if he had not, the defendant had waived his right to raise the objection to jurisdiction, and that it was now too late to maintain it.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wedderburn, for the defendant.—The defendant took the objection as soon as he was made aware of the defect in the proceedings. There was nothing patent on the form of summons to show that leave was necessary and had not been obtained. The judge was bound, under section 114 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to have dismissed the action as one over which he had no jurisdiction except by the consent of the parties.

Gregson, for the plaintiff.—The last section only refers to causes coming under section 56 which the county court had no jurisdiction to try. The objection has been taken too late. The further proceedings related to a claim of lien mainly. Such a claim is expressly excepted by section 75 from the provisions of section 74.

Wedderburn replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

CAVE, J.—This is an application by the defendant in an action for a prohibition to be directed to the judge of the Brighton County Court, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the plaint laid before him by a plaintiff, the present respondent. The claim in the county court was for the specific performance of a contract. Objection to the jurisdiction was taken by the defendant on the second day of the hearing, on the ground that he resided outside the jurisdiction, and that no leave to serve the summons upon him had been obtained, as required by the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 74. That section enacts that, "except where by this Act it is otherwise provided, every action or matter may be commenced in the court within the district of which the defendant shall dwell or carry on business at the time of commencing the action or matter, or it may be commenced, by leave of the judge or registrar, in the court within the district of which the defendant dwelt or carried on business within six months next before the commencement."

It was argued that, in the absence of such leave, there was a lack of jurisdiction in the county court, and that the judge was thereby bound to dismiss the plaint under section 114, which enacts that, "whenever an action or matter is commenced over which the court has no jurisdiction the judge shall, unless the parties consent to the court having jurisdiction, order it to be struck out."

There are two senses in which an objection to jurisdiction may be advanced. First, it may imply that there is no jurisdiction under any circumstances for the court to entertain the matter sought to be brought before it. Such matter is dealt with by section 56, which enumerates causes of action which are altogether excluded from the jurisdiction of the county courts. In the cases dealt with by section 74 there is no want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter. Specific performance is clearly within the ordinary jurisdiction of the county courts. No doubt the leave of the court or registrar is necessary before this particular claim could be entertained, owing to the defendant residing outside the jurisdiction. Ordinarily the registrar would be made aware of that fact on the entry of the plaint, and would have drawn the attention of the party entering the plaint to the fact that objection might be taken if leave was not previously obtained. However, that objection was not present to the registrar at the time of entry; the writ issued, and the defendant appeared.

It is difficult, as a rule, to draw analogies between actions in the High Court and those in the county courts, since the jurisdiction of the former depends largely upon the common law, and that of the latter depends entirely upon statute, but there is, I think, some analogy to be derived from the High Court practice in cases where a British subject is resident out of the jurisdiction, and the leave of the court must be obtained before a writ, or notice of a writ or summons, can be served. That is ing, cleansing, and watering, in so far as they were necessary for the maintenance of the road.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Macmorran, for the local board.

R. S. Wright, for the county council.

GRANTHAM, J.—There can be no doubt as to what our decision must be in this case—namely, that we have no right to put a more limited construction on the words of the Act of 1888 than they naturally would have, reading them in conjunction with the general legislation that from time to time has been passed in reference to roads.

The sections on which our decision mainly turns are the 13th section of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, and the 11th section of the Local Government Act of 1888. We have first of all to find out what is the meaning of the term "road," as referred to in the 13th section of the Highway Act, 1878, and then what is the meaning of the words "main road," more particularly as affecting the question of the footpath on each side.

By the old Highways Act, a road included footways; that is common ground, and admitted by both sides. That being so, the Legislature in all legislation dealing with roads always dealt with the word road under the impression that they were dealing with the carriageway and the footway, and we must assume that that was the intention of the Legislature. Then when they made the alteration by the Highway Act of 1878, of modifying to a certain extent the liability for cost of repair by throwing half the cost of certain roads on the county authority as distinguished from the local authority, as they did not in terms make any difference between footways in urban districts and those outside urban districts, we must assume that the Legislature had it in its mind, when that Act was passed, that the incidence of the alterations of liability would be the same in the urban authority as it was in the local authority outside the urban authority. Then comes the Local Government Act of 1888, without any limitation at all as to the liability which is thrown on the county of paying the whole expense of certain roads, whereas before, the county authority only paid half. I think we must assume that the Legislature again intended that which they purport to state—namely, that every road in a county which is for the time being a "main road" shall after the appointed day be wholly maintained and repaired by the council of the county in which the road is situate. Now as they have not by any other section limited the natural meaning of the word "road," I do not see what power we have to put an interpretation upon it which is not the natural interpretation of it, looking at the effect of the legislation of the last fifty years on highways in this country.

All I can add to what I have already said during the argument is that, in my opinion, with regard to the first question, "Whether under section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, the county council is liable for the costs of the maintenance and repair, and reasonable improvement connected with the maintenance and repair, of all or any of the above-mentioned footpaths or footways on the sides of main roads as parts of such main roads, or to make payments in respect thereof," our answer must be that the county council is liable to the cost of maintenance and repair and reasonable improvement of the footpaths or footways on the sides of main roads as parts of such main roads, and to make payments in respect thereof. I am also of opinion that, with regard to the paved or pitched crossings over such main roads, the same answer must be given as is given to the first—namely, that they are liable.

As regards scavenging, that the learned counsel for the county council gave up, and the point as to scavenging is not now contended for. With regard to lighting, that has been given up by the local authority. Then, with regard to the fifth question, our decision is that that must be left for the particular case that is brought before the authorities; or, if there is a dispute between them, before the Local Government Board. Under certain circumstances the county authority would be liable, but under other circumstances, if the change were greater than could fairly be considered a change likely to take place, or desirable, then the local authority must be at the expense of such a special change, which could not have been intended to have been thrown upon the county authority.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The section which we have to construe is the 11th section of the Local Government Act of 1888; but to construe that section it is necessary to consider what is the proper construction of sections 13 and 15 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act of 1878, for the 11th section of the Act of 1888 refers to roads which are for the time being "main roads" within the meaning of the Act of 1878. Therefore it is necessary to look at the two sections of the earlier Act to be enabled to place a true construction on the 11th section of the later Act.

Now the two sections of the earlier Act constituted two classes of roads, as main roads: in the first place, roads which had ceased, or which would cease to be turnpike roads; in the second place, under section 15, any highways which appeared to the highway authority proper to be made main roads.

Now what, at the time of the passing of the Act of 1878, was the duty of the highway authority with reference to the repair of these roads? First, take the case of roads which had been disturnpiked prior to the passing of the Act. At that time the highway authority had imposed upon it a double duty. In the first place, it had the duty of repairing the footways, which the turnpike trustees were never under any duty to repair. In the second place, it had the duty, restored to it, after the close of the turnpike trusts, as representing the inhabitants at large, of repairing the highway, and therefore, at the time of the passing of this Act, with reference to the disturnpiked roads, there was imposed on the county authority the duty of repairing roads and footways alike. The same observation is true with reference to highways—highways which are dealt with under the 15th section of the Act—that is to say, highways which had never been turnpike roads at all. With reference to those highways the duty rested upon the inhabitants at large at all times; and the duty, at the time of the passing of this Act, rested on the highway authority of repairing both roadway and footway. Therefore the Legislature passed the Act of 1878 in this state of things—they were dealing with disturnpiked roads, or roads which would be thereafter disturnpiked, and they were dealing with ordinary highways; and they provide that one-half of the expenses incurred—by whom? by the highway authority—in the maintenance of such roads shall be paid to the highway authority by the county authority.

We have been invited by Mr Wright, on behalf of the county council, to read these words thus: one-half of the expenses incurred by the highway authority, as successors of the turnpike trustees, in the maintenance of such roads, and reading in those words, and referring us to the Turnpike Act of 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, ss. 111 and 112, he pointed out to us that upon the turnpike trustees there was no duty of reparation with reference to the footpaths; quite the contrary, the duty of reparation of footpaths was reserved to the inhabitants at large. The effect of the two sections is to empower the trustees to keep the footways in rural districts in repair, but with regard to the footways in urban districts, undoubtedly the Turnpike Act reserves the liability to repair those, and leaves it where it always was, upon the inhabitants at large. If I could see my way to insert this limitation in section 13 I would insert it, but I own that, having regard to the fact that the same Act deals with two classes of main roads, one disturnpiked road, and the other ordinary highways, and having regard to the fact that, at the time it passed, the highway authority undoubtedly had the duty of repairing both highway and footway, it is impossible to insert any such limitation as that which is suggested.

It seems to me that, the turnpike trusts having come to an end, the Legislature means exactly what it says when it enacts that in the case of these disturnpiked roads one-half of the expenses incurred by the highway authority in the maintenance of these roads is to be borne by the county authority, the expenses of the highway authority including at that time undoubtedly both the expense of repairing the footway and the expense of repairing the roadway.

Now, that being the construction which I put upon the Act of 1878, I do not feel any difficulty at all with reference to the Act of 1888. There the whole of the expense is placed upon the county authority. I think it may be open to doubt under the former Act whether, in the case of roads which were simply declared main roads, one-half of the expenses could legally be thrown on the county, but, however that may be, it is quite certain now that under the Local Government Act the whole of the expenses of the maintenance of main roads, that is to say, main roads from hedge to hedge, including the footpaths, are thrown on the county authorities.

That disposes of the case. The urban authority in this instance have chosen to exercise the power reserved to them under sub-section 2 of section 11 of claiming to retain the duty of maintaining and repairing a main road, and, therefore, having done so, they are entitled to an annual payment or contribution from the county authority; they have to perform the duties which otherwise the county council would have to perform, and they may demand from the county council an annual payment; that annual payment is to cover the cost of maintenance and repair and reasonable improvement.

I may add, with reference to question 5, which is put to us, that if the alteration and substitution of flagging and paving for gravel is, under the circumstances, a reasonable improvement, undoubtedly that ought to be borne by the county council, they ought to contribute towards it. But whether in any particular instance it is an improvement or not seems to me to be a matter which, in case of difference, must, under sub-section 3 of section 11 of the Act of 1888, be determined by arbitration of the Local Government Board.

It is unnecessary for me to add anything to the answers we return to questions two, three, and four.

Costs—Solicitor and client—Solicitor acting for mortgagor and mortgagee—Agreement as to amount of remuneration, inclusive of costs of both parties—Reference to taxing master—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, ss. 1 (3), 2, 8.

A solicitor was instructed by a letter signed by S. to borrow £300 for him upon certain specified security, and S. thereby undertook to pay "your costs (which I agree at £20, exclusive of money out of pocket) . . . to be incurred in . . . doing what is necessary for the purpose of carrying out these instructions." The solicitor, who acted in the matter for the mortgagee as well as the mortgagor, procured the advance, and retained £20 for his costs of both parties. S. having subsequently applied that the solicitor might be ordered to deliver a bill of his fees, charges, and disbursements, and that it might be referred to taxation,

Held (affirming the decision of North, J.), that, though the remuneration agreed upon included matters in respect of which the solicitor was not engaged as solicitor for S. (including as it did the mortgagee's costs), yet as the solicitor was engaged by S. to do business for him as a solicitor, S. was thereby constituted a "client" of the solicitor within the meaning of section 1, sub-section (3), of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and within the meaning of that Act generally, and the letter amounted to an agreement within section 8 of the Act.

Held, also, that, in the absence of any evidence impeaching the agreement as unfair or unreasonable, the court ought not to refer it to the taxing master under section 8, sub-section (4), to deal with it in exercise of the powers thereby given.

Appeal from North, J.

Slater, the appellant, was a journeyman butcher, and being entitled to some money under his grandfather's will, was desirous of raising a sum of £300 upon his interest thereunder. Accordingly he consulted Mr. Palmer, a solicitor, upon the subject, and in the result wrote him the following letter:—"I hereby request and instruct you to raise, or endeavour to raise, for me the sum of £300 at 10 per cent. per annum, on the security of all my estate and interest under the will and in the property of the late Thos. Symons, and I hereby undertake to pay your costs (which I agree at £20, exclusive of money out of pocket) incurred and to be incurred in and about doing what is necessary, in your opinion, for the purpose of carrying out these instructions." The letter was duly signed. Palmer, who acted in the matter as solicitor for both mortgagor and mortgagee, accordingly obtained an advance of £300, which was secured upon a mortgage of Slater's interest under his grandfather's will, and retaining £20 out of the £300 for his costs of both parties, handed the balance to Slater. Out of a further advance of £50, an agreed sum of £15 was deducted for costs in the same way. A summons was subsequently taken out by Slater for delivery by Palmer of a bill "of all such his fees, charges, or disbursements as he claims to be due or paid, or as have been deducted by him from the applicant, or out of his moneys" and for reference of such bill to taxation.

The Solicitors' Remuneration Act provides by a paragraph in section 1 (3) that "in this Act 'client' includes any person who, as a principal, or on behalf of another, or as trustee or executor, or in any other capacity, has power, express or implied, to retain or employ, or retains or employs, or is about to retain or employ, a solicitor, and any person for the time being liable to pay to a solicitor for his services any costs, remuneration, charges, expenses, or disbursements."

Section 2 mentions "business connected with . . . mortgages" among the different kinds of business the remuneration in respect of which is dealt with by the Act.

Section 8 provides that "(1) With respect to any business to which the foregoing provisions of this Act relate . . . it shall be competent for a solicitor to make an agreement with his client, and for a client to make an agreement with his solicitor, before or after or in the course of the transaction of any such business, for the remuneration of the solicitor, to such amount and in such manner as the solicitor and the client think fit, either by a gross sum, or by commission or percentage, or by salary or otherwise; and it shall be competent for the solicitor to accept from the client, and for the client to give to the solicitor, remuneration accordingly.

"(2) The agreement shall be in writing, signed by the person to be bound thereby, or by his agent in that behalf.

"(3.) The agreement may, if the solicitor and the client think fit, be made on the terms that the amount of the remuneration therein stipulated for either shall include or shall not include all or any disbursements made by the solicitor in respect of searches, plans, travelling, stamps, fees, or other matters.

"(4.) The agreement may be sued and recovered on or impeached and set aside in the like manner and on the like grounds as an agreement not relating to the remuneration of a solicitor; and if, under any order for taxation of costs, such agreement being relied upon by the solicitor shall be objected to by the client as unfair or unreasonable, the taxing master or officer of the court may inquire into the facts, and certify the same to the court; and if, upon such certificate, it shall appear to the court or judge that just cause has been shown either for cancelling the agreement or for reducing the amount payable under the same, the court or judge shall have power to order such cancellation or reduction, and to give all such directions necessary or proper for the purpose of carrying such order into effect, or otherwise consequential thereon, as to the court or judge may seem fit."

North, J., held that the letter amounted to an agreement within section 8 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, and that he could not make an order for taxation for the purpose of setting aside the agreement. He accordingly dismissed the application.

Slater appealed.

Farwell (Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., with him), for the appellant.—First, there was no agreement here within the Solicitors' Remuneration Act. Secondly, if there was, the appellant is not debarred from having it taxed. By the scale the costs would have been under £10, instead of £20. There was no power to agree upon a sum which included the mortgagee's costs as well as the mortgagor's, for, though a mortgagor has to pay his mortgagee's costs, he is not the mortgagee's agent to retain a solicitor for him, nor is he himself the client of the mortgagee's solicitor: section 1 (3) (the definition clause) where client is defined. [FRY, L.J.—That is not a definition clause—it merely says "client" includes so and so. It does not exclude everything else.] Then, under section 8 (4), if the client objects to the agreement as unfair or unreasonable, it may be referred to the taxing master, and the amount may be reduced, or the agreement set aside: In re Inderwick, 32 W. R. 541, 25 Ch. D. 279, at pp. 281, 282; In re Gray, 30 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 551. The agreed sums here are clearly unreasonable, and the figures speak for themselves. Clients in humble life are at the mercy of solicitors, and it is not desirable that agreements should be made which require the machinery of a Chancery action to set them aside. The whole of these costs should be sent to the taxing master with a direction to have regard, in taxing them, to these agreements: Cole v. Park, 37 W. R. 742, 41 Ch. D. 326.

Dunham, for the respondent, was not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—Two points have been raised, which have been argued with great ingenuity by Mr. Farwell, but, in my opinion, the appellant cannot succeed on either of them.

First of all it was said that this was not an agreement within the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, at all, on the ground that Mr. Palmer and Mr. Farwell's client did not stand in the relation of solicitor and client. I think the construction of section 1, sub-section (3), is against that contention. According to the definition contained in that sub-section "client" includes any person who has power, express or implied, to retain or employ, and retains or employs, a solicitor. To my mind the appellant has done that. It is very true the remuneration agreed upon was partly with reference to matters in which the solicitor was not engaged as solicitor for the appellant, but he was engaged to do business for him as solicitor, and therefore, in my opinion, the relation of solicitor and client was created within the meaning of this clause and within the meaning of the Act.

But then it is said that this agreement ought to have been referred to the taxing master, having regard to section 8, sub-section (4), of the Act. Now the appellant has not filed any affidavit that this charge is unfair or unreasonable, and, although sub-section (4) does, in my opinion, give the court power, where an agreement is so impeached, to refer it to the taxing master to consider whether the charge is fair and reasonable, no foundation for such a reference has been laid in the present case; and though Mr. Farwell says that this is a very unfair and unreasonable charge, I do not think the court ought, merely upon such an argument by counsel alone, unsupported by an affidavit or facts which lead to that conclusion, to refer such an agreement to the taxing master to exercise the power given by the 4th sub-section of section 8.

In my opinion the appeal fails.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I entirely agree with what Cotton, L.J., has said.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Mortgage of uncalled capital—Power to mortgage uncalled capital given in memorandum and articles of association—Winding up—Priority—Unsecured creditors—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 7—9, 14, 16, 26, 38, 43, 75, 94, 95, 98, 101, 102, 133.

The Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, contain no prohibition, either in express terms or by necessary implication, against mortgaging the uncalled capital of a company limited by shares.

In the case of a company limited by shares, calls made by the liquidator in the winding up form part of the capital of the company; and, accordingly, where the memorandum and articles of association of a company limited by shares give a power to mortgage the uncalled capital of the company, such a mortgage, when made by the directors while the company is a going concern, is effectual to operate after the winding up upon calls made in the winding up by the liquidator, and entitles the mortgagee to be paid out of such calls in priority to the unsecured creditors of the company.

Decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 282), affirmed by the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Lindley, and Lopes, L.JJ.; Lopes, L.J., dubitante).

Appeal from the decision of Stirling, J., reported ante, p. 282.

The question raised by this appeal was whether mortgages of their uncalled capital made by a limited company did in fact cover, or could validly cover, calls made by the liquidator in the subsequent winding up of the company, so as to give the mortgagees priority over the unsecured creditors of the company in the distribution of the assets of the company.

The company was registered in 1880 as a company with a capital limited by shares, and amongst the objects stated in the memorandum of association were these:

"To borrow money by mortgage or otherwise, receive money on deposit, and issue transferable and other bonds, and mortgage debentures and other securities, founded or based upon all or any of the real and personal assets or on the credit of the company."

By the articles of association, which bore even date with the memorandum, it was provided (Article 111) that the board of directors "may from time to time borrow on bonds or debentures of the company or on mortgage of all or any part of the property of the company, and either with or without including in any such mortgage all or any definite proportion of the capital of the company then uncalled, such sum of money as they from time to time think expedient."

The directors, while the company was a going concern, had executed the following mortgages:—

1. A mortgage dated the 3rd of January, 1882, in favour of Frederick Greenwood and John Brooke Greenwood, by which, first, all the then uncalled-up amounts of £6 per share on 3,500 preferred shares of the company; and, secondly, all the personal property, assets, and effects which then, or at any time during the continuance of the security, should belong to the company, but not including any uncalled capital of the company, except that thereinbefore expressly mentioned, were assigned to secure repayment of an advance of £2,500.

2. A mortgage dated the 3rd of May, 1886, in favour of Robert M'Ilwraith and Edward Gotto, whereby the uncalled amounts of £4 per share on 5,000 shares of the company were assigned, by way of security against any loss or damage which M'Ilwraith and Gotto might sustain by reason of their having guaranteed to the British Linen Co.'s bank the repayment of a sum of £3,000 advanced by the bank to the company, and also guaranteed to the London and North-Western Railway Co. and to the Great Western Railway Co. the payment of such sum as might be due to those railway companies by the company for carriage of goods upon their ledger account with the railway companies.

3. A mortgage dated the 10th of August, 1887, in favour of L. Gautier, whereby the uncalled amounts of £4 per share on 5,000 shares of the company were (subject to the prior mortgages) assigned to secure an advance of £4,000.

4. A mortgage dated the 28th of October, 1887, in favour of R. M'Ilwraith, whereby the uncalled amounts of £4 per share on 5,000 shares of the company were assigned (subject to the prior mortgages) to secure an advance of £3,000.

All the mortgagees, with the exception of F. Greenwood, were themselves shareholders in the company.

The mortgages had been registered under section 43 of the Companies Act, 1862.

The company having subsequently gone into liquidation, the question arose whether these mortgages covered, or could validly cover, calls when made by the liquidator in the winding up, so as to entitle the mortgagees to be paid in priority to the unsecured creditors of the company.

Stirling, J., decided in favour of the mortgagees.

The unsecured creditors appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., Phipson Beale, Q.C., and Carson, for the appellants.—All mortgages of uncalled capital are inoperative as against the liability that arises after liquidation has commenced, and no provision to the contrary in the memorandum or articles of association can defeat or alter the statutory right of the creditors in the liquidation to have the assets of the company applied in payment pari passu amongst them: Companies Act, 1862, s. 133, sub-section 1. Section 16 imposes a liability to pay calls on every person joining a company, and constitutes such liability a specialty debt, but that is a liability arising in pursuance of the conditions and regulations of the company, and is applicable only while the company is a going concern. When a company is being wound up an entirely new liability, a liability to contribution in the winding up, arises under, and is imposed by, section 38. Then section 75 deals with this latter liability and constitutes it also a specialty debt. If the liability to pay calls were the same as the liability to contribute in the winding up, then section 75 would be superfluous, but if the liability to contribute in the winding up be a new liability, as we contend it is, then section 75 is intelligible. Calls made by the liquidator in the winding up do not form any part of the uncalled capital of the company. The capital of a company is that which is agreed on and fixed by the memorandum and articles of association as the capital—that which is placed at the disposal of the company as a going concern—and does not include the liability to contribute imposed by statutory obligation. This liability to contribute, imposed by section 38, applies to unlimited as well as to limited companies, and to past as well as present members; but how can a call made on a member in an unlimited company be part of the capital of the company? When a company fixes its capital at a fixed amount, can that be increased by the liability to contribution under section 38? There may be six persons liable as contributories, under section 38, in respect of one share, five as past members and one as a present member, and is the contribution of the present member part of the capital of the company and the contribution of the past members not, and, if so, what is the distinction? No doubt in the case of a limited company the liability to contribute under section 38 is limited by sub-section (4) to the amount unpaid on the shares, but though the limitation of the liability to contribute is thereby measured by the amount of the capital of the company, it is not thereby constituted part of the capital of the company. In the case of an unlimited company the only limit to the liability to contribution is that which is wanted to pay the creditors. In the case of a company limited by guarantee there may be no capital at all, but merely the undertaking of the members to contribute in the case of a winding up. The liability to contribution in a winding up is, therefore, not part of the capital of the company, but it is a statutory liability, independent of and separate from the contractual liability to pay up uncalled capital, though in the case of limited companies the statutory liability is measured by the contractual liability. It is beyond the powers of a company or of its directors to forestall the statutory fund created by this statutory liability and leave little or nothing for distribution among ordinary creditors of the company. Sections 25 and 26 show that the object of the Act was to give creditors information as to this statutory fund, but if the company or its directors can appropriate this in advance by way of mortgage or sale, then such information is but a trap to the unwary creditor. The Companies Clauses Act, 1845, by section 38, gives express power to mortgage future calls, but that Act only applies to companies incapable of being wound up—e.g., railway companies—and the power given, therefore, necessarily deals only with directors' calls; and the very fact of an express provision being considered necessary to give such power favours our contention. Stirling, J., decided against us on the authority of In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co., 44 L. J. Ch. 683, 23 W. R. Dig. 45, a decision of Jessel, M.R., which was followed by Kay, J., in Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., 36 W. R. 801, 38 Ch. D. 156. In the Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co. case, the point, that on the true interpretation of the statute it is ultrà vires the company to mortgage calls in the winding up, was not raised or argued, but the question as to power to mortgage future calls was treated merely as a matter of contract depending on the construction of the memorandum and articles of association, and that, where these are contemporaneous, the articles may explain and supplement the memorandum, as in Harrison v. Mexican Railway Co., 23 W. R. 403, L. R. 19 Eq. 358, and the argument was that when once a contract to mortgage future calls is found to exist, it includes not only directors' calls, but also calls made by the liquidator. In Ex parte Stanley, 12 W. R. 894, 4 De G. J. & S. 407, it was held that a provision authorizing directors to borrow money on the security of the funds or property of the society did not enable the directors to mortgage future calls, because it was inconsistent with a provision that the calls were to be made whenever "it shall appear to the directors to be necessary or expedient." In Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams, 23 W. R. 668, L. R. 6 P. C. 265, though the actual decision was only that the deed in that case did not give any power to charge uncalled capital, yet the observations of James, L.J., show that, in his opinion, the effect of Stanley's case was that a charge on future calls was ultrà vires and void; and Stanley's case was expressly approved of in that case, which is, therefore, certainly no authority that if the deed had contained a power to charge by way of mortgage, the liability of the shareholders in the winding up would be affected thereby. In In re Sankey Brook, 18 W. R. 427, L. R. 9 Eq. 721, there was an affirmance under the particular circumstances of the case, of a power to charge, but there the call was made and the time for its payment fixed for a date previous to the winding up, and in Sankey Brook Co. (No. 2), 18 W. R. 914, L. R. 10 Eq. 381, it was held that the power to mortgage did not extend to the proceeds of a future call. [COTTON, L.J.—I think the question as to mortgaging calls made in the winding up must have arisen in the case of General South American Co., 24 W. R. 891, 2 Ch. D. 337.] In that case the share capital had all been paid up in full, and the question, therefore, was not material; the only point there argued was, whether the debentures were invalid through want of proper registration. The case of In re Lishman, 19 W. R. 344, was expressly disapproved of in Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams. None of these cases deal with the question as to whether it is ultrà vires the company, on the true construction of the statute, to mortgage calls in the winding up, but there are cases as to set off, the principles of which are applicable to this question, and which were not cited in Phœnix Bessemer case; such are Grissell's case, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 528; Black's case, 21 W. R. 249, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 254; Webb v. Whiffen, L. R. 5 H. L. 711, all of which show that the statute creates a scheme for the payment of the debts of a company instead of allowing execution to issue against individual shareholders, that the winding-up sections of the Act have in view the payment pari passu and equally of all debts due by the company, and that the statutory scheme of administration cannot be altered by any antecedent contract. Further, the cases of In re Whitehouse & Co., 27 W. R. 181, 9 Ch. D. 595; Ex parte Bradshaw, In re Colonial Trusts Corporation, 15 Ch. D. 465, 29 W. R. Dig. 40; and Burgess' case, 28 W. R. 792, 15 Ch. D. 507, show that the liability to contribute in the winding up is not property or capital of the company, and is not a debt due to the company, and, if so, the company have no right to charge it; and that is really the principle on which the earlier set-off cases proceeded. In the present case all the mortgagees, except one of the Greenwoods, are also shareholders.

They also referred to Birch v. Cropper, ante, p. 401, 14 App. Cas. 525, and Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and F. Whinney, for Gautier, the respondent in the first appeal.—The Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co. case was decided fifteen years ago, and has always since been followed, and if it be right it covers this point. There have been many cases since in which the question was discussed whether words like "property" and "assets" were sufficient to include property of the company to be called up in the liquidation, and the point as to it being ultrà vires of the company was never raised. The Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams was the case of a call made by the liquidator of a company in liquidation, and though the actual decision was only on the point of construction of the particular deed, yet there are obiter dicta which clearly show that it would not have been ultrà vires for the company if it had by its memorandum and articles taken power to charge the uncalled capital. In a limited company the liability of a member to contribute in the winding up is exactly the same as the liability while the company is a going concern, and it arises from his contract by subscribing to take shares. Section 38 does not impose any new liability, but only restricts the existing liability; the liability in all cases depends on the contract, but in the case of limited companies members would have been liable to contribute on the footing of partnership, and therefore section 38 limited that, in the case of past members, so as to make them liable only to the extent of the deficiency of the present members. Section 98 provides for the distribution of the assets of a company in the winding up, but the question then arises, What are the assets of a company, and how far have they been anticipated? If the argument on the other side is right, then debentures which give a floating charge on the undertaking while the company is a going concern could not entitle the holders to any priority over other creditors in the winding up; but it has been established in General South American Co. case, and in In re Panama, &c., Mail Co., 18 W. R. 441, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 318, that they do. A mortgage of uncalled capital is in the same position as a mortgage on the undertaking. As to the argument that these charges would not appear on the register, and, therefore, that persons dealing with the company would be misled, the same thing would happen in the case of moneys agreed to be paid in advance of calls; the Act of 1862 itself gives no express power to a company to enter into such agreements, but in the model form of articles given in Table A, article 7 does contain such an agreement, and that shows it is a proper thing to be dealt with by contract by the shareholders among themselves; the register would not show the advances made on calls. Again, by the Act of 1867 a company is empowered to reduce its capital, and therefore to reduce the amount a member is liable to pay in the event of a winding up, and section 5 of the Act of 1879, as to the creation of a reserve fund, cannot be reconciled with the argument of the other side as to the effect of the Act of 1862: Poole's case, 26 W. R. 823, 9 Ch. D. 322. In Lishman's case, in Ex parte Bradshaw, and in Sankey Brook Co. (No. 2) the question as to the power of charging future calls was treated exclusively as a matter of construction on the frame of the articles. In Sankey Brook Co. (No. 1), the call, though made before the date of the winding up, was not collected till after the winding up, and therefore had to come through the liquidator, and through him alone, and the decision is therefore really against the appellants' contention. Grissell's case, Black's case, Webb v. Whiffen, and In re Whitehouse & Co. were cases relating to the setting off of what was due from contributories as such as against what was due to them as general creditors of the company, and did not raise the question as to the rights and liabilities as between third parties and the liquidator; and in those cases the court was only dealing with the principles to be applied in the proper distribution of the fund when ascertained, and not with the question as to what was the proper constitution of the fund. The dicta in those cases were alio intuitu, and are not applicable to the present case.

Buckley, Q.C., and Ashworth James, for the respondent Gotto.—Sections 7—10 of the Act of 1862 show that capital of a company is that which is raised from the shareholders—within a limit if the company is a limited one—unlimited if the company is unlimited. Section 5 of the Act of 1862 provides that the Act is divided into nine parts, and that the subject-matter of the second part (from section 22 to section 38 inclusive) relates to the distribution of the capital of companies under the Act; that shows that the capital of a company is that which is, under the machinery of the Act, applicable for distribution. Section 5 of the Act of 1879 also shows that capital includes that which the liquidator gets in the winding up. There are not two liabilities, but the only liability is that which arises ex contractu by all members to pay to the extent of their shares according to whatever is the proper machinery under the Act. The call made by the liquidator in the winding up does not create a new liability: Williams v. Harding, L. R. 1 H. L. 9, at p. 26, 14 W. R. H. L. Dig. 3; In re West of England Bank, Ex parte Hatcher, 27 W. R. 907, 12 Ch. D. 284; Stone v. City and County Bank, 3 C. P. D. 282, 26 W. R. Dig. 42, and a call made by the directors can be enforced by the liquidator as it is the company in either case who gets it in. The Act says nothing about how directors are to call up the capital, and the proper inference therefore is, that it is left to the company to say how it will proceed in the collection of the capital subscribed for; but after winding up the Act does say that the control of the collection shall be transferred to the liquidator, and his power to make calls is measured by what is unpaid on the shares. Article 7 of Table A contains a power to receive moneys in advance of calls, and that money is not received in payment of shares because it bears interest in the meantime; no injustice is done to persons dealing with the company because the assets of the company are increased by this advance. It is said that to charge uncalled capital would do away with the requirements of section 26, but a creditor has the means of informing himself by means of the register of mortgages which has to be kept under section 43, and which is open to inspection by any creditor or member of the company at all reasonable times.

F. Whinney (Graham Hastings, Q.C., with him), for the respondents, the Messrs. Greenwood and R. M'Ilwraith.—The respondents, the Messrs. Greenwood, have a charge on all the property of the company, as well as on the uncalled capital. F. Greenwood is not a shareholder in the company, and therefore as regards him I claim the benefit of Smith's case, 27 W. R. 845, 11 Ch. D. 579.

Giffard, Q.C., and Haldane, Q.C., for the official liquidator, took no part in the argument.

Rigby, Q.C., in reply.—The Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co. case is not treated by any of the text writers as settling the law on this point, and it is not even referred to in the last edition (5th ed.) of Lindley on Company Law. That calls made in the winding up are not part of the capital of a company, was not my main argument; I only submit that in the memorandum and articles of this company the power given to mortgage does not cover calls made in the winding up. But my main argument is that, whether calls made in the winding up are part of the capital or not, and notwithstanding the clearest words used in any memorandum or articles of association purporting to give a company power to charge uncalled capital in the winding up, it is ultrà vires to do so. It is said that section 38 does not impose but only restricts liability, but that gives the go-by to the cases of unlimited companies and guaranteed companies; in the latter class the liability has no relation to capital, and in the former it is only by means of this section that any liability is imposed, as in the case of a corporation the individual corporators are not liable. It may not be correct to say that section 38 imposes a new liability, but it does impose a liability, different from, or supplemental to, the contractual liability, and all I contend for is that it is not the same liability. A shareholder by subscribing does not contract to pay up the whole amount at once, but only sub modo et forma; the contract fixes how the capital is to be called up, and outside that contract there is no power to call it up. But when once a winding up occurs, the contractual liability, which is regulated by the contract, is overridden by the distinct statutory liability which then arises, and which is not and cannot be governed by the memorandum and articles of association. As to section 5 of the Act of 1879, it simply gave a legislative sanction to a practice then common in the case of banking companies, that only a part of each share should be called up, except in the case of a winding up; and this section in reality presents a difficulty to the respondents rather than the appellants, because what the Act of 1879 contemplates is the creation of a real—not a sham—reserve fund, capable of being called up only in the event of a winding up, whereas if the respondents' argument is right as to the effect of the Phœnix Bessemer case, then this intention of the Legislature may be evaded and got rid of by the insertion of a clause in the articles giving the directors power to charge the reserve fund. Then as to moneys paid in advance upon shares under article 7, table A—that is, not a power to borrow money, but only to receive payment of moneys in advance, and the moneys are not the less moneys paid up with a view to call because interest may be paid thereon by the company, such interest being only equivalent to the extra dividend the shareholder would receive, and the company might, if they preferred doing so, stipulate that the shareholder who had made advances should receive extra dividend instead of interest. Under section 25 a statement must appear on the register of the amounts paid or agreed to be paid in respect of calls, and the register must therefore show what moneys have been advanced under article 7, table A. That goes to show that the scheme of the Act consistently contemplates that the public may have the means of knowing what remains uncalled of the capital of a company, so as to enable them to judge what credit may be given to the company. As to floating charges it was said that they were charges which only take effect on the winding up of a company, but the case of Ex parte Bradshaw shows that such charges may take effect prior to, and independently of, the winding up if the debenture interest be not paid. Then, as to the argument that Black's case and other cases of that kind, dealt merely with the question of the distribution, not with the constitution, of the fund, that is not correct; in Black's case there was a bargain that persons should have power to intercept, in order to pay themselves, moneys which would otherwise have gone into the statutory fund; it was, therefore, in reality a case of charge by way of contract and not a case of set-off created either by the statutes of set-off or the equitable extension of those statutes.

April 1.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of Stirling, J., and the question raised is whether a mortgage of calls made in the winding up is good. The first point that has been raised is this, whether there was any power given by the articles of association and by the memorandum to make a charge on the uncalled capital. In my opinion there was. Let us take the memorandum. It states that one of the objects of the company is to borrow money by mortgage or otherwise, to receive money on deposit, and issue transferable and other bonds and mortgage debentures, and any other securities founded or based upon all or any of the real or personal assets, or on the credit of the company. [His lordship then read article 111, set out above, and continued :—] In my opinion, power is given there to mortgage the uncalled capital.

It was argued on behalf of the appellants that mortgages of uncalled capital were invalid, and Stanley's case was relied on as an authority for that. If that argument were to be allowed, it would not only make mortgages on calls which are made in the winding up bad, but it would make any mortgage on future calls made by the directors, before the winding up, bad. In Stanley's case the court had not to deal with the case of an express authority being given to mortgage uncalled capital. In the present case there is express power given to mortgage calls not already made. The argument in Stanley's case was that there was an implied contract in the debentures there issued, to do whatever might be necessary for the purpose of making them an effectual security, and, therefore, that they must be held to comprise uncalled capital. The view expressed by Turner, L.J., in Stanley's case, that to put such a construction on the debentures would interfere with the discretion by the deed of settlement vested in the directors as to making a call, does not, in my opinion, apply to a case like this, where there is in express terms power to mortgage calls not made at the time when the mortgage was granted.

But then it was said that calls which are made after the winding up has commenced, are not to be considered as part of the capital of the company. I cannot agree with that. It was said that the "liability to contribute to the assets of the company" in the 38th section of the Act is something which is entirely different from a call made by the directors before the winding up, and that a call made after the winding up has commenced, is not to be considered as a call of part of the capital of the company. In my opinion, that is wrong as regards a case like this. We are considering the case of a call made in the winding up of a company limited by shares—that is to say, not either a company limited by guarantee or an unlimited company. That which can be called for in the winding up, and only in the winding up, in the case of an unlimited or of a guarantee company, may not be, and I think is not, considered as, part of the capital of such company. But in the case of a company limited by shares, although there is a special provision (section 38, sub-section (4)) as to what is to be done when there is a winding up, yet that is merely giving the power to call for that part of the capital of the company which has not been called up. It is true that there is a difference in the liability to, and in the means of providing for, calls, when the company is being wound up, and when it is not being wound up. If the company is not being wound up, then the power of the directors to call the uncalled portion of the capital is different in terms from that which is the power of the liquidator. Of course, in an ordinary company there is generally only a certain part of the capital called up, and there are usually restrictions put on the time within which the calls shall be made; but, when the company is wound up, all that is done away with as regards the liquidator, and the call is not payable to the directors of the company which is being wound up, but it is to be paid to the liquidator, and he is freed from those restrictions which exist when the company is a going concern, and he is able to call for the amount which still remains unpaid in respect of the shares which each of the shareholders is called upon to pay. Although it is very true that what was said by Jessel, M.R., in Whitehouse's case, as to there being a new liability created by section 38, is strongly in support of the argument urged upon us by Mr. Rigby, yet, in my opinion, it was with reference to an entirely different question—namely, the right really of set-off—and although I think the actual decision of Jessel, M.R., in Whitehouse's case was right, yet, in my opinion, he spoke erroneously, unintentionally, as regards what was called for by the liquidator, in describing it as a thing which accrued to the liquidator, and not a sum which was really due to the company. The true view, in my opinion, of the ground on which set-off is prevented is that stated by Mellish, L.J., in Black's case.

Webb v. Whiffin was also referred to, and Lord Cairns' judgment in that case was much relied upon on behalf of the appellants. It was said that Lord Cairns described calls in the winding up as being a fund set apart in order to be specially appropriated to pay debts which were still due in the winding up. But what he was there dealing with was as to whether calls made on past shareholders settled on the "B." list, could be appropriated for a particular portion of the creditors, and in reality the expressions used by him are against the argument that calls in a winding up are not to be considered as a part of the capital of the company; he speaks of the Act of 1862 as creating a capital constituted in the shape of a "common fund"; he does not say that the common fund can never be mortgaged; but he says that the sums got from the "B." contributories are not to be set apart and appropriated to a particular part of the creditors, but are to be thrown into the common fund for the payment of all the creditors. He speaks of the common fund as the capital of the company, for he says (L. R. 7 H. L., at p. 734), "As I understand that Act, the relation of creditor and debtor, which is established by the Act, is established only with regard to that which is the common fund or capital of the company." He therefore, in distinct terms, treats that which can only be got at in the winding up as part of the capital of the company, and he uses that expression "capital of the company" again, a little further on, where he says, "But by the Act of 1862 that state of things is entirely swept away. A capital is created, sometimes limited, sometimes without a limit, but that capital is to be made good in the shape of a common fund, and that common fund it is, which is to be the source of payment of every creditor of the company." So that he distinctly treats that which is called up in the winding up, and called for from the "B." shareholders, as part of the capital of the company.

In my opinion, the Act of 1879, which was referred to by Sir Horace Davey, is not to be disregarded. Section 5 of that Act enables a reservation to be made of part of the capital of the company, which is only to be called up if there is a winding up. That distinctly recognizes that which is called up, and can only be called up, when there is a winding up, as part of the capital of the company; and that, I think, is what this is.

Whether or not there is anything in the Act to prevent it being mortgaged is another question which we have to consider, but, in my opinion, there is no good ground for saying that a call made by a liquidator in the winding up is not a call made of part of the capital of the company, in a limited company like this. As I have already said, there may be certain companies in which the calls that are made cannot in any way be considered as part of the capital of the company; but here we have to deal with what, in my opinion, is part of the capital of the company.

Although Mr. Rigby in his opening, very much put his case upon the ground that this was not part of the capital of the company, yet he afterwards relied on what we must consider as a more serious objection—viz., whether there is anything in the Act which prevents a mortgage being effectually made of capital which is to be called up by the liquidator in the winding up. He said that this is prohibited by the Act. Now in the Act of 1862, which we have to consider, and it must depend upon that, there is nothing in terms negativing the right to mortgage these calls which are a part of the assets and capital of the company—namely, that capital which, when the winding up commences, has not already been called up. Then, as there is nothing in terms expressly preventing the directors of a company from mortgaging that portion of their capital—I have expressed my opinion that it is really to be considered as part of the capital of the company which has not been already called up—is there anything like a necessary implication in the Act to prevent a company—the directors — from effectually mortgaging that part of their property if, as I think it is, it is to be considered as part of the capital? Now what is relied upon? It is said that this part of the capital of the company—namely, calls made by the liquidator—ought to be collected and applied equally in payment of all the unpaid creditors, and for that, sections 98 and 133 of the Act are relied on. But then the question arises. What are to be considered assets of the company? The assets of the company which are by those sections expressed to be dealt with, must mean that portion of the capital which the directors have not actually dealt with before the winding up commenced, and would include, in the case of a mortgage, the equity of redemption, which is the property of the company. The liquidator must get in the property, but the only portion which can be looked upon as a fund in the winding up for paying the creditors will be that portion—the equity of redemption—which remains the property of the company subject to the performance of all the obligations which the directors may have properly thrown upon this part of the property of the company. Therefore, although the assets must be applied by the liquidator rateably in payment of all the creditors then unpaid, yet this portion of the capital is not assets in the sense in which that is to be done—namely, free assets, assets which can be dealt with by the company in payment of debts without having regard to those who have a mortgage—if it is an effectual mortgage—on this portion of the property of the company. It is said that though there is no express provision in the Act to prevent this being done, yet that the general object of the Act will be defeated if this is effectual. Well, I think myself that it might be better, perhaps, if there had been some prohibition against the mortgaging of calls which have not been paid, but that has not been done, and, in my opinion, as the company has power to deal with its assets, and as there is nothing to prevent the company from dealing with this portion of its assets by mortgaging, it would be wrong to introduce such a restriction merely from our view, or the view of anyone, that the objects of the Act—that is, the paying of all creditors equally—would be better carried into effect by preventing this property from being mortgaged. If the Legislature had intended that that should not be done, I think they would have expressly so enacted, but they have not done so. I think we ought not to introduce into the Act that which would interfere seriously with the disposal by the company of that which, in my opinion, is its property, and which, in this case, has been dealt with by the company by way of mortgage.

I do not think that section 43 of the Act is to be disregarded in this case, because, although it is true that various cases have decided that a mere power to mortgage will not of itself enable a mortgage of unpaid calls to be made, yet I think that section 43, when rightly construed, requires the directors to make a list of all mortgages, including the mortgages which they have created over their uncalled or unpaid capital when the winding up commences. Again, I think that the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, giving the power to mortgage unpaid calls, is not to be disregarded. By section 38 of that Act express power is given to mortgage that portion of the capital which is not called up. It is very true there was no winding-up Act with reference to such companies, but there was a power for a creditor to obtain execution, by scire facias, against unpaid calls, and I do not know that there was any means of letting creditors know that a mortgage had been made. There was no necessity to make that known, but yet it would have been better for creditors if they had got some means of knowing that unpaid calls had been mortgaged; and though that is no authority on this Act, yet it has this bearing, that as the Act of 1862 does not expressly prevent mortgaging unpaid calls, and as we see the Legislature did expressly authorize it with regard to companies under the Act of 1845 it may be assumed it is not inconsistent with the objects of the Act of 1862.

Then have the decided cases, which we are bound to follow, laid down that there can be no mortgage of unpaid calls in the winding up? There is said to be no authority which we ought to follow, but, as far as I can see, the decided cases are against the appeal. One cannot disregard what was said by Sir George Jessel, M.R., in the case of the Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co., where he treated it as undoubted that there could be a good mortgage like this, because what he says is, "The first question is whether a company can mortgage future calls"—that was a call in the winding up—"There can be no doubt that the power can be given to a company by the articles of association." I agree that, as far as we can see, the point was not particularly argued, but the late Master of the Rolls treats it as undoubted that if power is given by the articles of the memorandum, there can be a mortgage effectually made of this part of the capital. Then there is the case of Howard v. Patent Ivory Co., where all the previous cases were considered by Kay, J., and he followed the decision in the Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co. case. But it does not stand there only, because, although those cases were not decided by the Court of Appeal, and if we thought them clearly wrong we should not be bound by them, yet the point has frequently arisen in cases before the Court of Appeal as to whether, in particular cases, there has been an effectual mortgage of the unpaid calls, and yet in none of those cases was anything said contrary to the view subsequently taken by Sir George Jessel, but the ground of the decision has always turned, where the mortgages have been held to be ineffectual, on this, that there was not sufficient power given by the articles to enable the mortgage to be made. In the case before the Privy Council, which cannot be disregarded, of the Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams, it was held that the mortgage debentures were not effectual to mortgage unpaid calls; but that decided simply, not that it could not have been done if the articles were sufficient—if the power given was sufficient—but that, having regard to the power given, and the terms in which it was given, that power would not include a mortgage of unpaid calls. Then there was the decision of James, V.C., in the Sankey Brook Coal Co.'s case (No. 2). It was there held that under a power to mortgage or charge the works, plant, implements, and effects of the company a mortgage might be effected of calls already made but not yet paid, but not a mortgage of a call not yet made. If James, V.C., in that case had thought that there was no power in a company to mortgage future calls, he would not have dealt with it in that way—namely, that there was no power by the particular articles to mortgage, but he would have said that, whatever might have been the power given by the articles, no effectual mortgage could have been made.

In my opinion, therefore, it is right to hold that there is nothing in the Act of 1862, either expressly or by necessary implication, to prevent an effectual mortgage being made of calls unpaid at the time when the mortgage was made—calls not then made, but which might afterwards be made, by the liquidator in the winding up.

As regards one of these mortgages, there was some special question raised which Stirling, J., has given no decision upon, and, therefore, it would not be right for us to give any opinion on that point.

I ought, however, to mention this, that some of these mortgagees were shareholders, and it is said that we ought not to allow these mortgages to be effectual in their favour, because to do so would go against the provisions of the Act of Parliament as to set-off. I think we ought not to consider this as a case of set-off. In Black's case there was a contract that the future calls on the shares of a particular shareholder were to be set off against moneys due to the shareholder, and that was clearly a case of set-off, but here that is not the case. The charge in the present case is not a charge only on the particular calls to be made on the particular shares held by the person who was the creditor; it is a general charge on all the unpaid assets, a mortgage generally of all unpaid calls, which, if my view is correct—and I believe the other members of the court agree with me—is effectual; and, in my opinion, the mortgage cannot be treated as bad simply because one or most of those who claim under the mortgage happen also to be, as regards part of the assets mortgaged, persons themselves bound to provide calls. It seems to me that their calls and the calls of other shareholders are well and effectually bound by this mortgage. In my opinion, the appeal fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In order to decide the question raised by this appeal, it is necessary to study the Companies Act, 1862, and the Acts amending it, and in particular those portions of them which relate to capital, to calls, to the liabilities of members, and to the collection and distribution of assets in the event of a winding up. The sections which relate to capital are sections 8 (sub-section 5), 12, 14, and 26. It is plain from these sections that what is meant by the capital of a company, having its capital divided into shares, is the nominal capital mentioned in the company's memorandum, or articles of association, as the case may be. This is the sum which the directors are empowered to raise by issuing shares, and which those who take shares agree to pay, to the extent of the nominal amount of the shares which they respectively hold. A power conferred by the articles of a company to call up, or to mortgage, or otherwise deal with, its capital extends to its nominal capital and (unless restricted in terms) to the whole of such capital. But such a power does not extend to other moneys which, although raisable in the event of a winding up, form no part of the capital of the company. The sections which relate to calls and to the liabilities of members in respect of their shares are sections 7, 9 (sub-section 4), 16, 38, 75, 101, 102, and the Companies Act, 1867, s. 25. The general effect of these sections is to render each member liable to pay the full amount of his shares, and in the case of unlimited companies and companies limited by guarantee to pay a further sum in the event of a winding up, but only in that event. This liability is in the nature of a specialty debt due to the company accruing, in respect of each share held, from the time of its acquisition, and it is a liability which in the case of companies limited by shares can only be discharged by payment in cash, unless an agreement to the contrary is duly registered. The sections which relate to the collection and distribution of assets in the event of a winding up are sections 94, 95, 98, 101, 102, 133. All actions which have to be brought in order to get in the distributable assets, are brought by the liquidator in the name of the company—section 95, sub-section 1—and although he is empowered to take proceedings in his own name when it is inconvenient to use the name of the company—section 95, sub-section 7—he ought not to adopt this form when there is no necessity for doing so. The form of procedure is, however, immaterial as regards the rights and liabilities sought to be enforced, as was held in Ex parte Kintrea, 18 W. R. 197, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 95. The assets when got in, are distributable pari passu amongst the unsecured creditors of the company, and members of a limited company cannot set-off money due to them from the company, against moneys which the liquidator is empowered to collect for the payment of the debts of the company.

A careful study of the foregoing enactments will be found to warrant the following inferences:—(1) That uncalled-up capital on any share is money which its holder is bound to the company to pay to it when required by the proper authority. The right to require payment of this money is vested in the company, and when payment is required the amount payable is a debt due to the company in all cases, whether the payment is required before or after liquidation. (2) That the Companies Act, 1862, does not say when or by whom the uncalled-up capital is to be called up before the company is in liquidation. The Act leaves this matter to be regulated by the company's articles of association. But after a liquidator is appointed, he is the person to exercise the power of calling it up. (3) That directors can only make calls at such times, after such notices, and of such amounts, as are prescribed in the articles of association, but liquidators are not bound to observe the articles as regards these matters; liquidators both can and must collect the assets which it is their duty to distribute as speedily as circumstances will permit. (4) That the Act contains no clause forbidding mortgages of assets, although every mortgage withdraws from the unsecured creditors that which, but for the mortgage, would be distributable among them in a winding up. So far from forbidding mortgages, the Act of 1862, s. 43, requires limited companies to keep a register of all mortgages and charges on their property, from which it is obvious that such mortgages were contemplated. The members are left to decide for themselves what powers of mortgaging they will confer on their directors. All mortgages and charges by limited companies under powers conferred by their articles ought, I apprehend, to be registered under section 43, whether what is mortgaged or charged is, at the date of the mortgage or charge, existing property of the company, or property which the company has only a power of acquiring and of equitably charging.

There being no prohibition in terms against mortgaging uncalled-up capital, is such a transaction forbidden by necessary implication—i.e., are there provisions in the Act to which full effect cannot be given if such a transaction is upheld? I can find none. Those moneys which are payable only on a winding up, and which by the Act are excluded from the capital of the company, are never under the control of the directors, and cannot, I apprehend, be dealt with in any way by them. Those moneys form a statutory fund, which only comes into existence when the company is in liquidation—that is to say, when the powers of the directors have ceased. But uncalled-up capital is in a totally different position. The liability to pay it up does not depend on the contingency of liquidation.

The power to call it up can be exercised by the directors, and all money raisable in respect of it is an asset of the company. When calls are made by directors, it is the capital which they call up; and where calls are made by liquidators, it is capital that they call up, so long as there is capital to call. In ordinary limited companies they can require payment of nothing else; in other companies they can, and it is unnecessary to distinguish the calls in respect of capital from calls in respect of further liability. But the proposition that calls made by the liquidators of an ordinary limited company are not calls of capital, but of other moneys payable by statute, seems to me very paradoxical, and to be a proposition which leads to the strange conclusion that members of such companies are under two liabilities and not one—viz., one liability to pay up the capital, and another to pay up a sum equal to it, with, I suppose, a substitution of the latter liability for the former in the event of a winding up. This view is, I think, erroneous, and the language of the Companies Act, 1879, to which I will refer presently, is inconsistent with it. Webb v. Whiffin appears to me to be rather in favour of, than opposed to, the view which I take of this matter. On a winding up it is the liquidator's duty to get in and distribute the assets of the company, including all uncalled-up capital, if it is required. But what are assets of the company, which the liquidator can get in and distribute, depends on what alienations, charges, or incumbrances have been validly made or created before the winding up began. If the company has mortgaged or charged its property, or any debt due to it, or any money which, although not a debt, the directors had the power of requiring payment of, there is nothing in the statute which entitles the liquidator to disregard such mortgage or charge. Those who contend that the liquidator, although bound to regard mortgages of specific property and floating charges, is at liberty to disregard charges on uncalled-up capital, are bound to show why these last charges are less valid than the first. Reliance is placed on the statutory enactment prohibiting set-off, and on the cases relating to that subject; and unquestionably there are passages in some of the judgments in those cases which, if taken as starting points and made the basis of further reasoning, might lead to a conclusion different from that at which I have arrived. I allude more particularly to Black & Co.'s case and Whitehouse's case. But the proper starting point is the statute itself. The exposition of it given in those and other cases is valuable; but it must never be overlooked that there is a section in the Act (section 101) expressly forbidding set-off in the winding up of limited companies, and that this express prohibition is the basis of the reasoning in the cases in question. In Whitehouse's case Jessel, M.R., criticized the reasoning of the Court of Common Pleas in Brighton Arcade Co. v. Dowling, L. R. 3 C. P. 175, on the ground that the court there was wrong in treating a call made by the liquidator in a voluntary winding up as a debt due to the company. But with deference to Sir George Jessel, it appears to me that on this point he was himself mistaken. The decision in Brighton Arcade Co. v. Dowling was, in my opinion, clearly erroneous, because, although the call was a debt due to the company, the statute, properly construed, prohibited the allowance of the set-off in cases of voluntary winding up as well as in cases of winding up by the court or subject to its supervision. I have thought it desirable to call attention to this matter as, although the decision in Whitehouse's case is, in my opinion, quite correct, some of the observations in it are, I think, themselves open to comment, and are opposed to conclusions at which I have myself arrived.

Having now dealt with the Act, and the decisions most opposed to the validity of mortgages of uncalled capital, it is necessary to refer to the authorities in which such mortgages have been held valid. The Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co.'s case and Howard v. The Patent Ivory Co. are distinct authorities in their favour. But there are many other cases in which the courts have taken for granted that such mortgages would have been valid if the regulations of the company had authorized them in sufficiently plain language. In re Sankey Brook Coal Co., Ex parte Bradshaw In re Colonial Trusts Corporation, Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams, Stanley's case, paved the way for these by treating the question as one of construction only. Further, article 7 of Table A, relating to the prepayment of uncalled capital, shows that uncalled-up capital may be anticipated, and the fund for distribution in the event of winding up be thereby reduced. Members who prepay the amounts which may be called up on their shares are not liable to pay them up again in the event of a winding up. This was decided in Poole, Jackson, and Whyte's cases, and this case goes far to show that calls made by the liquidator in winding up a limited company are in respect of uncalled capital, and not in respect of a liability to contribute to some other fund. The Companies Act, 1879, s. 5, enables a limited company to divide capital into two parts, one of which shall only be called up in the event of a winding up. When the capital of a company has been so divided, that part which can only be called up in the event of a winding up ceases to be subject to the control of the directors, and cannot, I apprehend, be charged or disposed of by them. Whether such part can be prepaid need not be discussed. The language of this enactment, however, again supports the view that calls made by the liquidator of an ordinary limited company in course of winding up are made in respect of capital and not in respect of some statutory fund more or less distinguishable from it. The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, expressly enables companies governed by that Act to mortgage unpaid-up capital. Such a mortgage would, I apprehend, prevail against a judgment creditor of the company who was proceeding by scire facias against a shareholder whose shares were not fully paid up, and such a mortgage would equally prevail against a liquidator making calls in winding up a company governed by the same Act, and capable of being wound up under the Companies Act, 1862. This shows that there is nothing contrary to public policy in allowing companies with limited liability to mortgage their unpaid-up capital. It is true that there is no such express power given in the Companies Act, 1862, but this is accounted for by the fact that the Act in question leaves powers of mortgaging and other powers of directors to be regulated by the company's articles of association. The omission of express power to mortgage unpaid-up capital affords, therefore, no sufficient ground for negativing such power. In conclusion, I can find nothing in the Companies Act, 1862, or subsequent Acts amending it, expressly or by necessary implication, prohibiting limited companies from mortgaging their unpaid-up capitals; nothing to show, in the view hitherto taken and daily acted upon, and according to which such mortgages are valid even as against creditors in a winding up—nothing which would justify the court in holding the mortgages in this particular case invalid. Finding nothing to prohibit them, and an article expressly authorizing them, I am of opinion that they are valid, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—With regard to the main point raised in this case, whether future calls can be mortgaged where such mortgage is authorized by the memorandum and articles of association, it is to my mind difficult to distinguish in principle this case from Black's case and Whitehouse's case.

It is said those decisions are based on a question of set-off, and are not applicable to the case of a mortgage on future calls. Mellish, L.J., no doubt, in Black's case does base his judgment on section 101 of the Act of 1862, a section which prohibits in limited companies a set-off; but Lord Selborne does not, in my opinion, rest his judgment on that section, but rests it rather on the ground that when a winding up comes, all the creditors are to be paid, and in the first instance pari passu. I will not refer again to the many passages in that judgment which to my mind are of importance. I will satisfy myself by merely referring to the very clear and comprehensive summing up of his opinion which is to be found at the end of the judgment: "I am clearly of opinion that it is not competent for any persons whatever, by any antecedent contract, to alter the administration of the assets of the company under such a winding up. I am not at all sure that, on the construction of this particular contract, it is necessary to hold that there has been any attempt to do so; but even if there was an attempt, my judgment would be that that attempt is necessarily ineffectual, because it would be an attempt, by private agreement, to get out of and override an Act of Parliament."

Now I cannot help thinking that Lord Selborne, when he used those words, intended to express an opinion that there could be no anticipation of future calls in any case so as to alter the administration of the assets in a winding up.

But it is said that the Act of 1862 does not prohibit these mortgages. That is true, but I do not think it has been suggested that there is anything in the Act which authorizes such mortgages; but it is to be observed that in the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, where it was intended that a mortgage of future calls should be authorized, there is an express power given to mortgage future calls. Now it has been argued that the anticipation of the fund out of which creditors are to be paid before that fund is created, is contrary to the policy of the Act and inexpedient. I cannot help saying that I feel there is weight in that argument. But it is said, with truth, that the Phœnix Bessemer case and Howard v. The Patent Ivory Co., if correctly decided, govern the case now before the court. With regard to the Phœnix Bessemer case, and I think I may say with regard to Howard's case, the point we have now to consider was scarcely, if at all argued. The late Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel), in the Phœnix Bessemer case, seems to have assumed the power to mortgage. Black's case was decided in 1872, the Phœnix Bessemer case being decided in 1875, and it is remarkable that in the Phœnix Bessemer case, Black's case, which was decided three years before, was not cited. Neither, again, in Howard's case, which was decided in 1888, was Black's case noticed. The late Master of the Rolls seems to have assumed the power, and given no reason for the conclusion at which he arrived. Now the Phœnix Bessemer case has no doubt been acted upon for some fifteen years, and so far as I know it has not been impeached by any other decision. I feel the weight of this, and I need not say that I feel the weight of the judgments which have just been delivered, and the reasons given in those judgments. The judgments have been delivered by very learned judges, who are much more conversant with company law than I am. I assent, therefore, to the judgments which have been delivered, but, I add, with great hesitation, for the reasons which I have given.

Appeal dismissed.

From Q. B. Div. June 18.

HOBBS & CO. v. HUDSON & CO. (a.)

Practice—Interrogatories — Penal action — Fraudulent removal of goods by tenant—Action by landlord for double value—11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3.

An action brought by a landlord under 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3, to recover double the value of goods fraudulently removed to avoid distress is a penal action, and the plaintiff cannot administer interrogatories to the defendants.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 639) affirmed.

Jones v. Jones, 37 W. R. 479, 22 Q. B. D. 425, approved.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Grantham and Charles, JJ.), reported ante, p. 639.

The plaintiffs were landlords, and brought an action under 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3, to recover against the defendants double the value of goods which it was alleged the tenant had fraudulently removed to avoid distress, and which it was alleged that the defendants had wilfully and knowingly aided the tenant in removing.

The plaintiffs sought to administer interrogatories, but leave was refused by a master, and on appeal Hawkins, J., referred the matter to the Divisional Court who upheld the master's decision.

The plaintiffs appealed.

W. Graham, for the appellants.

Duke, for the respondents.

The arguments used and cases cited were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion Jones v. Jones, 37 W. R. 479, 22 Q. B. D. 425, was perfectly right. We have to decide the case on the construction of the statute, 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3, and we have to say whether that statute inflicted a penalty or whether it merely gave the person aggrieved compensation for the wrong he had sustained. If the action is a penal one, then, according to the decision of this court in Martin v. Treacher, 34 W. R. 315, 16 Q. B. D. 507, interrogatories cannot be administered. I founded my judgment in that case on the remarks of Alexander, C.B., in Orme v. Crockford, 13 Price, 376, and the decision in Adams v. Batley, 35 W. R. 437, 18 Q. B. D. 625, is in no way opposed to it. The statute gives the plaintiff a right to recover double the value of the goods removed, and he can recover this, not only from the tenant removing them, but also from any person aiding or abetting him in the removal. Can there be any doubt but that that is a penalty and not merely compensation? In my opinion it is plain that the action is a penal action, and therefore that interrogatories cannot be administered.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The application is made for leave to administer interrogatories to the defendants, and it is contended that this is not a penal action, and therefore that leave ought to be granted. The question turns on the construction of the Act, and when I come to examine it I cannot help seeing that it is penal and nothing but penal. When it is seen that persons assisting the tenant to remove the goods are also to be held liable for double the value, and when regard is had to the summary process of recovery given by the Act where the amount is less than £50, it becomes plain that it is a penalty, and not any mere compensation which is given to the landlord by the statute. The action is therefore a penal action, and leave to administer interrogatories must be refused.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LOPES, L.J.—The sole question to be decided is whether this is or is not a penal action. It is brought under an Act of Parliament which, in my opinion, imposes a penalty and does not give compensation. Therefore, in my opinion, leave to interrogate cannot be granted. The defendant cannot, when the action is a penal one, be forced to put upon oath his objection to answer interrogatories administered to him by the plaintiff. I agree that Jones v. Jones was rightly decided, and that this appeal fails.

Solicitor—Striking solicitor off rolls—Practice—Appeal—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 32.

An appeal will lie to the Court of Appeal against an order of the court striking a solicitor off the rolls under section 32 of the Solicitors Act, 1843.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.).

A charge having been made against the solicitor under section 32 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, that he had improperly and knowingly suffered his name to be made use of upon the account of or for the profit of an unqualified person named Vague, knowing him not to be duly qualified, the matter was investigated by a committee of the Incorporated Law Society, and the charge was reported to be proved. Upon this report the Divisional Court ordered the solicitor to be struck off the rolls.

The solicitor appealed.

Willis, Q.C., and Pollard, for the appellant.

Hollams, for the Incorporated Law Society, took a preliminary objection.—This is a criminal matter, and there is no appeal. Section 32 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, which deals with solicitors acting with unqualified persons, gives the court power to imprison the unqualified person for a year. The court has held that such unqualified person, if so imprisoned, is a criminal prisoner: Osborne v. Milman, 35 W. R. 397, 18 Q. B. D. 471; and cannot appeal; In re Grayston, 4 Times L. R. 772. [He also cited In re Lamb, 37 W. R. 665, 23 Q. B. D. 477; Mellor v. Denham, 27 W. R. 505, 5 Q. B. D. 467.] The offence, if criminal, as regards the unqualified person, must also be criminal as regards the solicitor, and the difference in the penalties cannot affect the nature of the offence.

Willis, Q.C., was not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that the Legislature knew perfectly well at the time this Act was passed that the court had a disciplinary power over solicitors as its officers, which it exercised in a particular way—namely, by suspending them from practice, or striking them off the rolls. The exercise of this disciplinary power has never been held to be a criminal cause or matter. But, with regard to unqualified persons, they are not in any way under the discipline of the court, and therefore the Legislature devised a specific punishment for them. They are treated as criminals and sent to prison, and it is easy to see that in their case no appeal could be allowed. But there is a broad distinction between the case of an unqualified person thus sent to prison, and the case of a solicitor struck off the rolls by an exercise of the disciplinary power of the court. The one is a criminal, and, as such, cannot appeal here, the other is not a criminal, and can appeal. I think, therefore, that this is not a criminal cause or matter, and that the solicitor is entitled to appeal.

LINDLEY, L.J., concurred.

Practice—Writ of summons—Indorsement of "address of plaintiff"—Business address—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 4, r. 1; Appendix A., Part I., Form 1.

The "address of the plaintiff" to be indorsed upon a writ of summons under ord. 4, r. 1, must be the plaintiff's place of residence, and not his place of business.

Appeal from chambers.

The indorsement of the plaintiff's address on the writ of summons was as follows:—"Who resides at 145 and 146, Palmerston-buildings, Old Broad-street." This was the place where the plaintiff carried on his business, his residential address being in Surrey.

On the defendant taking out a summons to set aside the writ, on the ground that the indorsement of the address was incorrect, the master made no order. On appeal, Hawkins, J., held that the indorsement was bad, but gave the plaintiff leave to amend.

The plaintiff appealed.

Scarlett, for the plaintiff.—Ord. 4, r. 1, says that "the address of the plaintiff" is to be indorsed on the writ. The defendant relies on Form 1 in Appendix A., Part I., where the words are "the said plaintiff, who resides at," &c.; but residence does not necessarily mean where a man sleeps. The chief object of requiring the address to be given is that the defendant may know where to go for the purpose of settling with the plaintiff. It is not necessary to give the plaintiff's private address. This indorsement would have been sufficient under the old practice: Yardley v. Jones, 4 Dowl. 45; Ablett v. Basham, 5 E. & B. 1019, 4 W. R. C. L. Dig. 202. See also Attenborough v. Thompson, 6 W. R. 135, 2 H. & N. 559. In the case of an action by a partnership firm, for which no separate form is provided, it would be impossible to give a private address.

John Chester, for the defendant.—The framers of the rules intended to draw a distinction between "place of business" and "place of residence." Rule 1 of order 4, which requires "the address" of the plaintiff to be given, speaks of the "place of business" of the solicitor, and rule 2, which applies to a plaintiff suing in person, speaks of his "place of residence." The form shows that the expression "address" in the rule means place of residence: Mee v. Denbigh, 27 SOLICI-

TORS' JOURNAL, 617; In re A Solicitor, 33 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 301. The case of partners suing is provided for by ord. 7, r. 2; the expression in that rule "places of residence" shows that "residence" means where a man lives, and not where he carries on business.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of opinion that, looking at the language used, we must assume that those who framed the rules intended, by the use of different words, to express different meanings, and that the form which requires a statement of where the plaintiff "resides" means something different from where he carries on business. To hold in accordance with the view of the plaintiff, would be to open a door to much fraud in the way of fictitious addresses.

The appeal must be dismissed.

Company—Insurance—Payment out of deposit—Amalgamation—Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), s. 3—Life Assurance Companies Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 41), s. 7.

In order to entitle a life assurance company to receive back the deposit made by them under section 3 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, the sum of £40,000 required by that section to be accumulated must have been accumulated out of the premiums received on the policies of the company.

Where, therefore, the S. Assurance Co. had entered into an agreement for amalgamation with the M. Co., who had, for the security of their then policy-holders, accumulated a sum considerably exceeding £40,000, and the policy-holders of the S. Co. had accepted the liability of the M. Co., but had not abandoned the liability of the S. Co.,

Held, that, before the S. Co. could become entitled to receive back the deposit made by them, an accumulation of £40,000 must be made out of the policies of the M. Co. in addition to the amount already accumulated by them.

Petition.

In this case a question arose as to the right of an assurance company to the return of a deposit made under section 3 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870. That Act, by section 3, provides that every company commenced to carry on the business of life assurance shall be required to deposit the sum of £20,000 with the Accountant-General, to be invested by him as therein mentioned, and that the Accountant-General "shall return such deposit to the company so soon as its life assurance fund accumulated out of the premiums shall have amounted to £40,000." The Scottish Economic Life Assurance Society, upon being formed for the purpose of life assurance business, made the deposit of £20,000 as required by the Act. Subsequently, the society entered into an agreement for amalgamation with the Scottish Metropolitan Life Assurance Co. The amount of the policies for which the Economic Society was liable was about £260,000, and this liability was taken over by the Metropolitan Co. The Economic Society, which was in liquidation, had not entitled themselves to receive the deposit out of court, as they had not accumulated the required £40,000. The Metropolitan Co., however, had accumulated £100,000. The policy-holders in the Economic Society had (with very few exceptions) agreed to accept the liability of the Metropolitan Co. as if their policies had been originally issued by that company, and a memorandum to that effect had been indorsed on their respective policies. The memorandum, however, did not in terms contain any abandonment by the policy-holders of their rights against the Economic Society, as provided in section 7 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1872. The amalgamation having been duly sanctioned by the Court of Session in Scotland, a petition was now presented by the Metropolitan Co., the Economic Society, and the liquidators of that society, asking that the deposit, which had been invested in India Three and a Half per Cent. Stock, might be transferred and paid to the Metropolitan Co.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Methold, for the petitioners.—Your lordship has jurisdiction to make the order: In re The Colonial Mutual Life Assurance Society, 30 W. R. 458, 21 Ch. D. 837; sections 3 and 14 of the Act of 1870; and section 7 of the Act of 1872.

KAY, J.—I will allow the petition to stand over generally, but will express my opinion on the matter now, as the facts are all before me. [His lordship referred to section 3 of the Act of 1870.] The words "accumulated out of premiums" are essential words. I think that they mean that the company should have carried on its life assurance business so prosperously as to have accumulated out of the premiums of that life assurance business the sum of £40,000. It appears that the Metropolitan Co. has accumulated £100,000. The meaning of that is, that the business of that company is such that its directors consider £100,000 a proper sum to set apart for the security of their policy-holders. The form of the memorandum indorsed on the policies of the policy-holders in the Economic signifies their acceptance of the liability of the Metropolitan Co., but does not signify any abandonment of the liability of the Economic, and this petition, being for payment out to the Metropolitan of the £20,000 deposited by the Economic, it seems to me that there are serious objections to it. In the first place, the accumulation made by the Metropolitan was not made out of the premiums on the policies in the Economic.

In the second place, the Metropolitan seems to have thought before the amalgamation took place, and before they took over this additional liability of £260,000, that this large sum of £100,000 was a proper sum to meet their liability on the policies for which they were then liable. They do not, therefore, satisfy the letter of the Act of 1870, which is that before the Accountant-General pays out the £20,000 there must be an accumulation of £40,000 by the premiums on the policies of the particular company by whom the deposit was made, which in this case is the Economic.

The petitioners do not satisfy the letter, and to my mind they do not satisfy the spirit, of the Act, because there has been no accumulation in respect of or to meet the policies in the Economic. Before the £20,000 can be so paid there must be an accumulation of £40,000, which may now be made out of the premiums of any or all of the policies in the Metropolitan, in addition to the fund set apart to answer the liability of the Metropolitan in respect of their policies existing previously to the amalgamation.

Solicitors are not bound to wait to be paid for their services in respect of an abortive sale when it is unlikely that the property will be again put up for sale for some years, and are entitled to have their costs taxed under rule 2 (c) of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

Adjourned summons to review taxation.

Solicitors were employed by trustees for sale under a will to sell certain property by auction in 1886, at which only a very small portion of the property was sold. The solicitors sent in their bill of costs in accordance with Schedule II. of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, which, inter alia, included the costs of the abortive sale.

The portion of the property unsold in 1886 was again put up for sale by auction in 1889, when only one lot out of eleven was sold, after which it was determined not to put up the property for sale again.

The taxing master only allowed the scale charge for the part actually sold, and disallowed the costs and disbursements connected with the attempted sale of the remaining lots.

The taxing master stated: "There is provision in the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, for the allowance of scale charges when property is not sold at the auction, but sold subsequently. To allow the items objected to according to Schedule II. might give the solicitor twice or thrice the amount he would be entitled to under the scale if the property had been sold. It could not have been intended to give more for doing half the work than the amount would have been if the business had been completed. The solicitor will receive at a subsequent period the scale charge when the property is disposed of, and in addition the charges provided under rule 2" (i.e., rule 2 of Schedule I., Part I.).

R. F. Norton, for the solicitors, cited In re Dean, 32 Ch. D. 209, 34 W. R. Dig. 185, as an authority that the costs of the solicitors must be dealt with under rule 2 (c). The money required had been raised by mortgage.

CHITTY, J.—As the money required has been raised by mortgage, it is unlikely that the property will again be put up for sale for some years to come; the solicitors are not bound to wait to be paid for their services in respect of the abortive sale which has already occurred, and the matter must be remitted to the taxing master to tax the items disallowed in accordance with rule 2 (c) of the General Order. If the same solicitors are employed at a future time to conduct a sale which is successful, they will not be paid twice over, but on a quantum meruit basis, and not on the scale charge; if, however, they ask to be paid on the scale charge, they will have to bring into account what they have already received. The costs of this application will be costs in the taxation.

Petition.

This was an application to the court by mortgagees for leave to dispose of lands comprised in the mortgage, reserving the minerals. The mortgage was a mortgage in fee of lands situate in the county of York, and was dated in 1886. It contained no power of sale. In 1888 it was transferred to the petitioners. The land had been found suitable for selling in building lots, and that it would be most advantageous for all parties to retain the minerals for sale separately, and the petitioners asked the court for leave to exercise the power of sale conferred by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, with a reservation of the minerals.

The petition was served on no one.

An examination of witnesses abroad before a special examiner, ordered under rule 5 of order 37, is not an ordinary commission so as to prevent the issuing of letters of request in addition thereto under rule 6A of the same order.

This was an appeal from an order of Lawrence, J., at chambers, dismissing an application for letters of request to a French tribunal to insure certain documents which were in the possession of a foreign court being produced at the examination of certain witnesses abroad.

(a.) Reported by FRANCIS T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bigham, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson, for the appellants.—We have got an order for the examination of witnesses abroad before a special examiner, and we want to examine, amongst others, the officers of a foreign court. It is necessary for our purpose to insure the production of certain documents which are now in the custody of that court. The simplest way of obtaining them is by letters of request, to which we are clearly entitled.

Finlay, Q.C., and Hollams, for the respondents.—The defendants have already got a commission to examine witnesses abroad under rule 5, and under rule 6A they can only obtain letters of request in lieu of a commission, there is no precedent for granting both, and the result can only be to create unnecessary delay.

Tindal Atkinson, in reply.—The witnesses are being examined before a special examiner, and no writ of commission has been issued; the defendants, therefore, are entitled to the letters of request.

DENMAN, J.—This case has given us a great deal of trouble, and must be carefully considered. I think the court ought to allow the letters of request to issue. Mr. Finlay took the objection that ord. 37, r. 6A, has the words "in lieu of a commission," and that the rule is therefore inapplicable where a commission is in full play. That objection, which is one strictissimi juris, we should be bound by if it applied, but I think Mr. Tindal Atkinson has distinguished this case from the ordinary case of commission, because, as he has pointed out, it is the case of an appointment of an examiner by request on a special examination. It is impossible to say that the documents sought to be obtained would not probably be of great importance, and I think that every assistance should therefore be given.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I think these letters of request ought to go. The application might, I think, have been made earlier, but the importance of the case is sufficient to justify the present application.

CHARLES, J.—The objection to this order is as technical as possible. The difficulty raised is got over when it is shown that this is not an ordinary commission, but a special examination by agreement under rule 5 of order 37; therefore ord. 37, r. 6A, can be acted on. Whether we should act on it or not depends on whether we think these documents material, and on the affidavits I cannot say that they will not be.

The company was in liquidation. The defendant applied for an order that the plaintiffs should give security for costs. The master and the judge refused to make an order.

Bill of sale—Insufficiency of description of goods—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), and Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43).

Stock comprised in a bill of sale had been described in the schedule to the bill as follows:—"Roan horse, 'Drummer,'" "brown mare and foal," "three rave carts."

Held, that the horse and mare were sufficiently specified within the requirements of the Bills of Sale Acts, and that, in the absence of evidence showing want of identification of the particular carts, the expression "three rave carts" would be a sufficiently specific description.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Lushington, in the county court of Surrey, sitting at Farnham.

The action was brought by the plaintiff as grantee under a bill of sale from one Tuck to recover from the defendant a roan horse, a brown mare, and three "rave" carts* bought by the defendant from Tuck and claimed by the plaintiff under the bill of sale.

The defendant maintained that the said horse, mare, and carts were not so specifically described in the bill of sale as was required by the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882. The judge upheld this objection, on the ground

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* "Raves" are two frames of wood laid on or attached to the top of a wagon or cart, and projecting on all sides beyond the body of the vehicle so as to enable it to carry a larger weight of hay, &c.

that he was bound by the decision of Carpenter v. Deen, 23 Q. B. D. 566, and gave judgment for the defendant, against which judgment the plaintiff now appealed.

The bill of sale, dated the 11th of January, 1889, was made between Edward Tuck, described as a beerhouse-keeper and carman, at Aldershot, and Stephen Hickley, the plaintiff, a coal merchant, of the same place, and purported, in consideration of £40 advanced by Hickley, to assign to him "all and singular the several horses, carts, chattels, and things specifically described in the schedule hereto annexed by way of security for the payment of the sum of £40 and interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum." And Tuck further covenanted that he "would duly pay to the said Stephen Hickley the principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due on the 11th day of April next, and that, if the said principal sum and interest should not then be paid, then that he would pay interest on the said sum by equal half-yearly payments on the 11th day of July and the 11th day of January in every year until the whole of the said sum of £40 shall be fully paid."

The bill was attested as follows:—"C. Bateman, clerk to Mr. R. Eve, solicitor, Aldershot."

The schedule described the horses and carts as follows:—"Roan horse, 'Drummer,' brown mare and foal," "3 rave carts."

Tuck had paid five instalments, amounting to £14, up to December, 1889. The plaintiff subsequently discovered that the two horses (the foal was not claimed) and the carts had passed into the possession of the defendant, from whom he claimed their return or £27, the remainder due under the bill of sale.

The defendant alleged that he bought four carts from Tuck, and that there was no evidence that three out of the four carts purchased by the defendant had been recognized by the plaintiff as the subjects of the bill of sale. One witness of the plaintiff said he recognized two carts.

The judge, however, upon upholding this particular objection of the defendant as to want of specification against the bill of sale, declined to hear evidence of misdescription and want of identification tendered by the defendant.

De Colyar, for the plaintiff.—The defendant bought the horses and carts a fortnight after the execution of the bill of sale. The county court judge felt he was bound, under Carpenter v. Deen, that the description given did not amount to an inventory. That case does not apply to this, where the animals and goods described are the only ones of the kind belonging to the grantor of the bill, and are therefore sufficiently distinguished.

G. G. Greenwood, for the defendant.—There is not a sufficient "business description" of the goods given, such as would be given were they put up for sale. That is the criterion laid down by Lord Esher, M.R., in Witt v. Banner, 36 W. R. 115, 20 Q. B. D. 114. The plaintiff did not show that the three rave carts were the only goods of that description in his possession. The mare should have been denoted by a name: Roberts v. Roberts, 32 W. R. 605, 13 Q. B. D. 794. Carpenter v. Deen applies in every respect. The attesting witness ought to have given his address at Aldershot. There is an ambiguity in the bill of sale as to what interest is to be paid should the whole sum and five per cent. interest not be paid on the first day named, nor does it state what instalments are to be paid at the half-yearly dates.

CAVE, J.—I am sorry to have to decide that this case must go down again to the county court for trial. It has reference to a class of bills of sale which I feared had ceased to exist. The bill of sale here is a loan, not by a money-lender, but by a coal merchant to his neighbour. It is to secure £40 at the moderate interest of five per cent., and is as honest a transaction as one could wish, and it is almost shocking to hear such a transaction assailed by a number of technical objections such as have been already too frequently pressed, and perhaps unduly encouraged, against money-lenders exacting high interest on hard terms. The courts ought not to encourage frivolous objections against any class of money-lenders, such as insufficiency of actual address of the attesting witness, when it was shown that letters similarly addressed had reached the witness so described. Or, again, that there is no provision for payment off of the loan by stated instalments. The only objection of any substance is that there is a want of specific description of the goods secured under the bill of sale. To answer such an objection it must be shown either that from the nature of the description given in the bill of sale, the goods could not be specified, or from the evidence in the particular case that the goods could not be more particularly specified or could not be identified. In one case cited (Witt v. Banner) the description given was obviously illusory. The security as described under the bill of sale in that case was a floating security of so many pictures or frames out of a large stock. Such a description—namely, "450 oil pictures in gilt frames"—could not be in any sense an exact one specifying any particular set of pictures or frames.

In the other case cited, that called the Milch Cows case (Carpenter v. Deen), there was more difficulty in coming to a decision, as is shown by the fact of one Lord Justice, and that perhaps the one member of the court more familiar with cattle, dissenting from the judgment. No doubt that case is binding on us, but it may be pointed out that the grantor of the bill there, was a dairyman with a large number of milch cows out of which he could have more specifically described those upon which the loan was secured. Here we have a beer-house-keeper and small farmer with no large stock either of horses or cattle. The first thing secured is described as "A roan horse, 'Drummer.'" It cannot be said that this horse, from the description given, could not be identified when it has the additional advantage of having a name. Then "a brown mare and foal" could be very easily identified. The words "three rave carts," in the absence of evidence to the contrary, might certainly be a sufficient description. If every description of something given without specifying any individual name for it, by which it could be marked off from a genus or class of things, is to be held insufficient, you would have to prove the identity of every article made the subject of security. The question in each case is whether, considering the nature of the goods, and the circumstances of the case, the specific goods are sufficiently described so as to be identified. If it is said that there is no evidence of identity, evidence must be produced to show the lack of identification. If the defendant here can show that there were several rave carts in possession of the grantor, and that you could not tell which were secured under the description given, that might do to take the carts out of the bill of sale; but we have no such evidence here because the county court judge has preferred to uphold the objection first, without receiving the evidence which the defendant tendered to prove the lack of identification and insufficiency of the description. In the absence of such evidence we should hold that the description here given, is of such a nature that the articles sold could be specifically identified, but evidence having been tendered to show lack of identification, and not having been heard, the case must go down for hearing on that question.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) April 18.

Ex parte COLQUHOUN.
In re CLIFT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Solicitor—Counsel's fees—Payment.

On application by a barrister for an order that the trustee in bankruptcy of a solicitor might be directed to pay certain counsel's fees alleged to have been received by him in respect of the bankrupt's bills of costs as a solicitor in certain matters, it was contended that payments had been made by the bankrupt to the applicant on general account, which included the fees claimed, and also that an agreement had been come to between the trustee and the clients, whereby a lump sum was accepted in settlement of the bills of costs, exclusive of fees to counsel.

Held, that the matter must be referred to the registra. to inquire what fees had been received by the trustee, and whether any of such fees had been paid by the bankrupt to the applicant either specifically or generally, the applicant to be at liberty, on the registrar's finding, to raise before the court the question whether it was competent for the trustee to enter into an arrangement with a client of the solicitor to receive a less sum than was claimed by a bill of costs after deducting counsel's fees.

Application that the trustee in bankruptcy might be directed to pay certain barrister's fees amounting to £114 9s. out of a sum of £391 received by such trustee in respect of the bankrupt's bills of costs as a solicitor in certain matters.

The applicant, J. S. Colquhoun, had been employed for a number of years by the bankrupt, who was a solicitor, as his junior counsel, and there had been a running account between them as to fees, the bankrupt having made payments from time to time on general account.

It was alleged by the applicant, however, that the £114 9s. now claimed were his fees in the particular matters in respect of which the trustee had received the £391, and that no part of such fees had been paid him.

Yate Lee, in support of the application, referred to Re Hall, 2 Jur. N. S. 1076, as laying down the principle that if a bankrupt solicitor received fees prior to the bankruptcy, counsel was entitled to prove for them, but if such fees were collected by the trustee after bankruptcy they must be paid in full to counsel.

Cantley and Herbert Reed, for the trustee.—It is very doubtful whether some of the payments made by the bankrupt on general account to the applicant did not cover these fees. The applicant cannot produce any proper statement of what fees are due to him or what have been paid. As a matter of fact the trustee has only collected £4 9s. Although the bills of costs sent into the clients included the fees, the trustee has accepted a lump sum in settlement of the bills of costs exclusive of counsel's fees.

CAVE, J.—I shall refer this matter to the registrar to inquire in the first place what, if any, of the fees of Mr. Colquhoun referred to in the notice of motion have been received by the trustee; and secondly, whether any, and, if so, which, of such fees have been paid by the bankrupt to the applicant, either specifically or generally. As at present advised I think that if the trustee has accepted a lump sum from the client in settlement of the whole bill of costs then a proportionate amount of the sum received ought to be paid counsel on account of his fees. But if the trustee, in coming to a settlement with the client, expressly excluded counsel's fees, then he has not received any payment on account of such fees. The point will remain open for argument, however, on the registrar's finding on the inquiry, and the applicant will be at liberty, if he thinks fit, to raise before me the question whether it is competent for the trustee, if he has done so, to agree with the client of the solicitor that the trustee receive a less sum than is claimed by a bill of costs after deducting counsel's fees mentioned in such bill in settlement of the claim against such client of the solicitor.

Case referred accordingly.

The court, after directing the father to be cited, granted administration to the Chief Official Receiver, on his giving the usual administration bond, without the usual sureties.

Motion on behalf of Robert Palmer Harding, the Chief Official Receiver in Bankruptcy, for a grant of administration to the estate and effects of William Hobson Cope, deceased, and to dispense with sureties to the administration bond.

The deceased died on the 17th of February, 1889, an infant, intestate and unmarried, his sole property consisting of a policy of assurance for £100 on his own life, and leaving his father next-of-kin, him surviving. On the 5th of December, 1888, a receiving order had been made against the father, who was subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt, the Chief Official Receiver being appointed trustee of the estate. On a prior application the court directed the motion to stand over in order that the father might be cited. The citation was then personally served on him, but no appearance was entered.

RENDALL v. BLAIR. (a.)

Charity—Dismissal of schoolmaster—Action to restrain dismissal—Consent of Charity Commissioners—Condition precedent—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), s. 17.

Section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, applies only to actions or proceedings whereby administration of the trusts of a charity is sought; but where an action is brought merely to enforce common law rights or obtain equitable relief in respect of such rights, or to enforce an individual equitable right not relating to the administration of the trusts of the charity, the section does not apply even though a question relating to the charity may incidentally be decided.

A schoolmaster, having received notice of dismissal from persons claiming to be the trustees or managers of a charity school, brought an action for an injunction to restrain them (on the ground that they were not duly appointed trustees or managers within the trust deed) from dismissing him, and from appointing anyone else in his place, and from ejecting him from the school-house. The plaintiff had not, before commencing his action, obtained a certificate from the Charity Commissioners under section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853.

Held (reversing the decision of Kay, J.), that, even in the case of an action to which section 17 does apply, the obtaining of a certificate under that section is not a condition precedent to bringing the action, and that such an action ought not to be at once dismissed at the hearing if the certificate has not been previously obtained, but that the hearing ought to be allowed to stand over to see if the certificate can be procured.

Held, by Bowen and Fry, L.JJ. (Cotton, L.J., dissenting), that the present action was one coming within the class (above described) to which section 17 does not apply; that an action is not taken out of that class by the mere fact that a question relating to the charity may incidentally be decided; and that, even though such an action should be ultimately found to involve the decision of something further, which might bring it within the scope of the section, it would be time enough for the court, when that occurred, to bring the section into application; all they have to do at the time the case comes before them is to judge whether the action, as it is then presented to them, is one to which the section applies.

Held, by Cotton, L.J., that, as the plaintiff based a part of his claim upon the trust deed, and the present action might, therefore, involve a decision as to the proper administration of the trusts, it concerned or related to the charity within the meaning of section 17, and, consequently, the certificate of the Charity Commissioners ought to be obtained.

Appeal from Kay, J.

The plaintiff was, or had been, headmaster of a national school at Allerton Bywater, in Yorkshire. The defendants were the vicar of the parish and the other managers of the school. In September, 1888, the managers gave the plaintiff three months' notice of dismissal, and in the following December the plaintiff, without obtaining the certificate or consent of the Charity Commissioners under section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, commenced this action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from dismissing him from his office, and from electing or appointing anyone else thereto, and from ejecting the plaintiff from the school-house or premises occupied by him in virtue of his office. The defendants complained that the plaintiff refused to give up possession of the school-house, and they counterclaimed for the repayment by him of expenses incurred by them in consequence of such refusal, and of the moneys received by him as school pence. The school-house had been built on land conveyed, under the Acts for the conveyance of sites for schools, to the Archdeacon of Craven and his successors, in trust to be used for the purposes of a school.

Section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, provides that "before any suit, petition, or other proceeding for obtaining any relief, order, or direction concerning or relating to any charity, or the estate, funds, property, or income thereof, shall be commenced, presented, or taken by any person whomsoever, there shall be transmitted by such person" to the commissioners "notice in writing of the proposed suit, petition, or proceeding, and such statement, information, and particulars as may be requisite or proper," and that the commissioners may, by an order or certificate signed by their secretary, authorize or direct any suit, petition, or other proceeding to be commenced, presented, or taken with respect to such charity, . . . and that "(save as herein otherwise provided) no suit, petition, or other proceeding for obtaining any such relief, order, or direction as last aforesaid shall be entertained or proceeded with by the Court of Chancery, or by any court or judge, except upon and in conformity with an order or certificate of the" commissioners: "Provided always that this enactment shall not extend to or affect any such petition or proceeding in which any person shall claim any property or seek any relief adversely to any charity."

The Conveyance of Sites for Schools Act, 1841 (4 & 5 Vict. c. 38), enacts (by section 17) that "no schoolmaster or schoolmistress to be appointed to any school erected upon land conveyed under the powers of this Act shall be deemed to have acquired an interest for life by virtue of such appointment, but shall, in default of any specific engagement, hold his office at the discretion of the trustees of the said school."

The conveyance of the site for the school contained a clause providing that "the selection, appointment, and dismissal of the school teachers and their assistants shall be in all respects under the control and management of the incumbent for the time being of the said new parish of Allerton Bywater, his licensed curate, if the minister shall appoint him to be a member of the said committee, and of four other persons being bonâ fide members of the Church of England, to be nominated annually by the said incumbent to act with him in the management aforesaid."

By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that (for reasons which it is unnecessary to specify here) the defendants, other than the incumbent Blair himself, had not been duly appointed managers of the school, but that their appointment was invalid.

By paragraph 11 of the statement of claim the plaintiff said that if the defendants, other than Blair, were duly appointed managers or trustees of the said school, they did not properly dismiss him, as their discretion was not exercised bonâ fide or at all, and that in purporting to dismiss him they were actuated by indirect or collateral motives, being under the influence of Blair and wishing to further his private ends in respect of matters unconnected with the conduct of the school, and not essential to the good government thereof.

Kay, J., held that the present action related to the trusts of the charity, and, being therefore within section

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

17, could not be commenced without the leave of the commissioners, which must be obtained before action brought. He therefore dismissed the action, with costs.

The plaintiff appealed.

E. Cutler, Q.C., and H. Lynn, for the appellant.—This is not a charity case at all. [The court held that this point, not having been raised in the court below, could not now be taken.] Assuming, then, that this is a charity, first, the action is not within section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, and therefore the consent of the commissioners is not required; and, secondly, if the action is within that section, it is not essential to obtain that consent before the action is commenced, but the case ought to be allowed to stand over in order that the consent may be obtained now. Actions like this brought by individuals merely to enforce common law rights, or to obtain equitable relief in respect of such rights, are not within this section: Holme v. Guy, 25 W. R. 390, 547, 5 Ch. D. 901; In re Lister's Hospital, 4 W. R. 156, 6 De G. M. & G. 184; Glen v. Gregg, 30 W. R. 633, 31 Ibid. 149, 21 Ch. D. 513; Attorney-General v. Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, 15 W. R. 162, 21 Ch. D. 514, note (1). Brittain v. Overton, 32 W. R. 27n, 25 Ch. D. 41n, will be relied on by the other side, but as was pointed out by Jessel, M.R., the plaintiff there, being in the position of an object of the charity, asked for administration in order to get the benefit of the charity. [BOWEN, L.J.—Will you consent to have your action dismissed with costs if you fail at the hearing to prove that the defendants are strangers to the trust?] Yes, we agree to that. Another point is that the deed conveying the site provided that the appointment and dismissal of the school teachers should be under the control of the trustees or managers. That power having been exercised once by the appointment of the plaintiff, that appointment could not be revoked and another made.

They also referred to section 13 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1860.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Decimus Sturges, for the respondents.—The real question is, whether this is a "suit" "for obtaining relief" "relating to any charity" or not. Clearly it is. [FRY, L.J.—Would the Act apply to an action by a baker against charity trustees for the price of bread supplied?] The plaintiff is suing to restrain us from ejecting him from his office and the school-house, which he is entitled to occupy only by virtue of his office, and surely that is a matter which concerns or relates to the charity. Then he also asks the court to interfere in the administration of the charity by restraining the defendants from appointing a new schoolmaster, and the leave of the commissioners is clearly necessary in such a case, and before action brought: Braund v. Earl of Devon, 16 W. R. 1180, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 800. [BOWEN, L.J.—Is the leave of the commissioners a condition precedent to bringing an action? The section does not say no action shall be maintained without that leave, but that no action shall be entertained or proceeded with by the court. He referred to In re Markwell's Legacy, 2 W. R. 217, 17 Beav. 618.] The section says that notice must be sent to the commissioners before any suit is commenced. [They referred to Attorney-General v. Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge; Glen v. Gregg; and Holme v. Guy. FRY, L.J., referred to In re London, Brighton, &c., Railway Co., Attorney-General v. The Haberdashers' Co., 18 Beav. 608, 2 W. R. Ch. Dig. 71, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 12, 79; In re Bingley Free School, 2 W. R. 433, 2 Drew. 283; and In re Jarvis's Charity, 7 W. R. 606, 1 Dr. & Sm. 97.] In Holme v. Guy the defendant was treated as a complete stranger to the charity, but this is an entirely different action, involving the construction of the deed of trust of the charity. In Holme v. Guy Jessel, M.R., referred with approval to Lord Hatherley's observations in Braund v. Earl of Devon. The question here involved is who is to administer the funds of the charity. [FRY, L.J.—Is there any case in which the consent of the commissioners has been required in an action as to a question of contractual relation between the parties?] No doubt if a plaintiff could contrive to bring this as a common law action he might evade the difficulty of getting the commissioners' leave altogether. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Attorney-General v. Dean and Canons of Manchester, 18 Ch. D. 596, 29 W. R. Dig. 36.]

Cutler, Q.C., in reply.—On the language of the section the machinery which the commissioners are to originate is quite inapplicable to a case of this sort. In Holme v. Guy, James, L.J., said the 17th section of the Act was never intended to interfere with the rights or powers of the trustees of a charity in their character as owners of the property or as masters who are employing servants. The question involved in Holme v. Guy related to the charity fully as much as the question here does. Gross injustice would result if a plaintiff in a case like the present had to incur the delay of getting the commissioners' permission before bringing his action.

June 23.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff, whose action was dismissed by Kay, J., on the ground that he had not obtained the previous consent of the Charity Commissioners under the 17th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 137. Now at present I do not consider the question as to whether that consent was required, but I cannot agree with the view which has been expressed by Kay, J., that the action ought to be dismissed because that consent had not been obtained before the action was commenced. No doubt the terms of the 17th section do show that the consent ought to be applied for before the action is begun. But it does not say that if the consent is not obtained then the action must be dismissed, but only that it shall not be proceeded with until that consent is obtained. It would be wrong, I think, especially having regard to the decisions which were quoted to us, to dismiss the action without giving the plaintiff an opportunity of getting the consent and directions of the Charity Commissioners, simply on the ground that he had not applied for such consent and directions before the action was commenced. No doubt it might save some difficulties and some costs if the rule were established that there must be this consent before any action could be commenced. But, in my opinion, the course of the decisions, which we ought not to disturb lightly, has been this—that that consent may be obtained after the petition, or after the action, has been commenced, though of course, if it cannot be obtained, the result will follow which Kay, J., thought he could at once arrive at—namely, that the action will be dismissed. Therefore, so far as that goes I cannot agree with the view expressed by Kay, J.

But then we come to this question, as to whether the consent of the Charity Commissioners is required. Of course, if it is not, the appellant need not go to the Charity Commissioners, which I think he ought to have an opportunity of doing, notwithstanding that it was not done, as it ought to have been done, before the action was commenced. Section 17, I think, only requires consent where the administration of a trust is in some way required; and if I could agree with my learned brothers in thinking there was no administration of a trust here required, I should say the consent need not be applied for at all. As far as I understand the views of my learned brothers, they think it is a mere action by a person claiming, by contract with the managers of this charity, to enforce that contract, and prevent anything being done in violation of it. If it was the case of a mere tradesman claiming as against the managers of the charity, and seeking to enforce his rights under a contract made with them, I should say that the 17th section of the Act did not apply to such a case as that. But is that so? I think that is all the plaintiff will ever get, if he ever gets anything; but I do not think we can say—at least I cannot—that that is all he has claimed by his statement of claim. Why? Because he does not in his statement of claim refer to his contract as giving this right, but, as I understand, he refers to the deed of trust under which this school is held, and says, in effect, "Having regard to the trusts of that deed, and the fact that I have been appointed schoolmaster of this school, I have a right under the trusts of this deed to have the possession of this school-house." That is really seeking to a considerable extent to obtain a decision of the court on the proper administration of the trusts of this deed.

Now the plaintiff has undertaken not to base his claim on anything except this—that those who dismissed him (namely, the vicar and the trustees appointed by the vicar) were not, as regards the trustees or managers appointed by the vicar, duly constituted managers, and that they ought to be looked upon as mere strangers. That undertaking I understand he is prepared to give, which will cut out so much of his statement of claim as is contained in the eleventh paragraph, and, to a slight extent, modify the prayer. Still, to some extent he does claim, as I understand it, that by his appointment as schoolmaster under the trusts of the deed he has a right, as a person claiming under the trusts of that deed, to retain possession of that school-house.

As the parties have not been able to settle it, the case calls for our decision. My opinion is, that, having regard to what he has claimed (not what he is entitled to—a man is entitled to proceed on what he thinks his rights are) it will be open to him to enter into the discussion as to the proper administration of the trusts of this school. Therefore, in my opinion, though I believe both my learned brothers think differently, it is necessary that he should apply for and obtain, if the action is to go on, the consent of the charity commissioners.

BOWEN, L.J.—It is with much diffidence that I take a different view from that entertained by Cotton, L.J., whose experience on this class of subjects, as, indeed, on most others, is much greater than my own. But I am of opinion that on the true construction of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, section 17, the consent of the commissioners is not necessary, either for the originating, or for the prosecuting, of this action. Speaking broadly, I think, that this section does not deal with or touch actions which are brought to enforce common law rights, whether such rights arise out of contract or out of tort, or out of common law duty I ought to say. I think also that it does not apply to suits by individuals whose object is solely to obtain equitable relief in respect of common law rights, and I think, lastly, that this action at this stage, so far as we can judge of it at this stage, falls within the class of cases to which I have already said that, in my opinion, this section does not apply.

Now, in order to construe the section, we must examine carefully the words of it; and it is apparent from the initial language that actions at common law are not within the scope of the section, which applies simply to suits, petitions, or other proceedings for obtaining relief, order, or direction concerning or relating to any charity. Those were not, at the date of this statute—1853—apt words for dealing with or describing common law actions, and it follows, in my opinion, that no common law action, or, in other words, no action brought solely to enforce a common law right, whether such right arises out of contract or out of common law obligation or common law duty, is within the section. That view is in accordance with what I understand, though I am not sure that the language goes quite as far, would have been the view of the late Master of the Rolls, according to his judgment in Holme v. Guy. But as soon as you have advanced thus far in the construction of the section, it seems to me that reason and logic oblige you to go a step further. It is obvious that in the examination of the question of common law rights, matters may be inquired into which really do concern the charity, or opinions may be expressed by the court which govern, so far as the decision between the parties can govern—or may govern—the actions of those who are bound to administer the charity; because the decision may involve the construction of a section of the Act of Parliament, or may involve a declaration as to the common law rights of the parties. Nevertheless that does not operate to bring common law actions within the scope of the section, from the language of which they are omitted; and the mere fact, therefore, that incidentally in the action may be decided a question which concerns a charity is not enough apparently to bring the action within the provision of this Act of Parliament. But if that is so, must we not go a step further and ask ourselves whether it is possible that the Legislature can have enacted such an anomaly as not to require the consent of the commissioners for actions for enforcing common law rights, but to make the obtaining their consent a necessity in such equitable suits as are merely instituted for the purpose of obtaining relief with regard to common law rights. Is it possible that such a construction of the statute can be reasonable? That would lead to the singular conclusion that, although a man was not obliged to obtain the consent of the commissioners before prosecuting an action for breach of contract, he was obliged to obtain the consent of the commissioners before he came to the Court of Chancery, or that which formerly was the Court of Chancery, to appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of the High Court to prevent the breach. It would lead to this curious conclusion—that although a man was not obliged to obtain the consent of the commissioners before instituting an action for trespass, in which action the sole question would be his title to possession under the deeds of trust, he would nevertheless be obliged to obtain the consent of the commissioners before he obtained an injunction to prevent the trespass being committed. That would be a curious anomaly, and one which, unless constrained by the language of the Legislature, the court would scarcely adopt.

But, on turning to the language of the section and reading it carefully, it seems to me that the scope of the section is indicated with sufficient precision to enable one to see that the Act of Parliament does not authorize such anomalies, and that, on the contrary, the consent of the commissioners is only to be obtained in cases where administration of a trust is sought. This is a Chancery section. This is a Chancery statute. It was intended to cure the mischief of strangers instituting suits when the Charity Commissioners were the proper persons really to form an opinion on the subject; and the language is carefully confined to suits, petitions, or other proceedings for obtaining relief, order, or direction concerning or relating to any charity or the estate, funds, property, or income thereof. This language of the section seems to me to show it is only in cases where administration is sought that the consent of the commissioners becomes necessary, because the remedial provision introduced is that notice is to be given to them of the suit, and such particulars as may be required from time to time for extending the nature and the objects of the suit; and the board, if they think fit, thereupon may do—what? By an order or certificate signed by their secretary, they may authorize or direct any suit, petition, or other proceeding to be commenced, presented, or taken with respect to such charity, and they may by such order or certificate require and direct any such proceeding so authorized by them in respect of such charity to be delayed during such period as seems proper, while the section further provides that every such order and certificate is to be in such form and may contain such statement of particulars as the board shall think fit. Now is it possible that a section framed in those words is a section by which the Legislature intended to deal with individual common law rights, or any relief which was sought simply in respect of them? In the first place be it observed that that would be to place the Charity Board in the remarkable position of a court without appeal upon the subject of common law rights—that a man who had a claim against a charity which he could only enforce, or the apt relief in respect of which was an injunction in regard to a threatened wrong, in the Court of Chancery, would find himself absolutely at the mercy of an irresponsible board. Such legislation is possible, but I think we ought not to assume, without the clearest language, that Parliament intends to destroy the common law rights of her Majesty's subjects by placing them at the mercy of an irresponsible tribunal, or irresponsible department of the State. I think, therefore, that the true construction is that this does not apply to suits whose object is merely to obtain equitable relief in respect of common law rights any more than it applies to common law rights.

Then comes the question, what is this suit? And I begin by observing that, in considering the question whether the consent of the commissioners is necessary or not, we can only judge of the suit as it appears at the stage at which we embark on the inquiry. I do not say it is probable—I do not think it is—but it is possible that a suit which at one stage appears to ask for relief which falls solely within the category of that relief which I have said is not intended to be affected by the statute, may, nevertheless, at the hearing, turn out to be a suit which involves something further, and which might bring it within the scope of the section. I do not think it is likely, but still it is possible. We have only got to examine the suit as it is presented to us at the present moment. What is it? The plaintiff is a certificated teacher who was appointed headmaster of the National school of Allerton by the incumbent. The language of the deed which applies to him is this:—"It is hereby declared that the selection, appointment, and dismissal of the school teachers shall be in all respects under the control and management of the incumbent and his curate and of four other persons to be nominated annually by the incumbent." The selection, appointment, and dismissal of the teachers is to be in all respects under his control and management. And the 17th section of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38, if it applies to it, as it appears to do, provides that "no schoolmaster or schoolmistress to be appointed to any school erected upon land conveyed under the powers of this Act, shall be deemed to have acquired an interest for life by virtue of such appointment, but shall, in default of any specific engagement, hold his office at the discretion of the trustees." Now the claimant has been appointed by the incumbent, and he claims still to hold his office on the ground that those who dismissed him are not regularly-appointed trustees—are trustees who are so-called trustees, who profess to act under a valid appointment when valid appointment there is none. But it strikes me that the plaintiff's case really is one of contract only or of common law right. He may be entitled, so long as he is an authorized school teacher, to hold the schoolhouse, but it is in virtue of the appointment which he holds from the trustees, which is really a contractual employment by him to teach. He is simply enforcing here, or seeking to enforce, what he considers to be his common law right, not to be dismissed by those who have not employed him, and to hold premises which he has received from persons who are authorized to deal with the possession, against the unlawful and unauthorized usurpation of those who are strangers to together in the matter. That is his case. It may be that, incidentally, the question whether these defendants are trustees of the school, may be decided. We cannot help that, nor can the plaintiff help it. He is dealing with his masters, or with those who profess to be his masters. He declares that those who are seeking to exclude him from these premises are not the persons who are lawfully entitled to possession. The common law question, although incidentally it may involve the construction of a deed, may incidentally involve only the question whether the trustees who are seeking to oust him are really properly appointed. But, as I said before, in the earlier part of my examination of the statute, the mere fact that such questions incidentally arise does not seem to me to bring the case within the section.

For those reasons I think that the learned judge below was wrong in holding that this action in its present form, and as presented at this moment, was an action which fell within the 17th section of the Charitable Trusts Act of 1853, or which required the consent of the Charity Commissioners. Should a case ever arise in which an action at any stage does not seem to require the consent of the Charity Commissioners, but in respect of which subsequent investigation shows it is an action of a different kind from that shape which it took when it was first launched, then would come the moment for applying the section.

With regard to the second point, although it would not be absolutely necessary for the purpose of this case to decide it if the first point I have dealt with is decided as I think it ought to be decided, nevertheless, having regard to the view of Cotton, L.J., I think it would not become me not to express an opinion upon the second point—namely, whether, supposing the consent of the commissioners was necessary, it would be right to dismiss the action altogether. Therefore, upon that second point I entirely agree with the Lord Justice. It does not seem to me that the proper course would be, if an action appears to the learned judge at the hearing to be an action which falls within section 17, to dismiss it altogether. On the contrary, I think the court ought to allow it to stand over to see if the consent of the commissioners can be obtained. Now, first of all I come to that conclusion upon the language of the section. We are all of us familiar with the way in which Acts of Parliament are drafted when it is intended to prevent actions being waged at all, or writs being issued, unless some condition precedent has been fulfilled. The language of such sections we are all familiar with, and there is no reason for the use of any obscure language by the draftsman if the Legislature desires to enact such laws. But this section is not framed in the way in which sections are framed when it is intended that some preliminary steps shall be taken before the action is maintainable at all. On the contrary, both from the way in which it is broken and from the absence of the usual words, as also from the presence of words which seem to me to indicate that the absence of the consent of the commissioners is only a bar to the court's dealing with the action, and not a bar to the original institution of the suit—on all those three grounds—I come to the conclusion that this section enables the court, in such cases as I have indicated, to allow the action to stand over in order that the blot which has occurred may be cured if possible. In the first place, the section only begins with the enactment: "Before the suit shall be commenced there shall be transmitted notice in writing to the board." But it abstains altogether from saying that the action is to be dismissed if no such notice is transmitted. On the contrary, it only indicates that, save as hereinbefore provided, no suit, petition, or other proceeding shall be entertained or proceeded with by the court—that is to say, the enactment is directory. It directs what ought to be done. Unless the duty is complied with by the litigant the court must hold its hand. But it does not oblige the court to close the gates of mercy upon the applicant, but enables it to stay proceedings until that consent, which, as a matter of course, ought to be obtained in the first instance, is obtained at last. That, to my mind, is the scope of the section, and I cannot help here saying that if my view of the earlier point is correct, it adds additional weight to this conclusion on the second point, because, if the only cases with which the section is intended to deal are cases which affect the administration of the trusts of a charity, the entire, or substantially the entire mischief, which used to arise, may be prevented if the court is clothed with the power of staying the action until the proceeding has been had which ought to be had in the first instance.

If the matter rested upon logic and reason only that would be my conclusion; but in looking back through the books we find a mass or a considerable number of authorities which show that the court has taken the view of the section on this second point, which Cotton, L.J., and myself both take, and has been satisfied with letting actions stand over to obtain the consent of the Charity Commissioners when such consent had not been obtained in the first instance. I will simply name the cases in which such procedure has been had: In re Markwell's Legacy; In re London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., Attorney-General v. Haberdashers' Co.; In re Bingley Free School; In re Chelsea Waterworks Act, 4 W. R. 28; and Attorney-General v. Dean and Canons of Manchester, a case which went to the Court of Appeal, though I do not know that the point was brought before the attention of the court afterwards. One case, and one only, was said to be inconsistent with this view—namely, the case of Glen v. Gregg, in which it was said that the dilatory action taken by Lord Chelmsford as Lord Chancellor had been afterwards disapproved by the Court of Appeal. On examination of Lord Chelmsford's decision in the Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, case it does not appear to me that it is that portion of Lord Chelmsford's decision which is disapproved of by the court in Glen v. Gregg, but the action taken by the Lord Chancellor in a case in which, ex concesso, the consent of the Charity Commissioners was required, in deciding to allow such consent to be waived, and to proceed with the action although such consent had not been obtained. In doing that Lord Chelmsford was enabling the parties by consent to waive a bar which was instituted for the benefit of the public and for the protection of charities. I think the Court of Appeal might well consider that such action by the Lord Chancellor was not to be justified upon the ordinary principles of law; and I think it is to that, that the court are directing their criticism in Glen v. Gregg. It does not appear to me that Glen v. Gregg in any way decides, or was intended to decide, that in a case in which the consent of the commissioners was required, but had not been obtained, the court might not cure a blot by allowing the action to stand over. On these grounds I think that the learned judge below was incorrect in the view he took of this action, which I regret to think is going to be waged further, because nothing but disaster can come of it. Nevertheless, if the plaintiff desires it, I think he is entitled at our hands to a declaration that the learned judge below proceeded on an erroneous construction of the Act of Parliament. The case must go back to be tried out, and if it is to be tried out to the detriment and ruin of the plaintiff, he brings it upon his own head. The costs of the hearing below and of this appeal ought, I think, to be borne by the respondents.

FRY, L.J.—I have had the benefit of discussing this question with my learned brothers, and the judgment of Bowen, L.J., throughout so completely expresses the views which I entertain that I shall only add one word of explanation. It is this—that in insisting emphatically as he has done upon the view that the 17th section of the statute in question, does not refer to common law rights and to legal or equitable modes of enforcing those common law rights, he does not, as I understand, intend to imply that an individual equitable right, not relating to the administration of the trusts of the charity, would be any more within the 17th section than a legal right. In my opinion it is not any more within it. In my opinion the section relates exclusively to administration.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree with that. With regard to the costs, Fry, L.J., has pointed out to me that my language may be misinterpreted. I do not think that the costs of the hearing necessarily ought all to be borne by the respondents, but only such costs as were either caused or thrown away by reason of this point being taken.

BRISTOL TRAMS AND CARRIAGE CO. (LIMITED) v. MAYOR, &c., OF BRISTOL. (a.)

Local government—Tramway—Paving—Right of road authority to alter pavement—Difference between company and road authority—Reference to arbitration—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 33.

The defendants, who were the road authority, gave notice to the plaintiffs, a tramway company, of their intention to re-lay the whole of the roadway of certain streets, along which the plaintiffs' tramways were laid, including the part between the tramway rails, with a particular kind of pavement, and for this purpose to take up the existing pavement. The plaintiffs objected, and brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the pavement between and contiguous to their tramway rails until the matter in difference had been settled by a referee nominated by the Board of Trade under section 33 of the Tramways Act, 1870.

Held, that, as the defendants were acting under the general powers vested in them as road authority of altering and improving the roads, section 33 was not applicable, and an injunction could not be granted.

Reg. v. Croydon and Norwood Tramways Co., 35 W. R. 299, 18 Q. B. D. 39, distinguished.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Denman and Vaughan Williams, JJ.).

The action was for an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the plaintiffs' tramways, and the pavement contiguous thereto, so far as maintainable by the plaintiffs, until the matter in difference had been settled by a referee appointed by the Board of Trade under section 33 of the Tramways Act, 1870.

The plaintiffs were authorized by the Tramways Orders Confirmation Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. cxciii.), to construct certain tramways in Bristol, and by clause 1 of the provisional order (set out in the schedule to the Act) the provisions of the Tramways Act, 1870, except where expressly varied, were incorporated. The plaintiffs constructed the tramways, and paved with granite setts so much of the roads, along which the tramways were laid, as lay between the tramway rails and eighteen inches on each side. The plaintiffs were, under section 28 of the Tramways Act, 1870, bound to keep this part of the road in repair at their own expense.

In 1889 the defendants, who were the urban sanitary authority, and, as such, have vested in them by section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the control of the streets, gave notice to the plaintiffs of their intention to take up the granite setts and to pave with wood the whole of the roadway of two streets within their district along which the tramways had been laid, including the parts between the tramway rails. The plaintiffs, alleging that the wood pavement was unsuitable for their tramways, objected, and applied to the Board of Trade for the appointment of a referee under section 33 of the Tramways Act, 1870, to settle the difference. The defendants, having given notice of their intention to proceed with the work, the plaintiffs brought this action, and applied at chambers for an interim injunction in the terms above set out. The application was referred to the court, and by consent the hearing was taken as the trial of the action.

The Divisional Court (Denman and Vaughan Williams, JJ.) were divided in opinion. Denman, J., being of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to the injunction sought, and Vaughan Williams, J., being of the contrary opinion.

Vaughan Williams, J., having withdrawn his judgment, judgment in the action was entered for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Philbrick, Q.C., and H. Sutton, for the defendants.—The defendants are the "road authority" as defined by section 3 of the Tramways Act, 1870. Section 32 reserves to the road authority the power to break up and open the roads. By section 57 the tramway company have only a right of user over the road; and section 60 preserves the power of the road authority to alter or improve the roads. The Act, therefore, leaves the general powers of the road authority untouched. Section 33 only applies to something which is required to be done with respect to the tramway either by the tramway company or by the road authority under the Act, and does not apply to any works of the road authority done upon the roads under their general powers. In Reg. v. Croydon and Norwood Tramways Co., 35 W. R. 299, 18 Q. B. D. 39, the tramway company were purporting to exercise their statutory powers, and the corporation were trying to control them, and so section 33 was held to apply. Here the defendants are exercising their general common law powers as road authority.

Rigby, Q.C., and R. S. Wright, for the plaintiffs.—The case comes within section 33. The taking up the granite setts and laying down wood is an "interference in relation to the tramway." It interferes with the part of the road upon which the horses work. The plaintiffs object to the wood pavement on the grounds that the expense of maintaining it will be much greater than in the case of granite setts, and that it will be much more unsuitable for the horses. The granite pavement already laid down is work which "ought reasonably to satisfy the road authority" within section 33. There is, therefore, a difference which must be determined by a referee under section 33. The road authority have power to do what they think fit to the road, subject to a reference under section 33 as to whether or not they are acting reasonably. Section 32 reserves the powers of the road authority subject to their exercising those powers reasonably. Reg. v. Croydon and Norwood Tramways Co. is strictly in point. The words in section 33, "by virtue of this Act," refer to the words immediately preceding, "promoters or lessees," and do not govern the whole section.

Philbrick, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 16.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiffs have asked for an injunction to prevent the defendants, who are the road authority, from interfering with that part of the road that lies between the tram rails and eighteen inches on each side, until the matter in difference should be settled by a referee appointed by the Board of Trade. The road authority, it seems, have come to the conclusion that it is for the public advantage that the roads in question should be paved with wood. The question turns upon the true meaning of section 33 of the Tramways Act, 1870, as construed in connection with certain other provisions of the Act. It is necessary, in order to arrive at the true meaning of the section, to go through various other sections. The Act begins by defining in section 3 the meaning of the word "road." It means any carriageway being a public highway, and the carriageway of any bridge forming part of or leading to the same. The terms "local authority" and "road authority" are also defined. Then section 4 states who may obtain provisional orders authorizing the construction of tramways, and such persons are referred to in the Act as "the promoters." Then follow several sections which deal with the mode in which provisional orders may be obtained, and which it is not material to notice. Then come certain sections relating to the construction of tramways. Section 26 gives power to the promoters from time to time for the purpose of making, maintaining, and renewing any tramway to open and break up any road, subject to certain regulations and conditions. One condition is that the promoters shall not open, or break up, or alter the level of any road, except under the superintendence and to the reasonable satisfaction of the road authority. There we have the words "reasonable satisfaction of the road authority" mentioned for the first time. Then the section deals with what may frequently arise—namely, where the road is crossed by a railway or other tramway on the level; the work at the point of crossing must then be done under the superintendence and to the reasonable satisfaction of the railway or tramway company. These are all matters in which differences may arise between the promoters and the road authority or other companies. Section 27 provides that the promoters are to reinstate the road in as good a condition as that in which it was before it was broken up. Up to this point the promoters are given certain privileges with regard to the roads, subject to the control of the road authority. Section 28 then imposes an obligation upon the promoters to maintain and keep in good condition and repair, with such materials and in such manner as the road authority shall direct, and to their satisfaction, so much of any road whereon any tramway belonging to them is laid, as lies between the rails of the tramway, and if there are two tramways not more than four feet apart, the portion of the road between the tramways, and in every case so much of the road as extends eighteen inches beyond the rails on each side of the tramway; and in case the promoters neglect to do so, the road authority may, after seven days' notice to the promoters, do the necessary works, and recover the expense from the promoters. Section 30 gives the promoters power where necessary to alter the position of any gas or water mains or pipes, &c., and before laying down any tramway in a road in which any mains or pipes, &c., may be laid, the promoters must, whether they contemplate altering the position of any such mains, pipes, &c., or not, give seven days' notice to the owners of their intention to lay down or alter the tramway. Even though the promoters do not intend to alter the position of the mains, &c., the owners may think that it is necessary to do so, and they must then give notice to the promoters to lower or otherwise alter the position of the mains, &c., and any difference as to the necessity of any such lowering or alteration shall be settled in manner provided by the Act for the settlement of differences between the promoters and other companies or persons. That section gives the promoters power to interfere with the mains, pipes, &c., belonging to other persons. Section 32 then provides that nothing in the Act shall take away or abridge any power to open up the roads or any other power vested in the local or road authority with regard to them, or in any person or company for the purpose of laying down, repairing, altering, or removing any main, pipe, &c., subject to certain restrictions. That seems to be the only restriction placed upon the power of the road authority with regard to the roads—namely, that they must not interfere with the tramway unreasonably.

Up to this point I cannot see anything that interferes with the right of the road authority to do what they think right in the interests of the public. Is there anything in section 33 to interfere with that right? The section provides that "if any difference arises between the promoters or lessees on the one hand, and any local authority or road authority," or any company, body, or person, "on the other hand, with respect to any interference or control exercised or claimed to be exercised by them or him, or on their or his behalf, or by the promoters or lessees by virtue of this Act in relation to any tramway or work, or in relation to any work or proceeding of the local authority, road authority, body, company, or person." Pausing there, it is argued that the words "by virtue of this Act" refer and are confined to the words immediately preceding, "promoters or lessees." The word promoters, however, is defined in section 4, and to call them promoters by virtue of this Act seems to me to be unintelligible. It seems clear to me that the words refer to any difference that may arise with respect to any interference or control exercised or claimed to be exercised by the parties in relation to any tramway or work, or in relation to any work or proceeding of the local authority, road authority, body, company, or person. The words "by virtue of this Act" refer to the whole sentence. The section goes on: "or with respect to the propriety of or the mode of execution of any work relating to any tramway, or with respect to the amount of any compensation to be made by or to the promoters or lessees, or on the question whether any work is such as ought reasonably to satisfy the local authority, road authority, body, company, or person concerned, or with respect to any other subject or thing regulated by or comprised in this Act, the matter in difference shall (unless otherwise specially provided by this Act) be settled by an engineer or other fit person nominated as referee by the Board of Trade on the application of either party." In the former part of the section the governing words are "by virtue of this Act." The words in the latter part of the section, "regulated by or comprised in this Act," seem to me to refer to and to govern each of the differences which may arise and which are enumerated in the latter part of the section. It follows that the only matter to be referred under this section is a difference arising with respect to any interference or control by virtue of the Act mentioned in the first part of the section, or arising with respect to those things, regulated by or comprised in the Act, mentioned in the second part of the section. That construction makes the section consistent with section 60, which provides that nothing in the Act shall take away or affect any power of the road authority to widen, alter, divert, or improve any road. The contention put forward on behalf of the tramway company would most materially affect the power of the road authority to alter or improve the road. Section 61 reserves this power of the local authority or police to regulate the traffic along the whole road, whether on or off the tramway, and section 62 reserves the right of the public to the full use of the road. The power of the road authority to alter the road is not affected by section 33, but is an absolute power. The corporation in the present case propose, in the public interest, to lay down wood pavement instead of granite setts. Why should the question whether or not that is reasonable be referred to an engineer appointed by the Board of Trade? He cannot judge as between the public and the tramway company. His province would only be to say whether certain works were properly done. The argument must go this length, that if once a certain kind of pavement has been put down, which was a proper pavement at the time, the road authority can never alter the pavement on that part of the road which the tramway company are bound to keep in repair without the sanction of a referee appointed by the Board of Trade. I cannot accept that view. The difference in the present case has not arisen under the Act. The difference has arisen between the corporation acting under their general powers as road authority and the tramway company. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the power of the road authority to alter the road, and every part of the road, as they propose to do in the present case for the advantage, as they think, of the public is not controlled or limited by this Act. I agree, therefore, with the judgment of Vaughan Williams, J., and I think that this appeal should be allowed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question in the present case is whether the defendants, who are the road authority, can be controlled in the exercise of their power of maintaining the road, and whether the tramway company are right in contending that the acts of the road authority, when acting in the interests and for the benefit of the public as regards the repair and maintenance of the roads, can be controlled by an engineer or other referee appointed by the Board of Trade. I do not intend to go through the sections of the Tramways Act, 1870. I agree entirely with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls. Having regard to section 60, I cannot agree with the construction placed by Denman, J., upon section 33. Section 60 says that "nothing in this Act shall take away or affect any power which any road authority . . . may have by law to widen, alter, divert, or improve any road." The words "nothing in this Act" are, no doubt, themselves controlled and limited by other parts of the Act to this extent, that the tramway company have a right to have their tramway on the road. Still, section 60, in conjunction with other sections, reserves to the road authority the power to alter and improve the road. There does not seem to me to be anything in the Act controlling the road authority, in the exercise of that power, in the way asked for here. It is said that the case is governed by Reg. v. Croydon and Norwood Tramways Co. There is this vital distinction between the two cases. In the present case the road authority, acting under their general powers as road authority, on behalf of the public desire to alter the road. In that case the tramway company, purporting to act under their statutory powers, interfered with the road. I cannot see that that case is any authority for the proposition advanced in this case. I think that the view of the Act taken by Vaughan Williams, J., is correct, and that the appeal should be allowed.

Lopes, L.J.—The corporation are laying down the whole roadway, including the part on which the tram lines run, with wood pavement in substitution for granite setts. Such pavement is to be laid at the expense of the corporation, and the corporation have given notice to the tramway company of their intention. The tramway company ask for an injunction to restrain the corporation from so doing until there has been a reference under section 33 of the Tramways Act, 1870, to the Board of Trade. The question is, whether the corporation are entitled so to act before and without any such reference?

I am of opinion the tramway company are not entitled to an injunction. They rely on section 33 of the Tramways Act, and unless they can bring themselves within that section they have no case. Sections 32 and 60 of the Tramways Act in most clear and unmistakable terms show that the Legislature intended that the road authority should continue to possess all the powers which they possessed before 1870, subject only to the restrictions contained in section 32. But do the tramway company bring their case within section 33? I think not. Section 33 gives a reference when there is a difference with respect to an interference or control exercised or claimed to be exercised by virtue of the Act—i.e., the Tramways Act. To be the subject-matter of a reference it must be something done or claimed to be done by virtue of the Act, or something regulated by or comprised in the Act. The corporation here are not doing anything by virtue of the Act nor anything regulated by or comprised in the Act, but are exercising powers outside the Act and vested in them independently of the Act. In Reg. v. Croydon and Norwood Tramways Co. the corporation were seeking to exercise statutory control over the tramway company in relation to work of the tramway company, and there was a question whether such work was such as ought reasonably to satisfy the local authority. There was plainly a difference falling within the words of section 33. That case, therefore, is distinguishable from this. I agree with the judgment of Vaughan Williams, J., and think this appeal must be allowed.

GRESHAM LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY v. STYLES. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Life assurance company—Annuities paid out of profits or gains—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 102, schedule D., r. 4.

A life insurance company, which, in addition to its ordinary business, carries on the business of selling annuities for a lump sum, is not entitled to deduct the amount paid in respect of such annuities from its gross income for the purpose of assessment to income tax, but such annuities are liable to income tax in the hands of the company as sums payable out of profits and gains within the meaning of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 102.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 480, 24 Q. B. D. 500, affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Hawkins, J.), reported ante, p. 480, 24 Q. B. D. 500, where the facts are fully stated.

The Gresham Life Assurance Society, in addition to the ordinary business of a life assurance society, is in the habit of granting annuities, the consideration for which is a lump sum paid down.

They claimed, for the purpose of assessment to income tax, to deduct from their gross receipts the amount annually paid by them in fulfilment of these annuity contracts.

The Commissioners of Income Tax refused to allow the deduction, and stated a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division.

The Divisional Court upheld the decision of the commissioners, and the Gresham Life Assurance Society appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Lumley Smith, Q.C., and W. Fooks, for the appellants.—The society carries on the business of selling annuities, and its profits and gains are its receipts after subtracting the expenditure necessary to obtain those receipts. The sums paid annually by way of annuities are part of such necessary expenditure, and are not annuities payable out of such profits and gains.

They cited Last v. London Assurance Corporation, 32 W. R. 702, 12 Q. B. D. 389.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., and Danckwerts, for the Crown.—These annuities are payable out of the profits and gains of the society within the meaning of section 102, and schedule D., rule 4, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave, 11 Q. B. D. 174, 31 W. R. Dig. 90. The object of the Act was to facilitate collection of income tax, and the society, when it has paid the tax, will be able to deduct it from the annuity paid to each annuitant.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion this case is governed by the rule of construction which we laid down in Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave as applied to rule 4 of schedule D., which is the rule now in question. It cannot be denied that this society is carrying on the business of selling annuities—that is to say, that it grants annuities in return for the payment down of a lump sum. Now what is the profit of this business on which the Goverment is entitled to receive income tax? If it were not for section 102 and schedule D., rule 4, there can be no doubt that the income on which the society would be assessed would be the difference between what they receive as the receipts of the business and what they spend in order to obtain those receipts. That is the way in which an ordinary tradesman's net profit is arrived at. Now the receipts of this business would be principally the lump sums paid by the annuitants, and the expenses of obtaining those receipts would include not only the wages of clerks and ordinary office expenses, but also, without doubt, the amounts which the society has to pay each year in respect of such annuities. The balance, therefore, would be the sum on which, if it were not for section 102 and schedule D., rule 4, the society would have to pay income tax. But that section and that rule lay down an entirely different principle for the purpose of getting at the sum on which income tax is to be paid. That would, no doubt, be an immense hardship to the society if it were not for the compensatory clauses enabling them to deduct the amount of income tax on annuities paid by them from the annuities when paid to their annuitants. The section and rule do not alter the amount received by the Government, they only alter the method of collection, and oblige the society to collect the tax for the Government instead of the tax collector. In spite of the compensatory clauses, in some cases no doubt there will be hardship, but that must not prevent us from putting a construction on the Act. All taxing Acts are, to some extent, tyrannical, and impose greater burdens on some people than on others.

In the Alexandria Water Co.'s case we held that, for the purpose of assessment and liability to income tax, profits and gains meant the trade receipts, and that, in making up the debit side of the account, annual interest on the money must not be taken into account. It is true that but for the section and rule such annual interest, and, in the present case, these annuities, would be taken into account, but the rule says that no deduction shall be made on account of any annual interest or any annuity or other annual payment, and as we have held in the Alexandria Water Co.'s case that annual interest, although paid out, must not be deducted from the gross receipts; so now we must hold that the sums annually paid by the society as annuities must not be deducted from their receipts, but that income tax must be paid upon such sums by the society. For these reasons I think that the Divisional Court was right, and that this appeal fails.

Lindley, L.J.—I confess that I have had some doubt as to the proper construction of section 102, but I have come to the conclusion that the Divisional Court was right. The case really turns on section 102 and rule 4 of schedule D. of the Act of 1842, and the construction put upon them by this court in the case of the Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave. It is obvious that the principles laid down by that section and rule for ascertaining the balance liable to income tax are widely different from those which are ordinarily employed in ascertaining the net profit of a trade. I think that the words "profits and gains" used in the section and rule mean not the net profit after deducting losses and expenses, but the credit side of the account—the trade receipts, and, therefore, that these annuities are payable out of profits and gains which are brought into charge by virtue of this Act. It is true that they are not paid out of the net profits of the concern, but I think they are paid out of profits and gains within the meaning of the Act, and are therefore chargeable, and cannot be deducted from the amount on which income tax is payable. That is the construction put upon the rule in the Alexandria case, and, therefore, having regard to that case, I think the Divisional Court was right, although, as I have said, I feel some doubt about it.

Lopes, L.J.—But for the remarks of my brother Lindley I should have said that I had no doubt that the judgment appealed from was right. I entirely agree in the view taken by the Master of the Rolls. No doubt, if it were not for the rule and section, the appellants would be entitled to deduct these payments in ascertaining their profits, but a different principle of assessment and a different machinery for collection is given by the Act. The question is as to the meaning in the Act of "profits and gains." In my opinion the phrase means not net profits but trade receipts, and this view is strengthened by reading section 102. I can see nothing harsh or unreasonable in this construction. No doubt the society are made primarily liable for the payment of income tax on these annuities, but they have full authority to deduct the amount paid on each annuity when they are paying it to the annuitant. Our decision is in accordance with the Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave and the principles there enunciated, and therefore I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

Corporation of Bacup v. Smith. (a.)

Local government—Apportioned expenses—"Owner"—Validity of notice—Receiver appointed in action—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 2, 4, 150.

A receiver of rents and profits appointed in an action is not within the term "owner" in section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Adjourned summons.

The urban authority of the borough of Bacup, in July, 1886, served upon one Hitchen (a receiver of the rents and profits of certain premises appointed in an action) a notice under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, requiring him to level and make good part of a road upon which the said premises abutted. The notice was not complied with, and the urban authority executed the works mentioned in the notice, and the expenses were apportioned, and notice of the apportionment served upon Hitchen, who repudiated all liability. In consequence thereof a demand for payment was served upon him in accordance with section 257 of the Act.

The urban authority, having obtained leave to do so, brought this action by way of originating summons against the trustees of the will of the testator whose estate was the subject of the action in which Hitchen had been appointed receiver, for an account of what was due to them as urban authority in respect of the apportioned expenses, and that their charge on the premises might be enforced by a sale in default of payment.

Upjohn, for the plaintiffs, the urban authority, argued that the receiver was within the definition of the term "owner" in section 4 of the Act.

He referred to Eddleston v. Francis, 7 C. B. N. S. 568; Peek v. Waterloo Board of Health, 12 W. R. 252, 2 H. & C. 709; Cook v. Montagu, 20 W. R. 624, L. R. 7 Q. B. 418; Mayor, &c., of St. Helens v. Kirkham, 34 W. R. 440, 16 Q. B. D. 403.

Byrne, Q.C., and Warrington, for the defendant.—A receiver appointed in an action is neither agent nor trustee for any other person within section 4.

Upjohn replied.

Chitty, J.—It is admitted that no charge has been created unless the notice was a good one. Whether it was good depends on section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875. This is a defining section, and in the long list of terms there given the word "owner" occurs, and it is defined as "the person for the time being receiving the rack rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether in his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack rent." The notice here was served on the receiver appointed in an action, by the court. Now, a receiver is not in the position of agent for other persons, nor is he a trustee. He is appointed by order of the court. He is responsible to the court, and cannot obey the orders of any party to the action, and in no sense can he be said to be the agent of the parties at whose suit, or at the suit of one of whom, he has been appointed. Now, I am not at liberty to change the words used in this section—agent or trustee—so as to make them include a person who has not this capacity.

(a.) Reported by V. de S. Fowke, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

To do so would be to usurp legislative power. And it is to be borne in mind that what I have to construe is itself a defining section, which, in order to avoid ambiguity, defines the term in question with the object of making its meaning clear. Mr. Upjohn ingeniously argued that the words "whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person" in the section should be considered as in brackets, so as to make the term "owner" equivalent to any person who is in receipt of the rack rent, but he had to admit that, if this were the meaning of the language used, it could not be said that a mere rent collector was an "owner" within the section, because it is clear from the authorities and the other sections of the Act that whoever is "owner" within this clause, is personally liable. It is argued that I am to read these words in brackets as having been inserted with the view of extending the case of owners to persons who would not otherwise come within it. Mr. Upjohn wants me to expand these words so as to make them include some other person not within the clause, but I cannot adopt this construction. Therefore, upon the construction of this clause, I hold this notice was not a good notice.

Curiously enough, the defendant's contention that a receiver appointed by the court does not come within the words used in this section receives additional force from legislation—viz., the Act to amend the Nuisances Removal Act for England, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121), which, by section 2, defines "owners" by the same words as those used in the Act of 1875, with this remarkable difference, that after agent or trustee are inserted the words, "or as receiver or sequestrator appointed by the Court of Chancery, or under any order thereof," and for the purposes of this Act it was, of course, held that a receiver came within the term "owner." But this Act was repealed by the Act of 1875, so that at this date the Legislature, having before it the wider definition of this Act, left these words out of the definition in this latter Act.

And there is this, too, which shows even more strongly that the Legislature's attention was directed to the terms of this definition, for in the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), which immediately preceded the Nuisances Removal Act, 1855, there is (section 250) a definition of "owner" which does not include a receiver or sequestrator; the definition being expressed like the other, except that the words "receiver and sequestrator appointed by the court" are omitted.

And the Legislature did so advisedly, because great hardship might have been caused thereby to a receiver or sequestrator, who is not always appointed in a suit to which the owner of the premises affected is a party, for instance, in the case of a mortgage by a tenant for life of his life estate, suppose the mortgagee procures the appointment of a receiver, and then the tenant for life dies. Under the construction which is contended for, the receiver would be "owner" within the Act of 1875, and, as such, he would be personally liable, though without any fund to look to for his indemnity. I hold, therefore, that the notice given in this case was bad. I may add that the Legislature has provided for the service of the notice under section 267, by posting it on the property itself.

Patent—Petition for revocation of patent—Action for damages in Queen's Bench Division—Application to transfer petition to Queen's Bench Division—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 49, r. 3.

The court will order a transfer of a petition for revocation of a patent to the Queen's Bench Division to be heard by the judge at the same time as an action for damages before a judge and jury in respect of the same subject-matter.

Petition.

This was an application for the transfer to the Queen's Bench Division of a petition for the revocation of a patent for "Blue," taken out by one of the defendants, in order that the petition might come on for hearing with the action of Edge v. Harrison, which was an action, set down for trial by a judge and jury, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling their "Blue" as plaintiff's "Blue," and from representing it as Edge's Blue, and also claiming damages for conspiracy and fraudulent sale.

Bousfield, for the petitioner.—It is convenient for all parties that this petition should come on at the same time as the trial of the action. It is a cause or matter within ord. 49, r. 3.

T. M. Goodeve, in opposition.

North, J.—I am of opinion that it is convenient and for the benefit of all parties that this petition should come before the judge who tries the action, and subject to the consent of the President of the Queen's Bench Division I make the order for transfer.

An order was made that the jointress should have six months to redeem the plaintiffs as first and second mortgagees; that, if she did not redeem, the subsequent incumbrancers should have one period of three months to redeem; but that, if she did redeem, the plaintiffs, as fourth mortgagees, should have a period of three months to redeem, subject to the jointure, and the subsequent incumbrancers should have a further period of three months in which to redeem. Action.

This was an action for foreclosure of mortgages on the Haldon Estate, settled by Lord Haldon's Estate Act, 1885.

The plaintiffs were the first mortgagees for £85,000 and interest secured by two mortgages to them made in 1841. The third incumbrance was a jointure of £1,500 a year, charged upon the estate in favour of Dowager Lady Haldon, the widow of a former tenant for life, by a settlement made in 1845. The fourth incumbrance was a mortgage to the plaintiffs made in 1868, to secure £15,000 and interest, of which sum £3,200 had been paid off.

There were a number of subsequent incumbrances, the priorities of which had not been ascertained. Subject to these mortgages the estate was vested in trustees.

The defendants to the action were Dowager Lady Haldon, a number of subsequent incumbrancers, Lord Haldon, who was the tenant for life, the Hon. Laurance William Palk, who was the tenant in tail in remainder, an infant, and the trustees of the estate.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, for the plaintiffs.—In case the jointress redeems the plaintiffs as first and second mortgagees, the plaintiffs, as fourth mortgagees, ought to have a further period commencing from the determination of the period allowed to the jointress, given to them for redeeming her. The tendency of the court is to give one period of redemption only, but this is a special case: Doble v. Manley, 33 W. R. 409, 28 Ch. D. 664; Platt v. Mendel, 32 W. R. 918, 27 Ch. D. 246; and Coleman v. Llewellyn, 35 W. R. 82, 34 Ch. D. 143. The defendant incumbrancers who have not proved their securities or shown their priorities are not entitled to successive periods for redemption. The plaintiffs also ask for a direction that, in case the jointress redeems, the estate may be conveyed to trustees: Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 15; Conveyancing Act, 1882, s. 12; and that on the plaintiffs redeeming the jointress by paying her back what she has paid, with her costs and arrears of jointure, they may regain the priority in respect of their debt of £85,000 and what they will have paid her for arrears of jointure and costs, over the future payment of the jointure, which they originally had in respect of their debt of £85,000. [North, J.—With respect to the conveyance to trustees, let the order be in the usual form, with liberty to apply to have the conveyance made to trustees instead of the party named in the order. That will not deprive you of the benefit given by Conveyancing Acts, and I shall have control over the way in which it is worked out.]

Herbert Lake, for Lady Haldon.—If Lady Haldon redeems them, the plaintiffs, as fourth mortgagees, can only redeem her subject to her annuity. The order in this case should be the same as that made in Parry v. Parry, Seton on Decrees, vol. II., Part I., 4th ed., p. 1146.

Frank Evans, for a defendant incumbrancer.—I ask for a sale of the property. [North, J.—I cannot direct a sale now. There is no evidence of the value of the property. But the parties can hereafter apply for a sale at any time until foreclosure.]

E. S. Ford, Dauney, F. Thompson, and Henry Terrell, for other defendant incumbrancers.

Chadwyck Healey, for the infant tenant in tail in remainder.

North, J.—The tendency of the court now is much greater than it was to prevent foreclosure suits continuing for years, with successive opportunities for redemption given to the parties; ordinarily it gives one period in the first instance and no more.

The case which lays down what I understand to be the law on the subject at present, is Doble v. Manley, where Chitty, J. said "that he had consulted with Kay and Pearson, JJ., and that they were all unanimously of opinion that where the defendants did not appear, one time only should be fixed for redemption, whether the statement of claim alleged that they were entitled, or only that they 'claimed to be entitled,' to incumbrances. To fix several successive periods was to make a decree as between co-defendants, which should not be granted except upon the request of a defendant. If any subsequent mortgagee appeared and claimed to have successive periods fixed, the court would have to consider whether he was entitled to them." Now to apply that case to the present; in that case the defendants did not appear; in the present there are a good many defendants, at any rate, that do appear, and some request to have successive foreclosures. Then, to apply that judgment, it is for them to show that they are entitled to this. If they can make a case showing it right that successive periods be given, the court can do it; but as it was put in the case cited, they are the persons to point out why it should be done; and, I think, to entitle them to such an order they must put the court in possession of materials upon which it can make the order they ask. In the present case there are a great number of defendants, and their priorities are not admitted, and the mortgagees have not proceeded to prove their securities. I disclaim altogether the duty, if each had proved his security, to proceed to sort them out, and to make a decree giving successive periods for redemption, based upon my investigation of their respective securities. Of course, I could not do that. No doubt, if one had the dates, primâ facie, in the absence of anything else, that would be their order of priority; but it would not always be so, because there may be tacking, or consolidation, or something of that kind. It is impossible for me now to make any declaration as to the priorities of the parties.

Then I have asked in vain for any authority showing that I can direct an inquiry as to what their priorities are, and, when that has been answered, can make, on further consideration, for the first time, a decree for foreclosure according to the priorities so ascertained by an inquiry in chambers. I am not in a position to do it. The case relied on by counsel for the later incumbrancers seems to me, as far as I can judge from such a slight examination as I can give it here, to be an authority directly against their contention instead of in favour of it.

This is a case in which I ought to adopt the general practice of the court at the present day, in the absence of special circumstances, and not to give the defendants separate periods for redemption. As, however, the plaintiffs, in their capacity of fourth mortgagees, ask for a period of redemption—and as that is what all those behind them wish (except that it is not going so far as they want), and it is for their benefit, because it gives them longer time—I will give the plaintiffs a further period of three months, and give the subsequent mortgagees a third period of three months.

As regards the right of the plaintiffs to redeem the jointress if she pays them off, I do not see my way to giving such a special direction as Mr. Cozens-Hardy asks for, and for this reason. If the plaintiffs are redeemed the jointress will have paid them £85,000; she will then stand in the position of first mortgagee; she will then have the right to have the first mortgages assigned, I will not say necessarily to any party she may name, because difficulties may arise if they are assigned to a person outside the suit. But her right to have the charges kept alive in some way is clear, and it is not necessary at present to consider how. But, assuming the charges are kept alive for the benefit of the jointress, when she has paid them off, then the plaintiffs come forward again as fourth mortgagees, and ask me to direct that the first and second mortgages shall be transferred to them, or some nominee of theirs, by the jointress, subject to their paying to her all that she has paid to redeem the first and second mortgages, and also, of course, her own costs and all arrears of her jointure, but without making any provision for the jointure itself; and it is said that she will be in the same position as now, she will be jointress subject to the £85,000. But as the jointress has a right to redeem in priority to the fourth mortgagees, she might then have a right to say, "Hand back to me what you have compelled me to transfer to you, and transfer it to me." That may go on from time to time, and I do not see the end of it.

What the plaintiffs are entitled to as fourth mortgagees is to have a transfer by the jointress of all the property to them subject to her jointure, in the same way as was decreed in the case of Parry v. Parry, with respect to an annuity, which seems much the same thing. It is said it would be a hardship on the plaintiffs, who have the two first mortgages, to put the jointress over them. Supposing that the jointress had commenced proceedings for foreclosure and redemption, she might have redeemed the present plaintiffs as first and second mortgagees, and then the plaintiffs, as fourth mortgagees, would be entitled to redeem her. It may be that in that case she would have to transfer to them, and to part with the securities which they, calling on her to redeem, were entitled to call for. But then she might be in a difficulty, because she was the person who, as plaintiff, had set the ball rolling. In the present case it is the plaintiffs who have done that, and if they insist on their right to take away from her the property she has acquired by redeeming them, it seems to me they can only do it subject to the charge in her favour which is admittedly prior to them. Therefore, I do not see my way to make any order as between them, excepting that upon the plaintiffs, as fourth mortgagees, paying to the jointress all that shall be found due upon taking the accounts, which will include all arrears, then she shall convey to them subject to the jointure.

If the jointress does not redeem, she will be foreclosed; there will then be an account of what is due to the plaintiffs on all their mortgages, and the others will be foreclosed unless they pay in three months; so there will be a second period in that case instead of a third.

Duncan v. Dixon. (a.)

Infant—Settlement—Voidable contract—Infants' Relief Act, 1874.

An infant of eighteen years of age, by an ante-nuptial contract, settled certain reversionary interests. After attaining twenty-one she gave notice to the trustees of her desire to rescind the settlement, on the ground that it was void under the Infants' Relief Act, 1874.

Held, that the contract was only voidable—i.e., valid until repudiated—and not void, and that it was not within the Infants' Relief Act, 1874.

Trial of preliminary questions of law.

In this action the plaintiff, Alice Margaret Alexandrina Duncan (or Dixon), claimed a declaration that an ante-nuptial contract of marriage, dated the 21st of January, 1878, in the Scotch form was void, and that the property comprised therein ought to be reconveyed and transferred to her. The defendants were George Dixon, the husband, the trustees of the settlement, and an infant son of the marriage.

By the deed in question certain property of the husband, and a reversionary interest in real and personal estate together with a sum of money belonging to the wife, were settled upon trust for the plaintiff for life for her separate use, remainder to the husband should he survive, with remainder to the children of the marriage.

The plaintiff on the 24th of April, 1878, intermarried with George Dixon, being then eighteen years old, having been born on the 14th of December, 1859.

On the 2nd of August, 1883, a decree was pronounced by a Scotch court dissolving the marriage at the instance of the husband.

In 1884 the plaintiff recovered judgment in a Scotch court against the trustees of the settlement for arrears of the income up to the date of the dissolution of the marriage.

In September of the same year the plaintiff gave notice to the trustees of the settlement that she repudiated and disaffirmed the settlement, on the ground that she was an infant at the date of it, and domiciled in England.

On the 13th of November, 1888, the writ in the present action was issued, seeking the declaration above stated.

The following preliminary questions of law were set down for decision, and now came on for hearing:—

1. Whether the marriage contract was, as against the plaintiff, void ab initio.

2. Whether the said contract was, as regards the plaintiff, voidable (as distinguished from void) ab initio at her instance.

Warmington, Q.C., and Ribton, for the plaintiff.—This marriage contract was void ab initio, as the plaintiff was an infant when it was entered into, and it could not be ratified after she came of age, as she was under coverture, and also by reason of sections 1 and 2 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874. Sections 1 and 2 of that Act are as follows:—1. All contracts, whether by specialty or by simple contract, henceforth entered into by infants for the repayment of money lent or to be lent, or for goods supplied or to be supplied (other than contracts for necessaries), and all accounts stated with infants shall be absolutely void; provided always that this enactment shall not invalidate any contract into which an infant may by any existing or future statute or by the rules of common law or equity enter, except such as now by law are voidable. 2. No action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any promise made after full age to pay any debt contracted during infancy, or upon any ratification made after full age of any promise or contract made during infancy, whether there shall or shall not be any new consideration for such promise or ratification after full age. Nor can any act of acquiescence bind the wife, the interests settled by her being reversionary: Smith v. Lucas, 30 W. R. 451, 18 Ch. D. 531; Seaton v. Seaton, 34 W. R. 865, 13 App. Cas. 61. Section 1 of the Act of 1874 must be read generally as applying to all the contracts of an infant: Ex parte Jones, In re Jones, 29 W. R. 747, 18 Ch. D. 109. The 2nd section also is general: Coxhead v. Mullis, 27 W. R. 136, 3 C. P. D. 439; Northcote v. Doughty, 4 C. P. D. 385, 28 W. R. Dig. 106; and Ditcham v. Worrall, 29 W. R. 59, 5 C. P. D. 410.

They cited also Kingsman v. Kingsman, 29 W. R. 207, 6 Q. B. D. 122; and Ex parte Kibble, In re Onslow, 23 W. R. 433, L. R. 10 Ch. 373.

S. Hall, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the defendants.—Before 1874 this settlement would have been voidable. That Act makes no difference in the law as to ante-nuptial contracts by an infant. "Voidable," as applied to a contract, means valid until it is rescinded, not invalid until it is confirmed. The onus of proof that the contract is cancelled lies on the plaintiff: Oakes v. Turquand, L. R. 2 E. & I. App. 325, 16 W. R. H. L. Dig. 15. The plaintiff confirmed the settlement by bringing an action on it, and has also received benefits under it. Section 1 of the Act of 1874 deals only with certain specified contracts; the contracts aimed at being those with money-lenders. If all contracts were void under section 1, what was the necessity of section 2?

Warmington, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—On the argument of the point of law, which has now to be decided, the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, was freely criticized. Further consideration has convinced me, not only that the questions then discussed were real and serious, but that there are many others of at least equal difficulty. It is not, however, convenient to discuss the provisions of the Act further than is necessary for the decision before me, and I must not be understood to intimate an opinion on any questions not decided. Nor is it necessary to discuss at length the law respecting infants' contracts independently of the Act. Suffice it to say that such contracts are, with some exceptions or qualifications, which there is no need here to specify, voidable—which term I understand to mean that they are valid until repudiated. It was suggested in argument that "voidable" may equally well signify "invalid until confirmed"; but to my mind that, apart from the ordinary use of language, does not express the technical sense of the word. As regards those contracts which operate as covenants and affect property, I apprehend that you must look back to the date of the contract for the purpose of ascertaining its operation, and, unless there has been a subsequent repudiation within the limits of time and in the manner allowed by law, treat it as binding the property according to the expressed intention of the instrument. For that I have the high authority of Sir George Jessel, who, in Smith v. Lucas, says: "If, therefore, this is a covenant to settle the future-acquired property of the wife, and nothing more is done by her, the covenant will bind the property. There is no reason, so far as I am aware, for distinguishing a voidable covenant from any other covenant; till it is avoided it is a binding covenant." There are, no doubt, to be found expressions of other judges apparently in conflict with this, as, for instance, the language of Lord Cairns in Codrington v. Codrington, 24 W. R. 648, L. R. 7 H. L. 854, but it must be borne in mind that in cases of that class (to which this also belongs) the quondam infant is claiming to repudiate the settlement, and other parties are endeavouring to set up, adversely to that claim, conduct or acts equivalent to ratification. The language of judgments in such cases is directed to those contentions, and must not readily be construed as expressing a difference from Sir George Jessel's statement of the law.

This so far brings the present case within section 1 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, that it takes it out of the proviso. In other words, the contract, being voidable, is not by the proviso excepted from the operation of the earlier part of the section. Before considering the earlier part let me put aside the decisions which have been quoted on section 2—decisions mainly directed to the question whether a promise of marriage is a contract within it, and, if so, what is the proper application to such a promise of the provision respecting ratification. I do not say that it was useless to refer to those authorities. I think that the case could not have been thoroughly argued without a reference to them, and at one time I thought that they would throw more light on the question for my decision than they now appear to do. In the result I pass them by with less hesitation because I find it difficult to connect the 1st and 2nd sections of the Act together so as to make a coherent whole, and I do not understand how, if the 2nd section receives the wide construction which was given to it by the Lord Chief Justice in Coxhead v. Mullis, there is much, if anything, left for the operation of the 1st section. This puzzle, if it be one, I must leave for solution elsewhere or on another occasion.

The contract in this case is what is sometimes termed a marriage contract, but the more familiar description to us is that of a marriage settlement. Is a contract of that character within the purview of the Act? For the present purpose one need not closely distinguish between settlements purporting to operate by way of grant, and settlements operating only by way of covenant. This particular settlement is of the latter kind, and is therefore essentially a contract. It was said that this, and indeed every other contract into which an infant can possibly enter, must be within the statute because it is an Act to amend the law as to contracts of infants, and therefore all contracts of infants must be affected by it. The argument having been advanced, I have thus noticed it; but a branch of law is no less amended because some sub-divisions of it are untouched by the amendments. Take, at a venture, the Trustee Act, 1888, which is stated to be an Act to amend the law relating to the duties, powers, and liabilities of trustees. One would not expect to find every duty, every power, and every liability brought within the purview of the Act, nor is it, in fact, thus extensive.

A more plausible argument was raised on the words "all contracts" with which the first section commences. The next seven words are, doubtless, parenthetical; but, omitting them, and omitting also the exception of contracts for necessaries, it was urged that the particular contracts mentioned were mentioned only as examples, and without any intention to cut down the universality of "all contracts." This argument claimed and derived support from the proviso, of which, according to the ordinary rules of construction, the effect must be to except out of the earlier part of the section something which, but for the proviso, would be within it. Therefore, it is said, the section is intended to cover every contract by law voidable, and the contract in question being of that character, the section covers that. The answer to this argument is found in the true construction of the proviso. The meaning of the proviso that the enactment shall not invalidate any contract, &c., is that no contract which the enacting part would by force of language render void, shall be so rendered if it falls within a specified class. It may be, and I think is, difficult to determine precisely what is comprehended in that class, and the difficulty is increased by the sweeping exception with which the section concludes. Still, I think it would not be right to construe the proviso as enlarging the class of contracts falling within the enactment, when it can be fairly and properly construed without attributing to it that effect.

The enactment, standing alone, is, in my judgment—but subject to a remark to be presently made—free from difficulty. The contracts specified are of three classes: (1) contracts for the repayment of money lent; (2) contracts for goods supplied; and (3) accounts stated. To all contracts of these classes the enactment is expressly applied, and contracts of other classes remain unaffected. That seems to me to be the plain meaning of the language, and I can discern no reason for placing a forced construction on it.

It is said I am not at liberty to follow the bent of my own opinion on this point, and that it has been otherwise decided by judges to whose authority I must bow. I must, indeed, bow to them, and should not hesitate to do so if I thought they had really decided, or even expressed a definite judicial opinion on that point, but I do not. In Ex parte Jones, 18 Ch. D., at p. 122, Sir George Jessel used language which, apart from the context, certainly favours the argument which I am rejecting. He says that the words of the Act apply to all contracts of an infant except those which are expressly excepted, and that the words "are of universal application." But he was considering the question whether the words cover trade contracts for the supply of goods as well as those into which a non-trader or a trader, apart from trading, may daily enter; and there was no occasion for him to consider—nor do I think that he did consider—whether contracts wholly dissimilar to those specified in the section were intended to be governed by it. There really is no other authority which can fairly be cited as deciding or expressing a definite opinion on the point. I have already eliminated the cases on the 2nd section, which include Ex parte Kibble, but I revert to Cowhead v. Mullis, to say, first, that although Lord Coleridge (3 C. P. D., at p. 442) notices the argument in favour of the restricted meaning of section 1, he does not either uphold or reject it; and, secondly, that, while applying it differently, because to different language, I venture respectfully to agree with him "that it is better to suppose that Parliament meant what Parliament has already said, and not to limit plain words in an Act of Parliament by consideration of policy, if it be policy, as to which minds may differ, and as to which decisions may vary." I think that the two questions of law submitted to me by consent when the case was last before the court ought to be answered by declaring that the marriage contract set out in the statement of claim was, as regards the plaintiff, voidable as distinguished from void.

NORMAN & Co. v. BINNINGTON & Co. (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Excepted perils—Negligence, "whether in navigating the ship or otherwise"—Liability of shipowner.

A bill of lading contained a clause exempting the shipowners from liability for (inter alia) "misfeasance, error in judgment, negligence or default of pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise." Damage from "rain or from contact with other goods" was also excepted. After the plaintiffs' goods had been shipped upon the vessel, but before the vessel had started on her voyage, the plaintiffs' goods were injured through the master and crew negligently allowing them to be wetted by rain or by wet goods loaded on the top of them.

Held, in an action to recover from the shipowners damages for the injury to the goods, that the words of the bill of lading absolved the shipowners from liability for damage brought about in negligently navigating the ship, or in negligently bringing about those other losses from which the shipowners had exempted themselves in the bill of lading, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

Motion for a new trial, or that judgment be entered for the defendants.

The facts and the bill of lading upon which the action was brought are sufficiently set forth in the judgment of the court.

Bigham, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the defendants.—The words "whether in navigating the ship or otherwise" refer to perils incurred in navigating the ship or in any other way specified in the bill of lading. There is no ambiguity here, and the words should be construed according to their plain meaning.

They cited The Duero, L. R. 2 Ad. & Ecc. 393, 18 W. R. Adm. Dig. 19.

Kennedy, Q.C., and Percy Morris, for the plaintiffs.—This negligence is not within the exception; it occurred before the voyage began: Steel v. State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, 26 W. R. Dig. 216; Hayn v. Culliford, 27 W. R. 541, 4 C. P. D. 182; Crow v. Falk, 8 Q. B. 467. Words in a bill of lading or charter-party which are meant to absolve shipowners from liability should be construed against the shipowners, for it was their duty to make clear the exceptions in their favour: Burton v. English, 32 W. R. 655, 12 Q. B. D. 218, at p. 224; Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Co., 22 W. R. 752, L. R. 9 Q. B. 546, at p. 549. The words "or otherwise" mean or in doing other acts of a like character with navigation which fall within the duty of persons navigating the ship; an instance would be negligent stoking: Smith v. Hunt, 54 L. T. N. S. 422, 34 W. R. Dig. 79; Carmichael v. Liverpool, &c., Association, 35 W. R. 793, 19 Q. B. D. 242; Canada Shipping Co. v. British Shipowners' Association, 22 Q. B. D. 727.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 10.—The following judgment, in which CAVE and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, JJ., agreed, was delivered by

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is an action by the shippers of goods against the shipowners upon a bill of lading, for damage to goods after being loaded on board of the defendants' ship The facts are as follows:—

The plaintiffs' goods (cotton-seed cake) were loaded in the hold of the defendants' ship at the port of Galveston, and certain cotton in bales (not the plaintiffs') was also there put on board. It thereupon became necessary to complete the loading of the ship outside of the bar in the outer roads, and for this purpose the ship, with the plaintiffs' goods on board, proceeded outside and there anchored. Other cargo—viz., cotton bales (not the plaintiffs')—was then brought alongside in lighters and loaded in the ship, and the jury have found that the plaintiffs' cake was then damaged by rain water, either by it falling directly through the open hatchway on to the cake, or by reason of wet bales of cotton being then placed upon it, and that there was negligence on the part of those on board the ship in allowing the plaintiffs' cake to be so damaged.

Upon these facts the question arises whether the plaintiffs can maintain an action against the defendants for the damage to the plaintiffs' goods, or whether the defendants are protected by the exemptions in the bill of lading upon which the action is founded. The bill of lading, so far as is material, is as follows:—"Shipped, in good order and condition, to be delivered, subject to the undermentioned conditions, in like good order and well-conditioned, the act of God, Queen's enemies, misfeasance, error in judgment, negligence or default of pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise, ... loss or damage arising from insufficiency in strength of packages, from sweating, leakage, breakage, rain, spray, rust, decay, from storage or contact with other goods, or from the boilers, steam, or machinery, or from the consequences of any damage or injury thereto, . . . and all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, land, and rivers, and of navigation of whatever kind being excepted, and the ship not being liable for any consequences of the causes herein excepted, however caused or originated."

Under the bill of lading the shipowners became bound to deliver the goods at the port of discharge in like good order and condition as when shipped, unless absolved by any of the excepted exemptions.

Charles, J., who tried this case, was of opinion that, inasmuch as the jury had found that the rain or the contact with other wet goods which damaged the plaintiff's goods was permitted by reason of the negligence of those for whose acts the defendants were responsible, that they (the defendants) were not exempted from liability by the terms of the bill of lading, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. In my judgment there was ample evidence to support the finding of the jury that the damage was occasioned by the negligence of those for whom the defendants were responsible.

It has been held that in construing a clause in a bill of lading exempting a shipowner from liability which is ambiguous and of doubtful meaning, the construction most in favour of the shipper, and not such as is most in favour of the shipowner, for whose benefit the exemptions are framed, is to be applied. See per Lush, J., in Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steam Co., 22 W. R., at p. 753, L. R. 9 Q. B., at p. 549, and per Bowen, LJ., in Burton v. English, 32 W. R., at p. 656, 12 Q. B. D., at p. 224.

I do not understand this to mean that the true canon of construction is not to be applied, but that, when applied, if ambiguity or doubt still exists, the construction is to be in favour of the shipper rather than of the shipowner.

In this bill of lading the shipowners have exempted themselves from damage to the shippers' goods by reason of rain, or of contact with other goods. This is not disputed, but the shippers contended that this exception does not apply, first, to damage done before the voyage has actually commenced, and, secondly, that it does not apply when the damage is brought about by the negligence of those for whose acts the defendants are responsible. As regards this first point I do not agree with it. In my judgment when once a shipowner has received a shipper's goods on board his ship and has by his captain given a bill of lading in the ordinary form for them, he is bound to deliver them at the port of discharge in the like good order and condition as when shipped, except he is exempted by exemptions therein, and it is immaterial when the voyage in fact commences.

The case of Hayn v. Culliford was cited to support this contention, but in my opinion it does nothing of the kind. In that case the bill of lading exempted the shipowner "from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners in navigating the ship," and it was held in the Court of Appeal that this clause did not exempt the shipowner from the default of their other agents and servants, and consequently not from the acts and defaults of the stevedore. See judgment of Court of Appeal per Bramwell, L.J., 27 W. R., at p. 544, 4 C. P. D., at p. 185. This is all that case decided in the Court of Appeal. I desire to point out the difference between the bill of lading in the present case and in Hayn v. Culliford. In the present case the words "engineers or other persons in the service of the ship," coming after the words "pilot, master, mariners," were added, as it seems to me, expressly to meet the point taken successfully by the shipper in Hayn v. Culliford, and it also appears to me that the phrase "whether in navigating the ship or otherwise," was inserted to meet a point also taken in that case but left expressly undecided by the Court of Appeal—viz., whether damage done to goods in stowing them was damage done in "navigating the ship," which my brother Denman in the court below had held not to be so. Moreover, upon the facts of the present case the whole of damage done to the plaintiffs' goods was after they had the been safely stowed in defendants' ship, and not in the process of stowing, as in Hayn v. Culliford. In my judgment the shipowners, under this bill of lading are primâ facie exempted from liability for damage by rain or by contact with other goods after the goods had been shipped, whether the ship had started on her voyage or not.

I now come to the other contention of the shippers—viz., that if the defendants' servants had brought about the rain or contact damage, by their negligence, the simple exception of liability from damage by rain or by contact with other goods would not exempt them. In this I agree, but it is answered by the shipowners that they are exempt by reason of the further exception in this bill of lading—viz., "negligence or default of pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise, always excepted."

It is upon the construction of these words, "whether in navigating the ship or otherwise," that the decision of this case really depends. Mr. Kennedy says that the words "or otherwise" may mean two things—either (a) something akin to navigating the ship; or (b) something dissimilar to it; and, that being so, under the rule laid down in the cases above cited (Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Co. and Burton v. English) he asserts that the words must be construed in favour of the shippers, and consequently held to mean something akin to navigating the ship. He was unable when pressed to give any intelligible instance of what came under the terms "akin to navigating the ship" which was not covered by the words "in navigating the ship." To read the words "or otherwise" as meaning akin to navigating the ship is to give no meaning, in my judgment, to the preceding words "in navigating the ship." It should be noticed that they are not words enumerating a class with general words following, to which the doctrine of limiting the general words to the class, is ordinarily applied.

To read the words "or otherwise" as including everything besides navigating the ship is to render the words "in navigating the ship" inoperative, but to read the words "whether in navigating the ship or otherwise" as meaning an absolution from liability to damage brought about whether in negligently navigating the ship or in negligently bringing about those other losses or damages from which the shipowners have exempted themselves in the bill of lading, is, in my judgment, the true reading of this bill of lading. By this means the true canon of construction is followed. The natural meaning is given to the words. A meaning is given to every word and no word is rendered inoperative. When this is done there is no ambiguity or doubtful meaning.

The shipowners by the bill of lading contract to carry and deliver the shippers' goods in like good order and condition as when shipped except that they will not be liable for damage thereto brought about either by the negligent navigation of their ship or for any of the losses and damages excepted in the bill of lading, even though brought about by the negligence of those for whose acts they are responsible. It is unnecessary to determine in this case whether the damage accrued to the plaintiffs' goods was whilst the ship was or was not being navigated.

Our attention was called to a decision given in Australia in the case of Ah Kang v. Australasian Steam Navigation Co., in which it was held upon demurrer that the words in a bill of lading, "or under any other circumstances," following the general words of "restraint of princes or rulers, accident, loss, or damage from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, or mariners, and other servants of the company navigating the ship," did not cover the confiscation of the plaintiff's goods at a foreign port by reason of the omission of the master to insert an entry of them in the ship's manifest as required by the law of the port, a matter wholly dissimilar from any of the exceptions in the bill of lading and in no way excepted therein, as in the present case the damage by rain and contact is. In my opinion this fact distinguishes that case from the present one, and I see no reason to dispute the accuracy of that case, even if it were binding upon us, which it is not.

In my opinion the defendants in this case are exempted under the terms of the bill of lading from the liability sought to be imposed upon them, and judgment should be entered for the defendants, and with costs.

MOXON v. SHEPPARD. (a.)

Solicitor—Practice—Charging order on money paid into court—"Property recovered or preserved"—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.

An action having been collusively compromised without the knowledge of the plaintiff's solicitors, and without any provision for their costs,

Held, that money which had, through their instrumentality, been paid into court by the defendant to abide the event, was "property preserved" within the meaning of section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, and that there was jurisdiction to make a charging order thereon.

Application by the plaintiff's solicitors for a charging order under 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28.

The applicants had been solicitors employed on behalf and by the instructions of the plaintiff in an action commenced on September 18, 1889, to recover from the defendant a sum of £96 11s. 3d. On October 11 they applied on behalf of the plaintiff for judgment under order 14, and the master thereupon gave the defendant leave to defend upon the terms of his paying the amount claimed into court to abide the event. The action was subsequently compromised by the plaintiff without the knowledge of the applicants, and without any provision being made as to the payment of their costs, and on February 25 they were informed that such compromise had been effected and they were discharged from their employment. On March 19 the defendant applied to the master to have the action dismissed, and the money repaid to him out of court, producing at the same time a written consent by the plaintiff to an order to that effect. The master refused the order, on the ground of collusion in connection with the compromise between the plaintiff and the defendant. The applicants then applied, under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, for a charging order upon the money in court. The order was made by the master and affirmed on appeal by Lawrance, J., at chambers.

E. T. Holloway, for the defendant.—The sum paid into court was not "property recovered or preserved" within the meaning of section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860. The claim for costs which a solicitor has under that section extends to the property of his own client only: Berrie v. Howitt, L. R. 9 Eq. 1, 18 W. R. Dig. 128. In Clover v. Adams, 6 Q. B. D. 622, 29 W. R. Dig. 207, where the plaintiff's solicitor was allowed a charging order on money paid into court by the defendant, the amount so paid in was "recovered or preserved," for the plaintiff could have taken it out of court at any moment, whereas in the present case the money is paid into court to abide the event.

Montague Lush, for the applicants.—The solicitors "preserved" the amount paid into court for the plaintiff, and are therefore entitled to a charging order: Twyman v. Porter, 19 W. R. 151, L. R. 11 Eq. 181; Pinkerton v. Easton, L. R. 16 Eq. 492, 22 W. R. Dig. 236.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. It was through the instrumentality of the plaintiff's solicitors that the money was ordered to be paid into court to abide the event. While it was in court a collusive compromise was effected by the parties without the solicitors' knowledge, and in order to deprive them of their costs. It is contended that under the circumstances the money was not "recovered" within the meaning of section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860. Perhaps it was not, but it was in process of recovery, and but for the collusive proceedings would have been recovered. At all events, it was so much preserved out of the defendant's estate.

GRANTHAM, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

The prisoner was tried before the Recorder of London at the Central Criminal Court upon an indictment charging him in the first count, under section 4 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), with unlawfully attempting to have unlawful carnal knowledge of Frances Coles, a girl under the age of thirteen years, and in the second count, under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, with an indecent assault on the said Frances Coles, then being a young person under the age of thirteen years.

The evidence of Frances Coles was received, though not given upon oath, under the provision in section 4 of the said Criminal Law Amendment Act.

At the close of the case for the prosecution the recorder held that there was no evidence of an attempt to have carnal knowledge, but that the evidence of the girl as to an indecent assault was corroborated by other material evidence implicating the prisoner.

Without the girl's evidence the evidence as to an indecent assault would have been insufficient to justify a conviction.

The counsel for the defence then submitted that as the only charge remaining was the charge of indecent assault, and as there was nothing in the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, to make the evidence of the girl admissible without oath upon a charge of indecent assault, there was no evidence to go to the jury upon that charge, but the case was left to the jury upon the evidence of the girl as well as the evidence of the other witnesses, and they acquitted the prisoner on the first count, but found him guilty on the second count of an indecent assault.

The question reserved for the opinion of this court was whether the evidence of the girl was admissible, and whether the conviction could be supported.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 21.—The COURT (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., HAWKINS, MATHEW, DAY, and GRANTHAM, JJ.), held that the case was not governed by the authority of Reg. v. Wealand, inasmuch as in that case the prisoner had been indicted for the full act of felony under section 4, and was found guilty of an indecent assault by virtue of the power given by section 9 in cases of an indictment for felony. Here, however, the first count of the indictment was for the attempt only, and the jury would not have had power to convict of an indecent assault on that count, inasmuch as section 9 applies only in cases of felony. On the other count of the indictment, the evidence of the girl was clearly inadmissible without oath. The conviction was therefore quashed.

Conviction quashed.

MARKS v. BEYFUS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Evidence—Prosecution by Director of Public Prosecutions—Public prosecution—Disclosure of name of informer—Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 22), ss. 2, 7.

In an action for conspiracy to procure the Director of Public Prosecutions to institute a criminal prosecution against the plaintiff, the Director of Public Prosecutions was called as a witness for the plaintiff, and asked to state the name of the informer, and, if he had a statement in writing, to produce it.

Held, that, as a prosecution instituted by the Director of Public Prosecutions is a public prosecution, the question was not admissible.

Attorney-General v. Briant, 15 M. & W. 169, approved and followed.

Appeal from the judgment of Huddleston, B., at the trial of the action with a jury.

The action was to recover damages for an alleged conspiracy on the part of the defendants falsely and maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause to institute a criminal prosecution against the plaintiff or to cause the Director of Public Prosecutions to prosecute him.

Upon the trial the plaintiff called Sir A. K. Stephenson, the Director of Public Prosecutions, who stated that he instituted the prosecution, and on being asked who were his informers, and whether a statement was made to him, and if in writing to produce it, he stated that there was a statement made to him in writing, but he declined to give the names of his informers or to produce the statement unless ordered by the judge, on the ground that it was against public policy and the interests of the public service to do so. The judge declined to order Sir A. K. Stephenson to answer the question or to produce the statement. The learned judge accordingly nonsuited the plaintiff.

The Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) refused to grant a new trial.

The plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiff, in person, contended that the learned judge ought to have ordered Sir A. K. Stephenson to answer the question and to produce the statement.

He referred to The Attorney-General v. Briant, 15 M. & W. 169; Hardy's case, 24 State Trials, 751; Watson's case, 32 State Trials, 98; Reg. v. Richardson, 3 F. & F. 693; 42 & 43 Vict. c. 22; 47 & 48 Vict. c. 58.

Cock, Q.C., Winch, Q.C., and H. Kisch, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The ground upon which the objection to answer the question is put is that the prosecution of the plaintiff was a public prosecution, in the sense that it was instituted by what was equivalent to the Government for a public purpose, and, that being so, the grounds for instituting the prosecution ought not, in the public interest, to be disclosed. The first inquiry is whether a prosecution instituted by the Director of Public Prosecutions is a public prosecution. The answer to that inquiry depends upon the provisions of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 22, which created the office of Director of Public Prosecutions. Section 2 of that Act provides that it shall be the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions, under the superintendence of the Attorney-General, to institute, undertake, or carry on such criminal proceedings as may be, for the time being, prescribed by regulations under the Act, or may be directed in a special case by the Attorney-General; and the regulations made under the Act show that the Director of Public Prosecutions is to take action when it is required in the public interest. Section 7 of the Act shows that his position is distinguished from and contrasted with that of a private prosecutor, and prosecutions undertaken by him are placed in a different position from prosecutions by private persons. He is, therefore, to institute a prosecution in those cases only in which the Attorney-General thinks it necessary, or in those cases in which he comes to the conclusion that the offence is of such a character that he should do so in the public interest. He is put in the position of a person authorized by the Government to prosecute. In other words, the prosecution is a public prosecution.

The next inquiry is, what is the law as to the disclosure of the names and statements of informers in the case of a public prosecution? The law upon the point has been laid down by Pollock, C.B., in Attorney-General v. Briant, where he said, in discussing Hardy's case, that all the judges gave judgments, "and on all hands it was agreed that the informer, in the case of a public prosecution, should not be disclosed." And further on he said: "The rule clearly established and acted on is this, that, in a public prosecution, a witness cannot be asked such questions as will disclose the informer, if he be a third person. . . . And we think the principle of the rule applies to the case where a witness is asked if he himself is the informer." That is the rule laid down upon the grounds of public policy in the case of a public prosecution, and that rule is applicable to the present case. I do not say that the rule can never be departed from. If on the trial of a prisoner the judge is of opinion that the disclosure of the name of the informer is necessary or right in the interests of the prisoner, then the greater public policy, that an innocent man should not be convicted, must prevail, and the judge would most certainly order the name to be disclosed. With that exception the judge, in my opinion, has no discretion to order the witness to answer the question. That rule applies, not only to the criminal trial itself, but also to all subsequent proceedings; otherwise the privilege would be futile. And, further, in my opinion, even if the witness were willing to give the evidence, the judge ought to prevent him doing so. For these reasons I am of opinion that Huddleston, B., was right in refusing to order Sir Augustus Stephenson to answer the questions, and as, apart from that, there was no evidence to go to the jury, the nonsuit was right. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J., concurred.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The cause of action alleged is for a conspiracy maliciously to procure the Director of Public Prosecutions to prosecute a criminal charge against the plaintiff, and unless the plaintiff can show that the defendants did procure the Director of Public Prosecutions to prosecute him, he has no cause of action, as, otherwise, there would be no damage to the plaintiff, and damage is essential to the cause of action. That seems to me to be the point of this case, and it is obvious that the plaintiff's case broke down in this essential particular. Unless he was able to obtain the evidence he required from Sir Augustus Stephenson there was no case to go to the jury. The question, therefore, is whether the judge was right in upholding, upon the ground of public policy, the refusal of Sir Augustus Stephenson to disclose the name of the informer. The solution of that question depends upon whether the prosecution of the plaintiff was a public prosecution. In my opinion, if it was a public prosecution, the name of the informer ought not to be disclosed, either on the trial of that prosecution or in any subsequent proceeding. There is one exception, however, to that rule. It may be that, on the trial of the prisoner, if the judge is of opinion that the non-disclosure may tell against the prisoner, he may order the name of the informer to be given.

There remains the question, What is the position of the Director of Public Prosecutions, and what is the nature of a prosecution instituted by him? When one looks at sections 2 and 7 of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 22, and at the regulations made under that Act, it seems to me obvious that a prosecution instituted by him is a public prosecution. The judge was, therefore, right in refusing to order the questions to be answered, and in doing so he acted upon the rule laid down by the Court of Exchequer in The Attorney-General v. Briant, founded upon the decisions in Hardy's case and in Watson's case. The judge had no discretion in the matter. Upon the question being put he was bound, even though the witness did not claim the privilege, to intervene and prevent the question being answered. Whether the Director of Public Prosecutions can claim privilege as an officer of State, and upon that ground can refuse to answer the questions, does not arise in the present case.

Tort — Mischievous animal—Elephant—Injury—Liability of owner.

The plaintiff was present at a public performance given by the defendants, when an elephant which was being exhibited by them attacked and injured him. The jury found that the elephant in question was not an animal dangerous to man, and that the plaintiff did not bring the attack upon himself.

Held, that the defendants were liable, as elephants belonged to the class of animals dangerous to man, and a person who kept an animal of that class was liable for injury done by it.

Appeal from the judgment of Day, J., in favour of the plaintiff at the trial of an action to recover damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff was present at a public performance given by the defendants, when an elephant belonging to and which was being exhibited by them attacked the plaintiff and injured him. The jury found (1) that the elephant was not a dangerous animal to man; (2) that the defendants did not know him to dangerous; and (3) that the plaintiff did not bring the attack on himself. Day, J., upon these findings, entered judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Cyril Dodd, Q.C., for the defendants.—The finding of the jury that this elephant was not dangerous to man takes it out of the class of dangerous animals. Elephants in many countries are tamed, and used as beasts of transport. They stand in a different position from animals feræ naturæ, such as lions, tigers, bears, wolves, &c., which are never tamed. Some elephants being wild and some being tame, there is no presumption that they are feræ naturæ, and therefore, on the first finding of the jury, the defendants are entitled to judgment.

They referred to Rex. v. Huggins, 2 Lord Raym. 1,574, at p. 1,583; Fleeming v. Orr, 2 Macqueen, 14; 1 Hale P. C. 430.

Montague Lush, for the plaintiff, was not called on.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The only difficulty I have had in this case is to see whether a formula could be laid down which would be applicable to this and other cases. According to the law of England, animals for this purpose may be divided into two classes. The first class consists of those animals as to which, if a person chooses to keep one of them, he does so at his peril, and it is not necessary or material to prove that he knew the particular animal he keeps to be dangerous. The other class consists of animals which are not, as a class, of a dangerous nature, though particular individuals of that class may become dangerous. If a person keeps an animal of this class, he is not liable for injury done by it unless he knew that the particular animal was dangerous. How can one determine to which of these two classes any particular kind of animal belongs? Some animals are known by everybody not to be of a dangerous nature in any country. They may be feræ naturæ in the sense that they are not the subject-matter of property until reduced into possession, but they are not feræ naturæ in the sense that they are dangerous. The law accordingly recognizes that such animals are not dangerous. There is another division of animals which the law recognizes as not being of a dangerous nature in England. For instance, there are horses, oxen, dogs, and others which I do not pretend to enumerate. These have come to be recognized by the law as not being of a dangerous nature in England in this way:—Though originally wild, in the course of years the whole race has been so tamed in this country that their progeny in England is now known and recognized as not being of a dangerous nature. On account of that universal knowledge, the law in this country recognizes and assumes that these animals as a race are not dangerous in England. Unless an animal can be brought within one of these two divisions—namely, a race of animal that is not dangerous anywhere, or a race of animal which by cultivation, so to speak, in England is recognized as not being dangerous in England—it falls within the first class, and if kept by anyone it must be kept at his peril.

Applying that principle to the present case, we must inquire under which class the race of elephants come. It is clear that they cannot come under the division of animals not dangerous anywhere. Nor can it be said that elephants have through a long series of years been born and tamed in this country that their progeny has been recognized in England as not dangerous. Therefore the race is not brought within the second class above-mentioned. Accordingly elephants fall within the first class, and whoever keeps an elephant must do so at his peril, and must prevent it from doing any injury, and his knowledge of the dangerous or mischievous character of the particular elephant that he keeps is immaterial. The first question, therefore, which the learned judge asked the jury was immaterial, and the defendants are liable for the injury done by the elephant, as the plaintiff did not by his conduct bring the injury on himself, and the judgment must be affirmed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The last case upon the subject is May v. Burdett, L. R. 9 Q. B. 101, the case of a monkey, where knowledge of the mischievous nature of the monkey was averred in the declaration; but that case does not seem to me to assist the defendants. Unless it can be shown that elephants as a class are known and recognized as not being dangerous in this country the defendants cannot succeed. I agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the broad principle which governs this case is that laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330. If a person brings on to his premises something not naturally there which is likely to do mischief he takes the risk, and he must keep it at his peril, and the law holds him responsible for any damage which ensues. The subject of dangerous animals is a branch of the law which is covered by that proposition. The application of that proposition has been uniformly recognized in the text-books and cases from the time of Lord Hale (1 Hale P. C. 430) and Lord Holt (Mason v. Keeling, 12 Mod. 332) down to the present time. People must not be wiser than the experience of mankind. If, according to the experience of mankind, certain animals are dangerous as a class, though individual members of that class have been tamed, the person who keeps an animal of that class must take the risk of its doing any mischief. Elephants still remain as a class wild in their nature and untamed, though there may be individuals of that class which are brought to a degree of tameness amounting to domestication. Everyone knows when dealing with an elephant that he is dealing with an animal which, unless it is tamed, belongs to a class which is naturally wild. If, on the other hand, the animal belongs to a class which, according to the experience of mankind, is not dangerous and not likely to do mischief, and if the class is dealt with by mankind on such a footing, then a person may safely keep such an animal, unless he knows that the particular animal which he keeps is likely to do mischief. The broad rule, therefore, as applicable to animals, is that if a person brings on to his land an animal belonging to a class that is likely to do mischief, he must take the risk upon himself of that animal doing mischief. But if the animal belongs to a class which is not likely to do mischief he is not liable for mischief done by it, unless he knows the particular animal to be dangerous. The judgment, therefore, was right, and must be affirmed.

In re BLUNDELL.

BLUNDELL v. BLUNDELL. (a.)

Administration—Costs—Executors' right of indemnity—Persons standing in executors' shoes—Subrogation—Relative rights against the estate of creditors standing in executors' shoes and persons to whom those creditors had been ordered to pay costs of proceedings taken by such creditors for the benefit of the estate.

In an action to administer the estate of a testator, the conduct was given to a company who were large creditors. The company, having taken out a summons with the approval of the judge to recover from the solicitors who had acted for the executor a sum of money received by them out of the estate for their costs, were ordered to pay the solicitors their costs of the summons, which was dismissed; the company were shortly afterwards ordered to be wound up by the court, and had no means of paying the amount. A small sum, not enough to pay in full either the company's or the solicitors' costs of the summons, remained in court to the credit of the action.

Held (reversing the decision of North, J.), that the solicitors were entitled, by subrogation to the right of the company (who stood in the shoes of the executor), to be indemnified out of the estate, and, as the company had been ordered to pay costs to the solicitors, the latter had a right to be paid such costs out of the fund in court, prior to the right of the company to be paid thereout their own costs of the same proceedings.

Appeal from North, J.

Thomas Blundell died in 1882, and an order directing the usual accounts of his estate was made in November, 1884. The testator's son, the defendant, G. T. Blundell, alone proved the will.

In January, 1885, the conduct of the action was given to the Bavarian Brewery Co. (Limited), who were large creditors of the estate. The present appellants, Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower, had for some time acted as solicitors to the executor, and had been paid by him out of the estate their costs to the amount of £1,148 14s. 9d. A balance of over £2,000 was subsequently found due from G. T. Blundell on his accounts, but, he having become bankrupt, no part thereof was ever paid.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The costs of the Bavarian Brewery Co. of the action were paid in pursuance of an order of the 26th of April, 1887, made upon the further consideration.

Directly after that order, the Bavarian Co., with the approval of the judge in chambers, took out a summons in their own name for an order against Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower to refund the sum of £1,148 odd paid to them as aforesaid, but this summons was dismissed, with costs, by Stirling, J. (40 Ch. D. 370, 37 W. R. Dig. 190). None of those costs were, however, paid, and the company having, on the 16th of June, 1888, been ordered to be wound up, there was no probability of their being paid out of the company's assets. A small sum (under £200) remained in court in the action, but out of that £35 13s. 6d. was due to the receiver.

Under these circumstances Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower gave notice of motion that the costs ordered to be paid to them as aforesaid might be declared a charge on the fund in court in priority to all other claims, and that they might be at liberty to apply for payment out of that fund of such part of those costs as they could not obtain from the brewery company. The only costs in the action in fact remaining unpaid were those incurred by the company in their summons against Bower, Cotton, & Bower (which alone exceeded what would be left of the fund in court after the receiver had been paid what was due to him), and the costs of the same summons payable by the company to Messrs. Bower & Co. (which also exceeded such residue of the fund).

The official liquidator of the company accordingly took out a summons for payment of the balance due to the receiver, and for taxation and payment out of the residue of the costs of all parties, and payment of the balance (if any) to himself as liquidator of the company.

The motion came on for hearing on the 20th of December, 1889.

North, J., held that the liquidator of the Bavarian Brewery Co. was entitled to the balance of the fund in court, in payment of the company's costs of the summons against Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower, in priority to the right of that firm to be paid the costs the company had been ordered to pay them.

Messrs. Bower, Cotton, & Bower appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Levett, for the appellants.—The summons in respect of which both these sets of costs were incurred was a proceeding commenced by the Bavarian Brewery Co., not for their own benefit, but for the benefit of Blundell's estate, and as they had been substituted for the executor in having the conduct of the action, we ought, by subrogation to them, to have the benefit of their right to indemnity: In re Gorton, Dowse v. Gorton, 37 W. R. 341, 40 Ch. D. 536. If, in the winding up of a company, an action brought by the liquidator against another person fails, the defendant's costs must be paid out of the assets in priority to the costs of the winding up: In re Home Investment Society, 28 W. R. 576, 14 Ch. D. 167; In re Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan, Ex parte Smith, 16 W. R. 170, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 125. Again, if an action is brought by leave of the court against a company in liquidation, and is successful, the claimant is entitled to have his costs paid in full out of the assets of the company in priority to the costs of the liquidator, though the liquidator had leave to defend: In re Trent and Humber Shipbuilding Co., Bailey and Leetham's case, 17 W. R. 1079, L. R. 8 Eq. 94. In In re Dominion of Canada Plumbago Co., 32 W. R. 425, 27 Ch. D. 33, Pearson, J., whose decision was upheld on appeal, followed In re Home Investment Society, and declined to follow In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. (No. 2), 31 W. R. 671, 23 Ch. D. 511, in which Chitty, J., had taken a somewhat different view. In the present case there was a personal order against the liquidator to pay the costs, though with a right to indemnify himself out of the company's assets. The principle was enunciated by James, V.C., in Bailey and Leetham's case. The Bavarian Co. could not, except as representing Blundell's estate, have sued us. As between two parties, one of whom has been shown to be right and the other wrong, the former ought to have his costs in priority to the latter. The person wrongly attacked ought not to be postponed to the person who has wrongly attacked him. Why should the liquidator be paid his costs of his mistaken application before the present appellants, as the successful party, are paid theirs?

Everitt, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the liquidator.—What the appellants are really asking for is, not subrogation, but direct payment out of the assets in priority to all other claims. The cases cited on behalf of the appellants are all distinguishable, on the ground that in each a winding-up order had been made before the costs were incurred. In In re Home Investment Society the liquidator acted mero motu at his own peril, without the direction of the court. Subrogation would only apply to their right to work out their indemnity. Suppose a trustee had, for the benefit of his estate, done what we did, could his successful antagonist take the whole of a small estate to pay his costs, leaving nothing for the trustee or anyone else? A lien for costs has never been interfered with. An order for payment of costs to a party personally does not take away the solicitor's lien for his costs: Ex parte Bryant, 1 Madd. 49. The appellants elected to look to the company for their costs, and cannot now have them out of the estate. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Ex parte Garland, 10 Ves. 110, and In re Johnson, Shearman v. Robinson, 29 W. R. 168, 15 Ch. D. 548. LOPES, L.J.—You put the appellants to expense by your improper proceeding.] Every step here was taken with the sanction of the court. The principle on which liquidators or trustees in bankruptcy (as held in In re Angerstein, 22 W. R. 581, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 479) are made to pay costs personally is that, where they act without the sanction of the court, the other parties are not to be bound to look only to an insolvent estate for their costs; but that principle does not apply here. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Have executors priority as to costs over persons to whom they have been ordered to pay costs?] If they have done their duty they take priority over everyone else.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—The judge said he would take care, in case there were enough to pay our costs as well as those of the company, that the money went into our pockets before being applied in payment of the creditors generally. The only question was as to priority between us and the company, and surely the better equity is that of the party to whom the other party has been ordered to pay costs.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of North, J. It has been fully argued, but if there were any authorities, bearing directly on the question, I should have liked to consider them before giving judgment. It is conceded, however, on both sides that there is no direct decision on the point raised by the appeal, though several cases have been referred to which show what it would be right to do if it could be done consistently with principle. The judge, in the administration action of Blundell v. Blundell, gave the conduct of that action to the brewery company, which is now unfortunately being wound up. That company made a claim against the solicitors, who are Mr. Hardy's clients, seeking to have a certain sum paid into court to the credit of the action. It is admitted that every step taken by the brewery company in prosecuting that claim was taken with the approval of the judge, and rightly taken, and that is shown by the form of the order giving the company the costs of the proceedings. The proceedings ultimately failed, and the appellants obtained an order against the brewery company for the payment of their costs of those proceedings. The company has, however, gone into liquidation and unfortunately it has no assets, and the question now is whether the appellants are not entitled to be paid those costs out of the assets of Blundell's estate in priority to the costs of the brewery company in this matter, which costs have not yet been paid. There is no question as to the costs of the brewery company incurred in getting in assets of the estate, all those costs having been already paid to them. It is simply this, whether these solicitors are entitled by way of indemnity to be paid these costs out of the estate in priority to the claims of the company.

The order made by the judge, which was, I think, in rather an unusual form, allowed the brewery company to take proceedings in its own name against Messrs. Bower & Cotton in respect of a claim made against them on behalf of the estate. That order had the effect of substituting the brewery company for the executors, and, therefore, as regards this question of indemnity, we must treat the brewery company as standing in the shoes of the executors, with this additional fact, that every step taken by the company in their conduct of this action was approved by the judge.

It was contended that the appellants could not enforce their claim to an indemnity out of the estate, because they elected to take an order simply against the brewery company. But I do not think that fact ought to prevent their enforcing any right of indemnity they might have had against the estate. It was not a case of election at all. A great many of the cases referred to, do show a right of such a nature, and cases were cited where a liquidator who was liable to pay costs, and get them out of the estate, has been held entitled to pay the costs out of the estate directly to the person against whom he has been litigating.

But it is said that it is unreasonable, independently of the question of election, that there should be a claim against the company personally (if I may so describe it), and also a claim by way of indemnity out of the assets of the estate. I think that objection fails, because there are numerous examples of such claims—there is, for instance, the case of executors who are authorized to carry on the trade of their testator, and to apply either the whole or a portion of the estate for that purpose. There the persons dealing with the executors are in no sense creditors of the testator—they are at law creditors of the executors. But it is well established that, although this is so, the persons dealing with the executors, in addition to their right against the executors personally, are entitled to such indemnity as the executors might have against the estate. If the amount of the estate allowed to be employed in the trade is limited, then their claims in respect of the indemnity will be also limited. I only refer to this to show that it is not unreasonable that the appellants in this case should raise a claim against the brewery company, as standing in the shoes of the executors, personally, and also, by way of indemnity, as against Blundell's estate.

There is in this case the difficulty that these solicitors can only claim by getting the benefit of the indemnity to which the company would have been entitled if they had paid these costs, which they have not done.

If the company had paid the costs to the successful litigants, they would have been entitled to indemnity out of the estate in respect of any costs paid by them to the solicitors: but here the company is claiming against this estate in respect of its own costs. Although North, J., does not in so many words decide that the company would be entitled to such an indemnity, yet in my opinion, as they commenced their proceedings under the authority of the court, and every step in those proceedings was taken by the company with the sanction of the court, if they had paid the costs to the appellants, they would have been entitled to say to the court which was administering the estate of the deceased, "Not only ought we to be paid out of the estate the costs incurred by us, but also the costs which have been paid by us to the successful litigants." Then the solicitors who succeeded in the litigation would be entitled to the benefit of the company's right of indemnity. But the costs have not been paid. However, it is no unusual mode of proceeding for the person or estate liable to indemnify another for a payment made by him, to make a payment directly in discharge of the original liability. That is, in fact, generally the best way of getting rid of the liability of indemnity. Therefore I do not think that the non-payment of the costs by the company prevents the solicitors from claiming by way of indemnity.

But the question remains, which of the two would have a prior right to be indemnified from the costs which have been incurred. The order is that the company do pay the costs of Messrs. Bower & Cotton. As between those two parties—the company and Messrs. Bower & Cotton—which is entitled to priority? Surely those to whom the others were ordered to pay costs. As that order against the company stands, not having been questioned within the time allowed, we have to say what is to be done, now that the company is being wound up.

My view of carrying out to a legitimate extent the benefit of indemnity to which the company would have been entitled, and in priority to any claim which the creditors would have against the assets, is to give the solicitors the right to stand in the shoes of the company against those assets. I think, therefore, the order made by North, J., must be reversed, and that there must be a direction that the sum be ordered to be paid to the liquidators of the company must be paid to the appellants here.

It has been suggested that the appellants cannot have any claim against assets of the estate, which ought to go to the payment of creditors. But we really have not got to consider that question, because the question here only arises between the two parties who incurred the costs of the litigation raised against the one by the other of them, which failed, and I myself feel no difficulty at all as regards the priority of the right to indemnity over the right of creditors of the estate.

The court has power to direct what is right to be done in the winding up of estates, and in approving the proceedings taken against the solicitors by the company, it no doubt acted for the best with a view to increasing the assets of the estate.

Unfortunately, the claim made was unsuccessful, but that cannot take away the right to indemnity against costs incurred with the sanction of the judge, and which must, accordingly, be presumed to have been properly incurred, and though the claim failed, I cannot say that it was an unreasonable one.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question we have to decide is how to dispose of a sum of about £170 standing in court to the credit of the action of In re Blundell. All the costs of everybody incurred in producing that fund have been paid long ago, and the estate has been cleared of every liability, and this sum represents the net balance.

The difficulty which arises is attributable to a certain legal proceeding which I will deal with shortly. It was supposed by the persons interested in Blundell's estate that certain gentlemen — Messrs. Bower & Cotton —were indebted to that estate, not legally, in the sense that they could be sued for the debt at common law, but on the ground that there were certain equitable demands upon them arising out of breaches of trust, and that, if proceedings were taken, a sum of £1,100 odd could be got in for the benefit of the estate. The principal creditors of the estate, the brewery company, who had obtained the conduct of the proceedings, accordingly took out a summons with a view to get in this supposed asset, and got the leave of the judge to fight out the question with Messrs. Bower & Cotton. The result was that the summons was dismissed, with costs. The company, however, acted, we are told, with the approval of the court, and nobody suggests that they did anything wrong, and that brings us to the question what is to be done about the costs of that summons. The company, on the one hand, are entitled to be indemnified out of the estate for all the costs properly incurred by them in the proceedings on that summons, and, on the other hand, the solicitors were ordered to be paid their costs by the company. It is to be observed that Messrs. Bower & Cotton have a legal right against the company which could be followed up by fi. fa., or other proceedings. But Messrs. Bower & Cotton say that they have more than that—they say that they are entitled in equity to be paid out of this fund in court. How do they make that out? It appears that their equitable right to stand as creditors of the estate is got at in accordance with the principal on which Ex parte Garland and similar cases were decided, and which were carefully reviewed by Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in In re Johnson. They do not claim to be cestuis que trust of the fund, but they claim to be entitled to be paid out of it through the right of the brewery company to be indemnified out of it for what they pay. There are two claimants, and two only upon this fund, and as between those two one has been ordered to pay the costs of the other. That, to my mind, settles the point of priority. The authorities most closely bearing upon this point are the cases of winding up referred to by Mr. Hardy and Mr. Levett, and taking them as guides and applying the principle of those cases, in good sense and in equity it seems to me that Messrs. Bower & Cotton have priority over the company.

LOPES, L.J.—I have nothing to add. I quite agree with the rest of the court. The principle applicable to the decision is one which was introduced by the Home Investment Co.'s case and the series of cases ending with the Dominion of Canada Plumbago Co.'s case.

Ex parte MEXICAN SANTA BARBARA MINING CO. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Secured creditor—Obligation to give up security — Company — Lien on shares of debtor— Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 6, 168.

A debtor against whom a bankruptcy petition had been presented by a company had previously obtained judgment against a registered shareholder of the company, under which the defendant shareholder had been declared to be a trustee of some of the shares standing in his name in favour of the debtor. The articles of association of the company provided that the company should "have a first and paramount lien on all shares for all moneys due to the company from the registered holder thereof, or other the persons for the time being entitled thereto as against the company." The registrar dismissed the petition, on the ground that the company declined to declare that they held any security for their debt from the debtor.

Held (reversing the registrar's decision), that, as the company were not bound to recognize trusts of their shares, the debtor was not "a person entitled to the shares as against the company," and, therefore, that they were not "secured creditors" of the debtor within the meaning of sections 16 and 168 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, since they had no lien upon the shares registered in the name of a person declared to be a trustee for the debtor.

Appeal from Mr. Registrar Giffard dismissing a petition in bankruptcy presented by the company against Perkins.

In 1889 the debtor Perkins had commenced an action against one J. M. Dickey and the company, claiming from Dickey certain shares and debentures of the company, of which Dickey was the registered owner. Judgment was given on the 8th of April, 1889, in the action, by which Dickey was declared "trustee in stock or shares for three-fifths of the agreed partnership share of profits of which Dickey was entitled to one-fifth," and it was adjudged that the present debtor, as plaintiff in that action, should "recover against the defendant Dickey shares and debentures in the Mexican Santa Barbara Mining Co., amounting to £23,408, and costs to be taxed," but the action as against the company was dismissed with costs. These latter costs, taxed at £129 3s. 9d., were the debt on which the company founded the present bankruptcy petition. Dickey had in May, 1888, executed transfers to other persons of all the shares standing in his name, but the company had refused to register these transfers on the ground that Dickey was indebted to them, and took their stand upon the following articles of association:—

"16. The board may, without assigning any reason, decline to register any transfer of shares made by a member who is indebted to them, or, so long as the amount of the shares has not been fully called up, to a person not approved by them."

"20. The company shall have a first and paramount lien on all shares and on the dividends thereon for all moneys due to and liabilities subsisting with the company from or on the part of the registered holder or holders thereof or other the person for the time being entitled thereto as against the company, either alone or jointly with any other person or persons, including calls for which resolutions shall have been passed by the board, but which may not have become due and payable, and may enforce such lien by forfeiture and sale of the shares on which such lien may attach."

The registrar held that, by reason of the lien which the company had on the shares as against Dickey, they were "secured creditors" within the meaning of sections 16 and 138 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and as such must amend their petition by stating that they held security which they were willing to give up for the benefit of the creditors of the debtor, or to put a value on. This the company declined to do, and the registrar thereupon dismissed their petition.

The company now appealed.

Barnes, Q.C., and Yate-Lee, for the appellants.—The debtor is not, within the meaning of clause 20 of the articles of association, "a person entitled to the shares as against the company," because Dickey is the only legal owner of the shares known to the company, therefore the company are not "secured creditors" of the debtor within section 6 (1) and section 168 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The company cannot take cognizance of the debtor's rights against Dickey. Secondly, there are no shares on which the judgment in favour of the debtor against Dickey can take effect, because Dickey had, previous to the judgment, executed transfers of all the shares standing in his name to third persons.

Poley, for the respondent.—Dickey has been declared a trustee of the shares of which the respondent debtor is in equity the owner. Therefore the company have a lien on his equitable interest in those shares, and are secured creditors within the Act; and they ought to have declared, under section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, that they held such security, and were willing to give it up or have it valued. The transfers by Dickey, not having been registered, do not defeat the equitable title of the debtor to these shares: Roots v. Williamson, 36 W. R. 758, 38 Ch. D. 485.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is a bankruptcy petition presented by the Santa Barbara Co. against the debtor, and it is founded upon a judgment debt of £129. In their petition the company stated that they held no security for their debts upon the debtor's estate, and the answer was that they were really secured creditors of the debtor, because he was the cestui que trust of certain shares in the company which stood in the name of one Dickey, and that, as between himself and Dickey, the debtor had a right to a transfer of these shares. If the shares were transferred to him they would greatly overtop the debt which he owed to the company, and by their articles of association the company were entitled to a lien upon shares in respect of a debt due to them from the shareholder. This was the ground, as I understand it, upon which the registrar refused to make a receiving order. I am unable to agree with the registrar's view upon two grounds. In the first place, it seems to me extremely important not to throw any doubt on the principle that companies have nothing whatever to do with the relations between trustees and cestuis que trusts in respect of the shares of companies. If a trustee is on the company's register as the holder of shares, the relations which he may have with some other person in respect of the shares are matters with which the company have nothing whatever to do; they can look only to the man whose name is upon the register. It seems to me that if we were to throw any doubt upon that rule we should make the carrying on of their business by joint-stock companies a very serious question, and the ultimate result would be anything but beneficial to the holders of shares in such companies themselves. I think, therefore, that, although there may have been transactions which, if they were settled as between Dickey and his cestui que trust Perkins, would give the latter rights as against the company, yet, till those transactions have been settled, and as long as Dickey and Perkins remain in the situation of trustee and cestui que trust, those transactions cannot be treated by the court as creating any relation between the company and the debtor which the company were bound to regard. The second ground arises, as I think the Master of the Rolls has already pointed out, on the very words of section 168 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. If the company have any security at all it is a lien upon the shares held by Dickey, and section 168 says that "secured creditor means a person holding a mortgage, charge, or lien on the property of the debtor, or any part thereof, as a security for a debt due to him from the debtor." Here the lien of the company, which is their only security, is upon the shares standing in the name of Dickey, and it is sought to make that lien a security for a debt to the company, not from Dickey, but from the debtor. Now, the shares are not, so far only as the company can regard them, the property of the debtor, and they cannot therefore be security for a debt due from him to the company. They may be security for a debt due to the company from Dickey, but with that security we have nothing to do now. It seems to me, therefore, that the registrar was wrong in refusing to make a receiving order, and on those two short grounds his judgment must be reversed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The company presented a bankruptcy petition against the debtor on the ground that he owed them a debt of £129 which he had neglected to pay. His answer to the petition is, "It has been decided by a court of competent jurisdiction that I am in equity entitled to a certain number of shares in the company, the value of which greatly overtops the company's claim for £129. It has been declared by that court that I am the cestui que trust of those shares, and that Dickey is a bare trustee of them to me." In answer to that the company says, first, "You may be the cestui que trust of those shares; a court of competent jurisdiction may have declared that you are, but we know nothing about you. We are legally entitled to take no notice of you, and we have a right to treat you as if you were a cestui que trust, and, although you may have a right which in some way or other you can enforce to become a shareholder in the company to the extent of £23,000, we are entitled to make you a bankrupt if you do not pay the £129." In the second place the company says, "Dickey, who is said to be your trustee, owes us money, and therefore we have a lien on our shares which stand in his name, and we insist on that lien." The debtor replies, "If you have a lien on the shares as against Dickey you are secured creditors, and you must either value your security or give it up for the benefit of the creditors." To this the company answer, "That lien does not make us secured creditors of you, Perkins, within the meaning of section 168 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883."

With regard to the first point, I confess I have a great desire to overrule it, if I could, because to say to a man, "We admit that you are a cestui que trust of the shares; we admit the man in whose name they stand is a bare trustee for you; we admit, therefore, that you must ultimately be entitled to shares in our company to a large amount; nevertheless, we have a right to make you a bankrupt for a smaller sum," does seem to me a very wrong thing. But it is said that the company have a legal right to do this, because it is necessary for the protection of companies that they should not be bound to recognize trusts affecting their shares. So far as I understand the law now that I have considered it, it does give the company power to do this. Therefore the first ground of objection to the bankruptcy petition fails, because the first step which the debtor must take is to show that he is a cestui que trust of shares. The law has given the company the right to say, "We do not care whether you are a cestui que trust of shares or not; if you are we have the right to take no notice of you." I agree that that is the law, though I think it is hard law; but we have nothing to do with the question of hardship.

Then comes the other question, which was the ground of the judgment of the registrar. I doubt whether the first point was really argued before him; at any rate, it was not the point upon which he based his judgment. He held that the company had a lien as against Dickey upon the shares which stood in his name. In virtue of that lien the company declined to consider the claim of the debtor upon the shares. If the matter had stood upon the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 I should have been very much inclined to say that that lien was a security in the hands of the company against any claim which the debtor might have upon them, and to hold that they were creditors holding security for their debt. I should have been inclined to say that they had a security in fact and in law. But then the Act of 1869 has been altered by the Act of 1883, and some effect must be given to the alteration. The alteration is in the definition of a secured creditor contained in the Act. Section 168 defines a secured creditor as meaning "a person holding a mortgage, charge, or lien on the property of the debtor or any part thereof as a security for a debt due to him from the debtor." The words

"from the debtor" have been added to the definition contained in section 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. We must give effect to those words. The question here is not whether this lien is a security to the company as against Dickey, but whether it is a security for a debt due to the company from the debtor? I think it cannot in fairness be said to be a lien in respect of a debt due to the company from the debtor, and therefore, although in one sense it is a security in their hands, it is not such a security as makes them secured creditors of the debtor within the meaning of the Act. This new definition shuts that lien out. Therefore, although I agree with the registrar that the company had a lien, I cannot agree that that lien, which was a lien against Dickey, was such a lien as made them "secured creditors" of the debtor, for the lien as against Dickey was not a security for a debt due to them from the debtor. I think, therefore, that we ought to disagree with the registrar's decision, and to hold that a receiving order must be made.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The debtor owed the company £129 upon a judgment. Dickey was a shareholder in the company, and he had been declared by a competent court to be a trustee of some of those shares for the debtor. It is said that, under these circumstances, the company have a lien on the shares for the £129 which is due to them from the debtor. Reliance is placed upon the 20th clause of the company's articles of association, which provides that "the company shall have a first and paramount lien on all shares and on the dividends thereon for all moneys due to and liabilities subsisting with the company from or on the part of the registered holder or holders thereof, or other the person for the time being entitled thereto, as against the company." It must be, and indeed is, conceded that the debtor is not the registered holder of these shares.

The only question, therefore, is, was he "a person for the time being entitled thereto" as against the company? In my opinion he was not. The policy of the Companies Act, as has been already pointed out by the Lord Chief Justice, is to free companies from any obligation to take notice of trusts. As against Dickey, no doubt the debtor was the person entitled to the shares, but as against the company, Dickey, and not the debtor, was the person entitled, because they knew nothing of the litigation between him and Dickey, and the court is not bound to know anything of that litigation, which has been determined as between him and Dickey. It may be said that some meaning must be given to the words "other the person for the time being entitled thereto as against the company." In my opinion these words can be satisfied in other ways. One obvious meaning of the words would include the executors or administrators of a deceased shareholder, or the trustee in bankruptcy of a bankrupt shareholder, or any person who might have obtained a judgment from a court of competent jurisdiction against the company, whether in an action or in proceedings under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, that he was entitled as against the company to be registered as the holder of shares. All those persons would come within the meaning of clause 20. In my judgment the words do not include the cestui que trust of shares, however clear the trust may be, however certain the right of the cestui que trust, because the company are not bound to take notice of trusts.

The present case illustrates, as it seems to me, the expediency of that rule. The position of the debtor as against Dickey is not free from complication. He has obtained a judgment that Dickey is his trustee of certain shares; but the company claim to have a lien on the shares for a very large sum of money as against Dickey. Whether that claim is well or ill-founded I know not. The company have the absolute right, under clause 16 of the articles of association, to refuse to register any transfer of the shares so long as any money is due to them from Dickey, without giving any reason for their refusal. Other persons have lodged transfers of the shares with the company, and insist that those transfers have priority. All these questions have been raised and discussed.

It appears to me, therefore, that the particular circumstances of this case strongly illustrate the expediency of adhering to the general rule which the Lord Chief Justice has stated. But I base my decision on the broad general ground that the debtor is not "a person entitled as against the company" to these shares, and not upon the particular circumstances of the case, although I have used them by way of illustration. I think, therefore, that a receiving order should be made.

Adjourned summons.

This was an originating summons taken out by the executor of the will of Mrs. Elizabeth Parsons, asking for the decision of the court whether one-third of a legacy of £1,600 to which the testatrix was entitled under the will of John Stockley was disposed of by the will of Mrs. Parsons, or belonged to her husband in his marital right.

John Stockley, by his will, left £1,600 to trustees upon trust for his daughter Eliza Bird, remainder to her husband for life, remainder for her children and issue, "and if there should be no child or other issue of my said daughter who shall attain a vested interest in the said trust moneys, funds, and securities, then the same shall be in trust for such person or persons as, at the time of the failure of the preceding trust, would be my next of kin and entitled to my personal estate under the statutes for distribution of the personal estate of intestates if I had then died intestate, and in the proportions in which they would be so entitled."

John Stockley, the testator, died in 1879. Eliza Bird died on the 21st of May, 1886, without leaving any husband or having had any issue.

One of the next of kin of John Stockley, if he had died at the same time as Eliza Bird, was Elizabeth Parsons. She married in 1857, made a will dated in 1887, and died on the 10th of September, 1889, leaving a surviving husband. The plaintiff proved her will.

The question arising for decision on these facts was, whether a contingent title to the legacy in question had accrued to Elizabeth Parsons before the passing of the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882,—in which case the legacy would not be her separate property, and consequently would not pass by her will—or whether her title to the legacy first accrued after the passing of the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, in which case the legacy in question would, by virtue of section 5 of that Act, be her separate property, and would, consequently, pass by her will.

Ingle Joyce, for Mr. Parsons, the husband of the testatrix.—The executors are trustees of the fund for the husband. Mrs. Parsons had a "contingent title" before the commencement of the Act of 1882, and therefore, by section 5, could not dispose thereof by will after the passing of the Act. The real next of kin of the testator, who died in 1879, were, until the death of Miss Bird in 1886, entitled to the fund contingently: Reid v. Reid, 34 W. R. 332, 31 Ch. D. 402; In re Beaupré's Trusts, 21 L. R. Ir. 397. [KAY, J.—I decided Smart v. Tranter as if the lady had no separate estate; in the Court of Appeal it appeared that she died possessed of separate estate of a trifling amount. Upjohn, for the defendants claiming under the will of the testatrix.—Persons who would be presumptive next of kin of John Stockley when the propositus died had no interest before the death of the propositus. Could the defendants have maintained an action before the death of the propositus in order to protect the fund? [KAY, J., referred to Joel v. Mills, 3 K. & J. 458, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 91, 114.] Lord Dursley v. Fitzhardinge, 6 Ves. 251, in which case reference is made to Smith v. Attorney-General, in Chancery, 1777; Clowes v. Hilliard, 25 W. R. 224, 4 Ch. D. 604; Meek v. Kettlewell, 1 Hare, 464, 1 Ph. 342. In section 5 of the Act there are no such words as expectancy or possibility; the word is "title." During the life of the propositus there was no title, but only a possibility. The testatrix, therefore, became entitled to the fund for her separate use after the death of Eliza Bird in 1886, and had power to make a will disposing of it: In re Cuno, Mansfield v. Mansfield, 43 Ch. D. 12.

Ingle Joyce replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2.—KAY, J., delivered the following written judgment:—[After stating the facts above set out, his lordship continued:—] It is indisputable law that no one can have any estate or interest at law or in equity, contingent or other, in the property of a living person to which he hopes to succeed as heir-at-law or next of kin of such living person. During the life of such person no one can have more than a spes successionis or hope of succeeding to his property.

The law is the same when there is a limitation by will or settlement of real or personal property to the heir or statutory next of kin of a living person. During his life no one can say, I have a contingent estate or interest as possible heir or next of kin. Just as in the first case no one can have more than an expectation or hope of being heir or next of kin.

It makes no difference that the limitation is not to the actual heir or next of kin, but to the persons who would be heir or next of kin if the ancestor were to die at some future time. Until that time arrives there is no one who can say he has anything beyond a hope or expectation.

For this reason, in a suit to administer the estate you could not make such possible heir or next of kin a party, nor is there any case in which he has been allowed to sue to protect the estate or has been recognized as having an interest, except that in proceedings in lunacy against the ancestor he is permitted to be before the court. The reason for that is thus stated by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Clarke, Jac. 589:—"The principle which leads the court to call for the next of kin or the heir-at-law of lunatics is to receive from the persons probably entitled that assistance in the protection of the property which persons having such expectant rights will be likely to afford, but the inquiry is not to be considered binding."

The object of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was to benefit women who had married before the passing of the Act by giving them a separate estate in property to which they might become entitled during the coverture after the passing of the Act. It excepts all property their "title to which, whether vested or contingent," accrued before the Act. To give a wide meaning to "contingent title" would narrow the operation of the statute. But, without straining the words in either direction, can a possible next-of-kin of a person who is to be supposed to die at a future time, be said to have a "contingent title," or is it not the proper view that he has no title at all, nothing but an expectation or hope which is not recognized in law as any title?

While the propositus is living, every relative he has in the world is a possible next-of-kin; can each one say that he has a contingent title? He may have sons, brothers, and nephews. Can the nephew (living the sons and brothers) say, "I have a title"? If he cannot, then the brother cannot, nor the son. A spes successionis is not a title to property by English law. Why should this meaning be given to it in the statute in order to deprive a married woman of her right to separate property? I suppose the object of excepting a title accrued before the Act was in order not to take from the husband any advantage which he might then have. Possibly the exception goes further than is necessary for this purpose, but if that is its main object it would be contrary to the spirit of the enactment to construe the words so as to include an expectation of the wife in which the husband could not have any interest.

Now let me see how far this view of the law is supported by authority.

In a note at page 219 of the 8th edition of Watkins on Conveyancing it is said, in effect, that there are two classes of possibilities — namely, possibilities coupled with an interest "such as contingent remainders, executory devises, springing or shifting uses; the other bare or naked possibilities, such as the hope of inheritance entertained by the heir. . . . The former class may, perhaps, with more propriety be denominated contingent interests, and the latter mere expectancies; for a possibility coupled with an interest is more than a possibility, it is a present interest and may be devised: Perry v. Phelips, 17 Ves. 173, 182. On the other hand, the expectancy of an heir apparent, during the lifetime of his ancestor, is less than a possibility, being but a mere hope or anticipation."

The statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 6, makes a possibility coupled with an interest assignable at law, but not a mere possibility.

In Smith v. Attorney-General, cited 6 Ves. 255 and 15 Ves. 133, 136, it was decided that an heir apparent during the life of his ancestor, though the ancestor is a lunatic who cannot recover, could not have a bill to perpetuate testimony in order to prove that he was heir apparent, and could not—as the verus heres might—have the writ de ventre inspiciendo. [His lordship then referred to the case of Lord Dursley v. Fitzhardinge, 6 Ves. 251, and read from the judgment of Lord Eldon, at page 260, the passage commencing "The case of Smith v. The Attorney-General went upon this—that the next of kin of the lunatic had no interest whatever in the property," and ending on page 261 with the words "they could not qualify themselves as to any interest in the subject itself"; and proceeded:—] Nothing can be more clear and emphatic than these words of Lord Eldon, and I know of no case in which the law so laid down has been departed from or doubted.

Then, has an expectant heir or next of kin any greater interest under a limitation to the heir or statutory next of kin of a living person?

In Meek v. Kettlewell it was held that an assignment by deed of a mere possibility was only a contract, and, being voluntary, could not be enforced in equity. The possibility there, was the hope of succession as one of the next of kin of H. M., under a limitation by will in trust for the next of kin according to the statute, in case she left no issue. While H. M. was living, one of her possible next of kin made this assignment. H. M. died without issue, and the suit was instituted after her death to enforce the assignment. Wigram, V.C., said that the assignor "at the time of the assignment had nothing but an expectancy in the fund in question (like that of an heir in the lifetime of the ancestor)," and he dismissed the bill.

This was affirmed by Lord Lyndhurst, who said, "The assignment of an expectancy such as this is cannot be supported unless made for a valuable consideration." That is a direct decision that the expectant next of kin take no greater interest under a limitation to next of kin than they would by the hope of an actual succession.

In Clowes v. Hilliard Sir George Jessel, M.R., had before him a case in which the limitation was identical with that which I have to deal with. A testator had left his residuary estate for the benefit of his three daughters and their issue, with an ultimate gift if all of them died without issue "in trust for such person or persons as would have been entitled to the residue of my trust estate under and according to the Statutes of Distribution in case I had then died intestate." The testator died in 1869. While the daughters were living and unmarried, some of the persons who would be next of kin of the testator, if they had all died unmarried, brought an action for administration of the estate, as possible and presumptive next of kin entitled under the ultimate limitation. A demurrer was allowed on the ground that they had not sufficient interest to maintain the suit. Yet the veriest scintilla of interest will entitle a person to maintain such a suit, as is shown by such cases as Joel v. Mills, and Cosser v. Radford, 1 De G. J. & S. 585. The Master of the Rolls said:—"These plaintiffs, who claim to be some of the testator's possible next of kin, are in the same position as persons claiming to be next of kin of a living person. Ex hypothesi the testator is to live on. Whether, therefore, you attempt to ascertain the next of kin of a living person, or of a person dying at a future period, it is the same thing, there is no difference. You cannot predicate of anyone that he will be a member of the class." Later, he criticizes Roberts v. Roberts, 2 Ph. 534, where Lord Cottenham made a difference between a widow and next of kin; and, noticing Davis v. Angel, 10 W. R. 722, 4 De G. F. & J. 524, he says, "It is a decision that nothing less than an interest will allow a man to maintain a suit."

That decision (Clowes v. Hilliard) follows what was laid down in Meek v. Kettlewell, that possible next of kin have no greater interest during the life of the propositus under a limitation to his statutory next of kin than they would have in property which they hoped to take by succession to him, and shows that the same law applies where a time is fixed for the supposed death of the propositus, not the date of his actual death.

I have referred to this very familiar law, and the authorities upon it, because I am asked to follow a decision of eminent judges in Ireland, which it is said governs the case now before me, In re Beaupré's Trust. The facts in that case were as follows: By marriage settlement, in 1830, £20,000 was settled in trust for the wife for life, then husband for life, then children of wife by any husband, and in default of such children "in trust for such person or persons as, according to the statutes for the distribution of the estates and effects of intestates in Great Britain, would at the time of such failure of issue as aforesaid have been the next of kin of" the wife "if she had departed this life intestate and without having been married." The husband died in 1862, the wife in 1885, without having had issue. One of her next of kin, Lady Nugent, had married in 1860, without settlement, and her husband was adjudicated bankrupt in 1881. The contest was between Lady Nugent and the assignees in bankruptcy of her husband; the question being, whether or not the share which belonged to Lady Nugent had become her separate property under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, or whether her title had accrued before that Act, in which case the share belonged to her husband's assignees. It was decided, first by the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, and on appeal by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, with the concurrence of Fitzgibbon, Barry, and Naish, L.JJ., that Lady Nugent's title had accrued before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and that accordingly she had no separate estate, but that her share of the fund belonged to the assignees in bankruptcy of her husband. The Master of the Rolls said, "Till the class is ascertained it was argued there was no title in anyone, not even a contingent title, within the statute. No authority for this proposition was referred to, which is a startling one, and if it be well founded it would apply to many cases besides the present, cases in which no question of next of kin would arise, such as where property is left to or settled upon the children of A. B. living at a particular time, answering a particular description, or the like, since the class cannot be ascertained till the event happens." He then cites the language of Cotton, L.J., in Reid v. Reid:—"There must be an accruer of title after, and not before, the passing of the Act, and the title must be considered as accruing when the married woman first acquires her interest in the property, whether such interest is at that time in possession, reversion, or remainder." "And, of course, also," the learned Master of the Rolls adds, "whether vested or contingent." The Master of the Rolls then considers whether Lady Nugent had a contingent title to the fund before the Act, the policy of which he states to be, in the case of a previous marriage, to oust the marital right only in respect of property acquired after the Act in such a manner that it could not have been contemplated as part of the consideration of the marriage, or dealt with by husband and wife, or either of them, before the Act. He seems to consider that if the instrument under which the title accrued had been executed after Malin's Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57), Lady Nugent's title would have come within the description in that statute: "Every future or reversionary interest, whether vested or contingent." The Lord Chancellor, on appeal, treats Reid v. Reid as having decided that, if a woman married before the commencement of the Act had before that time acquired a title of any kind to any property, such property is not made her separate property by section 5 of the Act, though it falls into possession after the passing of the Act. His lordship then says:—"The title of the next of kin, under the settlement of the 4th of June, 1830, was a title in contingency and in remainder; their right to a contingent interest was hardly disputed"; and later on, after dealing with the maxim Nemo est heres viventis, he says:—"The settlement of the 4th of June, 1830, created a contingent limitation in favour of a class of persons who are of kin to the tenant for life and capable of being ascertained. In my opinion they had a right contingent on their surviving the tenant for life under the marriage settlement, which is the foundation of their title." Fitzgibbon, L.J., concurs in the conclusion, "though not without doubt." Lady Nugent, he says, "could have parted with her title by assignment, or dealt with it as she pleased, as an existing and accrued title, though contingent as to its actual enjoyment; her title deed is now the settlement of 1830." The word "title" in section 5 he treats as including "every kind of property"; and he concludes by saying that Lady Nugent's title "accrued when the settlement was executed." Barry, L.J., agrees, and Naish, L.J., also, the latter saying:—"It appears to me as much a contingent title as if the limitation had been to such of the nephews and nieces of Sophia Southwell as shall be living at her death."

If this were an English authority I could do nothing but follow it; but decisions of the Irish courts, though entitled to the highest respect, are not binding on English judges. If, therefore, I cannot agree, I am bound to decide according to my own judgment.

I confess I am unable to come to any conclusion except one which is contrary to this decision. I cannot help feeling great hesitation in opposing my opinion to that of so many eminent judges; but I must say that, if it were not for this authority, I should have no doubt whatever about the right conclusion according to the English cases I have referred to. After all, the opinion I express is not so much mine as that of the judges who decided those cases.

The point of difference, to state it shortly, is this: Nemo est heres viventis should be construed literally. There is no such character in law as the heir of a living person or as his statutory next of kin. There is a wide difference for this reason between a gift to such of the "children," or "nephews," or even "kindred" of A. who shall be living at his death, and a gift to those who shall then be his statutory next of kin. During A.'s life there may be children, nephews, or kindred. Each of them has probably sufficient interest, though contingent, to take proceedings to protect the fund: see per Lord Hatherley, 3 K. & J. 474. Some or all of them might be made defendants in an action to administer the trust. Neither of these things can be done where the gift is to statutory next of kin. They have no existence whatever in law while the propositus is living. No one can as possible next of kin even bring an action to perpetuate testimony as to his kinship during that period. I am unable to agree with the judgments which consider these cases as parallel.

As I have pointed out, the learned judges in Ireland treat the word "title" in section 5 as equivalent to "interest," citing Cotton, L.J.'s words in Reid v. Reid to the same effect; with this I respectfully agree. One who has no interest whatever in property can hardly be said to have a title. But I have mentioned abundant authority to prove that no one can have any "interest" as heir or next of kin in the ancestor's lifetime. The familiar cases to which I have referred were not quoted, but I cannot suppose that they were not present to the minds of the learned judges whose judgments I have been considering.

In Reid v. Reid the Court of Appeal refused to accept the decisions upon the ordinary covenant in a marriage settlement, to settle other or after-acquired property of the wife, as a guide in determining what should be excluded under the word "title" from the operation of the 5th section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Cotton, L.J., adopted Wickens, V.C.'s remark in In re Clinton, 20 W. R. 326, L. R. 13 Eq. 295, that cases of that class must be approached with the presumption that the object of that covenant was to exclude the husband, whereas the object of the peculiar language of section 5 was to confine its operation to property in which the husband at the commencement of the Act had not any interest. Everyone must, I think, agree in the reasonableness of this view, as it follows that, if under a covenant to settle any property to which the intended wife is "contingently entitled" at the time of the marriage such a possibility as this which I am considering were included, it would not necessarily be within the words "contingent title" in section 5. But, so far as I know, no such possibility has ever been held to be included in such a covenant, and I confess I should have no difficulty in deciding that it could not be. For, suppose the trust to have been declared before the marriage for the statutory next of kin of A., and that A. did not die till after the determination of the coverture by the death of the husband subsequently to the passing of the Act, and that the widow was one of A.'s next of kin under the statute at his death, I should imagine it would be held without hesitation that the intended wife had not at or before the coverture any interest whatever, and, therefore, her husband could have none by reason of the coverture, and consequently the words of such a covenant, though they might include all property to which the intended wife had a contingent title at the date of the settlement, would not comprise such a possibility as this.

In Atcherley v. De Moulin, 2 K. & J. 186, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 134, a marriage settlement contained a covenant to settle, which the court held included all property to which at the date of the settlement the wife was "entitled." At that date the wife was contingently entitled under a bequest to all the daughters of her father living at his death who should attain twenty-one or marry. The father died in 1854. This daughter had married in 1846, and her husband had died in 1851. Lord Hatherley held that "although she had the transmissible contingent interest she had nothing during the marriage which could be called property to which she was entitled." The word "entitled" might be large enough to include a "contingent interest," but, upon regarding the whole of the settlement, he thought in that case it did not.

In Mackenzie's Settlement, 15 W. R. 662, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 345, where the covenant included anything to which the wife was entitled at its date, and she was then entitled in reversion after the death of her mother to a share of Consols, and her mother died during the coverture, Turner, L.J., said, in effect, "that if she was entitled contingently the covenant would reach it" à fortiori, as she had a vested reversionary interest.

This was followed in Cornmell v. Keith, 24 W. R. 633, 3 Ch. D. 767, where the interest was in remainder expectant on the death of the wife without issue. This contingent reversionary interest was bound.

It appears, therefore, that the courts have hesitated to hold the word "entitled" in such a covenant to include a contingent reversionary interest under such a limitation, as "to the children of A. living at his death," though now that would probably be held to be included. But this, so far as I know, is the furthest extent to which the construction of that peculiar covenant has gone.

I am bound to follow the English decisions to which I have referred.

I must hold that the property in this case first accrued, in title and interest, to Elizabeth Parsons on the death of Eliza Bird on the 21st of May, 1886, and that, by section 5 of the Married Women's Property Act, she was entitled to it for her separate use, and that it passed by her will dated in 1887.

MUMFORD v. COLLIER. (a.)

Mortgage—Attornment clause—Validity—Landlord and tenant—Bill of sale—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 6—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 14.

An attornment clause in a mortgage of real property is effectual to create the relation of landlord and tenant between mortgagee and mortgagor, and is not avoided by section 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, except as regards the power of distress which would otherwise be an incident of the tenancy.

Therefore, where, by a mortgage deed, the mortgagor had attorned tenant to the mortgagee at a rent equivalent to the mortgage interest, and that interest was in arrear,

Held, that the mortgagee was entitled to obtain judgment under order 14 in an action for ejectment against the mortgagor.

Appeal from chambers.

By an indenture of mortgage of the 25th of March, 1884, the defendant mortgaged to the plaintiff certain freehold premises, together with the "steam-engines, boilers, fixed and movable machinery, plant, implements, and utensils now in or hereafter to be fixed or placed upon or to be used in or about the said premises," to secure a sum of money and interest. The deed contained a clause in the usual form by which the defendant attorned tenant of the mortgaged premises to the plaintiff at a rent equal to the mortgage interest.

The interest being in arrear the plaintiff commenced this action, the claim indorsed on the writ being for possession of the mortgaged premises "of which premises the defendant was tenant at will to the plaintiff under an indenture of the 25th day of March, 1884, which tenancy was duly determined by notice expiring the 18th day of May, 1890." The defence was, that the attornment clause was void under the Bills of Sale Acts. The master gave judgment for the plaintiff under order 14. The defendant appealed to the judge, who referred the appeal to this court.

Hansell, for the defendants.—An attornment clause in a mortgage deed is a bill of sale within section 6 of the Act of 1878. It is inserted in order to give the mortgagee a power of distress by way of security for the debt, and the rent is made payable as a mode of providing for the interest on the debt. Being a bill of sale it is void altogether for want of registration and for divergence from the form in the schedule to the Act of 1882: see section 9.

He cited In re Willis, Ex parte Kennedy, 36 W. R. 793, 21 Q. B. D. 384; Davies v. Rees, 34 W. R. 573, 17 Q. B. D. 408; Thomas v. Kelly, 37 W. R. 353, 13 App. Cas. 506.

C. C. Scott, for the plaintiff.—The Bills of Sale Acts do not affect real property. The attornment is made a bill of sale by section 6 only with respect to "any personal chattels which may be seized or taken under such power of distress." Except as to the power of distress the bill of sale is good; it may be good in part and bad in part. In re Burdett, Ex parte Byrne, 36 W. R. 345, 20 Q. B. D. 310. In Daubuz v. Lavington, 32 W. R. 772, 13 Q. B. D. 347, it was decided that a mortgagee suing upon his attornment clause was entitled to judgment under order 14.

He also referred to Hall v. Comfort, 35 W. R. 48, 18 Q. B. D. 11.

Hansell replied.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—We have here to contribute a fresh chapter, or rather section, to the already voluminous literature dealing with the Bills of Sale Acts. The precise point which is raised in this case seems one which has not been raised before. In an ordinary deed of mortgage given as a security for money advanced, there is an ordinary clause of attornment creating the mortgagee landlord and the mortgagor tenant; nothing is said about distress or seizure, but of course the ordinary incidents of the relation of landlord and tenant arise, and the landlord has the power to distrain for non-payment of rent. It does not follow that words which, under certain circumstances, would bring the transaction within the mischief of the Bills of Sale Acts are therefore for all purposes void. But it is said that the words of the Act of 1878 have made an attornment clause of this kind void; they have made it, it is said, a bill of sale, and therefore, because it is not registered and is not in the form prescribed by the later Act, this document is void. It is true that if it be a bill of sale it is void. Now it certainly is not within the mischief of the Acts; what the object of this legislation was and what documents come within the mischief of the Acts was clearly pointed out by Lindley, L.J., in In re Willis; and this document does not come within it. It is not within the definition of "bill of sale" in section 4 of the Act of 1878, but it is said that it is within section 6. But what that section enacts is that such a document as is there described "shall be deemed to be a bill of sale . . . of any personal chattels which may be seized or taken under such power of distress." Therefore, granted that the attornment reserves the rent for the purpose of further security, and granted that under it goods are seized, then the attornment shall be deemed to be a bill of sale as to those goods and if not in conformity with the Acts shall be void. But here section 6 has no application whatever and the ordinary relationship of landlord and tenant is created.

Looking at the purposes of the Act it is difficult to understand the proviso to section 6. There have been decisions on it and the courts have said that an attornment clause in a mortgage deed creating the relationship of landlord and tenant is within the mischief of the Acts, but that if the mortgagee enters and then re-demises the property to the mortgagor, that is not within the mischief; once a mortgagee is in possession he is within this proviso and is protected. That is a very fine distinction but it is so decided and there it is: In re Willis. But that has nothing to do with this case, which can be properly decided on the body of the section without reference to the proviso, which does not affect it.

There are no cases which hold in terms that this attornment clause is void. It is said that there are cases which hold it in principle. It is said that as it would be bad as to goods seized under it, it is bad altogether. The answer is clear, and to my mind conclusive. The scope of the Bills of Sale Acts does not include real property; it is directed at ownership of personal property, because a man gets credit as being the owner of personal chattels when they are in reality under the control of some other person. The Acts say that the world shall know the real position of a man who has given to another the control over his personal property. They were never intended to interfere, and do not by their terms interfere, with real property. It is real property which is affected here; therefore I think that the master made the right order, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The argument for the appellant is quite intelligible, and it is this—in no mortgage can an attornment clause any longer be supported, because it comprehends a security over personal chattels, and therefore, being incapable of being framed in the statutory form, is void. That is a very strong proposition, and it is scarcely to be supposed that the Legislature would adopt legislation which would affect nearly every security ever given by words whose meaning was not plain and obvious.

The attornment clause has two parts; it first creates the relationship of landlord and tenant, and then it gives a power of distress as incident thereto. In so far as it creates the relationship of landlord and tenant it relates to real property; in so far as it gives a power of distress over personal chattels it has been held to be a bill of sale, and therefore void. But I cannot think that as creating the relationship of landlord and tenant it is struck at by the Act. Is it within the words of the Act? I think not. [His lordship then read section 6, and continued:—] It is only so far as it creates the right to seize goods that it is to be deemed a bill of sale—not otherwise. I do not know why these words should be thought to go beyond that, and to declare that the attornment clause is to be deemed to be a bill of sale as to the other part of it also. That would be wholly beyond the purview of this legislation. In re Burdett is not decisive of this matter, but it has a considerable bearing upon it. There the security was good as to the gas engine because it did not belong to the class of property to which the Act applies. In this case the same is true of the relationship of landlord and tenant created by the attornment clause; it is not within the Act. I therefore entirely agree with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

Practice—Referee—Motion to set aside findings—Judgment ordered by referee—Judgment entered—Power of court to enter judgment for other party—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, r. 52.

The court has power, in a reference under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, not only to set aside the judgment ordered by an official referee to be entered for one of the parties, although such judgment has been entered accordingly, but also to enter the judgment for the other party instead of sending the case back to the referee to be re-heard.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

Application, on behalf of the defendant, to set aside the finding of an official referee, and the judgment ordered by him to be entered.

This action was for commission and expenses due to the plaintiff as a traveller for the defendant, and it had been referred under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, to an official referee.

The referee found for the plaintiff, and he directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff accordingly.

The defendant appealed to the Divisional Court to set aside the findings of the referee and the judgment ordered by him. The decision of the referee was reversed by the court, and an application was then made on behalf of the defendant that, instead of sending the case back to the referee to be reheard by him, judgment should be entered by the court for the defendant, notwithstanding the judgment ordered by the referee to be entered for the plaintiff.

Houghton, for the defendant.

Channell, Q.C., and Heather, for the plaintiff, contended that under the circumstances, the court had no power to enter judgment for the defendant, but could only send the case back to the official referee to be reheard.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23.—The judgment of the COURT was read by

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—We have already stated that we think that the judgment of the referee is wrong in fact and cannot be supported by the evidence. The question arises as to what judgment we ought to give. Can we order judgment for the defendant, or are we bound to remit the matter for rehearing before the referee, or can the court, if satisfied that it has all the necessary materials before it, not only set aside the judgment ordered by the referee, but also order judgment for the defendant? We think we can. Originally, under the rules of 1875, the referee had no power to enter judgment, and Dyke v. Cannell, 31 W. R. 747, 11 Q. B. D. 180, makes it clear that under ord. 36, r. 34, of the R. S. C., 1875, which is similar to ord. 36, r. 52, of the present rules, the court before judgment has power, on the motion of either party, and not merely in cases where the referee being in doubt has submitted a question to the court, to decide any question referred to the referee on the evidence taken before him. Cave, J., in that case says that the rule authorizes the court to decide the question referred, on the evidence taken before the the referee, either with or without any additional evidence as the court may direct. Now is this power of the court inapplicable in cases where the referee has ordered judgment to be entered under the power conferred on him by rule 50 of order 36?

We think that the rule applies even though judgment has been ordered by the referee to be entered, and has been entered accordingly.

In the first place, it is plain that, although the judgment entered by order of the referee is in form the judgment of the court which ordered the reference, yet the Divisional Court retains control over the judgment. For the motion to set aside the judgment is, in the Queen's Bench Division, to the Divisional Court, and we think that the meaning of this rule is not to limit in any way powers that the Divisional Court previously had under ord. 36, r. 52, but to prevent any doubt which might otherwise have arisen as to the power of the Divisional Court to review that which in form was its own judgment, and to negative the possible supposition, which might otherwise have arisen, that the appeal from the decision of the referee must be to the Court of Appeal.

MAW v. JONES. (a.)

Master and servant—Damages—Wrongful dismissal—Apprentice—Measure of damages.

By a deed of apprenticeship, under which the plaintiff bound himself as an apprentice to the defendants, it was provided that if, during the term of apprenticeship, the plaintiff showed want of interest in his work, it should be lawful for the defendants to cancel the deed upon giving him a week's notice. The plaintiff was dismissed, without notice, on a false charge of misconduct. In an action for wrongful dismissal the judge directed the jury that they were not bound to limit the damages to the value of the week's notice which he had lost.

Held, that, as the defendants had not acted under the clause which empowered them to dismiss on the ground of want of interest, there was no misdirection.

Motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff bound himself as apprentice to the defendants to learn the business of a draper for the term of four years from May, 1887, and the defendants covenanted to instruct the plaintiff and provide him with food and lodging during that term. It was provided by the deed of apprenticeship that if, during the term, the plaintiff showed want of interest in his work it should be lawful for the defendants to cancel the deed upon giving him a week's notice. In October, 1888, the defendants dismissed the plaintiff without notice, assigning misconduct as the ground of dismissal.

The plaintiff brought an action for wrongful dismissal in breach of the apprenticeship deed. The defendants pleaded justification, at the same time paying forty shillings into court, and it was agreed between the parties that the value of a week's notice would not have exceeded this amount. The action was tried before Manisty, J., and a jury. The jury found that the plaintiff had not been guilty of the misconduct imputed, but that the defendants would have been justified in dismissing him with a week's notice on the ground of want of interest in his work. The judge then directed the jury that they were not bound to limit the damages to the value of the week's notice which the plaintiff had lost, although they might take into consideration the fact that the defendants would have been justified in dismissing him with a week's notice. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with £21 damages.

Channell, Q.C., and Wedderburn, for the defendants.—The loss of a week's notice was the only damage sustained by the plaintiff. A servant improperly dismissed without notice can only recover a month's wages: Hartley v. Harman, 11 Ad. & E. 798. Except in the case of breach of promise of marriage, damages for matter of aggravation cannot be given in an action of contract.

McCall and J. F. K. Cleave, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that there was no misdirection in this case. It has been contended that, the deed having provided that the defendants might dismiss the plaintiff at a week's notice if he showed want of interest in his work, and the jury having found that he did show such want of interest, the damages to which he is entitled for wrongful dismissal are ascertained at the value of the week's notice which the defendants omitted to give. If the defendants had dismissed the plaintiff on the ground of such want of interest, intending to act under the clause which empowered them to dismiss him on that ground, the dismissal, apart from the want of notice, would not have been wrongful, and in such case the defendants' contention that the measure of the damages was the value of the week's notice would have been good. But the defendants did not dismiss him on that ground. In this indenture the law implies a condition that the master shall not dismiss the apprentice wrongfully, and here the defendants have done so. Then what is the measure of the damages for the breach of that condition? The plaintiff was entitled to recover for all the damage flowing naturally from the breach, and in considering what that would include, the jury might take into account the difficulty that the plaintiff, as a discharged apprentice, would have in obtaining employment elsewhere. The judge told the jury that, as the defendants had not acted under the notice clause, fair damages for the wrongful dismissal must be given; but, at the same time, he told them that they might take into consideration the fact that the defendants would have been justified in dismissing the plaintiff under the notice clause. In the opinion of the jury, after taking into account that the boy was not an industrious boy, the fair damages were £21. In my judgment the direction was perfectly right and the verdict sensible.

BOOTH v. FERRETT. (a.)

Common lodging house—Unregistered—Charitable institution—Common Lodging Houses Acts, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 25) and 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 41).

A lodging house was established and maintained, not for any primary purpose of gain, but for the accommodation of the poorest class of persons, partly with a charitable and partly with a religious object. It was not open to everybody, but only to such persons and at such times as the proprietor thought fit.

Held, that it was not a "common lodging house" within the meaning of the Common Lodging House Acts, 1851 and 1853.

Case stated by Mr. Lushington, metropolitan police magistrate.

It was proved, and not contested, that the appellant Mr. Booth had in and from October, 1889, opened and kept open a Salvation Army "refuge" at 272, Whitechapel-road, for the reception of male lodgers to sleep in one common room for one or more nights, and to be supplied with food in it, and another common room at an inclusive charge of fourpence per night, for bed, supper, and breakfast. Notice to register the house under the Common Lodging Houses Act, 1851, was given by the Commissioners of Police to the appellant; but in spite of such notice the house remained open and continued unregistered. There was accommodation in the house for 100 men, and as many as 69 were on one night found sleeping in the room. The lodgers were of the class of poor persons who frequent the registered common lodging houses. The sum of fourpence a night was reduced, and even entirely remitted in some cases, at the discretion of the person in charge, who also had the power to refuse admission to those he thought could pay more.

The magistrate held that the house was a common lodging house, and convicted the appellant, but he also found as a fact that the house was established and maintained not for any primary purpose of gain, but for the accommodation of the poorest class of persons only, partly with a charitable and partly with a religious object.

The question for the court was whether, under the circumstances, the house was a common lodging house within the meaning of the Common Lodging Houses Acts, 1851 and 1853.

Willis, Q.C., and Colam, for the appellant.—This is not a common lodging house within the meaning of the Act. The regulations affecting common lodging houses would seriously fetter such institutions as these. The Legislature intended only to deal with lodging houses the keepers of which received all who applied and made a charge.

R. S. Wright, for the respondent.—The magistrate was right. Whether or not a lodging house is a common lodging house is a question of fact for the magistrate to decide. The phrase "common lodging house" is intended to distinguish between a lodging house where all are admitted, and a private lodging house. Upon sanitary considerations it makes no difference whether the object was profitable or charitable.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. In the absence of any definition of "a common lodging house," it is necessary to consider what are "common lodging houses" within the meaning of the Act. It is clear that they are not all odging houses, but only "common lodging houses." It appears to me, looking at the scope and intention of the Act, that such an institution as this—a charitable institution, not carried on for purposes of profit or gain, not open to all comers, but only on such terms and conditions as the managers may direct—is not within these Acts of Parliament, which contain extremely stringent regulations, highly proper for the purposes of the institutions, which appear to be intended, where all persons are received for purposes of gain. Such lodging houses being kept for the purpose of profit, it is reasonable to assume that the keepers, so that they do not violate the law, will endeavour to make as much money as possible, and that, therefore, injury or danger to the public may result from the houses being overcrowded or kept without regard to sanitary conditions; and therefore Parliament established certain regulations highly proper for such houses, which appear to have been intended by the Act. It cannot be said that this institution comes within the notion that anyone would entertain of a "common lodging house." According to ordinary understanding, a lodging house open to all comers, and kept for the purposes of profit, would seem to be the kind of lodging house intended by the Act. A magistrate of intelligence has already held, in the case of a female lodging house, that it does not come within the Act, and there has been no attempt to reverse that decision. It is for those who desire to bring such institutions as these within the Act to show that they come within it. They certainly do not come within my idea of a "common lodging house." On the whole, therefore, I think that this conviction was wrong, and must accordingly be set aside.

On appeal to the county court judge from the rejection by the trustee of three proofs tendered against the bankrupt's estate, three orders were drawn up affirming the trustee's rejection. An appeal was brought from the decision of the county court judge to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy, only one notice of appeal being duly stamped and one deposit lodged on the appeal.

The county court judge has affirmed that rejection and in consequence this appeal is brought. [CAVE, J.—How is it that three appeals are joined together?] The county court judge really pronounced one order, though I admit three orders were drawn up. It is practically the same point which has to be decided in each case. [CAVE, J.—That may be, but in any event you are depriving the Government of certain fees. Here is one notice of appeal which bears a 5s. stamp on it. You are depriving the Government of 10s. in the first place by this course.] The appellants are willing to pay the fees.

E. C. Willis, Q.C., for the trustee in bankruptcy.—Only one deposit has been paid on this appeal. By the course adopted the appellants have got off paying two deposits of £20 each.

CAVE, J.—That cannot be allowed. It looks very much as if what has been done has been tried as an experiment, and, if so, it is one to which the court cannot consent. Practice—Interrogatories—Collision.

Two vessels, The A. and The B., came into collision, and, in consequence of the collision, The A. sunk, and many of those persons on board her who would have been material witnesses on her behalf were drowned. Subsequently the owners of The A. instituted an action of damage against The B., for the recovery of the damages they had sustained, and, before delivering their statement of claim, caused interrogatories to be administered to the owners of The B., interrogating them respecting the circumstances of the collision. The owners of The B. refused to answer certain of such interrogatories, which, if answered, would have supplied the same information as was contained in their preliminary Act.

The court, taking into consideration the difficulty the plaintiffs would have in obtaining evidence in support of their claim if the interrogatories were not fully answered, made an order requiring the owners of The B. to file a further and better answer.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Cleddy against the steamship Isle of Cyprus to recover for the damage sustained by The Cleddy on the 29th of December, 1889, when the two vessels came into collision in the English Channel, and in consequence of the collision The Cleddy sank, and the crew of The Cleddy had to take to their boats, one of which, containing eleven hands, including the watch on deck, capsized and was lost with all hands.

An appearance in the action as defendants was entered on behalf of the owners of The Isle of Cyprus, and leave to interrogate them having been granted, the following interrogatories were, before the delivery of the statement of claim, administered to them on behalf of the plaintiffs:—

1. Is it not the fact that a collision occurred between the steamship Cleddy and the steamship Isle of Cyprus about 0.30 a.m., or at some other, and what, time on the 20th of December, 1889, in the English Channel off the Isle of Wight?

2. Did not the said steamship Isle of Cyprus at the time of the said collision belong to you or some of you? Who were the managing owners of the said steamship?

3. Upon what course or courses was the Isle of Cyprus in the half-an-hour preceding the said collision? If there were any changes of course during that period, what were such changes, and at what time or times did such changes respectively take place? If more than one change, what were such changes respectively, and how long before the collision did such changes respectively take place?

4. Was not one, and which, of the mates of The Isle of Cyprus in charge of the watch at the time of, and for some and what time, before the collision? What number of hands had he on deck in his said watch, and where were they stationed respectively?

5. Was not the master of The Isle of Cyprus below until shortly before the said collision? How long before the said collision did he come on deck? What called his attention and brought him on deck? How long after he got on deck did the said collision occur? How far from The Isle of Cyprus was The Cleddy when he got on deck, and how did The Cleddy then bear from The Isle of Cyprus? How was the helm of The Isle of Cyprus, and how was the telegraph pointer standing; at what speed were her engines working when he got on deck? What orders did he give to the helm and engines after he so got on deck?

6. Was the helm of The Isle of Cyprus altered in any way, and what way, and by whose and what orders, after The Cleddy's lights were sighted, and before the said master came on deck. If so altered, once or more than once, how was The Isle of Cyprus heading by compass immediately before such alteration, or each of such alterations respectively, and to what extent did the heading of The Isle of Cyprus alter under each of such alterations of her helm? State how The Cleddy bore from The Isle of Cyprus just before each of such alterations. What light or lights of The Cleddy were seen from The Isle of Cyprus whilst the latter was on the said courses, and each of them? When, and at what distance, did such lights, and each of them, come into view?

7. How was The Isle of Cyprus heading by compass at the time of the said collision? About how far from the stern was The Cleddy struck?

8. How were the engines of The Isle of Cyprus working at the time of the said collision—ahead or astern, and, if astern, how many revolutions had they made astern before the collision from the last order astern?

9. What was the bearing and distance of St. Catherine's Light at the time of the collision?

10. After the said collision did The Isle of Cyprus make any water, and, if so, how much, and where? How long did The Isle of Cyprus remain near the place of collision? Were any boats of The Isle of Cyprus put into the water to go to the assistance of The Cleddy, and, if not, why not? How soon after the said collision was The Cleddy, or the lights of The Cleddy, lost sight of by those on board The Isle of Cyprus?

The defendants are required to answer all and each of the above interrogatories, and, so far as the matters interrogated to are not within their personal knowledge, to inquire of their agents or servants, and to answer according to the best of their knowledge and belief upon the information acquired by such inquiries.

The four first of the above interrogatories were answered by one of the defendants, but in regard to the remaining interrogatories, the same defendant deposed in his affidavit in answer as follows:—I object to answer the remaining interrogatories, upon the grounds that the matters inquired into are not sufficiently material at the present stage of the proceedings; that the said interrogatories are exhibited unreasonably and vexatiously; and that they are oppressive and unnecessary, and are an attempt to obtain that part of the defendants' case which the defendants only know from information or documents which are privileged.

The plaintiffs now moved the judge in court for an order directing that the defendants should file further and better answers to the plaintiffs' interrogatories.

Barnes, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The information which the plaintiffs will obtain from the interrogatories being fully answered will be most material to them, and necessary at this stage of the suit owing to so many of the crew of The Cleddy, who otherwise would have given evidence in support of the plaintiffs' claim, having lost their lives. Moreover, interrogatories similar to those in the present case were held admissible in the case of The Radnorshire, 5 P. D. 172, 29 W. R. Dig. 73, where an attempt was made to set them aside on the ground that they were exhibited unreasonably and vexatiously.

Raikes, for the defendants.—The practice of not in any case permitting interrogatories to be administered in collision suits when the information sought to be obtained is substantially the same as will be disclosed in the preliminary acts, was laid down in The Biela, 24 W. R. 524, and though modified to some extent since the case of The Radnorshire, so far as to allow of the exhibition of interrogatories in cases where there are special reasons for such a course, is still applicable in ordinary cases like the present.

BUTT, J.—These interrogatories must be answered. It is not usually the practice in damage suits in the Admiralty Division to give in the affidavit in answer, information which is to be found in the preliminary acts, but the plaintiffs desire to have the answers of the defendants on oath, and I think that in this case, having regard to the special circumstances that so many of the plaintiffs' crew, who otherwise would in all probability have been witnesses for the plaintiffs, have been drowned, the interrogatories left unanswered must be answered fully.

In re JODRELL.

JODRELL v. SEALE. (a.)

Will—Construction—Bequests to persons named for life and then to their children—Children of illegitimate relatives described as testator's "cousins"—Residuary gift to "relatives hereinbefore named" who were entitled to vested transmissible interests.

A testator, after giving legacies upon trust for several persons, each of whom he described as his "cousin," for life, and afterwards for their respective children, and giving legacies direct to two of his cousins, J. and H., and to three of his nieces, directed the residue of his estate to be equally divided amongst such of "my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained" should become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of his property. One of the cousins, J., predeceased the testator, and the testator subsequently revoked by codicil the legacies to the three nieces. Some of the persons described as "cousins," to whom legacies had been left on trust for life were not legally cousins, being descended from illegitimate children of the testator's grandmother. H. was the only legitimate relative mentioned nominatim in the will who took a vested transmissible interest under it.

Held, reversing the decision of Stirling, J., (ante, p. 267), that "relatives hereinbefore named" included persons whom the testator had himself mentioned in his will, and described as the children of his "cousins," whether such cousins were in fact cousins in the strict legal sense or not, and although he had not mentioned such children in his will by any of their names, and that such children were accordingly entitled to participate in the residue as well as H.

Appeal from the decision of Stirling, J., reported ante, p. 267).

The Rev. Sir E. R. Jodrell, by his will dated March 28, 1868, appointed executors, and gave specific bequests to his wife and to his cousins, Richard Jennings and the Rev. Charles P. P. Jodrell by name.

Then, after giving his general, real, and personal estate to his executors upon trust, after payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, for the benefit of his wife during her life, and after her death for sale and conversion, and upon trust out of the proceeds thereof to set apart and pay the legacies specified in the ensuing part of his will, with a direction to marshal in favour of charities, he gave a number of bequests as follows:—

(1) To such one or more of the children of "my late cousin, Major Edward Jodrell, other than his eldest son," as should be living at the death of the testator's wife, and should attain twenty-one; (2) in favour of the children of "my cousin, the Rev. Henry Jodrell," other than his eldest daughter, who should be living at his wife's death and attain twenty-one; (3) in favour of "my cousin, Mary Bishop," for life, and after her death for her children surviving her and his wife, and attaining twenty-one; (4) in favour of "my said cousin, Richard Jennings," and his wife during their lives, and after the death of the survivor for their children surviving them and his wife, and attaining twenty-one; (5) in favour of "my cousin, Louisa Buller," for her life, and after her death for Charles Seale Hayne, if he should survive her and the testator's wife; (6) in trust for "my niece, Emily Higgins," if she should survive his wife and attain twenty-one; (7) in favour of "my two nieces, Mary Champagné and Blanche Champagné," if they should respectively survive his wife and attain twenty-one; (8) upon trust for "my cousin, Major George King," for life, and after his death for his children who should survive him and the testator's wife and attain twenty-one; (9) upon trust for "my cousin, Georgiana Forde," for life, and after her death for such of her children as should survive her and his wife and attain twenty-one; (10) upon trust for "my cousin, Emily McDonnell," for life, and after her death for such of her children as should survive her and his wife and attain twenty-one.

The 37th clause of the will was as follows:—"As to all the residue and remainder of my real and personal estate not hereby effectually disposed of, I direct the same to be equally divided amongst such of my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained shall become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of my property, and as to such of them as are females for their separate use respectively, and without power of anticipation."

By a first codicil dated March 11, 1871, to his will, the testator revoked the bequest in favour of his nieces Mary and Blanche Champagné. By a fifth codicil dated July 26, 1882, he appointed Alfred Jodrell and R. E. Jennings executors of his will, revoked the bequest to his niece, Emily Higgins, and directed that it should fall into his residue, and declared that none of those three nieces should participate in the division of his residuary estate.

The testator died on November 12, 1882, and his widow on March 1, 1888, and an originating summons having been then taken out to ascertain who were the persons entitled to the testator's residuary estate, an inquiry was directed as to which of the persons named in the first thirty-six clauses of the will were his relations.

The chief clerk certified that Charles Seale Hayne was the testator's first cousin once removed; that Louisa Buller and Charles P. P. Jodrell both died in the testator's lifetime; that Major George King, Georgiana Forde, and Emily McDonnell (who were all dead) were descended from illegitimate children of the testator's grandmother; and that the other persons named in the will as cousins were so in the strict sense.

Stirling, J., held (1) that "transmissible" meant "capable of transmission" after death, and that, consequently, persons having only life interests were not entitled to participate in the residue; and (2) that "relatives hereinbefore named" meant only legitimate relatives hereinbefore mentioned by name.

From the latter part of that decision four sets of persons interested in divers of the aforesaid bequests appealed.

Romer, Q.C., Moulton, Q.C., and W. B. Trevelyan, for some of the appellants.

Vaughan Hawkins and Swinfen Eady, for other appellants.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Rashleigh, for other appellants.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Hadley, for other appellants, one of whom, though born at the date of death of testator's widow, had not attained twenty-one.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I am called upon to express an opinion on what is the meaning of this written instrument, and I repudiate entirely for myself the notion of laying down any canon of construction which is to extend beyond the particular instrument that I am called upon to interpret. I do not know what the testator meant except by the words he has used. I do not know that the law is intended to afford any presumption whether the testator intends to benefit those who are related to himself in the strict sense, or related to his wife. I do not know that the law presumes that he means to make a provision for those in respect of whom it may be said they are connected by blood, although not in every link of the pedigree by wedlock. The law makes no presumption, I believe, upon the subject, and it would be very strange if it did, because the law will allow a testator, if he chooses to do so in express terms, to make bequests to his wife's relations or to persons who are not his legitimate descendants, and, inasmuch as the law permits both these things to be done expressly, I myself am wholly unable to understand in what way a court of construction is called upon to put particular interpretations upon particular words with reference to any supposed presumption that the law makes either way. For myself I am prepared to look at the instrument such as it is, to see the language that is used in it, to look at the whole of the document, and not at part of it only, and, having looked at the whole of the document, to see (if I can) through the instrument what was the mind of the testator. Those are general principles for the construction of all instruments, and to that extent it may be said that they are canons of construction. But the moment I depart from those general canons of construction applicable to all instruments, and am overwhelmed with authorities about what particular judges have thought about other particular instruments, and whether in this or that particular instrument the judge has been sufficiently satisfied that such and such was the meaning of the testator, I confess myself to be in a hopeless state of confusion. In the first place I do not know what mental thermometer there is to ascertain what exact degree of certainty is to be obtained. If the thing is sufficient to establish the meaning, why it is sufficient. And what does that mean? Why, sufficient in the mind of the particular tribunal that has to decide. That there are particular phrases and particular sets of phrases to which the law would attach a particular meaning is true, and when those words are found in an instrument, unqualified and unexplained by anything else, then you must give to those words or to those phrases the meaning which the law has attached to them. And it would be unreasonable if you did not, because you must suppose, in the absence of any other explanation, that the person who has used those phrases or used the particular word, has used the phrase or the word in the sense which has hitherto been attached to it by the law, and there is no reason to go out of what you might call the ordinary and primâ facie meaning of such an expression.

But now I come to construe the particular instrument, and I do not desire to express my meaning otherwise than in the language of Lord Cairns, who says very truly, I think (in Hill v. Crook), "If you find that that is the nomenclature used by the testator, taking his will as the dictionary from which you are to find the meaning of the terms he has used, that is all which the law, as I understand the cases, requires." It seems to me that that is a very simple test, and adding only to that the circumstances of the case with which the testator was dealing, in order that you may put yourself as much as you can into the position, and thus dive into the mind of the person who has made the instrument which you are endeavouring to construe, it appears to me you have all the legitimate materials from which you can deduce what was the meaning of the testator.

Now, applying those general observations which are applicable to the interpretation of all instruments, I find that the testator has described a number of persons as his cousins. I do not think the particular word which we have here to construe, the word "relative" occurs in any other earlier part of the instrument than in that residuary clause which we are called upon to construe, and when we do come to the word "relative" in the 37th clause, we must find out what the testator has meant by the word "relative."

Now the first observation that strikes one, is that he has described according to the statement in the residuary gift (I use for the moment the word "described" leaving out for the moment the word "named," which requires separate treatment)—he has described as "relatives" a number of persons in respect of whom his view is that by the provisions that he has made some of them may become entitled to a "vested transmissible interest" in some part of his property "by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained." I find, therefore, that that is the first guide to the interpretation which I am called upon to make, and I find, therefore, that the word "relative" is used as a general word applicable to some of the persons whom he has "hereinbefore" described.

Now with reference to Major King, Georgiana Forde, and to Emily McDonnell the observation applies. I take those as examples, though I believe there are more—those are persons who are not cousins in the strict sense which is insisted on by the other side. They are persons, all three of them, with respect to whom the bar sinister would prevent the actual application in strictness of that language. Then did he mean that they were to be persons who were to come within that other description—that they were persons who might become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of his property? With respect to Major King the provision is that after the death there should be a trust for one or more of his children who shall survive him and the testator's wife and shall have attained or shall attain the age of twenty-one years. And I think that formula is repeated with respect to each of them. Did he mean those persons? Did he mean those persons when he spoke of his "relatives"? I confess for myself I cannot entertain the smallest doubt that they were in his mind as "relatives." The whole framework of the will, looking at it (I say nothing for the moment about the codicil), seems to me to point in that direction, and that direction only, and, without repeating the same class of observations, I may say the same about that person who is described as his niece. He has, therefore, to use the language of Lord Cairns, given me a dictionary whereby I find that his wife's relative, the niece, and his illegitimate cousins, are his relatives. Under those circumstances, I am in a position to construe what he meant when I refer to the 37th clause and find that he says that he directs his real and personal estate not effectually disposed of "to be equally divided amongst such of my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained shall become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of my property, and as to such of them as are females for their separate use respectively, and without power of anticipation."

Now, so far I have been able to explain satisfactorily to my own mind what he meant, and the Miss Champagné's being referred to in the 10th clause of the 5th codicil, to which I will refer for another purpose presently, seems to me to raise no question of doubt at all.

Now (having satisfied myself that he used the word "relatives" in the extended sense to include the wife's relation and those who are related in the way I have pointed out) the next question that is raised is, whether it was only those persons whose Christian and surname was inserted that he referred to, and that depends upon the true construction to be given to the word "named" —"hereinbefore named." I confess that I have been a little puzzled to know in what way this will was to be construed if that strict construction of that word "named" was to be given. Remembering that the will and the codicil are to be read together, I really do not know in what way more than one of the provisions of this will could be given effect to. But when I come to see what the effect of the opposite construction is, and I find that the 37th clause of the will contemplates the division "equally amongst such of my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the trusts and provisions" and so forth, and I find that at the date of the codicil there was only one person who had satisfied the description (putting the limitation upon the language used by the testator that is insisted upon on the other side), it seems to me that not only must one assume the testator not to have known the meaning of the particular words that he was employing, but that, while assuming he did know, as he must have known, the position of his family, he was reiterating the statement that the residuary estate was to be divided with all this particularity among such of his "relatives hereinbefore named" and so on, at a time when he must perfectly well have known that there was but one single person who could have satisfied that description.

Now, is it reasonable in construing the whole of an instrument and looking to the mind of the testator at that time, and assuming him to be aware of the meaning which he had himself previously attached to the language which he had used, and to the fact that he contemplated at that time a division, and a proportionate division which was impossible in the events that had happened, to give such a construction to this instrument as, it appears to me, if I were to give it, would completely frustrate the intentions of the testator as exhibited by the language which he himself had used, and, by reason of some supposed overwhelming necessity, to attach a peculiar technical meaning to words which it is not denied under some circumstances, and with a sufficient context, may bear a meaning which will give full effect to every part of the testator's complete testamentary disposition? Under those circumstances, I cannot entertain a doubt that I am unable to follow the decision of the learned judge below. I think that the decision was erroneous, and must be reversed.

With reference to that very small point that was last argued before us, I can only say that I should have been very sorry to suppose that some technical rule which the learned judges have adopted for the convenience of administration could be supposed to overrule a testator's intentions. If I ascertain what the intention of the testator is, I am bound to follow it, and I can only understand the language of the learned judges by introducing words which are not in the judgment quoted to us, certainly—that one must artificially suppose that the testator remembers what a very inconvenient thing it would be to keep a class open, and that therefore you cannot attribute to him the intention which nevertheless some of the learned judges say he obviously had. That is a feat in logic which I have a little difficulty in following. It is enough for me to say that I think Mr. Crackanthorpe's answer is complete, and on that point also I think the judgment must be the other way.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This will is long, and is made longer by the addition of five codicils, but if one addresses one's mind to the will for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the testator from the language which he has used in the will and the codicils, it appears to me that the conclusion is not difficult to get at. In truth, in this case, as in so many others, the difficulty arises when you look away from the document which you have to construe—when you look into cases, that is to say, which have been decided on other documents more or less like the one before you. I do not propose to deal with decided cases at all. It may be that there were expressions in those which made the judges come to conclusions which we (or I) cannot arrive at when I come to look at the will and codicils with which I have to deal. I do not consider that a decision which is more or less at variance with other cases is wrong because it is so at variance. Cases of construction are useful when they lay down canons or rules of construction, and they are useful when they put an interpretation on common form—whether deeds, wills, or mercantile documents. They are valuable guides, but when I am told that because something occurs in one will I am to give a precisely similar effect to a similar expression occurring in another will dealing with a different property and in another context, I object altogether to do it. The only principle that I know of is that which has been expressed before. Look at the words; avail yourself of such evidence as is legitimately admissible to see what the testator has said, and expound it as best you can with reference to what is legitimately before you. Now we have got to consider what the real meaning is of the 37th clause of this will. In order to do that one must look far beyond clause 37. You must look at the whole will and all the codicils too, and when you look at the whole will, you see this. First of all the testator gives certain small legacies—some to persons who are relations, some to servants and others who are not relations. Then he creates a trust fund, which consists of the bulk of his property. He vests that in trustees, and he tells the trustees what they are to do. He sub-divides it into sums of considerable amount—£5,000, £5,000, £2,000, and so on; and he gives those sums, or tells the trustees to hold those sums in trust for persons whom he describes as his "cousins," as his "nieces," as "children of his cousins," and "children of his nieces." I do not think any other word of relationship is used.

Then he says, by clause 37, "As to all the residue and remainder of my real and personal estate not hereby effectually disposed of, I direct the same to be equally divided amongst such of my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained shall become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of my property, and as to such of them as are females to their separate use respectively, and without power of anticipation." What does he mean by that? He has not said that the rest of his property is to be equally divided amongst his relatives simply. He has said nothing of the sort. If he had, a difficulty would arise which would be a formidable one, but it is "my relatives hereinbefore named," and I cannot agree at all with the construction, which was put upon this will, giving no meaning to those words "hereinbefore named." On the contrary, those words appear to be the key to the whole thing. When we bear in mind that in point of fact some of the persons called cousins were not cousins (some of them were illegitimate); when we bear in mind that some of the persons he calls "my nieces" were not his nieces (they were his wife's nieces), the importance and the necessity of introducing some such expression as "hereinbefore named" becomes apparent, and it becomes obvious that you cannot, without doing violence to the language, treat those words as superfluous. In other words, you cannot treat the expression "my relatives hereinbefore named" as equivalent to "my relatives." You must look at whom he has heretofore named as relatives. Now he has referred to them as relatives in two ways. He has referred to some of them by their names. He has referred to others of them in this way: he has called them children of persons whose names he gives. Are the children of persons, whose names he gives, not "hereinbefore named" within the true meaning of this clause? I cannot come to that conclusion. You may name a class. You may name a person by calling him the son of his father, just as well as by calling him John Thomas; and to say that this expression, "relatives hereinbefore named," excludes all those relatives who are before referred to as children of persons named, would lead to a conclusion which I will show presently appears to me to be entirely contrary to his manifest intention. Now that conclusion is arrived at by looking out of the will into the fifth codicil.

At the date of the fifth codicil, if the construction put upon this will by Stirling, J., is right, the only person who could take the residue was Mr. Charles Seale Hayne. Now, when the testator made his fifth codicil he excluded from the persons amongst whom the residue was to be divided, three persons called "nieces" in his will; and, having excluded those, there is only one, according to Stirling, J., who can take his residue. But by the fifth codicil he confirms his will. What does that mean? It means he repeats at the date of his fifth codicil that his residue is to be divided amongst a class of people. How is that language apt to a state of things where the whole goes to one? There being an alternative construction which will let in a number of people whom he has already called or designated as the children of relatives, and treated as relatives, is it consistent with the language of his fifth codicil, when he again directs his residue to be divided amongst those persons to exclude the whole of them, and to give the whole of the property to one person? That conclusion appears to me to be so startling, and so at variance with what he has said in his fifth codicil, that I unhesitatingly reject it. That leaves us in this position, that he means by the 37th clause of his will to include, and not to exclude, those relatives whom he has named by referring to them as a class, and it appears to me that that is the true view and the true construction of this will. The case does not stop there, because he goes on:—"Such of my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained shall become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of my property." That language is perfectly applicable to these children. They are all described as children who shall attain twenty-one and shall survive his wife (I think that occurs in all). I do not say that that is conclusive, because the same words are applicable to some of the persons named—not as to all, but as to some. Then it goes on: "And as to such of them as are females." Mr. Rigby relies upon the word "are." It seems to me the true answer to that is to be found in the clause. Recollect the clause is a direction to the trustees. It says, in substance, the trustees are to divide the residue "amongst such of my relatives," and so on, "and as to such of them as are females for their separate use." When does that mean? What period does the expression "are" refer to? Does it mean when he makes his will? Obviously not. Does it mean when he dies? No. Does it mean when the division has to be made? It appears to me obviously that it does, and it is not doing violence to the word "are" to say that what he means is that you are to divide my property among certain persons, "and as to such as are females"—that is, those whom you find to be females then. That appears to me, I confess, to be the true construction of this will, and I cannot myself entertain any doubt about it until I confuse myself by looking at other decisions. That I decline to do.

With respect to the point raised by Mr. Cockburn-thorpe, it appears to me that he is right on that—that is to say, that the one child born and in esse at the date of the testator's widow's death, but who had not attained twenty-one, will on attaining twenty-one take a share. I think he is right. Therefore, it seems to me that we should, if the Lord Chancellor and my brother Bowen acquiesce, make a declaration to this effect:—Declare that according to the true interpretation of the testator's will and codicils, the testator's residuary estate has become divisible between such persons and children of persons mentioned or referred to by the testator as were or are referred to by him as his "relatives," and as survive his widow, and as have attained or shall attain twenty-one. Then we must add—"with the exception of the persons expressly excluded by his will." Some are expressly excluded, and, of course, they cannot take.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and should add nothing at all to what has been said by the Lord Chancellor and Lindley, L.J., except that as we are overruling the judgment of a very experienced judge, it is rather more respectful to him that I should add a few words embodying my own judgment; but they will be based exactly upon the lines which have been laid down in the judgments of those members of the court who have preceded me. It seems to me, as it seems to them, that all we have to do is to take the words of the will and the codicil, and to examine them by the light of such evidence as is admissible in these cases, and when we have examined the will and the codicil, by the light of that evidence to arrive at the conclusion as to what the testator's meaning is as expressed by him in his will.

In this particular case the words which we have had to construe in the 37th clause of his will—the words "relatives hereinbefore named"—are words which receive, as it seems to me, a construction partly from the will itself and partly from the fifth codicil, which renders, I think, one and only one interpretation a reasonable one. You cannot put a reasonable interpretation upon the codicil unless you assume that by the words "hereinbefore named" in the will the testator intended, not merely such persons as were named by name, but such of his relatives as he had indicated before in the will as "relatives," and by a term appropriate to such a relationship. And I think it also follows that the term "relatives" must be taken, not in the strict legal sense, not in the sense of those who are connected only with the testator by ties which the law recognizes as legitimate, but all those in the previous part of the will who have been in effect called by him relatives, whether the legitimate tie exists between him and them or whether it does not. We were told that it was the law established by authorities that when the testator had used language in his will which designates the persons who are intended to receive benefits from him by the name of a tie which the law recognizes, that, unless you are driven by absolute stress of necessity, you must not include in the class even such persons as might popularly be included in the tie, unless you can see that the testator in the clearest and in the most unmistakable way has so said. It seems to me that the law as laid down in Hill v. Crook, 22 W. R., p. 140, by Lord Cairns is the true law, and although I do not disguise from myself that many judges from Lord Eldon's time down to the present—judges of the highest authority and of the greatest learning—have used language (so to speak) of warning, and language that amounts to more than Lord Cairns has said—have used language to the effect that you must, in order to include (under the name which the law usually appropriates to a legitimate tie) persons who stand outside that strict line, find a necessary inference or a very clear intention, yet it seems to me that the only effect one can give to such language is to treat it not so much as a canon of construction as by way of a counsel of caution to warn you in dealing with such cases not to give way to guesses or speculation as to the probabilities of an intention, but to act only on such clear evidence as can lead a reasonable man to a distinct conclusion. But I protest that as soon as you see upon the will, read by the light of such extrinsic circumstances as you may survey, what the construction is, and what the true intention expressed by the testator is, then your journey is performed. You require no more counsellors to assist you; and after once arriving at the journey's end to pause in giving effect to the true interpretation of the law, because, forsooth, the language has not been expressed according to some measure or standard of correct expression which is supposed to be imposed by the law out of regard for social or other reasons, appears to me to be using the language of such learned judges, not as laying down canons for construing a will, but as justifications for misconstruing it. As soon as you once arrive at your journey's end you have no more to do than give effect to the true construction as you see it. It seems to me that here the true construction of the will must be, that in the term "relatives hereinbefore named" the testator intended to include all those whom he had before treated as relatives, whether he was correct in law in so treating them or not, and the children of those whom he had referred to in the preceding clauses.

JONES v. WATTS. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Practice—Discovery—Agreement to accept lease—Agreement for right of way—Right to production of freehold title—Right to prove title bad aliunde—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 2—Interpretation Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 21), s. 4.

J. agreed to grant, and W. to accept, a lease of a house and land, which lease was to contain stipulations for the free use by W. of a drive leading to the house over land not belonging to J., but over which he had, as owner in fee of the house, a right of way. W. failing to perform the agreement, and J. having consequently brought an action against him for specific performance, the defendant, by his defence, denied the plaintiff's title to the house and land, and his title or power to grant the right of way, and alleged in general terms that the house and land were subject to restrictive covenants affecting the enjoyment of them, without specifying in any way the nature of the covenants or of the restriction.

The defendant having taken out a summons for production by the plaintiff of certain deeds relating to the land and house, and certain other deeds relating to the right of way, all of which deeds the plaintiff had scheduled to his affidavit of documents in his possession as documents relating only to his freehold title,

Held (affirming the decision of North, J.), that the effect of section 2 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, was to deprive the defendant of the right to the production of the deeds showing the freehold title to the house and land, notwithstanding that, in consequence of the defendant denying the plaintiff's title and failing to perform the agreement, the matter had become a litigious one; but,

Held (reversing the decision of North, J.), that, having regard to section 4 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, the agreement that the defendant should have the free use of the drive during the term of the lease was "a contract to grant a term of years to be derived out of a freehold estate" within the meaning of section 2 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, and therefore, also, "a contract of sale of land" within the Act; and that the deeds relating to the plaintiff's title to the right of way, therefore, stood upon the same footing as regards that section as his deeds relating to the house and land, and the defendant, accordingly, had no right to production of them.

Held, further, that, though there was nothing to prevent the defendant from proving aliunde that the title was bad, and that, if he had raised a definite and specific objection to the title which the court could try he would have had the usual right of a litigant to call for the production of documents material to the issue raised, and which are in the possession of the other party, yet a mere general assertion that the property was subject to restrictive covenants affecting its enjoyment was not sufficiently definite to confer any such right.

Appeal from North, J.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of North, J., for production of certain deeds scheduled to the plaintiffs' affidavit of documents as not privileged, and there was a cross notice of appeal by the defendant as to certain other deeds not included in the order for production.

The application was made in an action for specific performance of an agreement by the defendant to accept a lease agreed to be granted by the plaintiffs.

The statement of claim in the action alleged that Mr. Morgan M. Jones, one of the plaintiffs, was the owner of a piece of land adjoining a residence and property known as "Maindee Hall," in Monmouthshire, and that Mr. Reginald H. Jones, the other plaintiff, was the owner of that residence and property, Maindee Hall; and that prior to the 16th of August, 1888, there had been negotiations between the plaintiffs and the defendant as to letting Maindee Hall, together with the said piece of adjoining land, to the defendant for a term of years. It was further alleged that by various letters which had passed between the parties during the negotiations, it had been mutually agreed by and between the plaintiffs and the defendant that the plaintiffs should grant, and the defendant forthwith accept and execute, a lease of the said piece of land, together with the said Maindee Hall, with the land and premises thereto belonging, for the term of seven years from the 1st of October, 1888, with the option to the defendant to determine such lease at the expiration of the first five years of such time by giving to the plaintiffs, their heirs, &c., twelve calendar months' previous notice in writing, and that possession was to be given on the 1st of December, 1888, and the annual rent was to be £250, to accrue from the time when possession was given and certain stables therein mentioned were completed, and to be payable half-yearly.

The statement of claim went on to allege that "by the same letters it was further mutually agreed by and between the plaintiffs and the defendant that . . .

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

the said lease should contain stipulations for the free use to the defendant of the drive leading to the house, and a stipulation or covenant by the plaintiffs, as regards obstructing branches, to keep the drive in a fit and proper condition"; and it was alleged that the defendant refused to perform his agreement.

The plaintiffs claimed specific performance and damages, or, in the alternative, damages only.

The defendant by his defence denied that he entered into any agreement with the plaintiffs, and, in the alternative, he said that, if there was any agreement, it was not correctly stated in the statement of claim, and the defence went on as follows:—

"9. The plaintiffs have not, nor has either of them, any right or title to, or power to demise the premises comprised in the said alleged agreement, or any of them, and are unable to perform the said alleged agreement on their part, by creating the term therein mentioned. Moreover, the said premises are subject to divers restrictive covenants affecting the use and enjoyment thereof.

"10. The only access to the premises comprised in the said agreement from the high road is over a drive through certain gates standing at the entrance to the drive. It was a term of the said alleged agreement that the plaintiffs should grant to the defendant an easement of the free use of the said drive, and should covenant to keep the said drive in a fit and proper condition, and to clear away all obstructing branches. The said drive and the said gates at the entrance thereof, and the land on which they stand, are not the property of the plaintiffs, who have no right or title thereto or power to demise the same, nor any easement of way or otherwise over the same, nor any right, title, or power to grant any such easement over the same, nor any right or power to keep the drive in a fit or proper condition, or to regulate the same. The plaintiffs are, in fact, unable to give to the defendant a right of access to the house and grounds comprised in the alleged agreement from the public road, or to perform their agreement with respect to the said drive."

The plaintiffs joined issue on paragraphs 9 and 10 of the defence, and also said: "The plaintiffs will also rely on 37 & 38 Vict. c. 78, s. 2, by way of answer to the allegations in the said paragraphs. The plaintiffs have perfect right, title, and power to demise the said premises, and to grant the free use of the drive, and to stipulate or covenant, as regards obstructing branches, to keep the drive in a fit and proper condition."

By an affidavit made in pursuance of an order to make an affidavit of documents in their possession relating to the matters in dispute in the action, the plaintiff M. M. Jones deposed: "I have in my possession or power the documents relating to my freehold title to the property adjoining Maindee Hall. . . . The said documents are set forth in the first schedule hereto"; and the plaintiff R. H. Jones deposed: "I have in my possession or power the documents relating to my freehold title to the Maindee Hall estate. The said documents are set forth in the second schedule hereto"; and both the plaintiffs deposed: "We are advised and believe that all the documents before mentioned respectively relate only to our freehold title to the property out of which the lease, the subject-matter of this action, was to be derived." The plaintiffs objected to produce the documents comprised in the first and second schedule to that affidavit.

The first schedule referred to a "copy deed of covenant relating to tithe, and deeds relating to the freehold title of the plaintiff M. M. Jones, the owner in fee of the piece of land adjoining Maindee Hall."

The second schedule comprised:—

"1. Conveyance in fee, dated the 28th of October, 1873, to William Jones, of the freehold property known as Maindee Hall.

"2. Indenture, dated the 29th of October, 1873, containing a signed and executed covenant by the owner in fee of the soil over which the drive, mentioned in the statement of claim, passes, with and in favour of the said William Jones, his heirs and assigns, and to the effect that the said owner in fee, his heirs and assigns, will at all times thereafter repair and maintain at his and their cost the entrance gates on the Newport and Chepstow road and the said drive, and that the owners or lessees, or other the occupiers, of the said Maindee Hall, and their respective agents and servants, shall at all times thereafter have full and free access for themselves, their horses, carriages, and carts, through the said entrance gates, and along and over the said drive, and all other reasonable use of the same as an approach to the plaintiff's said estate.

"3. Conveyance, dated the 16th of July, 1881, from the said William Jones to the said R. H. Jones of the fee simple of Maindee Hall aforesaid, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, and also with the full benefit and advantage of the covenants and agreements thereto relating contained in the said indenture of the 29th of October, 1873."

The defendant took out a summons for production of the above documents, which was heard before North, J., on the 7th of December, 1889.

North, J., held that the effect of section 2 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, was that the defendant had no right to production of the deeds showing the plaintiffs' title to the freehold property, but that that section did not interfere with his right to production of the deeds showing the title of the plaintiffs to the right of way, the agreement as to that, not being a contract to grant a term of years in the drive, and being quite distinct from the agreement to grant a term of years in the property, and that the plaintiffs must therefore produce the second and third documents comprised in the second schedule to their affidavit.

The plaintiffs appealed from the latter portion of this decision, and the defendant from the earlier portion.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Lush-Wilson, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are the absolute owners of this right of way, as well as of the freehold property agreed to be granted. The agreement is not separable. This right of way would have passed as appurtenant to the property without any express stipulation as to it; Thorpe v. Brumfitt, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 650, 655; Skull v. Glenister, 11 W. R. 368, 16 C. B. N. S. 81. A term of years may be granted in any corporeal or incorporeal thing that lies in livery or grant: Sheppard's Touchstone, p. 268; Bacon's Abridgment, vol. iv., pp. 638-9, Leases (A.). The words of section 2 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874—"Whether derived or to be derived out of a freehold or leasehold estate"—are evidently chosen with care. The plaintiffs had a freehold right or interest, though less than the whole freehold estate, and, therefore, had a right to grant a term of years out of such freehold right or interest: Hawkins v. Shippam, 5 B. & C. 221. If the defendant's contention, that when there is litigation the provisions of section 2 do not apply, but that all parties are in that event entitled to discovery of all relevant documents, is correct, a purchaser need only refuse to complete in order to obtain production of documents contrary to the express words of the Act. It is clear on the authorities that a covenant that a person shall have a right of way amounts to a grant: Com. Dig. (Chimin), vol. iii. p. 58. A right of way is an incorporeal hereditament: 2 Black. Comm., p. 35; and, therefore, unless it be merely for a term of years, is freehold. [LINDLEY, L.J.—13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 4, defines the meaning of "land" in an Act of Parliament as including hereditaments. That seems to justify the assertion that an easement is an interest in land.] The definition in Lord St. Leonards' Act (section 25) makes land include all tenements and hereditaments and any interest in any tenements or hereditaments. The term hereditament includes, not only lands and tenements, but whatsoever may be inherited: 2 Black. Comm., p. 16; 1 Co. Inst. 6.

They also referred to section 13 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the defendant.—The defendant is entitled to the production of all the title deeds on the ground that they are incident to the litigation. The contract contained no stipulation as to title, so that the matter rests entirely on the statute. The question is, What is meant by the expression "calling for the title"? That question involves inquiring what the law was previously to the statute. Under that previous law a person who had agreed to take even a very short lease was entitled to require the lessor to show a good title for sixty years and (possibly at a vast expense) to produce the deeds and other evidence required for the purpose. It was to remedy this hardship that section 2 was passed, and not to alter the law as to production of deeds in an action. [COTTON, L.J.—On what issue do you require these deeds?] On the issue raised by paragraphs 9 and 10 of the defence, which raise the issue that the plaintiffs have no title. That issue having been raised, gives the defendant the usual right of a litigant to production of all material documents in his opponent's possession. This is not a mere technical matter, as this drive is the only means of access to the house. An Act which was passed merely to facilitate the transfer of land and amend the law of real and personal property, cannot alter the law as to discovery. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Can you raise by proof aliunde the question whether the title is bad?] The true meaning of section 2 is that its provisions are to be read into the contract, and that such stipulations do not prevent a purchaser from raising objections aliunde; that is reasonably clear on the older authorities: Shepherd v. Keatley, 1 Cr. M. & R. 117; Waddell v. Wolfe, 23 W. R. 44, L. R. 9 Q. B. 515; Darlington v. Hamilton, Kay, 550, 2 W. R. Ch. Dig. 87. The defendant is insisting on a totally different right from that dealt with in section 2, under totally different conditions, and for a totally different purpose. In Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 15 Q. B. D. 261, 16 Q. B. D. 778, (decided on section 3, sub-section (3), of the Conveyancing Act, 1881), it was held that the plaintiffs were not precluded from taking an objection as to undisclosed restrictive covenants and refusing to complete the purchase, though the covenants were prior in date to the stipulated commencement of title. The operation of sections 1 and 2 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, is expressly confined to "the completion of any contract for sale." The Act, at any rate, is perfectly satisfied by shifting the burden of proof from the lessor on to the lessee. It does not prevent the issue being raised, nor does it affect the ordinary law of discovery, as between litigants. Even an express agreement entered into with a company by a shareholder that he shall not be at liberty to inspect the books of the company is not sufficient to prevent an order for production in an action by him against the company: Hall v. Connell, 3 Y. & C. Ex. 707; Turner v. Bayley, 34 Beav. 105, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 114. As to the argument on the plaintiffs' appeal, this agreement is not a "contract to grant" "a term of years" "out of a freehold or leasehold estate." [LINDLEY, L.J.—Why is not the contract for the lease of the right of way in the same position as the contract for the lease of the land?] The plaintiffs have only an easement; that is an interest, not an estate, in the drive. [LOPES, L.J.—Is not "interest" the same as "estate"?] No. "Interest" is a wider term, and includes "estate." An easement is a limited, definite right of using land; an estate is an unlimited, indefinite right of using it. An easement is a jus in solo alieno—a right over another man's land. But a man does not have an "estate" in solo alieno, but in solo suo. There is no evidence that the right of way is incident to the lease, as being an appurtenance. That must be proved. No doubt Blackstone truly says that a right of way is an incorporeal hereditament, but he does not say it is a freehold estate. The 4th section of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, defines "land," not "estate."

Napier Higgins, Q.C., in reply.—The cases cited for the defendant do not apply. His contention would practically repeal the 2nd section of the Vendor and Purchaser Act. The question of production is within the discretion of the court, and where it would involve great inconvenience, production will not be ordered.

COTTON, L.J.—This case comes before us by way of appeal and cross-appeal from an order of North, J. The plaintiffs agreed to grant a lease of a house and land to the defendant for a term of years, and the agreement included a right of way to the house over land belonging to other owners. Two questions arise—first, whether the plaintiffs are bound to produce their title deeds as to the right of way? and, secondly, whether they are bound to produce those referring to the house and land? The judge below decided the first question against the plaintiffs, and the second in their favour. The case depends on 37 & 38 Vict. c. 78, s. 2. The first section of that Act reduces the statutory title, which a purchaser is entitled to require, from sixty to forty years. Then the 2nd section (which is the important one here) provides that, "in the completion of any such contract as aforesaid" (that is, "any contract of sale of land" made after 1874), "and subject to any stipulation to the contrary in the contract, the obligations and rights of vendor and purchaser shall be regulated by the following rules; that is to say, first, under a contract to grant or assign a term of years, whether derived or to be derived out of a freehold or leasehold estate, the intended lessee or assign shall not be entitled to call for the title to the freehold." The form of this first paragraph is such as to preclude any question whether an agreement to grant a lease comes within the words "contract of sale of land," for this is clearly "a contract to grant . . . a term of years." Then are the plaintiffs bound to produce these title deeds? Mr. Upjohn argued that the clause was only to prevent the expense which, under the old law, vendors or lessors were put to in having to produce a sixty years' title to the freehold, and that it does not deprive the purchaser of his right to production of documents, when the matter comes before the court. In my opinion, the effect of the clause is that the vendor makes out a good title without producing the deeds which show his title to the freehold.

The question here is whether, without producing his freehold title, the vendor can make out a good title, or whether the intending purchaser, by simply denying that the vendor has a good title, can acquire a right to discovery of documents relating only to the vendor's freehold title. In my opinion, the purchaser cannot by such means entitle himself to production in such a case. But does that prevent him from raising aliunde any objection to the freehold title? In my opinion, it does not. It does not prevent his objecting to the title on any distinct and definite ground, and if he does raise a tangible issue as to the title, I think he is entitled to production of documents material to that issue, and which are in the vendor's possession. If the purchaser here had raised a specific objection to the title, he would, in my opinion, have been entitled to the discovery he claims. Has he done so in such a way as to enable the court to see that there has been any tangible issue raised upon the goodness of the vendor's freehold title which the court can try? The defendant has merely alleged that the premises are subject to divers restrictive covenants affecting the use and enjoyment thereof. That is perfectly general and indefinite, and looks like a mere fishing allegation. If it had been alleged that there was a covenant which restrained the holder from carrying on some particular business, it would have been different, and in that case I think the plaintiffs would have been entitled to have an opportunity of making a further affidavit as to whether they had any documents bearing upon that issue. There has been an argument here on the part of the plaintiffs that to concede the defendant such a right of discovery as I have suggested would entirely defeat the object of this clause of the Act. But I do not think that would be so; for if the vendor has not any documents in his possession, or can say that such documents relate only to his own title, and do not affect the purchaser's claim, he is protected. As regards the title deeds relating to the land, I think the decision of North, J., was right, and that the cross appeal fails.

But then as to the appeal from that part of the decision of North, J., which was against the plaintiffs, if a contract is not a "contract of sale of land," it is not within the 1st or 2nd sections of the Vendor and Purchaser Acts. But Lindley, L.J., has referred to the 4th section of the Act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, which shows that a contract for the sale of land does include hereditaments, and a right of way is certainly a hereditament. The 2nd section of the Vendor and Purchaser Act shows that a contract to grant a lease is a contract for sale within the Act, so that the contract is within the Act, even as regards the right of way. That being so, it follows that, no specific objection having been taken to the title of the plaintiffs, they are entitled to rely on section 2. Accordingly, I differ from the judge on that point, and hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to protect themselves both as to the deeds generally and also as to those which give them the right of way.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The plaintiffs here agreed to give the defendant a lease of a house and land, and also of a right of way. We know nothing about that right of way, as to whether it is appurtenant or in gross, nor have we any exact knowledge as to the terms of the contract, which was embodied in a number of letters, but I understand that the correctness of the general effect of them, as appearing by the pleadings, is not disputed. Nothing in that contract makes it incumbent on the plaintiffs to produce their title to the freehold. Under those circumstances the defendant raises this dispute. He calls upon the plaintiffs to produce their title deeds to the freehold, and the question is whether he can compel them to do so. That depends on section 2 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, the effect of which is that the lessor is under no obligation to show his title to the freehold, and we must see that in construing it we do not place such a narrow construction on it as to defeat the object of the Act. The preamble recites that it is expedient to facilitate the transfer of land by means of certain amendments in the law of vendor and purchaser. [His lordship then read the general part of section 2, at the beginning of it, and the first heading thereunder, and proceeded:—] How much less is the lessee entitled to? Can he say, "You must produce your deeds, though I cannot call on you to produce your title"? Obviously he cannot. Can he say, "I cannot call on you to produce your title, but I will say you have a bad title, and thus defeat the Act"? I think that the lessee is not entitled to defeat the object of the Act in that way, and that upon that point, therefore, North, J., was right.

As to the appeal of the plaintiffs, I am not sure I quite understand what the view of North, J., was as to the right of way part of the case. It would seem he thought a lease of a right of way was not a lease of land, but the statutory definition of "land" given in 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 4, makes it include "hereditaments," so that I think no distinction, as regards this question, can be drawn between the right of way and the other property. That, however, does not quite dispose of the case, because Mr. Upjohn contends that the defendant is entitled to prove aliunde that the title is bad, in which I agree with him, and that he is entitled to discovery of documents in order to support his case, and he has accordingly put into his pleadings an allegation that there are restrictive covenants affecting the property which interfere with its enjoyment. Now it appears to me that if that were a specific allegation, instead of a general one, the defendant would be entitled to call upon the plaintiffs to make an affidavit distinctly stating whether the documents in their possession affect the defendant's title or only their own. But I regard this allegation as far too indefinite for that purpose. It seems to me to be merely an attempt to fish.

I think, therefore, the plaintiffs' appeal ought to be allowed, and that they are not under any obligation to produce any of their deeds.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree with the opinions of the other members of the court, subject only to this, that I have felt some doubt whether this Act applies to cases where there is litigation, and where the production of documents is demanded under the rules which regulate the right to discovery among litigants, and not under the law regulating the right to production as between vendor and purchaser upon a sale; but I do not dissent from the rest of the court upon this.

ONSLOW v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Time for appealing—"Judgment" or "order"—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, rr. 9, 15.

A decision of the Queen's Bench Division upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 19 of the Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), is an "order" and not a "judgment," and an appeal from the decision must be brought within twenty-one days.

Application for an extension of time to appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division, dated January 21, 1890, upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 19 of the Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97). The question was whether the decision of the Divisional Court was an "order," in which case the appeal ought to have been brought within twenty-one days from the date of the decision; or a "judgment," in which case the appeal could be brought within a year.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord Esher, M.R.—I think the time has come when we must determine what is the distinction between the word "order" and the word "judgment." It seems to me that we must adopt the view taken by Cotton, L.J., in Ex parte Chinery, 32 W. R. 469, 12 Q. B. D. 342' concurred in as it was by the other members of the court. The Lord Justice in that case said that "in legal language, and in Acts of Parliament, there is a well-known distinction between a judgment and an order. . . . I think we ought to give to the words 'final judgment' in this sub-section (sub-section 1 (g) of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883), their strict and proper meaning, i.e., a judgment obtained in an action by which a previously existing liability of the defendant to the plaintiff is ascertained or established." Bowen, L.J., said that "there is an inherent distinction between orders and judgments," and he went on to say that the words "final judgment" had a proper professional meaning. Obviously, he meant to express his concurrence with Cotton, L.J. The result accordingly is that a judgment is a decision obtained in an action. Every other decision of the court is an order. The language of ord. 58, r. 9, strongly justifies that view, for it says that the time for appealing from any order or decision made "in any other matter not being an action" shall be the same as the time limited for appealing from an interlocutory order under rule 15—namely, twenty-one days. There the distinction is drawn between an order, not made in an action, and a judgment, which is always a decision obtained in an action. That is the true distinction. The present decision, not being in an action, was not a "judgment." It was, therefore, an "order," and the time for appealing from it was limited to twenty-one days. The time, however, under the circumstances would be extended.

Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ., concurred.

Partridge v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration. (a.)

Dentists Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 33), s. 11—Erasing name from Dentists' Register—Discretionary duty—Judicial or ministerial act—Action for wrongfully erasing name.

Section 11 of the Dentists Act, 1878, provides that a register of dentists shall be kept by the registrar, and sub-section 5 provides that every registrar shall in all respects in the execution of his discretion and duty in relation to any register under the Act conform to any special directions given by the General Council.

The General Council having wrongfully directed the name of a person to be erased from the register on the ground that he had lost his qualification, a mandamus was issued directing them to restore his name to the register. In an action to recover damages for such wrongful erasure,

Held, that, as the duty imposed upon the General Council by the Act as to giving directions to the registrar in regard to the register was discretionary, the duty was of a judicial character, and not merely ministerial, and the action was not maintainable without proof of malice.

Appeal from the judgment of Huddleston, B., at the trial, without a jury, of an action for maliciously and unlawfully removing the plaintiff's name from the Dentists' Register kept under the Dentists Act, 1878.

After the passing of the Dentists Act, 1878, the plaintiff obtained a diploma from the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland as a licentiate in dental surgery, and was entered by the defendants in the Dentists' Register in respect of this qualification.

The Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland granted the diploma on the conditions that the holder would not seek to attract business by advertising or by any practice considered by the college to be unbecoming, and that the diploma would be cancelled on its being proved to the satisfaction of the president and council of the college that he had done so.

In July, 1885, the College of Surgeons in Ireland cancelled the plaintiff's diploma on the ground that he had advertised in connection with his profession, and notified this fact to the defendants. The defendants thereupon, in June, 1886, ordered his name to be erased from the Dentists' Register on the ground that he had lost his qualification.

A mandamus was issued, directing the defendants to restore the name to the register on the ground that the fact of losing the qualification was not sufficient reason for erasing the name. The case is reported, sub. nom. Ex parte Partridge, 36 W. R. 442, 19 Q. B. D. 467.

The plaintiff's name was restored to the register in September, 1887.

The defendants subsequently held an inquiry under sections 13 and 15 of the Dentists Act, 1878, and ordered the plaintiff's name to be erased from the register on the ground that he had been guilty of "disgraceful conduct in a professional sense" in advertising.

Huddleston, B., found that there was no malice, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Waddy, Q.C., and Lyon, for the plaintiff.—The act of the defendants in removing the plaintiff's name from the register was merely a ministerial act. They did not profess to hold any judicial inquiry or to act under section 13. They considered that they had no option but to erase the name as the qualification was gone. The court held that they were wrong in that (36 W. R. 442, 19 Q. B. D. 467). The plaintiffs cannot now say that they were acting in a judicial capacity. They professed to act under section 11, and their duties under that section are merely ministerial.

They referred to Pickering v. James, 21 W. R. 786, L. R. 8 C. P. 489; Ashby v. White, 1 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., 268; Cullen v. Morris, 2 Stark. 587; Toser v. Child, 5 W. R. 287, 7 E. & B. 377.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the defendants.—The grounds upon which the defendants acted in erasing the plaintiff's name are immaterial. If the duty imposed upon them by the Act is judicial, and they acted bonâ fide, then they are protected, though they may have acted wrongly. If they acted under section 13, though without holding an inquiry, then their act was clearly judicial. Even if they acted under section 11, inasmuch as they had a discretion to do the act or not—that is, to give special directions to the registrar under sub-section 5 as to the register—their act cannot be considered as merely ministerial.

Waddy, Q.C., replied.

Lord Esher, M.R.—This is an action against the Medical Council for maliciously and unlawfully causing the plaintiff's name to be erased from the Dentists' Register. The learned judge found that no malice was proved, and, indeed, I can hardly conceive how there could possibly be any malice in the defendants towards the plaintiff. Now the defendants' duty in considering whether they should erase a name from the register on account of alleged misconduct is clear. They ought to inquire carefully whether there is any ground for the complaint. If they come to the conclusion that there is, they ought to communicate with the accused and ask him for an explanation. I do not say that they ought to hear the witnesses, if there are any, in his presence; but at the least they ought to communicate any evidence to him, and ask for his explanation upon it, and if necessary make further inquiries into the matter. Then, and not till then, ought they to decide upon erasing the name. It is quite clear that the defendants upon the occasion in question acted wrongly. They erased the plaintiff's name without holding a proper inquiry, and consequently they were directed by a writ of mandamus to restore the name to the register. The question, however, whether such a body as the council has acted rightly in removing the name and the question whether an action will lie against them if they have acted wrongly are two totally different questions. Certain duties are imposed upon the defendants by the Dentists Act, 1878. The defendants in erasing the plaintiff's name were intending to act under the statute. They ought to have acted under section 13, and held a proper inquiry before deciding to erase the plaintiff's name upon the ground of disgraceful conduct in a professional sense. If they acted under section 13 I have no doubt that their act was not a ministerial act but a judicial act. But assuming that they ought to have acted under section 13 and did not, then they acted under section 11, and that being so can their act be called a merely ministerial act when they might have done it or not? I may state that, in my opinion, if the defendants intended to act under the statute, and erroneously acted under a wrong section, they would not be liable in the absence of malice if the act was not merely ministerial.

Assuming, then, that they acted under section 11, in my opinion their act was not a merely ministerial act. The giving an order to the registrar under section 11 depends upon discretion. I think this proposition is good law. When a public duty is imposed on persons which they undertake to perform, and the performance of that duty depends upon the exercise of discretion, the carrying out of that duty cannot be said to be a merely ministerial act, but must be considered for the purposes of protection as a judicial act. The defendants, in the performance of that judicial duty, were protected in the absence of malice.

In the present case, therefore, there being no malice, the defendants cannot be made liable, and the appeal must therefore be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—The learned judge having properly found that there was no malice, the question arises whether the plaintiff has any cause of action against the defendants. The solution of that question depends upon whether or not the act of the defendants was a merely ministerial act. I agree with the proposition enunciated by the Master of the Rolls that where there is a discretion to perform a public duty imposed upon a person by statute, the duty is a judicial and not a merely ministerial duty. The scheme of the Dentists Act seems to be this. The registrar is the person who is to do all the ministerial acts in regard to the register. By section 11 he is to keep the register, and by section 12 he is to insert any necessary alterations in it. I also think that the registrar has some duties with respect to the register that are not merely ministerial. By sub-section 4 of section 12 he has a discretion in the execution of his duties to act on such evidence as in each case appears to him sufficient. Then when we look at the duties of the General Council in regard to the registrar we see that by section 11 they are to exercise superintendence over him. By section 11, sub-section 2, they have a discretion as to the form in which the register is kept. Then it is further provided by sub-section 5 that the registrar shall conform to any orders made by the General Council under the Act; and it is also provided that the registrar is to conform to any special directions given by the General Council. In my opinion the duty of the General Council in giving these special directions is of a judicial character. The conclusion I have arrived at upon the facts before us is that the General Council were of opinion that the register must automatically follow the qualification—that is to say, that the retention of the qualification was a condition of the name remaining on the register—and that they had power to make the necessary corrections by giving an order to the registrar to that effect. In that opinion they were wrong. But they were exercising superintendence over the registrar, and had a discretion conferred upon them by the statute in giving the order to the registrar. In my opinion there is no duty imposed upon the General Council in connection with the register which is not discretionary in its nature. I think, therefore, that the General Council were acting in the exercise of a discretion vested in them by the statute, and were consequently acting in a judicial capacity. The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants in erasing the plaintiff's name from the register acted without malice and bonâ fide, but they made a mistake, thinking that they could erase his name simply because his qualification ceased. Under those circumstances can the present action be maintained? It is admitted that the defendants were acting in the discharge of a public duty imposed upon them by statute, and intended to act under the statute. If they acted under section 13, it cannot be denied that they were acting judicially. It is said, however, that they were acting under section 11, and that the duty imposed by that section is merely ministerial. It seems to me that as the defendants have power under the section to give special directions to the registrar as to his duties in connection with the register, and as they have a discretion as to those directions, they are acting judicially in giving those directions. Therefore, whether they, the defendants, were acting under section 11 or section 13 they were not acting merely ministerially, and in the absence of malice cannot be made liable in this action.

PROUDFOOT v. HART. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Covenant—"Good tenantable repair."

Good tenantable repair is such repair as, taking into account the age, the character, and the locality of the house, would make it reasonably fit for the occupation of a reasonably-minded tenant of the class who would be likely to want such a house.

Motion to set aside the findings and award and judgment directed to be entered thereon of an official referee.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of agreement to repair.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCIVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By an agreement in writing dated the 11th of November, 1885, a dwelling-house and premises situate in Caversham-road, Kentish Town, were let by the plaintiff to the defendant for a term of three years, and the defendant agreed that he would "during the said term keep the said premises in good tenantable repair, and so leave the same at the expiration thereof."

The action having been tried by an official referee, he reported in favour of the plaintiff, and directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff accordingly.

Before making his report he stated that, in his view of the obligation of a tenant to do tenantable repair, he ought to re-paper walls when the paper which was on them at the commencement of the tenancy had become worn out, and to re-paint internal woodwork where the paint had been worn off, and to whitewash and clean ceilings, &c.

Morton Daniel, for the defendant, in support of the motion.—The repairs included by the official referee are merely decorative repairs, and do not come within the meaning of the phrase "good tenantable repair": Crawford v. Newton, 36 W. R. 54.

T. W. Chitty, for the plaintiff.—The premises are to be kept in good tenantable repair. They must first be put into good repair, and then maintained in that condition: Payne v. Haine, 16 M. & W. 541.

CAVE, J.—My brother Mathew has asked me to state my opinion first, and I do not know how to state it in language other than that which I have used more than once before. "Tenantable repair" to my mind extends to commissive waste undoubtedly. I also thinks that it extends to permissive waste, and that the tenant must not only make good the damage going beyond mere ordinary wear which is done by himself and by his family and servants, but that he must also make good the damage which is done by other causes—such, for instance, as a casual storm that takes off a slate from the roof, or a stone thrown from the outside which breaks a window. All these things seem to me to fall within his obligation to keep the premises in "tenantable repair," and if he neglects to do those things, and the result is that still further damage is caused to the structure, then he must make good that further damage also, because it comes of his not performing his covenant to do "tenantable repairs." With regard to paper, I cannot see how in any case a man can be bound to put new paper on the walls simply because the old paper which was on at the time when he took the house, or which he has subsequently put on the walls, has become worn out. Mr. Chitty has suggested the possibility of paper being required to hold a wall or ceiling together. When a case of that kind occurs it will have to be dealt with, though I can hardly conceive the case of a wall needing a paper to hold it together.

With regard to the ceiling, if it were the case that the ceiling is only held together by the paper, and the tenant were to choose to tear the paper off and let the ceiling fall down, that would undoubtedly be permissive waste. It may possibly be that under those circumstances he would be bound to put up new paper when the old one showed no signs of being able to perform its duty of keeping the ceiling up. With regard to the paint, again, I can only repeat that painting is decoration, and that it is not necessary for the tenant to paint the woodwork inside where it is only required for the purpose of decoration. Where the woodwork as he receives it, is painted, and the paint wears away in the course of his tenancy, and he does not re-paint so that the woodwork underneath perishes from want of the preserving effects of paint, I think again he would be liable on the ground of permissive waste, but so long as no damage is done to the woodwork the mere fact that from lapse of time the paint has worn off does not in such a tenancy as this, call upon him to replace it by fresh paint. So, again, with regard to the whitewashing of the ceilings, we all know that in the ordinary course ceilings get black and have to be whitewashed, and if at the end of such a tenancy as this, the ceilings have become in the natural course of things black, the tenant is not bound to whitewash them. That, again, is a repair which the landlord must do.

The learned referee has thought that if the paper or paint is thoroughly worn out the tenant must re-paper or re-paint. That is exactly the thing he is not bound to do. Where the paper or the paint is thoroughly worn out he is not bound to replace either paper or paint unless his omission has caused damage to the fabric which otherwise is protected by the paper or by the paint. Then he goes on to say: "Cleaning and scouring might suffice in some cases but not in all." The tenant is certainly not bound to clean or to scour when the state of the paper is such as might naturally be expected from ordinary wear during the course of the tenancy. Then, with regard to the whitening of the ceilings, the official referee says that he did not believe the defendant fairly or properly whitened the ceilings or papered the top room. I have already said that under ordinary circumstances he was not bound to whiten the ceilings or paper the top room. He was not bound to do that unless it can be put by some exercise of ingenuity as being permissive waste of the fabric underneath not to do it. Nothing of the kind appears to have been suggested here. The learned official referee seems to have thought that the tenant was bound, because the ceilings were dirty from ordinary wear, to whitewash them and bound also to paper the top room because the paper which was then on it had gone through its ordinary existence and was in such a state that it required to be replaced.

That is, as I have said, not the duty of the tenant under such a lease as this.

I think that we must send this case back to the official referee in order that he may try it again with the light which is now thrown upon it.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the judgment of my learned brother, and with the reasons which he has given. It may not be easy to give a compendious description of the obligations of a man who has bound himself to keep premises in tenantable repair, because it is not easy to say compendiously what would be reasonable conduct under a great variety of circumstances, but it is very easy to see and to say what such a tenant is not bound to do. He is not bound to repair what is worn out by age. If those simple rules were kept before the minds of the official referees in dealing with each particular case, they would very clearly see whether the repair asked for is analogous to rebuilding or restoration. If the repair which the landlord requires to be done is one of that character, as a general rule the tenant would not be bound to do it.

The plaintiff appealed.

April 23, 30.—Winch, Q.C., T. W. Chitty, and Ernest Pollock, for the appellant.

Morton Daniel, for the respondent.

The following additional cases were cited: Belcher v. M'Intosh, 8 C. & P. 720, 2 Moo. & Rob. 186, and Davies v. Davies, 36 W. R. 399, 38 Ch. D. 499.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a question has arisen between a landlord and his tenant as to whether the tenant infringed the covenant in his lease to leave the premises in "good tenantable repair." The action was tried before the official referee, who has given a judgment in which he has laid down the principles on which he meant to act, and on which he did act. The Divisional Court have come to the conclusion that some of those principles are incorrect, and that if he acted upon them he must have come to a wrong decision. We are now asked to say that the principles on which he acted are correct, and that the principles laid down by the Divisional Court are wrong. There seem to be three courses open to us. We may agree with the official referee, or with the Divisional Court, or we may say that both were wrong, and lay down some principles for ourselves. The question is as to the true construction to be given to the term "good tenantable repair." It has been held that where a tenant agrees to keep premises in good tenantable repair, and to so deliver them up, he is bound, if the premises are out of repair when he takes possession, to put them into repair, and so keep them and deliver them up. That they were out of repair when he took them does not in any way affect his liability.

Different definitions have been given at different times of tenantable repair. In Belcher v. M'Intosh the covenant was to put premises into habitable repair and Alderson, B., said it was difficult to suggest any material difference between the term habitable repair and the more common expression tenantable repair. Both must import such a state as to repair that the premises might be used and dwelt in, not only with safety, but with reasonable comfort, by the class of persons by whom, and for the sort of purposes for which, they were to be occupied. In Payne v. Haine there was a covenant to deliver up in good repair, and it was held that the tenant was bound not to deliver up the premises in the state in which he received them, if they were then in bad repair, but to put them into repair, and so to deliver them up. Parke, B., said that the age and class of the premises, with their general condition as to repair, might be estimated in order to measure the extent of the repairs to be done. "Thus a house in Spitalfields may be repaired with materials inferior to those requisite for repairing a mansion in Grosvenor-square," and Rolfe, B., said that the term "good repair" must be construed with reference to the subject-matter, and must differ as that might be a palace or a cottage. In Mantz v. Goring, 4 Bing. N. C. 451, and Stanley v. Towgood, 3 Bing. N. C. 4, similar definitions were given. From these it is plain that the test of tenantable repair is not the condition in which the house is when it is taken. If it is then in bad repair it must be left in better, that is to say in tenantable repair, but if when the tenant takes it, it is richly painted and decorated, it is not incumbent upon him to paint and decorate it in exactly the same manner when he leaves it. The age of the house, its position and character, are all material elements in deciding what extent of repair is necessary, and I entirely agree with the definition which my brother Lopes has drawn up: "Good tenantable repair is such repair as, taking into account the age, the character, and the locality of the house, would make it reasonably fit for the occupation of a reasonably minded tenant of the class who would be likely to want such a house." That definition appears to me to sum up the definitions given in the earlier authorities, and to contain all the essential elements, and it seems in no way to controvert the decision of this court in Crawford v. Newton.

It follows, therefore, that the principle on which the official referee acted—namely, that the tenant was bound to re-paper with similar paper and re-paint with similar paint the walls and woodwork which were papered and painted when he took possession—is a wrong principle, and that if he acted on that principle he came to a wrong conclusion. I do not think that the definition we have given differs from the principles laid down by the Divisional Court; if it does, of course, we disagree with those principles. I do not say that the tenant who has to deliver up a house in good tenantable repair need never paint or paper it. It is possible that no reasonably minded man might be willing to take the house if it was not papered or painted, but in every case the extent of the repairs to be done will differ in accordance with the age, the character, and the locality of the house, and the class of tenants who would be likely to take it. The result is, therefore, that we agree with the decision of the Divisional Court whether we agree with their reasoning or not. This matter must go back to the official referee, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree, but as the case is of general importance I will add a few words. I think there is nothing new in the definition of good tenantable repair which I have drawn up. It is the result of the various authorities which have been cited. As to papering and painting, I should say that under such a covenant as a general rule a tenant would not be bound either to re-paper or to re-paint the inside woodwork. Certainly he would not be bound to put paper on the walls similar to that which was there when he came, or to re-paint in an extravagant or decorative manner. If paint is needed to prevent the woodwork from decaying he would be bound to paint, and if through lapse of time the paper and paint were in such a condition of defectiveness that no reasonably minded man could be expected to take the house, then I think he would be bound to re-paint and re-paper so as to put it into such a condition as to satisfy a reasonably minded tenant of the class who might be expected to take such a house. The same remarks apply, I think, to white-washing. Therefore, in my opinion, the principles laid down by the Divisional Court are right, while those acted upon by the official referee are wrong, and the case must go back to him.

Appeal dismissed.

MELLERSH v. BROWN. (a.)

Mortgage—Reversionary interest in personal estate—Covenant for payment of principal and interest on a day certain—Arrears of interest—Statutes of Limitation (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42; 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3).

By a mortgage deed, dated in 1875, the mortgagor assigned to the mortgagee a reversionary interest in personal estate, and covenanted for payment of the principal sum and interest thereon at five per cent. per annum on a day certain, but there was no covenant as to payment of interest in the event of the principal sum, or any part of it, remaining unpaid after the day named for payment. The mortgagor paid a sum on account of principal, but no interest was ever paid. In an action brought by the transferee of the mortgage for foreclosure,

Held, that interest was recoverable as damages, and must be calculated from the date of the mortgage deed, at £5 per cent., and was not limited to six years' arrears.

Adjourned summons.

By indenture of mortgage, dated the 24th of April,

(a.) Reported by JAMES H. BAKEWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1875, and made between Edward Barrett, of the one part, and George Barrett (the father of Edward Barrett), of the other part, in consideration of £600 lent to him, Edward Barrett assigned to his father all the share or interest of him the said Ed. Barrett whatsoever under three several indentures of settlement, and of and in the securities whereon the same or any part thereof were or might be invested, subject to a proviso for making the assignment void upon payment of the principal sum and interest at 5 per cent. per annum on the 24th of October, 1875. The indenture contained a covenant by Ed. Barrett to pay the principal sum and interest on the last-mentioned day, and a power of sale in default of payment, but did not contain a covenant to pay interest in the event of the principal sum, or any part thereof, remaining unpaid after the 24th of October, 1875.

On the 22nd of June, 1875, Ed. Barrett paid £78 on account of principal. No other payment, either on account of principal or interest, was ever made.

In 1878 Ed. Barrett assigned the same property to the defendant, subject to the above-mentioned mortgage, and notice of this assignment was given to George Barrett by the defendant.

George Barrett died in 1889, and the plaintiff subsequently became entitled by transfer to the mortgage of 1875, and in December, 1889, commenced this action for foreclosure.

The chief clerk found that £397 6s. was due in respect of interest on the principal sum, calculated from the date of the mortgage. The defendant thereupon took out this summons asking that the chief clerk's certificate might be varied by disallowing part of this sum of £397 6s. on the ground that the plaintiff was only entitled to arrears of interest for the six years previous to action.

Marten, Q.C., and R. Hornell, for the summons.—There is no express covenant for payment of interest after the 24th of October, 1875, and a covenant will not be implied. Interest will only be given by way of damages: Cook v. Fowler, L. R. 7 H. L. 27, 22 W. R. Dig. 260; Mounson v. Redshaw, 1 Saund. 201a, note (r). If the property mortgaged had been land, even though it was a reversion, six years' arrears of interest only could have been recovered under the statute: Smith v. Hill, 9 Ch. D. 143, 26 W. R. Dig. 146; Vincent v. Going, 1 J. & Lat. 697; Sinclair v. Jackson, 1 W. R. 400, 17 Beav. 405. The court has a discretion to limit the damages, and in so doing should follow the analogy of the statutory period: In re Roberts, Goodchap v. Roberts, 28 W. R. 870, 14 Ch. D. 49; Ashton v. Dalton, 2 Coll. 565; Thompson v. Drew, 20 Beav. 49, 4 W. R. Dig. 53; Bolding v. Lane, 11 W. R. 386, 1 De G. J. & S. 122; Thomson v. Eastwood, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 215, 25 W. R. Dig. 341; In re Frisby, Allison v. Frisby, 36 W. R. 603, ante, p. 65, 43 Ch. D. 106. This is a case in which the court should exercise its discretion in limiting the damages recoverable.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Manby, for the plaintiff, the mortgagee.—The mortgagee is entitled to recover interest at five per cent. from the date of the mortgage as damages. The mortgage is of a reversionary interest in personal estate, and no statute of limitations applies; the statute applies to real property, and cannot be extended by analogy to personal property: Cook v. Fowler; 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3; 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42. There is no case making the law as to a mortgage of realty applicable to a mortgage of personalty: Smith v. Hill; In re Kerr's Policy, 17 W. R. 989, L. R. 8 Eq. 331.

Marten, Q.C., replied.

Kay, J.—There is no doubt that in an action on the covenant in this mortgage the jury would be directed to give damages for non-payment after the day which was fixed for payment, and those damages would be measured by the interest if it was not more than five per cent., and if more than five per cent. the damages would still be at that rate. In this case, in taking the account of what is due on the mortgage, the chief clerk has included that interest in the amount at which the mortgagor may redeem.

It is said that this is wrong, because a limit ought to be set by analogy to the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42. It is not an analogy between a legal and an equitable debt; no doubt equity follows the analogy which is afforded with respect to a similar claim for a legal debt. But I never heard before that there was any obligation to follow, in the case of personal estate, the analogy of a statute which applies to real estate.

The Legislature has enacted that in the case of a charge on real estate only six years' arrears of interest shall be recovered; but with respect to personal estate has not enacted anything of the kind. The result is inevitable that the same rule was not to be observed, and I do not understand how there can be any analogy between the two cases.

The case amounts to this—that the mortgagor admits that he has never paid any interest, and that all these arrears of interest are due from him, and that there has been a judgment for foreclosure against him, but he contends that he is entitled to redeem on paying only six years' arrears of interest.

No authority has been produced for this contention, and there is authority against it in Smith v. Hill, in which case more than six years' interest was allowed. In In re Roberts, Goodchap v. Roberts, where the claim was not for realization of a mortgage, but for breach of covenant, a lower rate of interest—viz., five per cent.—than that fixed by the mortgage deed was given by way of damages, although the covenant did not expressly say that interest was to be paid after the date fixed for payment of the principal. Cotton, L.J., said, "We are not deciding now what rate of interest should be allowed in a suit for redemption, but simply on an action brought for breach of covenant to pay the money on a given day." An intimation which, I understand, means that if the mortgagor came asking for redemption, it is possible you might say that he should not redeem without paying interest at the higher rate.

The result is, that there is absolutely no authority whatever for the limitation of interest which the mortgagor has asked for. I see no reason why he should have any indulgence at all.

Summons refused.

When judgment has been actually entered up pursuant to a direction of the official referee under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, rr. 50, 52*a*, it is too late for the unsuccessful party to apply to a court of first instance to move by way of appeal to set aside the judgment; his proper course is to go direct to the Court of Appeal.

Motion.

Upon this action coming on for trial, his lordship had made an order directing that the action should be tried before the official referee under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, "who is to decide what is to be done, and to deal with the costs, and to direct judgment to be entered accordingly."

The official referee made his award, dated the 3rd of December, 1889, and directed "Judgment to be entered for the defendants against the plaintiff, with costs."

Judgment was duly entered accordingly on the 7th of December, 1889.

The plaintiff now moved, under notice dated the 21st of December, 1889, "on appeal from the judgment of the official referee," for an order that such judgment might be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff, or a new trial had, on the ground that the official referee was wrong in point of law in giving judgment for the defendants, and that his findings were against the evidence; and also that the time for appealing against the judgment of the official referee might be extended.

To this motion the preliminary objection was raised that a court of first instance had no jurisdiction to set aside an award of the official referee after judgment had been entered up on it.

Millar, Q.C., and E. Knowles Corrie, for the defendants.—This motion is misconceived. Having sent the whole action to the official referee, your lordship divested yourself of all further jurisdiction in the matter; and the judgment that has been entered up is the judgment of the court, from which the plaintiff's only remedy lies to the Court of Appeal. It is too late to impeach the official referee's report after judgment has been entered up on it: Bedborough v. Army and Navy Hotel Co., 53 L. J. Ch. 658, 32 W. R. Dig. 161; Dyke v. Cannell, 31 W. R. 747, 11 Q. B. D. 180.

Marten, Q.C., and E. Boyle, for the plaintiff.—Neither of the cases cited applies to the present case, in which judgment has been actually entered up. The court has inherent jurisdiction to set aside a judgment improperly entered.

KAY, J.—The simple question involved in this preliminary objection is whether this court has power to set aside the award of the official referee after the judgment of the court has been entered up on it. If the court itself had directed judgment to be entered up, no one could doubt that it would be too late to apply afterwards to set aside the award. Taking the analogous case of a certificate made by the chief clerk, if the court has made an order on that certificate, it is too late, after that order, to move to vary the certificate. So, in the case of an award made by the official referee, I find no power under the rules to set aside that award after judgment has been entered up. In the present case the official referee decided the questions submitted to him. Under ord. 36, r. 50, of 1883, and ord. 36, r. 52a, of 1889, he directed judgment to be entered up on his findings, and thereupon judgment was entered up; and after judgment had been thus entered this application is made to set aside his findings of the facts, and to enter a different judgment.

The question is whether I have jurisdiction to do that. Under the old practice which existed under the rules of 1875, before the present rules of 1883 came into operation, the opinion of at least one learned judge of the High Court was expressed upon this point in Dyke v. Cannell. The question in that case was as to the proper course to be adopted by the unsuccessful party to a reference under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, where he desired to question the finding of the official referee, and it was decided that it was proper to move on notice to set aside the findings. There were two motions before the court, one by the plaintiff for judgment on the findings, and the other by the defendant to set aside the findings, and to remit the action to the official referee. The preliminary question was whether this latter motion was a proper course for the defendant to adopt, and the court decided that it was. In giving judgment Mr. Justice Cave, after referring to rule 34 of order 36 of the rules of 1875, which was substantially identical with rule 52 of order 36 of the rules of 1883, said this: "The report of a referee has no effect so long as it remains a report. To produce any result it has to be adopted by the court. If the party seeking to impeach the report does not do so before judgment has been given upon it, he is too late, because after judgment the report has no further value, and it is the judgment, and not the report, that is relied on by the successful party. But so long as the report of the referee is unconfirmed by a judgment of the court, I think it may be impeached. This seems to me to be a natural mode of procedure, and to be that provided for by the rules." Here I have the opinion of a learned judge who had evidently considered the matter very carefully. The effect of it is that, after judgment has been entered, it is too late to move to set aside the referee's report. I confess that seems reasonable. How can the court more formally adopt the report of the official referee than by entering up judgment upon it? And ord. 36, r. 50, of 1883, and ord. 36, r. 52a, of 1889, enable the official referee to do that which otherwise only the court itself could do—namely, to direct judgment to be entered up. That the party dissatisfied with the judgment may go to the Court of Appeal is not for one moment contested; but the question is whether a court of first instance has jurisdiction, when judgment has been entered up on the finding of the official referee to alter this finding and set aside the judgment. In the absence of any rule to that effect, I answer, it has not. It is too late to come and say the finding is wrong after judgment has been entered up on it. It is not denied that the award in this case was regular and proper in form, and that judgment was duly entered up on that award; and if the question is whether, in order to have that judgment reversed, the plaintiff should come here or go to the Court of Appeal, in my opinion he should go to the Court of Appeal.

I refuse the motion, with costs.

READ v. JOANNON. (a.)

Bill of sale—Debenture of incorporated company—Necessity of registration—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 4, 8—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 8, 17.

Debentures of an incorporated company are not bills of sale which require registration under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and are specially exempted under the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882.

Appeal from the City of London Court.

The plaintiff was a debenture-holder of the Cigarette Supply Co. (Limited). The defendant was a judgment creditor of the company. The sheriff having seized and sold certain goods of the company, the plaintiff claimed them under his debenture for £1,500, and an interpleader issue was directed. The judge held that the debenture was a bill of sale within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and was not affected by the Act of 1882. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant, on the ground that the debenture was void for want of registration as against an execution creditor.

The plaintiff appealed.

Bassett Hopkins (H. Kent with him), for the plaintiff.—It was held by Pollock, B., in Debenture-holders of John Welsted & Co. v. Swansea Bank, 5 Times L. R. 332, that the debentures of an incorporated company are not void as against execution creditors for want of registration under the Act of 1878; but if they were bills of sale under that Act they are specially exempted from its operation by section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, for it is provided by section 3 of the latter Act that so far as possible the two Acts shall be read as one.

Dickens, for the defendant.—Before the Act of 1882 debentures were clearly bills of sale and subject to the regulations of the Act of 1878. The words of section 4 are "any agreement by which a right in equity to any personal chattels or to any charge or security thereon shall be conferred," which clearly includes such a debenture. The question is whether the law is altered by the Act of 1882. Section 17, which is supposed to create the exemption, is strictly limited in two ways, in the first place it only applies to cases within "this Act"—that is to say, it does not affect cases dealt with by the Act of 1878, and in the second place it applies only to debentures of mortgage and loan companies, for the words "or other incorporated company" mean other company of the same kind: Jenkinson v. Brandley Mining Co., 35 W. R. 834, 19 Q. B. D. 568. The necessity for putting in such an exemption was that debentures could not be in the statutory form provided by the Act of 1882. The question was decided in this sense in Jenkinson v. Brandley Mining Co., and the case of Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co., 35 W. R. 40, 34 Ch. D. 43, is not an authority against it, because there the dispute was between grantor and grantee.

He also cited Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co., 35 W. R. 798, 36 Ch. D. 215, and Levy v. Abercorris Slate and Slab Co., 36 W. R. 411, 37 Ch. D. 260.

Bassett Hopkins in reply.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is certainly an example of the occasional truth of Lord Westbury's famous observation, that he wished there were no cases, for if one looks at the Act of Parliament by itself, nothing, as it seems to me, could be plainer. No doubt, if there have been decisions on the point, whether by a court of appeal or by a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, we have no right to disregard them, but must construe the Act according to the interpretation which the judges have put upon it. But I have carefully looked at the judgments in the cases which have been cited to us, and so far as I can see there is not one of them with which our present judgment in any manner conflicts. The question is whether a debenture of an incorporated company requires registration as a bill of sale. I am of opinion—and I think it right to say that my opinion does not stand alone, but is supported by that of a judge of much greater authority than myself, whom I have had the opportunity of consulting—that such debentures are not bills of sale, and are not struck at by either of these Acts of Parliament—that they never were within the Act of 1878, and are expressly exempted from the operation of the Act of 1882. I agree in theory with much of the argument for the defendant—that, for certain purposes, the Acts of 1878 and 1882 must be read separately. The Act of 1882 provides that where it is necessary to read them separately they shall be so read; but the Act does not provide that in every respect they shall be treated as different Acts; on the contrary, it expressly enacts that, as far as possible, they shall be read as if they were one Act. The Act of 1882 expressly exempts debentures from its operation, and it was necessary for the defendant's counsel to give some effect to that exemption. The effect which he proposed to give to it was this. He said that whereas the Act of 1878 required a bill of sale to be registered, the Act of 1882 required it to be registered in a particular form, that a debenture could not be in the statutory form, and that consequently it was necessary to exempt debentures from the operation of the provisions affecting the form; but he said that the effect of section 17 went no farther, but left the necessity of registration, apart from the question of form, exactly as it stood under the Act of 1878. My answer to that argument is twofold. In the first place, I asked in vain for a case or dictum which said in terms that debentures of incorporated companies were bills of sale requiring registration under the Act of 1878. No such case was produced. Cases were indeed cited, from certain dicta contained in the judgments in which, it was argued that the judges who decided them must have so thought. Whether they thought so or not, they certainly did not so hold, and, so far as I am aware, no case can be produced in which it has ever been held that a debenture of an incorporated company—a perfectly well-known instrument—was a bill of sale within the Act of 1878. Therefore the first broad answer is, that even if the Acts of 1878 and 1882 are to be read separately to the extent contended for, still the argument fails, the earlier Act having no application to such debentures.

But, secondly, there is a still more conclusive answer. Section 17 of the Act of 1882 expressly provides that "nothing in this Act shall apply to any debentures issued by any mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company and secured upon the capital, stock or goods, chattels and effects of such company." Now I pass by with respectful difference the dictum—for it is no more than a dictum—of my brother Grove, that an incorporated company in that section must mean a company incorporated for the purpose of mortgage or loan, or for some other purpose in pari materiâ. I do not agree with that dictum, and in that disagreement I do not stand alone, because one of my learned brothers in the other division has twice treated the section as applying to debentures of incorporated companies generally. I am, therefore, not without authority in saying that that dictum is not to be taken as law. "Nothing in this Act shall apply to any debentures." It seems clear, when one looks at the language of section 3 of the Act of 1882, that even if debentures had originally been within the operation of the Act of 1878, section 17 is quite sufficient to take them out of that operation, because section 3 requires that the two Acts shall, as far as is consistent, be construed as one Act, so that the words of section 17, "nothing in this Act," really mean that "nothing in this Act, or in the principal Act, shall" apply to debentures.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that the decision of the learned judge in the court below was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I agree with my lord, upon consideration, that debentures of an incorporated company are not, and were never intended to be, within the operation of the Act of 1878. But assume that the defendant is right on that point, and that such a debenture was within the Act. It seems to me that this case has been a very signal illustration of the danger, which it is almost impossible to escape, when an Act of Parliament has once become so overladen with decisions as this has been—namely, the tendency to fly at once to the cases without looking at the words of the statute itself, for when the language of the Act of 1882 is seriously looked at, this case, to my mind, becomes absolutely free from doubt. Section 8 of the Act of 1878 said that every bill of sale to which that Act applied should be registered. That section has been in terms repealed, though there is the authority of the cases of Swift v. Pannell, 31 W. R. 543, 24 Ch. D. 210, and Casson v. Churchley, 53 L. J. Q. B. 335, 32 W. R. Dig. 26, for saying that that repeal does not extend to absolute bills of sale, but is confined to bills of sale given by way of security only. But this debenture, if it is a bill of sale at all, is a bill of sale given by way of security only, as to which there is no possibility of contending that section 8 of the principal Act has not been repealed. But, if so, then the only enactment requiring a bill of sale of this description to be registered is section 8 of the Act of 1882. But the moment that is conceded section 17 clearly applies, for I entirely agree with what my lord has said with reference to the impossibility of adopting the view taken by Grove, J., that "other incorporated company" means other incorporated company ejusdem generis with mortgage and loan companies. Then, if so, there is an express enactment that nothing in the Act of 1882, including section 8 of that Act, shall apply to such debentures as this.

Poor law—Settlement of pauper wife—Derivative settlement of husband—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.

E. C., a pauper, was the wife of one A. C., who had deserted her and could not be found. A. C. had not acquired any settlement for himself. A. C., born in 1857, was the legitimate son of J. C., who was born in 1825 in the Edmonton Union, and had not acquired any settlement for himself before his son A. C. was twenty-one years old.

Held, that, upon the authority of the Reigate case, ante, p. 295, 14 App. Cas. 466, the court were bound to hold that, under clause 3 of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, E. C. took the settlement of her father-in-law, J. C., as being the parentage settlement of her husband, A. C.

Case stated by the justices of the county of London at quarter sessions.

The pauper, Elizabeth Crawley, aged thirty-two, was the lawful wife of Albert Crawley, who had deserted her and could not be found. Albert Crawley was born within the West Ham (the appellant) Union in 1857, and had not acquired any settlement for himself. Albert Crawley was the lawful son of James Crawley, who was born within the Edmonton Union in 1825, and had not acquired any settlement before his son Albert was twenty-one years old.

The justices held that upon these facts the pauper's settlement was in the appellant, the West Ham Union, but stated the case for the High Court.

Philbrick, Q.C., and Forrest Fulton, for the appellant union.—The pauper's settlement was that of her father-in-law, being derived through her husband, who had acquired no settlement of his own. Albert Crawley, the pauper's husband, therefore, retained the settlement of his father under section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. That section applies to all persons who have been "children under sixteen" and who have not since acquired a settlement of their own. Section 35 does not abolish derivative settlements altogether in the case of children under sixteen and females deriving a settlement from their husbands. The wife here derives a settlement from her husband, but he, having never acquired a settlement of his own, comes under the 3rd clause of the section as "any child in this section mentioned who shall not have acquired a settlement for itself." Such child, after sixteen, retains its parent's birth settlement. This is the effect of the decision in the Reigate case, ante, p. 295, 14 App. Cas. 466.

Poland, Q.C., and Buckmaster, for the respondents.—The pauper takes her husband's first settlement in the appellant union. Such a reading of the words "child under sixteen" would apply to any person, and would do away with the effect of the section intended to abolish derivative settlements. The Reigate case does not apply here. The Bridgnorth case, 31 W. R. 938, 11 Q. B. D. 314, applies, and is not overruled by the Reigate case. The 3rd clause of section 35 provides that a child when over sixteen shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born, if he or she has acquired no other settlement, and the settlement of the parent can only be found by inquiring into that parent's derivative settlement.

Philbrick, Q.C., in reply.—It is admitted that the quarter sessions could not go on to inquire into James Crawley's derivative settlement, but they can into Albert's derivative settlement. The section only provides against a double derivative settlement being inquired into.

He cited Dorchester Guardians v. Poplar Guardians, 36 W. R. 706, 21 Q. B. D. 88.

Lord Coleridge, C.J. — I should have had no difficulty in coming to a clear decision on this case had not the decision of the House of Lords in what is called the Reigate case been binding upon us. It is, however, more important that people should know what the law has been decided to be than that they should be made aware of the merits of any particular case. It is of great importance that families should not be unnecessarily divided. That was the object of recent legislation. Looking at section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, under the light of the decision in the House of Lords, one can only say that although the word "child" apparently only refers to a child under sixteen, being legitimate, yet it must be taken to apply to a legitimate child over sixteen, and that any person coming under that description who has not acquired a settlement for himself must be taken to be included under the provisions of that section. And, again, it must be taken that such a child over sixteen, being legitimate, does not come under the words "no person" at the beginning of the section; so that a person coming within this description of child shall be deemed to derive a settlement from another person though the section says that "no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person" except in the cases mentioned—viz., being a child under sixteen, &c. The section has been so construed by the highest tribunal, and we must therefore accept this construction. In the case, then, of this female pauper taking the settlement of her husband, who had acquired no settlement except a birth settlement unless he derived one from his father, the House of Lords says that he must be deemed to derive a settlement from his father although the section of the Act seems to say the opposite. A man must be taken, then, to have a settlement by parentage so long as that settlement is not in itself a derivative settlement; and it follows that a pauper over sixteen, being legitimate, and not having himself since that age acquired a settlement, but whose father has a non-derivative settlement, himself acquires that father's settlement. The pauper here, therefore, must be deemed to acquire James Crawley's settlement, and this appeal must be allowed and the order of the justices be amended to that effect.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Apart from the judgment of the House of Lords in the Reigate case I should have thought that the husband of the pauper could not under the Act have derived a settlement from his father. The House of Lords, however, upon the facts of three cases before them, have put a different construction upon the effect of this section 35, and Lord Watson's judgment sums up the law upon the subject. His first four statements of the law do not apply to this case, but his fifth statement does, where he says, "subject to these provisions and limitations the effect of section 35 is to reserve to children the same rights in relation to parentage which they possessed under the then existing law."

The present case being taken as stated, we can only apply the existing law to it. The facts are that Albert Crawley, the pauper's husband, had a birth settlement, having acquired no other, which settlement would primâ facie be his, but then it is found that his father had a settlement. If so, and if that is all that is known, the children of that father who had not acquired a settlement for themselves must be taken to retain the same right, as they had before this Act passed, to derive a settlement from their father; and upon this state of facts Albert Crawley's settlement would be that of his father. On the grounds stated, in accordance with Lord Watson's judgment, this appeal must be allowed.

BOOTH v. RATTÉ. (a.)

River—Riparian owner—Erection of wharf in navigable river—Damages.

A riparian owner is entitled to damages for any unauthorized interference with the flow of the stream on which he has erected a floating wharf and boathouse, the said erections not obstructing the navigation.

This was an appeal from a decree dated the 29th of June, 1887, of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, affirming a decree of the Divisional Court, dated the 6th of March, 1886, which reversed a decree of Proudfoot, J. (11th of November, 1885).

The facts are stated in their lordships' judgment.

Bompas, Q.C., and Gore, for the appellants.—The respondent has not made out his title to access to the river. At any rate, as regards the wharf and boathouse he was a mere trespasser, and these were an obstruction to the rights of navigation reserved to the Crown by the patent of the 24th of December, 1850. (See also 23 Vict. c. 2, s. 35, as incorporated in the Revised Statutes of Ontario, c. 23, s. 47).

(a.) Reported by J. M. COLLYER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jeune, Q.C., and Rubie, for the respondent, were not heard.

The judgment of their lordships, Lord HALSBURY, C., Lord WATSON, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, and Sir RICHARD COUCH, was delivered by Sir RICHARD COUCH.—The suit to which this appeal relates was brought by the respondent in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice of the Province of Ontario against the appellants, who are severally owners of saw mills in the city of Ottawa, on the Ottawa river. It was first heard by one judge who dismissed the suit. On an appeal to the Divisional Court, that court set aside his judgment and gave judgment for the plaintiff, and ordered that it be referred to one of the masters of the court to inquire and state the amount of the damages the plaintiff had sustained, and the amount of such damages for which the defendants were respectively liable. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal for Ontario, which court dismissed their appeal, and they have appealed to Her Majesty in Council.

The plaintiff has a floating wharf and boathouse on the Ottawa river, about half a mile below the saw mills of the defendants. The wrongful acts complained of are thus described in the judgment of the Chancellor of the Divisional Court:—"The evidence very clearly establishes that the defendants are wrong-doers who from their mills allow sawdust, blocks, chips, bark, and other refuse to fall into the River Ottawa, and thereby pollute the water and impede navigation. This refuse accumulates in great floating masses, substantial enough occasionally for a man to walk upon, and the tendency of the currents and the prevalent direction of the winds bring these masses in front of the plaintiff's property up to his boathouse and wharf and the banks of his lot. Deposits of sawdust are thus by degrees formed before his property, and they result not only in fouling the water, making it offensive both to taste and smell, but produce from the gas generated underneath the surface frequent explosions, which are disagreeable and sometimes dangerous. It is thus proved that the plaintiff sustains special injury beyond the rest of the public by this unauthorized interference of the defendants with the flow and purity of the stream. He is injured in the personal enjoyment of the property and the river, and he is injured in the business which he follows of hiring and housing pleasure boats."

No evidence was given for the defendants. The defence they relied upon was that the plaintiff had no title to maintain the action. The root of the plaintiff's title is a grant from the Crown under the Great Seal of the Province of Canada, dated the 24th of December, 1850, to Joseph Aumond, of a piece of land in the town of Bytown, by the following description:—"Being composed of water lot number one in letter O in the aforesaid town of Bytown, being butted and bounded as follows, that is to say, commencing where a stone monument has been planted on the west side of Metcalfe-street, at the south-east angle of the said water lot; then north 23° 30′ west, three chains more or less to where a monument has been planted on the north-east angle of the said water lot, south 66° 30′ west, four chains ten links more or less to a point in the Ottawa river two chains distance from the shore: then southerly parallel to the general course of the shore to a point in the northern limit of Cathcart-street produced on a course of south 66° 30′ west distant two chains from the aforesaid shore of the River Ottawa; then north 66° 30′ east six chains ninety-six links more or less to the place of beginning." The power of the Crown to grant water lots in harbours and navigable rivers, subject to the public right of navigation, in Upper Canada was declared by the Act 23 Vict. c. 2, s. 35, Canada Statutes. Aumond appears to have sold portions of the water lot to different persons, and by a deed dated the 2nd of November, 1866, he sold and conveyed to Amable Prevost, amongst other lands, water lot number one, more particularly described in the deed from the Crown, excepting certain portions of the lot sold and conveyed by several conveyances to other persons who are named. By a deed dated the 23rd of July, 1867, Prevost sold and conveyed to the plaintiff part of the water lot granted by the Crown to Aumond, by the following description of the boundary towards the river:—"Thence along the northerly line of Cathcart-street in a westerly direction to the water's edge of the River Ottawa, thence along the said water's edge down the stream in a northerly direction to the line of Bolton-street." It will be observed that here the boundary on the river side is called the water's edge, whilst in the Crown grant the boundary of the land granted is two chains from the shore, and the contention of the defendants at the original hearing and in the appeals was that the plaintiff was not entitled to the two chains.

Before the conveyance to the plaintiff was executed he was put in possession, by Prevost, of the subjects which were to be conveyed to him, and constructed a floating wharf and boathouse, in size sixty feet long shore and sixteen feet wide, and moored it to the bank of the river. In 1874, or about that time, he increased the size of the wharf and boathouse to 140 feet in length, by forty feet in width. It draws four or four and a half feet of water, and floats chained at each end. There is no evidence as to the depth of the water at the side or in front of it. The plaintiff has from the time when the wharf and boathouse was first placed there, occupied it without any question or objection by either the Crown or Prevost, and by means of it has been doing a very considerable business as a letter of boats, &c.

This is not a case of a stranger taking possession of part of the two chains. The plaintiff moored the wharf to the bank where he thought fit, by virtue of his purchase, and had possession. The expression "along the water's edge" may either signify the line which separates the land from the water, or a water space of greater or less width, constituting the margin of the river. The description in the conveyance is capable of being explained by possession, and it appears to their lordships that the possession which, in this case, has followed upon the conveyance is sufficient to give the plaintiff a good primâ facie title to the whole of the two chains as against Prevost. Even if he had not such a title, and occupied only by the permission of Prevost, that would be sufficient to entitle him to maintain the action. No question arises in this case as to the wharf and boathouse being an obstruction to the navigation, but it may be noticed that the Chancellor in his judgment in the Divisional Court says:—"Here all the tendency of the evidence as to the position of the plaintiff's bank, the bay there formed at a distance of 700 feet from the main channel, the great width of the Ottawa, its ample facilities for shipping apart from the comparatively narrow strip where the plaintiff's wharf is moored, the fact that the plaintiff has thus occupied the property in question for over twenty years, all strongly suggest that he has done nothing detrimental to river and navigation, but that on the contrary his wharf has been a benefit to the boating public." So from being an obstruction to navigation, the maintenance of a floating wharf of that kind is, in the circumstances stated by the learned Chancellor, a positive convenience to those members of the public who navigate the river with small craft. As a riparian owner the plaintiff would be at liberty to construct such a wharf, and would be entitled to maintain an action for the injuries to it which are complained of.

For these reasons their lordships agree with the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal that judgment should be given for the plaintiff, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeal and dismiss this appeal. The costs will be paid by the appellants.

WINDHILL LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH v. VINT. (a.)

Contract — Illegality — Highway — Prosecution for obstructing highway—Agreement for withdrawal—Stifling a prosecution—Specific performance.

There can be no valid agreement for the withdrawal of a prosecution where the offence is a matter of public concern, because, even though there may be no injury to the public in the particular case, the determination of what ought to be done in such a matter ought not to be withdrawn from the ordinary administration of the law and taken into the hands of private individuals. Such an agreement amounts to stifling the prosecution—i.e., putting a stop to it otherwise than in the ordinary course of law, and is none the less a diversion of the course of justice, though the terms of the contract be in fact such as to carry out the object of the prosecution.

At the trial of an indictment brought by a local board against certain persons for obstructing a highway, an agreement was come to that the defendants should restore the highway within seven years; that in the meantime the indictment should lie in the office; and that when the defendants had carried out their undertaking to restore the highway the board should consent to a verdict of "Not guilty." The terms were approved by the court. The defendants not having restored the highway within the agreed term, the board brought an action for specific performance of the agreement.

Held (affirming the decision of Stirling, J.), that the prosecution in the present case was in respect of a matter of public concern; that the effect of the agreement was to put an end to that prosecution in a manner not depending on the ordinary course of the administration of justice; and, consequently, though the agreement was not entered into in consideration of any personal benefit to the prosecutors, it was illegal, and could not be enforced.

Keir v. Leeman, 6 Q. B. 308, 9 Ib. 371, followed.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

The defendants were indicted on the prosecution of the plaintiff board at the Leeds Summer Assizes in 1880 for obstructing a highway called Gaisby-lane, in the district of the plaintiff board, by digging and excavating a stone quarry to a great depth, the whole width of the roadway. The defendants pleaded "Not guilty," though they had no real defence to the prosecution. An agreement was then come to between the parties, and a written memorandum, dated the 4th of August, 1880, was signed by their respective solicitors and initialled by counsel, whereby it was agreed (subject to the approval of the court), (1) that the defendants should within seven years from that date restore Gaisby-lane between specified points, and give it a minimum width of ten yards; (4) that on those and certain other conditions, the board would concur in the necessary steps for stopping up the footpath; and (5) that the indictment should lie in the office as a security for the observance of the terms agreed upon, and that such terms should, if required by either party, be embodied in a deed to which the plaintiffs, the defendants, and one George Vint were to be parties, and that as soon as the terms of the agreement had been complied with, a verdict of "Not guilty" was to be consented to by the board. At the trial the court approved of the terms, and ordered the indictment to lie in the office. The terms were accordingly embodied in a deed dated the 9th of November, 1880, which contained a covenant by the defendants to restore Gaisby-lane within seven years from the 4th of August, and to make the road of the stipulated width. At the end of the seven years the defendants had not restored the highway, and the board brought this action to enforce specific performance of the covenant.

Stirling, J., held that the covenant was based on an illegal consideration, and could not be enforced, and though he absolved the parties from any unlawful intention, he considered he was bound by the principle laid down in Keir v. Leeman, 9 Q. B. 371, at p. 395.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., Bardswell, and R. S. Wright, for the appellants.—The question is whether the consideration is illegal. There was really no stifling of a criminal prosecution here, and as that is the test of illegality the consideration was not illegal: Wallace v. Hardacre, 1 Camp. 45; Williams v. Bayley, L. R. 1 E. & I. App. 200, 14 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4. "Stifling" implies a corrupt bargain. Here there was no personal benefit to the prosecutors. Fallowes v. Taylor, 7 T. R. 475, is a clear decision in our favour. Other cases are Coppock v. Bower, 4 M. & W. 361; Keir v. Leeman, 6 Q. B. 308 (and in the Exchequer Chamber), L. R. 9 Q. B. 371, which is the case mainly relied on against us. This road is vested in the board, and they might have brought a civil action: Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co., 32 W. R. 776, 13 Q. B. D. 904. [Sir H. Davey, Q.C., referred to Wallasey Local Board v. Gracey, 35 W. R. 694, 36 Ch. D. 593.] In Ex parte Dobson, 11 W. R. 330, it was held that where an order had been made directing the criminal prosecution of a bankrupt for misdemeanour, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the court would stay such proceedings on payment of an adequate sum to the assignees. Indictments for obstruction and non-repair, though in form criminal, are really civil proceedings—so much so that an Act has been passed to allow parties to give evidence in such cases. The principle underlying all the cases is that an agreement is illegal where the object of the prosecution which is to be stopped is to punish the offender. Here the object is not to punish the offender, but simply to enforce the law. Upon conviction for obstruction of highways a nominal fine is sometimes imposed, and if the defendant satisfies the court that he is about to remove the nuisance, the court may order the writ to be suspended, or to lie in the office for a certain time to give the defendant an opportunity of removing the nuisance himself: Short and Mellor's Crown Office Practice, p. 235. Again, in Chitty's Criminal Law, 2nd ed., at p. 429, it is stated that on an indictment for neglecting to repair a highway the defendant may confess, and upon affidavit that the way is repaired, may submit to a small fine. In Reg. v. Paget, 3 F. & F. 29, Wightman, J., held that on an indictment for obstructing a highway, where it appears that the obstruction has been removed, there is substantially an end of the proceeding, its object having been attained. There was nothing in the intention of the agreement here so contrary to the policy of the law as to make it inadmissible. There would have been nothing illegal in the plaintiffs dropping the prosecution. The agreement was under seal, so that no consideration was necessary. Was there, then, anything illegal in agreeing to do something which they had an unquestionable right to do without an agreement? Not unless the purpose or effect was to thwart the object of the law. [FRY, L.J., referred to Hall v. Dyson, 17 Q. B. 785.] Stirling, J., decided against the plaintiffs with reluctance, feeling the hardship of their case, but he thought he was bound by Keir v. Leeman. There, however, the facts were very different from those of the present case; besides that, the offence there was much more serious. The object of the law in prosecutions for obstructing highways is not to punish the offender, but to get the obstruction removed. The agreement was really no more than an agreement to ask the court for a stay of proceedings, in order that the object of the prosecution might be brought about in a reasonable way. In every case from 1774 to 1884 the test applied by the judges has been whether the effect of the agreement in question was to "stifle the prosecution." The reason why a prosecution must not be stifled is that, if once dropped, it cannot be taken up again—nemo bis vexari potest. That reason does not apply here, as, the obstruction being a continuing nuisance, anyone can prosecute as long as it lasts. [LOPES, L.J., suggested that the proper course would have been to have let the offender be found guilty, and then to have postponed judgment, and if he abated the nuisance within a reasonable time, to have then inflicted a nominal fine.] The agreement is illegal only if the object or effect is to prevent the law being carried out: Johnson v. Ogilby, 3 P. Wms. 277. There must be an intention to do something wrong: Collins v. Blantern, 1 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., at p. 398. [LOPES, L.J.—Is not the reason of the thing that it is considered inexpedient to stop the course of the law where a public right is involved?] There was no stopping the course of the law here.

They also referred to Edgcombe v. Rodd, 5 East, 294; Beeley v. Wingfield, 11 East, 46; Reg. v. Hardey, 14 Q. B. 529; Fisher v. Apollinaris Co., 23 W. R. 460, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 297; and Flower v. Sadler, 10 Q. B. D. 572, 31 W. R. Dig. 45.

Fischer, Q.C., Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and R. C. Glen, for the respondents, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of Stirling, J., that the action be dismissed on the ground that the agreement sued upon was an illegal one, and that it was an agreement to stifle (to use the word that is so commonly used) a prosecution.

I do not intend to enter at all into the question whether an agreement to stifle any prosecution is illegal or not. That does not arise here; because this was clearly a prosecution on a public matter—a matter which concerned the public. It was an interference with the public highway in a very serious manner; and this agreement was made to postpone the prosecution for a considerable time, and that could, of course, only be done with the consent of the judge. There was an agreement that, upon certain acts being done by the defendants who were prosecuted, the prosecutors would not object to a verdict of "Not guilty." Now, how was the course which was adopted, dealt with and defended by the counsel for the appellants? As I understood Mr. Graham Hastings' argument, he said that if there was no money received for the private benefit of the prosecutor, such an agreement was not illegal. It was said on the other hand by Mr. R. S. Wright (and I think that was the more reasonable argument) that such an agreement would not be illegal unless the agreement had for its object the preventing effect being given to the law or preventing the object of the prosecution being attained. It is impossible, to my mind, to accede to Mr. Graham Hastings' argument. But I go further, and say that I cannot accede to the argument addressed to us by Mr. Wright. I put it to him whether he could find any authority in favour of such an agreement being legal, and he very fairly admitted that he could not. But he said that what was stated in his argument, which I have referred to, must be the reason of the thing. To my mind the reason of the thing goes deeper than that: it is this—that the court will not allow as legal any agreement which has the effect of withdrawing from the ordinary course of justice a prosecution where the offence is an injury to the public. It would be the case of persons taking into their own hands the determining what ought to be done; and that ought not to be taken into the hands of any individuals, even if they are a quasi-public body like the plaintiffs here, but ought to be left to the due administration of the law, and to the judges who can determine what in the particular case ought to be done. I think that is independent of the question whether in the particular case there can be or cannot be any injury to the public; but the administration of the law and the object which the law has in view, cannot be taken out of the hands of the judge, and put into the hands of a private individual. That, to my mind, is illegal.

I will not go into the authorities, but many of them have been referred to. They do not lay down that view definitely, I agree; but that must be the object, and that must be the principle upon which the cases are decided. I think I need hardly refer to the case of Keir v. Leeman; but it is laid down there that stifling a prosecution for a public object is illegal, and that must be upon the principle I have referred to, even though in the individual case it could be shown, or would be shown, that there is no injury to the public in taking the administration of the law out of the hands of those to whom it is committed—namely, the judges—and putting it into the hands of a private individual to determine what shall be done in the particular case. Here it was also argued that there was not a stifling of the prosecution; but I think that stifling (one need not go to the words) does mean this:—the preventing the prosecution which has been instituted being conducted in the ordinary course. I think here this certainly does so; because, not only does it postpone it, but there is an agreement by the prosecutors that certain things shall be done—I will not enter into the question whether that is all that ought to be done or not—and if certain things are done, the prosecutors, who have taken the matter into their hands, would not object to a verdict of "Not guilty."

In my opinion, the decision of Stirling, J., was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—In this case the contract provided that the indictment which was pending should lie in the office (in the language of the agreement) for the term of seven years, and that when the terms of the agreement were fulfilled a verdict of "Not guilty" should be consented to by the local board. In my judgment, that means an agreement to stifle the prosecution—that is to say, an agreement to put an end to it in a manner which does not depend upon the ordinary course of law. It is to put an end to it, in a certain contingency, by consent.

Now I confess it appears to me that the law upon this point is determined by the case of Keir v. Leeman. That lays down this principle (which I take to be one of general application) that where the matters of indictment are matters of public concern, they are not the subject of compromise. To use the language of the learned judge in the Court of Queen's Bench: "These are matters of public concern, and therefore not legally the subject of a compromise." A similar thing was held in the same case when it came before the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in delivering judgment in that court, says: "The offence is an assault coupled with riot and the obstruction of a public officer. No case has said that it is lawful to compromise such an offence." I think, therefore, the whole inquiry is this—whether the subject of the indictment in the present instance is a matter of general public concern. That question, it appears to me, must be answered in the affirmative. Therefore, upon the principle of that case, it appears to me that the decision of Stirling, J., was correct.

But then two arguments are addressed to us. It is said that that principle does not apply where the benefit secured by the agreement is a benefit secured to the public by the contracting party, and not to some private individual whom he desires to favour. I am of opinion that no such exception can be made. If that exception were valid it would seem to follow that a prosecution for manslaughter, or, for aught I know, for murder, could be validly compromised with the prosecutor on agreement that the defendant pay £1,000 to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because that would be a consideration for the public benefit. But I do not think the prosecutor is at liberty to weigh the advantage to the public in continuing the prosecution, against the advantage of some sum of money being paid to the public, or against something else which is to be done, and that he has no right to put those two things into the balance, and determine in favour of the one as against the other.

Then it is argued by Mr. Wright that there is another exception to the rule, and it is this, that if the stipulation in the contract is to the same effect as the object of the prosecution, or, in other words, if the object of the prosecution is carried into effect by the terms of the contract, the contract is valid, and the compromise is good. It must be admitted that no case can be produced in support of this contention, nor does it appear to me to be sound in principle; because the result of it is to remove from the ordinary administration of the law by the court, the decision of a question which was pending before it.

Now, to illustrate it by the present case, if this case had taken the ordinary course it would have been for the learned judge before whom the defendants might be brought, to pass sentence, to determine what was to be done with them, and if he thought a serious outrage had been done to public rights he might have shown his sense of the impropriety and wrongfulness of the defendants' conduct by fine or by imprisonment. Now that whole power which would be vested in the judge before whom, after the adjournment, the case might come, is taken away from that judge (so far as the contracting parties could take it) by one of them consenting that a verdict of "Not guilty" should be entered. We have, therefore, a case in which a contract is entered into for the purpose of diverting—I may say perverting—the course of justice; and, although I agree in this case it was entered into with perfect good faith and with all the security which could possibly be given to such an agreement, I nevertheless think that the general principle applies, and that we cannot give effect to the agreement, the consideration of which is the diverting the course of public justice.

For these reasons I think the appeal fails.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree with the judgments which have been delivered, and have but a very few words to add.

As a general principle it may be stated that it is the duty of every prosecutor, where the public are interested, to prosecute either to conviction or to acquittal. Again, it may be stated as a general principle that it is inexpedient to stop the course of the law in a criminal matter where a public right is involved—that it is inexpedient to take out of the hands of the law, and commit to an individual, the determination of what is to be done in a particular case. Now, those being general principles, with regard to the present case I have only to state that, in my opinion, this case falls well within the decision of Keir v. Leeman, and I shall satisfy myself by merely citing the words at the end of Lord Denman's judgment. He says:—"But if the offence is of a public nature, no agreement can be valid that is founded on the consideration of stifling a prosecution for it." Now there can be no doubt that in the present case the offence was of a public nature, and, in my opinion, the consideration for the agreement which was entered into was the consent to an acquittal in the future, which seems to me, in effect, to be a stifling of a prosecution. I think that the agreement in question was against public policy and illegal, and that, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

TUCKER v. NEW BRUNSWICK TRADING CO. OF LONDON. (a.)

Injunction — Undertaking as to damages — Damages sustained by others than parties restrained.

As a general rule, where an interim or interlocutory injunction is granted, the undertaking as to damages should not be limited to the damages sustained by the party restrained.

An action was brought against A., B., and the C. Co. for an injunction to restrain the C. Co. from confirming by general meeting certain agreements between them and the other defendants. An interim injunction having been granted, A.'s counsel asked for the usual undertaking as to damages, and plaintiff's counsel replied that it would, of course, be given. B. did not appear, not having been served with notice of the motion for the injunction. In drawing up the order the registrar limited the undertaking to damages sustained by the C. Co. (as being the only parties restrained by the injunction), and the order was passed and entered in that form. A. and B. having appealed, and asked that the undertaking might be extended to damages sustained by them respectively,

Held, that, A. having asked for an undertaking, and the plaintiff's counsel having assented, the order must be set right by extending the undertaking to damages sustained by A., but that B., not having applied for or been promised an undertaking, could not now get it extended to damages incurred by him, for that, the court having no power to order an undertaking to be given (an undertaking being merely a condition which the court has power to impose upon the granting of an injunction), the court cannot extend such an undertaking subsequently in the way proposed, as the party might, if asked at the time, have preferred to forego his injunction.

Held, further, that A. ought to have applied to the judge below to set the order right, even after it has been passed and entered, as not correctly expressing the effect of the judgment pronounced, and consequently no order as to the costs occasioned by the appeal would be made.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

The plaintiff was a shareholder in the defendant company, and it appeared that, in reliance upon certain agreements, he had given a guarantee for the company. He had since brought this action against them, and against J. T. Matthews, Lamplough & Co., and the Bank of Montreal, for an injunction to restrain the company from confirming at a general meeting either an agreement of the 26th day of February, 1890, between C. E. Lamplough, J. T. Matthews, W. Lamplough & Co., and the defendant company, or another agreement of the same date between the said defendant company and J. T. Matthews, and also for an injunction to restrain Matthews and the defendant company from registering either of the two last-mentioned agreements in Canada as a document affecting or dealing with any landed property of the company in Canada.

The plaintiff having applied ex parte for an injunction, Chitty, J., refused such application, but gave leave to serve short notice of motion, which was accordingly served on the company and on Matthews, and when the motion came on Chitty, J., ordered it to stand over for a week, granting an interim injunction till then, against the company only. On behalf of Matthews the usual undertaking as to damages was asked for, and the plaintiff's counsel replied that of course it would be given.

The registrar, however, drew up the order in such a way as to limit the undertaking to damages sustained by the defendant company, though the question whether it ought not to extend to damages sustained by Matthews was discussed before him.

When the motion came on again, it was directed to stand over, without any further order being made, and a petition to wind up the company was now pending.

Matthews and Lamplough & Co. appealed from the order granting the interim injunction so far as it limited the plaintiff's undertaking to damages sustained by the company, and asked that it should be extended to include damages sustained by them or either of them.

Stokes, for the appellants.

Alexander Young, for the plaintiff.—Such an undertaking is always limited to damages sustained by the person against whom the injunction is granted, and that is the meaning of the phrase "the usual undertaking." In any case the Court of Appeal could not now extend it, because they cannot compel an undertaking to be given, and the plaintiff would have chosen to forego the injunction rather than give the extended undertaking. Moreover, the appeal is an entirely useless one, Matthews having suffered no damage. [COTTON, L.J.—In that case you will not have to pay anything.]

Stokes, in reply.—Lamplough & Co. are parties to the agreement, and are damnified by the injunction as much as the defendant company. They ought, therefore, to be protected by the undertaking, which is always given in such cases: Chappell v. Davidson, 8 De G. M. & G. 1. As to Matthews, counsel gave the undertaking orally, and the registrar was, therefore, clearly wrong in his case. As to Lamplough & Co., they had not been served, so that the order was ex parte in their case, and they ought not to be prejudiced. Can a plaintiff, having got all he wants, refuse to pay the stipulated price for it?

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal under somewhat unusual circumstances. An application was made by the plaintiff for an injunction, which was granted on the terms of "the usual undertaking" being given as to damages. Both the company and Matthews appeared at the hearing of the motion, and counsel for Matthews applied for the usual undertaking, and the plaintiff's counsel assented. But the order was drawn up and passed with an undertaking only as to damages sustained by the company. I think that was wrong. Matthews' counsel applied for the usual undertaking as to damages, and the plaintiff's counsel said of course it would be given. He assented as to both the company and Matthews, and, accordingly, when the order was drawn up, the undertaking ought to have been made to apply to damages sustained by both of those parties. Therefore, what we have now to do is this—we do not allow the appeal, but we set the order right, the order as drawn up not expressing the order as really made.

Then, as to the appeal of Lamplough & Co., in my opinion they cannot get the order as drawn up altered in their favour, because we ought not to impose on the plaintiff any undertaking which he did not actually give. If a defendant applies for an undertaking, the plaintiff has the option of declining to give it, with the result that he will not get his order. The court only makes the undertaking a condition of granting the injunction; if the plaintiff declines to give it, the court can refuse the injunction, but it cannot compel the plaintiff to give an undertaking. Therefore, as regards Lamplough & Co., we cannot, in my opinion, impose this undertaking on the plaintiff, because he might say he did not care to have the injunction on such terms. I think that, as a general rule, an undertaking ought not to be confined to damages sustained by the person against whom the injunction is granted. In Pemberton on Decrees, 4th ed., p. 435, it is said that "the undertaking applies to all the defendants, although one or more only may be restrained." Mr. Pemberton does not give any authority for that statement, but I think it is a correct statement of the practice.

Then, as regards costs, I think if the judge himself had been applied to, he might have set the matter right; for though the order had been passed and entered, he had jurisdiction to correct it as not rightly expressing the order he had made. Extra costs have no doubt been caused by coming to this court, and I think, therefore, that we should give no costs on either side.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I agree. As regards Matthews there is no difficulty, as he asked for an undertaking and got it, and it was by a mere misapprehension on the part of the registrar that the order as drawn up did not extend the benefit of the undertaking to him. An undertaking is the price of an injunction, and if a man gets an injunction he must pay the price of it.

As regards Lamplough & Co. there is more difficulty. They did not ask for an injunction, and Mr. Young says if it had been put to him he would not have taken the injunction at the price. I think, therefore, that in Lamplough & Co.'s case this must be regarded as a step which cannot be set right.

As to the costs, I agree with Cotton, L.J.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

BUCKLE v. FREDERICKS. (a.)

Covenant—Restrictive covenant—Covenant not to carry on the trade of retailer of wine, spirits, or beer—Sale at refreshment bar of theatre—Injunction.

The lessee of a theatre, for the purpose of facilitating egress therefrom, bought a plot of ground adjoining it, which (as he had notice) was subject to a covenant against carrying on the trade of a retailer of wine, spirits, or beer, and upon that plot he built an annexe to the theatre containing a staircase and exits from the theatre. He also put up on each floor or landing of the annexe, a refreshment bar, at which any person paying for admission to see the theatrical performances could purchase wine, spirits, and beer to be drunk on the premises, but which was not otherwise open to the public.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the lessee's conduct amounted to carrying on the trade of a retailer of wine, spirits, and beer, and was a breach of the covenant which must be restrained by injunction.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

This was an appeal by the defendant from an order of Kekewich, J., restraining him until the trial of the action from carrying on at the Theatre Royal, Stratford, Essex, the business of an innkeeper, victualler, or retailer of wine, spirits, or beer. The defendant was the lessee of the Theatre Royal, and had purchased from one Purkis, in June, 1887, a plot of land adjoining it, upon which he had built an addition to the theatre containing a staircase for the purpose of providing additional exits in case of fire or other emergency. He had also put up on each floor or landing a refreshment bar, at which wine, spirits, and beer were sold, for the convenience of persons visiting the theatre. There were, however, no means of access to these bars except by going into the theatre while a performance was going on, and that could only be done by paying the usual charge for admission, which varied from sixpence to two shillings.

The plot of land in question had formed part of a building estate subject to restrictive conditions, one of which was that no house for the sale of beer, wine, or spirituous liquors should be erected, nor should the trade of an innkeeper, victualler, or retailer of wine, spirits, or beer be carried on upon any lot. Purkis had purchased under the conditions and covenanted to observe them. The defendant's licence entitled him to sell beer, spirits, and wine in the theatre.

The action was brought by purchasers of other lots for an injunction to restrain the defendant from carrying on the trade aforesaid upon the plot purchased by him from Purkis, and it was not disputed that he had notice of the covenant at the time of such purchase.

Kekewich, J., held that the defendant was committing a breach of the covenant, and accordingly granted an interim injunction in the terms above mentioned.

The defendant appealed.

Haldane, Q.C., and Lyttleton Chubb, for the appellant.—There is no sale to the public here. The refreshment bars are merely for the convenience of persons attending the performances at the theatre. The case is analogous to the supplying of liquors at a club to the members, which surely would not be an infringement of a covenant like this, merely intended to prevent the establishment of anything in the nature of a public-house.

They referred to Jones v. Bone, 18 W. R. 489, L. R. 9 Eq. 674.

Marten, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the respondents.—In the case of a club there is really no sale of the liquors: Graff v. Evans, 30 W. R. 380, 8 Q. B. D. 373. The present case is governed by Bishop of St. Albans v. Battersby, 26 W. R. 679, 3 Q. B. D. 359; and London and Suburban Land and Building Co. v. Field, 16 Ch. D. 645, 29 W. R. Dig. 66, but the covenant here is more comprehensive, and exactly applies to the breach. Jones v. Bone is distinguishable on the ground that the defendant there was carrying on a new sort of business which had sprung up since the covenant was made, and was therefore not within its purview.

Haldane, Q.C. replied.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COTTON, L.J.—In this case Kekewich, J., has granted an injunction to restrain the defendant from carrying on the trade of a victualler, or a retailer of wine, spirits, or beer, in a building annexed to the Theatre Royal, Stratford, the building being on a plot of ground which is subject to the restrictive covenant in question. The defendant, who is the proprietor of the theatre, in order to provide better egress from it, pulled down an adjoining house, and erected a building of considerable height, which provided exits from the different floors. But then he arranged so as to provide also upon each floor the means of selling refreshments, wine, spirits, and beer, to persons visiting the theatre. Having regard to the prices charged for admission, I think there was in this case a carrying on by the defendant of the trade of a retailer of wine, spirits, and beer. He contends that he is not carrying on that trade, but the business of a theatrical manager, and that the supplying of refreshments is merely incidental to that business. But, in my opinion, he, at any rate, carries on the sale of refreshments in such a way as to be a substantial part of the business of carrying on the theatre, and I cannot say he is not carrying on the "trade of a retailer of wines, spirits, and beer." In my opinion, we ought not to restrict the plain meaning of these words—we must not strike out from the covenant the words which forbid that. Then it was said that the case of Jones v. Bone governs this case in favour of the defendant. I do not understand that James, L.J., decided that there was in that case no breach of the covenant, but only that there was not such a breach as ought to be restrained by an injunction; and he points out the distinction between the new sort of business carried on by the defendant and that against which the covenant was directed. The present case is, moreover, a very different one, as the defendant is not (as in that case) selling beer in bottles not to be opened on the premises, but is selling it to be drunk on the premises. In my opinion, we need not go into the question whether the public could get into this building without paying sixpence or a shilling. I think the appeal fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The defendant here claims under a conveyance containing the restrictive covenant which we are considering, and which is divisible in fact into two stipulations. One of those stipulations is as follows:—"No public-house, beerhouse, or house for the sale of beer, wine, or spirituous liquors shall be erected." That refers to the class of buildings to be erected. Then there was this: "Nor shall the trade of an innkeeper, victualler, or retailer of wine, spirits, or beer be carried on upon any lot." Now, the defendant is, in fact, selling by retail on his lot, wine, spirits, and beer every night in the year, except Sundays, to such of the public as choose to pay the sixpence for going into the theatre. If that is not carrying on the trade of a retailer of wine, spirits, and beer I should like to know what is. There is no doubt he would have been a trader under the old bankruptcy law. It is said he is only carrying on the business of a theatre proprietor, and that this trade is only ancillary to that. That may be quite true, but still he is carrying on the trade. It appears to me, therefore, that, upon the construction of this covenant, he is doing what he is forbidden by it to do.

Then it is contended that this case is governed by Jones v. Bone. I do not think it is. In that case, grocers having become entitled, in consequence of an alteration in the excise law, to sell wine in bottles, it was considered that by doing so the defendant there was not carrying on the trade of a "seller by retail of wine, beer, spirits, or spirituous liquors" within the covenant, which was not directed against such a trade as that carried on by the defendant in that case. Mr. Haldane says this covenant was not intended to apply to such a case as the present. But draftsmen put in general words to cover cases which do not occur to their minds at the time, and it seems to me that the draftsman here has put in general words which cover the present case.

LOPES, L.J. — There are three refreshment bars attached to the defendant's theatre, to which the public can obtain admission by paying sixpence. No doubt it may be said his chief trade is that of carrying on the theatre; but a man may carry on several trades at the same time and place. Do the facts here bring the case within the words of the covenant? Is the defendant carrying on the trade of a retailer of wine, spirits, and beer? I think he is, and I much doubt whether it is not the most profitable part of his business. I think myself that the facts here are within both the letter and the spirit of the covenant. Cases have been referred to, but I think this question must be decided on the construction of this covenant, and that none of the cases assist us. I think this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Ex parte HEPBURN.
In re SMITH. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Leasehold interest—Mortgage by sub-demise—Assignment by mortgagee to trustee for himself—Disclaimer by trustee in bankruptcy—Vesting order—Exclusion of mortgagee and his assignee—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 55, sub-section (6).

Where a mortgagee by sub-demise has, after the bankruptcy of the lessee, assigned his mortgage to a trustee for himself, he is still liable to have an order made against him at the instance of the lessor under section 55, sub-section (6), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, excluding him from all interest in, and security upon, the demised property unless he elect to take an order vesting the property in him, subject to the bankrupt's liabilities in respect thereof at the date of the filing of the petition.

Such an assignment in trust is, as between the mortgagee and the landlord, absolutely void.

Appeal from Cave, J., in bankruptcy.

In February, 1884, Smith mortgaged certain leasehold property to Messrs. Hepburn by sub-demise to secure £2,000 and interest. In the following year Smith was adjudicated a bankrupt.

In March, 1890, the trustee in the bankruptcy gave notice to Messrs. Hepburn that he intended to apply under section 55, sub-section (3), for leave to disclaim the lease.

On the 16th of April Messrs. Hepburn, by a deed of assignment, transferred the mortgage to one Adcock, a clerk, to hold the same in trust for the assignors.

On the 17th of April the trustee, by leave of the registrar, disclaimed the lease.

On the 2nd of May the original lessor served notice of motion on Messrs. Hepburn and upon Adcock for an order, under section 55, sub-section (6), that each of them should be excluded from all interest in and security upon the demised property unless Messrs. Hepburn should within a limited time elect to take an order vesting in them the whole of the property comprised in the original lease to Smith, subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the lease at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed.

Cave, J., on the 12th of June, made the order against Messrs. Hepburn, and declined to order that the property should be vested in Adcock, who was willing to accept it, subject to the liabilities.

From this order Messrs. Hepburn appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Yate Lee, for the appellants.—This order cannot be made against Messrs. Hepburn, but only against Adcock, although we admit that he is a mere nominee of Messrs. Hepburns'. The words in section 55, sub-section (6), "person claiming under the bankrupt, whether as underlessee or as mortgagee by demise," must include the transferee of a mortgage; the person meant is the person in whom the lease is vested—that is, Adcock, not Messrs. Hepburn. When Messrs. Hepburn transferred the mortgage they had a perfect right to do so; they were then under no legal liability to the original lessor: Cox v. Bishop, 5 W. R. 437, 8 De G. M. & G. 815. The Legislature did not intend to give the landlord this great benefit by means of the bankruptcy of his lessee—the substitution of a solvent for an insolvent tenant. This deed of assignment was not a mere sham; it intended to operate as it actually operated—as a transfer of the legal estate: Fagg v. Dobie, 3 Y. & C. Ex. 96.

Woolf, Q.C. (A. T. Lawrence with him), for the respondent, the lessor.—Messrs. Hepburn have all the equitable interest, and are therefore mortgagees by demise within sub-section (6). It follows the order was rightly made: In re Finley, 37 W. R. 6, 21 Q. B. D. 475. [He was stopped by the court.]

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the landlord has claimed the interference of the court of bankruptcy, and asks that a similar order should be made in his favour to the one which was made in Finley's case, and that that order should be made against Messrs. Hepburn as the sub-lessees. Unless the case is altered by means of the conveyancing plan which has been adopted, it is governed by In re Finley. The question, therefore, is, is that plan to succeed? To allow it to succeed would be to uphold that which has no effect whatever except to defeat the Act of Parliament and to take away the rights which it gives to the landlord. Where that is to be the only effect of a document this court will regard it as a sham, and will treat it as absolutely void. I will alter the words of Alderson, B., in Fagg v. Dobie, and instead of the word "fraudulent" will use the word "sham." "If a party assign nominally only, retaining the beneficial possession all the time, it is a sham, because whilst he assumes to do one thing, he really does another." That seems to me exactly to describe this case. I think, therefore, that Cave, J., was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also think that this ingenious attempt ought not to succeed. Of course, in a sense, it is legitimate; the parties to the deed meant what they said. But the object was to make an instrument which should not affect the parties to it, but which should take away rights which the landlord would otherwise have. Will this court give effect to that? The effect as between the parties is absolutely nil. If you look through the transaction you see that the real position is that the Messrs. Hepburn still remain the mortgagees, and have all the interest except such as a bare trustee has. Is this to be treated as a genuine assignment to Adcock leaving out of sight the real intention of the transaction? It is like the case of a shareholder assigning his shares to a trustee for himself in order to get rid of his liability. Sub-section (6) says that the court may make an order vesting the property in "any person entitled thereto," and Messrs. Hepburn are in reality persons entitled thereto. I think the order of Cave, J., was right.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. One may start with the premiss that the landlord has rights under this section. If that be so, those rights cannot be defeated by an assignment to a trustee in trust for the assignor. Such a deed, as against the landlord, is a mere sham, and is absolutely void.

Motion.

This was a motion to set aside the service of a writ under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiff carried on business at Lagos, on the west coast of Africa, and the defendants, Hirsch, Pritchard, & Co., were his London agents, the defendant Hirsch being a French subject, and residing in France.

It was assumed that the defendant Pritchard was within the jurisdiction when the writ was served. He was also a British subject, but (semble) from the language of the judgment his nationality was immaterial.

On the 25th of April, 1890, the plaintiff issued a writ against the defendants claiming an account and consequent relief.

This was served on the 23rd of April, 1890, on James Merritt, the defendants' manager, at their place of business in Fore-street, London.

On the 11th of July the defendant Hirsch moved to set aside the above service on four grounds, viz.:—

(1) That the partnership was dissolved at the time of action brought;

(2) That the plaintiff knew of such dissolution;

(3) That ord. 9, r. 6, does not apply to a foreign partnership.

(4) That the place of service was not the defendants' place of business, but only a warehouse.

Of these (1) was proved at the hearing, (2) was held not proved, and (4) was subsequently abandoned.

Levett, for Hirsch.—I take all the above points, though I contend that (2) is unnecessary, as the proviso in ord. 16, r. 14, only applies where the plaintiff had notice of the dissolution. If he had no notice the proviso must be stuck out, in which case the rule becomes the same as ord. 16, r. 10, of the Rules of 1875, under which Ex parte Young, 30 W. R. 330, 19 Ch. D. 124, was decided. As to the third point, see Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526; Pollexfen v. Sibson, 34 W. R. 534, 16 Q. B. D. 792; and Davies v. André, ante, p. 437, 24 Q. B. D. 598.

Romer, Q.C., and Theodore Ribton, for the plaintiff.—Ord. 16, r. 14, was altered to meet Ex parte Young. Previous to the alteration the point was arguable, but it is so no longer: Vide Lord Selborne's remarks in Ex parte Young, 30 W. R., at p. 331, 19 Ch. D., at 131, and Cotton, L.J., 30 W. R., at p. 331, 19 Ch. D., at p. 134.

Levett, in reply.—The business must be going on at the time of service. Mr. Merritt had not, in fact, at the time of service, the management of any partnership business, because the partnership was gone. The principle of law underlying substituted service—viz., that it is likely to come to the notice of the person sought to be served—must be considered. Then Hirsch is a foreigner, and within Russell v. Cambefort. Pollexfen v. Sibson is really overruled by that case, except as to service on the individual partner who was served within the jurisdiction, a point scarcely requiring authority.

CHITTY, J., after stating the facts as above, proceeded:—Now Hirsch says, and it is proved, that he is a foreigner resident and domiciled in France and out of the jurisdiction of this court, and that at the time the writ was issued the Fore-street business was carried on by him alone. Ord. 9, r. 6, provides, inter alia, that where a firm is sued, service on the manager at the principal place of business within the jurisdiction is good service on the firm. In interpreting that rule regard must be had to the principles of international law, and if the question were open to me I should have to consider whether, according to those principles, a State allowing foreigners to carry on business here may not demand from them, in return for the protection afforded by the laws of the State, submission to the ordinary rules of service on their manager here. I am precluded from considering this point by Russell v. Cambefort. In that case the three members of the firm were all foreigners residing out of the jurisdiction, and service effected on their manager in England was held bad; and similarly where a foreigner residing out of the jurisdiction is sole proprietor, the service would be bad.

If these were the only facts my decision would be in favour of Mr. Hirsch. The additional facts are as follows:—[His lordship here went at length through the evidence, and after holding that the firm had been dissolved before action brought, but that the plaintiff had no knowledge of such dissolution, proceeded:—]

Now I come to the argument on ord. 16, r. 14. It is said that the proviso at the end of that rule was added to meet the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Young. As the order stood without the proviso there was a question of construction raised which is stated by Lord Selborne in Ex parte Young. On this point he expressed no opinion, merely saying he was not convinced by the argument. Cotton, L.J., however, held that the rules apply to persons who, at the time the action was commenced, were partners in an existing firm, and not to persons who have been partners in a firm which has been dissolved. Brett, L.J., was of the contrary opinion. He discussed the point at length, and held the service good.

Now when the proviso was added to the rule in question, the Rule Committee knew of this decision, which was given on the 28th of November, 1881, and of the doubts expressed by the Lord Chancellor and the differing opinions of the Lords Justices on the point whether the partnership must be a subsisting one or not, and under these circumstances they added this proviso, which provides affirmatively for the case where the plaintiff knows at the commencement of the action that the partnership is dissolved. It does not in terms provide for the case where he does not know of such dissolution, but it is impossible to read the proviso, which is a proviso in a rule relating to partnership actions, without seeing that the case was supposed to be included in the rule apart from the proviso.

Then Mr. Levett argues that there must be a continuing partnership for the rule to apply. He says that if there are three or more partners and one goes out, the rule applies to the partnership thus continued (though that, I may observe, is in fact a "new" not a "continuing" partnership), but that when there are only two partners, if one goes out the partnership is at an end, so the rule has no application. This appears to me against the express language of the rule, which says "any two or more persons," and I cannot adopt that contention.

I have now reached this point—viz., that if the business of Hirsch, Pritchard, & Co. had been carried on by Englishmen, and if the partnership was dissolved without the plaintiff's knowledge, service on the manager was good service. Mr. Levett next says that Forestreet was not the place of business of "this firm"; but it was where Hirsch, Pritchard, & Co., whoever they were, carried on business, and I therefore overrule that point.

Now I come to the last point, which is a curious one. Mr. Levett says:—"Granted that in the case of two British subjects carrying on business here, the service might be good, the facts here show that Hirsch is a foreigner. He resides in France, and is entitled to say, 'I owe no allegiance to this country, and if you want to sue me you must serve me with notice of the writ under order 11.'" For this Russell v. Cambefort is again relied on, and there are certainly observations in the judgment of Cotton, L.J., which countenance that argument. But there is a prior decision—Pollexfen v. Sibson. There all the partners were foreigners. They carried on business in America, and had no place of business within the jurisdiction, as appears from the papers which have been furnished to me. One of the partners, however—viz., Sibson—came to England, and was personally served under ord. 9, r. 6, and the question was whether it was good service on the partnership—i.e., on the other partners. Mathew and A. L. Smith, JJ., held that it was, and sitting here I should, of course, follow that decision of two judges of the Queen's Bench Division.

Now Cotton, L.J., in Russell v. Cambefort, refers to O'Neile v. Clason, 46 L. J. Q. B. 191, 25 W. R. Dig. 208, and expressly overrules it. He then deals with Pollexfen v. Sibson, which, he says, does not interfere with his decision, "for there one partner was served while in England. It did not decide that service can be effected on a foreign partnership under this rule." He goes on to call attention to certain expressions of Smith, J., which are inconsistent with his view, but he does not overrule the decision. Had he meant to do so I think he would have said so, as in the case of O'Neile v. Clason. As it is, he seems to me designedly to have saved it. At all events, that decision is not expressly overruled, and I have no jurisdiction to overrule it. If I thought it wholly wrong, I could only decline to follow it.

Mr. Levett is right in saying that members of the firm sued and served here are rightly served as to all of them within the jurisdiction, though not served personally, but only by serving the manager at the place of business here, and that if I exclude foreigners out of the jurisdiction, from service under this rule they could be reached by concurrent writ for foreign service, of which notice would be served out of the jurisdiction; but I do not think that is sufficient reason for me to put so narrow a construction on the rule, or refuse to follow Pollexfen v. Sibson, which is a clear authority for the plaintiff, for in that case all the partners were American citizens, and the effect of that decision is plain. Service on one partner within the jurisdiction is good service on all the partners, although the partnership is a foreign partnership, and all the partners reside and are domiciled out of the jurisdiction. On the facts before me, although Pritchard is not a party to the motion, I am bound to decide that the service effected is a good service on him. Consequently the decision in Pollexfen v. Sibson applies, and the service is good as against Mr. Hirsch, although he resides out of the jurisdiction.

Motion dismissed.

Evidence was subsequently given showing conclusively that the plaintiff knew of the dissolution at the time of action brought, and the above order was reversed, and the service of the writ set aside.

premises in which the business was carried on was thereupon assigned to S., and C. entered into a covenant that he would not, "during the remainder of the term of the lease," carry on business within a mile of the premises. In February, 1871, a decree was made at the suit of S. prohibiting C. from carrying on the business within a mile of the premises. S., long after the lease had expired, served C. with notice of motion to commit him for breach of the injunction, and C. served S. with notice of a cross-motion to amend the decree by inserting in it words limiting the operation of the injunction to the duration of the term of the lease, which words, he alleged, had been accidentally omitted.

Held, that the decree should be amended by the insertion of the words omitted.

Motion.

The point for decision was whether a decree of the Court of Chancery made in the year 1871 should be amended by adding what was alleged to be an accidental omission therein.

The plaintiff and defendant were formerly partners in the business of hairdressers and perfumers carried on at No. 10, Tichborne-street, which was held by them under a lease for twenty-one years from the 24th of March, 1860. In December, 1868, they dissolved partnership. The lease was then assigned to the plaintiff, and in an agreement made between them, the defendant covenanted that he would not "during the remainder of the term of the said lease," carry on the business of a hairdresser and perfumer within one mile from No. 10, Tichborne-street.

In 1871 the plaintiff commenced an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from acting in violation of his covenant, the prayer in the plaintiff's bill of complaint asking for an injunction simply and not for an injunction limited to the duration of the lease of No. 10, Tichborne-street, and on the 20th of February, 1871, the plaintiff obtained a decree granting an injunction "perpetually to restrain" the defendant from doing certain specified acts connected with the sale of a particular perfume known as I Zingari Perfume, "and further to restrain the defendant John Bennett Clements from selling any perfume or in any other way carrying on the business of a hairdresser or perfumer within the distance of one mile from No. 10, Tichborne-street, in the county of Middlesex."

The lease of No. 10, Tichborne-street, which had been assigned to the plaintiff, and in reference to which the defendant had entered into the covenant above mentioned, expired in 1881.

The plaintiff in June, 1890, served the defendant with notice of motion to commit him for an alleged breach of the injunction restraining him from carrying on the business of a hairdresser or perfumer within a mile of No. 10, Tichborne-street, and the defendant served the plaintiff with notice of motion under ord. 28, r. 11, to amend the decree of the 20th of February, 1871, by inserting in it after the words "and further to restrain the defendant John Bennett Clements" the words "during the remainder of the term of the lease."

The Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 28, r. 11, provides: "Clerical mistakes in judgments or orders, or errors arising therein from any accidental slip or omission, may at any time be corrected by the court or a judge on motion or summons without an appeal."

Higgins, Q.C., and Warrington, for the plaintiff.—The defendant has committed a breach of the injunction. The Vice-Chancellor may have thought that the defendant acted so badly that he granted a perpetual injunction against him without reference to the terms of the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Henry Terrell.—The injunction was intended to be limited to the period of the duration of the lease of No. 10, Tichborne-street, and the words expressing that limitation were accidentally omitted in drawing up the decree. They ought to be inserted now under the provisions of ord. 28, r. 11.

They referred to Barker v. Purvis, W. N., 1887, p. 1; Fritz v. Hobson, 28 W. R. 722, 14 Ch. D. 542.

NORTH, J.—I think that the case is perfectly clear. [His lordship then referred to the agreements between the parties and to the deed of dissolution of the partnership, and continued:—] In 1890 the plaintiff brought an action to restrain the defendant from making the I Zingari perfume or carrying on the business of a hairdresser, or representing that the business he was carrying on was connected with that formerly carried on by the firm. The prayer asked merely for an injunction, and made no reference to a limited period only. The Vice-Chancellor took a strong view of the defendant's conduct, and used these words:—[His lordship then read a passage from the judgment, and proceeded:—] The order was clearly framed with that passage in the shorthand writer's notes, in view. The present motion is to add words to limit the period on the ground "that there is an error in the order by reason of the omission of the period for which the injunction is claimed." Mr. Higgins has said that the terms of the order are perpetual. I do not think that the word "perpetual" applies to both parts of the injunction; but if it did, my opinion would not be different, because I think that there has been an accidental omission in drawing up the order in the registrar's office. In my opinion, from the language of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, it is clear that he did not intend the injunction to be anything but what was intended in the agreement. What the Vice-Chancellor intended was that the injunction should follow the words of the agreement. If he had looked at the agreement instead of the prayer the mistake would not have arisen. If the matter had been brought before the Vice-Chancellor he would have directed the insertion of the words omitted. The words to be inserted are, "During the remainder of the term of the lease." This insertion will not alter the former part of the decree for the injunction. I do not give costs to either party. There will be one order in both motions.

Company—Arrangement with creditors—Debenture-holders—Sanction of scheme by court—Jurisdiction—Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 104), s. 2.

Debenture-holders are creditors of a company within the meaning of the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, s. 2, and the court has jurisdiction to sanction a scheme which provides that the debenture-holders shall accept fully paid-up shares in substitution for their debentures, if the court is satisfied that the arrangement is fair and equitable.

Petition.

This was a petition under the Companies Acts and the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, to obtain the sanction of the court to a scheme of arrangement between the company and its debenture-holders.

The company was incorporated in 1886 with a capital of £125,000 in shares of £1 each, of which 100,300 shares were issued and were fully paid up.

In 1888 debentures were issued of the nominal value of £50 each, and at the present time the total amount outstanding was £23,700.

In October, 1889, an extraordinary resolution for a voluntary winding up of the company was passed, and by a special resolution subsequently passed the liquidators were given a general authority to sell the property of the company to another company partly or wholly in consideration of shares in such new company.

By an agreement dated the 31st of December, 1889, with the Golden Leaf Co. the liquidators agreed to sell the business and property of the company to the new company in consideration of 100,300 shares in the new company, 13s. paid, subject to the debentures.

By an agreement dated the 22nd of January, 1890, and made between the Empire Co. and its liquidators of the first part, the Golden Leaf Co. of the second part, and E. H. Young, on behalf of himself and all other the debenture-holders of the Empire Co., of the third part, it was agreed that each debenture-holder of the Empire Co. should surrender to the new company the debentures held by him and receive in exchange fifty fully-paid up £1 shares in the new company for each £50 debenture surrendered in full discharge of all principal and interest due on such debentures. The agreement was made subject to the sanction of the court and of an extraordinary resolution of the Empire Co.

On the 12th of February, 1890, a meeting of the debenture-holders was held, in pursuance of an order made by North, J., for the purpose of considering the scheme of arrangement embodied in the above agreement, at which debenture-holders to the amount of £20,550 were present, and a resolution was passed approving of the scheme by all the debenture-holders present except four, whose debentures amounted in value to £650.

On the 24th of February, 1890, an extraordinary resolution was passed by the company approving the agreement.

The other debts of the company amounted to about £9,000 in America, and £500 here. Of the former about £7,000 had priority over the debenture-holders according to American law, and of the latter £273 15s. 11d. was a Crown debt here.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and F. B. Palmer, for the petitioners.—The court has jurisdiction to sanction this scheme under the Joint-Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, s. 2, as the section applies to any class of creditors: Slater v. Darlaston Steel and Iron Co., W. N., 1877, pp. 139, 165; In re North-Western, &c., Co., Palmer's Company Precedents, 3rd ed., p. 603.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Farwell, for debenture-holders to the amount of £9,000, supported the arrangement.

Seward Brice, Q.C., and A. Brown, for a dissentient debenture-holder.—The court cannot deprive a secured creditor of his security without his consent. The mortgagee of a company is outside the winding up: In re David Lloyd & Co., 26 W. R. 572, 6 Ch. D. 339; In re Richards & Co., 27 W. R. 530, 11 Ch. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply, cited In re Mammoth Copperopolis of Utah, Palmer's Company Precedents, 3rd ed., p. 606.

NORTH, J.—I think the proposed scheme should be sanctioned. I feel no doubt about the jurisdiction, as the Act gives the court power to bind "creditors," and debenture-holders are creditors. But should the court exercise its discretion? I felt some difficulty on this point, because the debenture-holders have a first charge on the property of the company, and the scheme proposes to deprive them of the benefit of that security, and also to give to certain unsecured English creditors priority over them; but their claim amounts to £500 only, of which £274 is a Crown debt, having priority, and £177 are the costs due to the company's solicitors, who will accept fully paid-up shares in the new company in discharge. The small balance of £48 I cannot take into account if I am satisfied with the scheme. As regards the alleged deprivation of the debenture-holders of their security, I do not think that the proposed arrangement will have that effect. Debts to a considerable amount, by the law of the American State in which the property is situate, have priority over the company's property, and as against those creditors the debenture-holders are postponed. At the meeting of the debenture-holders held to consider the arrangement they were almost unanimous in favour of adopting it. Now, if the approval of the debenture-holders must be unanimous—if the dissent of one or two holders can stop the whole arrangement—the power given by the Act to the court to summon meetings of creditors and to sanction the scheme approved by a majority would be rendered nugatory. If I were not to give effect to such an expressed opinion of the creditors as there is in this case, I do not know when the court should do so. I therefore sanction the proposed scheme.

HUME v. SOMERTON. (a.)

Practice—Writ of summons—Renewal—Writ issued before Judicature Acts—Power to renew such writ without leave of court or judge—R. S. C., ord. 8, r. 1; ord. 72, r. 2.

Writs of summons issued prior to the coming into force of the Judicature Acts, come within the operation of ord. 8, r. 1, as to renewal, so that such writs cannot now be renewed without the leave of the court or a judge, as required by that rule.

Motion to set aside the service of a writ of summons.

On the 6th of April, 1861, the plaintiff issued a writ against the defendant, Lord Somerton, now the Earl of Normanton, for a sum of money alleged to be due to the plaintiff from the defendant. That writ had never, until recently, been served, but it had been regularly renewed in the manner prescribed by section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, down to March, 1890. It was then served upon the defendant, and the present motion was to set aside such service on the ground that the writ had been irregularly renewed.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., and A. T. Lawrence, for the defendant, in support of the motion.—Ord. 8, r. 1, applies to all writs of summons, whenever issued, and whether issued before or after the Judicature Acts. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, was repealed by 46 & 47 Vict.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

c. 49, and therefore section 11 of that Act is no longer in force, and writs cannot now be renewed under its provisions. Ord. 8, r. 1, applies to all renewals, and that rule requires the leave of the court or a judge for a renewal, which leave was not obtained in this case.

Philbrick, Q.C., and English Harrison, for the plaintiff.—The writ has been regularly renewed under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, down to the present time, and the leave of a court or judge was not obtained as such leave was not necessary, as the practice with regard to the renewal of such writs was still governed by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 11, and was in accordance with the practice of the Practice Masters' Rules (5), where it is laid down that such writs are renewed without an order (Annual Practice, 1889-90, p. 1161). Ord. 72, r. 2, keeps the old procedure alive in this respect, as it provides that "where no other provision is made by the Acts or these rules, the present procedure and practice remain in force." The words of section 5 of 46 & 47 Vict. c. 49 keep alive section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, as regards writs issued before the Judicature Acts.

A. T. Lawrence replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 17.—The written judgment of the COURT was read by CHARLES, J.—In this case an application was made to us that the service of the writ of summons on the defendant might be set aside, on the ground that the writ was at the date of the service no longer in force. It was originally issued on the 6th of April, 1861, and it was proved to our satisfaction that it had been regularly renewed in the manner prescribed by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 11, down to the 5th of March, 1890. Shortly after the last mentioned date it was served on the defendant.

The question now raised is whether the plaintiff can rely on the provisions as to renewal contained in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 11, or whether he is not bound by the provisions of ord. 8, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883. If that rule applies, the service of the writ ought to be set aside, for writs of summons which come within its purview can only be renewed by order of the court or a judge, and in this case no such order has been obtained. If on the other hand the earlier statute applies, the service was regular, inasmuch as, under the terms of the 11th section, a plaintiff was at liberty to renew a writ of summons without leave.

The section is as follows:—"No original writ of summons shall be in force for more than six months from the day of the date thereof including the day of such date, but if any defendant therein named may not have been served therewith, the original concurrent writ of summons may be renewed at any time before its expiration for six months from the date of such renewal, and so from time to time during the currency of the renewed writ by being marked with a seal bearing the date of the day, month, or year of such renewal, such seal to be provided and kept for that purpose at the offices of the Masters of the Superior Courts, and to be impressed upon the writ by the proper officer of the court out of which such writ issued, upon delivery to him by the plaintiff or his attorney of a praecipe in such form as has hitherto been required to be delivered upon the obtaining of an 'alias' writ, and a writ of summons so renewed shall remain in force and be available to prevent the operation of any statute whereby the time for the commencement of the action may be limited, and for all other purposes from the date of the issuing of the original writ of summons."

There is no limit, it will be observed, placed upon the number of renewals which might be made, nor was it necessary for the plaintiff to show that he had made reasonable efforts to serve the defendant. His right to renew appears to have been absolutely unrestricted, and if the statute had still been in force and applicable to the plaintiff's case, it would have been difficult to hold that the mere frequency of the successive renewals, or the fact of their having been made during a period in which the defendant might have been served, constituted in themselves an abuse of the process of the court. But the Act of 1852 was repealed by the 46 & 47 Vict. c. 49, contemporaneously with the coming into operation of the rules of 1883. The preamble of the Act declares that it is expedient that various enactments mentioned in the schedule, which chiefly relate to civil procedure or matters connected therewith, and which may be regarded as spent, or the subject-matter whereof is provided for, by or under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and the Acts amending it, or rules made pursuant thereto, be now expressly and specifically repealed, and by section 3 provides that "the enactments described in the schedule to this Act are hereby repealed subject to the exceptions and qualifications mentioned in this Act and in that schedule." In the schedule is "the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852," except certain portions of it not material to the question now before us. Section 5 enacts that the repeal effected by the Act shall not affect, amongst other things, "(a) anything done or suffered before the passing of this Act under any enactment repealed by this Act, or (b) any jurisdiction or principle or rule of law or equity established or confirmed, or right or privilege acquired, or duty or liability imposed or incurred, or compensation secured by or under any enactment repealed by this Act," and it is contended that these words keep the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 11, alive so far as regards writs issued prior to the Judicature Acts coming into operation. But we cannot come to that conclusion. The rules under the Judicature Act and this statute ought, we think, to be read together, and, having regard to the language of the rules, we are unable to hold that, notwithstanding the repeal of the Act of 1852, the plaintiff can still act in a matter of civil procedure under its provisions.

It was not, in our opinion, a right or privilege acquired within the meaning of section 5. The rules, therefore, are the only authority under which writs can be renewed, and unless they can be applied to writs issued prior to the Judicature Acts, as well as to those issued since, there is no authority at all for the renewal of the former class of writs. For since the 24th of October, 1883, when the rules and 46 & 47 Vict. c. 49 came contemporaneously into operation, ord. 72, r. 2, cannot be relied on. That rule provides that "where no other provision is made by the Act or these rules, the present procedure and practice remain in force." As Cotton, L.J., points out in In re Busfield, 34 W. R. 372, 32 Ch. D. 123, "even if no other provision is made, it is difficult to hold that this rule keeps on foot any practice or procedure contained in a repealed statute." "No person," says Mellish, L.J., in Republic of Costa Rica v. Erlanger, 3 Ch. D. 69, "has a vested right in any course of procedure." But we do not decide this case on that ground, because we have come to the conclusion that ord. 8, r. 1, does make provision for writs prior to, as well as after, the Judicature Act. The prefatory note provides that the rules shall apply, unless otherwise expressly provided, so far as may be practicable to all proceedings taken on or after October 24, 1883, in all causes and matters then pending. There is no such express provision, for whatever may be the construction to be placed on ord. 72, r. 2, it certainly is not an express provision. Then ord. 8, r. 1, enacts that no original writ of summons shall be in force for more than twelve months from the day of the date thereof including the day of such date; but if any defendant therein named shall not have been served therewith, the plaintiff may before the expiration of the twelve months apply to a court or judge for leave to renew the writ, and the court or a judge, if satisfied that reasonable efforts have been made to serve such defendant, or for other good reasons, may order that the original or concurrent writ be renewed for six months from the date of such renewal inclusive, and so from time to time during the currency of the renewed writ, and a writ of summons so renewed shall remain in force and be available to prevent the operation of any statute whereby the time for the commencement of the action may be limited, and for all other purposes from the date of the issuing of the original writ of summons.

It is contended that these words, which are, it may be observed, a repetition of the words used in the rules of 1875, do not apply, and cannot be construed to include writs issued prior to the coming into operation of the Judicature Acts. The form of the writ under the Judicature Act is prescribed by ord. 2, r. 3, and the form, which has the same parliamentary authority as the rules (see Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100), indicates a twelve months and not a six months writ.

The writ in the present case is, of course, a six months writ. But although it is a six months writ, and in other respects in the form prescribed by the schedule of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1882, it is none the less an "original writ of summons." The words are wide enough, in our opinion, to include all writs of summons, and therefore, if we had been considering the matter in the interval between the coming into operation of the Judicature Act and the repeal of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, we should have held that the rule was applicable. But since the repeal of the Act of 1852 we consider it clear that the rules as to renewals form a complete code on the subject of renewal, just in the same manner as the rules as to service out of the jurisdiction form a complete code on that subject (see In re Busfield), and that they are capable of being read, and should be read, as applicable to all writs of summons whenever issued.

This construction of the rule is opposed to the prevailing practice.

The practice masters, acting, we presume, under ord. 72, r. 2, have at some period between 1880 and 1888 issued a direction that "writs of summons before the Judicature Acts came into force may be renewed without an order." This direction, however, has no statutory authority. It cannot, in our judgment, be treated as a direction of the court under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 22, and, even if it could, it cannot control the Rules of Court of 1883, which have parliamentary authority, and are expressly made applicable to pending proceedings.

For the reasons above given, therefore, we think that on the coming into operation of the Judicature Act, 1875, and the rules, the rule as to renewals applied to all writs whether issued before or after the Act.

This being so, ord. 72, r. 2, does not apply. We further think that, even if we are mistaken in our construction of ord. 8, r. 1, ord. 72, r. 2, cannot be relied on by the plaintiff, the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, now being repealed, and there being no words in the repealing statute sufficient to keep on foot, for the plaintiff's benefit, the unrestricted power of renewing this writ without an order.

We should add that the defendant has not, in our opinion, waived the irregularity, and accordingly we order the service of this writ to be set aside, with costs.

Service of writ set aside, with costs.

BISHOP AND OTHERS v. BALKIS CONSOLIDATED CO. (a.)

*Company—Transfer of shares—Certification of—Want of title in transferor—Certification—Ultrà vires—Representation as to credit or ability—Lord Tenterden's Act* (9 Geo. 4, c. 14), s. 6.

The plaintiffs were the transferees of certain shares in the defendant company. Before the transfer form had been executed by the plaintiffs, or the price paid, the stockbrokers procured the defendants to place upon it (partly by means of a stamp, partly in writing) the following words:—"Certificate lodged. The Balkis Consolidated Co. (Limited). J. V. Thomas, for secretary." The defendants subsequently discovered that the transferor had had no title to the shares specified in the transfer, and thereupon, notwithstanding their "certification," refused to recognize the plaintiffs' title to the shares. The plaintiffs then brought an action to recover the price of the shares paid by the brokers upon the faith of the "certification."

Held, that, although the "certification" was a representation by the defendants that a genuine certificate covering the shares denoted by the numbers in the transfer had been lodged with them, and that the transferor had a good title to the same, and, further, that such representation was made with the intent that a subsequent purchaser should act upon it, yet the action was not maintainable, upon the grounds (1) that the "certification" was ultrà vires, and (2) that it was a representation as to the credit and ability of the transferor within the 6th section of Lord Tenterden's Act, and, not being under the seal of the defendants, could not bind them.

Action tried at Birmingham Assizes before Vaughan Williams, J., without a jury.

The defendants were a company, incorporated under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, who had issued the whole of their authorised share capital. Subsequently to the completion of such issue the plaintiff Bishop, between February and the 25th of May, 1889, made certain purchases of Balkis shares, amounting in all to 200, through Messrs. Blythe & Hutchinson, members of the London Stock Exchange. These contracts were carried over from time to time till the 29th of June, when they were taken up by the plaintiffs, Messrs. Cuthbert, of Birmingham, as the nominees of Mr. Bishop. The money for taking up the shares was not provided by Cuthberts, but by Bishop, who, however, was credited by Cuthberts in account current with the amount so paid by him for the purpose of taking up the shares.

The facts as to the taking up the shares appeared to have been as follows:—

In June, 1889, a clerk of Blythe & Hutchinson, took to the offices of the Balkis Co. a transfer of 1,000 shares by one Powter to one Lupton, which he delivered to the company in exchange for transfer receipts, and on the 4th of July went back to the office of the company with these transfer receipts, and in exchange got certification on a transfer by Lupton to Cuthberts. The words of certification were. "Certificate lodged. The Balkis Consolidated Co. (Limited). J. V. Thomas, for secretary." All these words, except the signature "J. V. Thomas" and the word "for," were printed with an impressed stamp. Hutchinson was acting as the agent of Lupton, the vendor, in getting the certification.

It was in the ordinary course of the defendants' practice to grant such certification if they were satisfied that the transferor was entitled to the shares specified in the transfer.

Hutchinson, having obtained the certification on the 8th of July as the agent of Bishop, paid Lupton £38 13s., the price of the shares, and was repaid by Bishop on the 11th of July. Hutchinson having in the meanwhile, about the 9th of July, sent to Cuthberts the transfer, Lupton to Cuthberts, with the certification on it, Cuthberts sent up this transfer to the company on the 11th of July for registration, and it appeared by the company's receipt on the transfer that the company received the transfer for registration on the 11th of July and registered the transfer on the 22nd of that month; but the payment of Bishop's cheque was in no sense made on the faith of the company's receipt of the 11th of July.

The company, having registered the transfer, proceeded on the 6th of August to seal certificates in favour of Messrs. Cuthbert, and on the 22nd of August sent the certificate to Messrs. Cuthbert. Bishop did not appear to have seen this certificate until after the 20th of September, when he sold 100 Balkis shares to one Watson. On the 1st of October Cuthberts sent to the company the certificate and the transfer, Cuthberts to Watson, for certification, and on the 4th of October the company refused to certify the transfer of the whole of the shares on the ground that Lupton had never been entitled to 135 of the shares transferred by him to Cuthberts, certain of which shares were included in the transfer by Messrs. Cuthbert to Watson.

J. Dugdale, Q.C., and Hugo Young, for the plaintiffs.

H. D. Greene, Q.C., and A. T. Lawrence, for the defendants.

April 25.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The first question which arises is whether Bishop, independently of the issue of the share certificates to Cuthberts, has any cause of action against the company by reason of the certification of the transfer, Lupton to Cuthberts, and the payments made on the face of it. If there is a cause of action it is because Bishop acted upon the faith of the representation made by the company in certifying the transfer; and assuming that Bishop would have a cause of action if the transfer had purported to be to him, it makes, in my opinion, no difference that the transfer purported to be to Cuthberts, as his nominees, and not to himself. The damage sustained by Bishop in either case is precisely the same.

Now, in order that Bishop should have a good cause of action it is necessary, first, that the company should, by certification of the transfer, have represented that a genuine certificate covering the shares in question had been lodged with them. As to this I find, as a matter of fact, that this is the meaning of the certification. Secondly, it is essential to the cause of action that the certification should have been made in order that a subsequent purchaser might act upon it. I find as a fact that it was so made: the transfer mentions Cuthberts as the transferees, but the representation, in my opinion, was made as much to Bishop, the undisclosed principal of Cuthberts, as to Messrs. Cuthbert. Thirdly, it is essential to the cause of action that Bishop should have sustained damage by acting on this representation of the company; it seems clear that Bishop did sustain damage to the extent of £38 15s., which Hutchinson, the broker, paid on the faith of the certification. It was urged in argument that there was another condition essential to the cause of action—viz., that the representation of the company should have been made in the course of some duty owing by the company; but I do not think that is so; it is sufficient, in my opinion, that the company chose, for the purpose of making the shares of its members more marketable, to supplement certificates with this sort of certification, with the intention that such certification should be treated by buyers as a voucher of title. It is true that in the judgments of Cockburn, C.J., and Blackburn, J., in In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., 16 W. R. 862, L. R. 3 Q. B. 584, some stress is laid upon the fact that there was a statutory obligation on the company to issue the certificates which raised the estoppel in that case; whereas in the present case there is no duty, statutory or otherwise, to impress certification on the transfers, but if the judgment and the observations of the judges during the argument are looked at, it will be seen that the mention of the statutory duty is not as an essential of the estoppel, but merely for the purpose of pointing out that the declaration contained in the certificate is intended, not only as a voucher as between the company and its members, but also as a voucher to the public at large who might wish to deal with the shareholder. Duty is essential to an action of negligence or estoppel by reason of negligence, but not to an action claiming compensation for damages sustained by acting on representations made for the purpose that they should be acted on.

It is, however, urged on behalf of the Balkis Co. that the giving of these certifications is ultrà vires, and that the directors themselves, and à fortiori the clerk of the directors, have no authority to give such certification. If I were free to decide this case according to my own view of the law, I should hold the defendants estopped, and should hold that the giving of such certifications were not ultrà vires. The certifications are merely representations made in the ordinary course of business by the company in respect of a matter as to which the company had a statutory duty and statutory authority—namely, the issue of certificates, and can only be ultrà vires in the sense that a letter addressed to the transferor would be stating that he had lodged such and such a certificate with the company.

But even assuming that the certification is a representation by a clerk made in the course of business so as to bind the company, recognized in Swift v. Jewsbury, 22 W. R. 319, L. R. 9 Q. B. 301, and acted on in Shaw v. Port Philip Gold Mining Co., 32 W. R. 771, 13 Q. B. D. 103, yet the effect of the case of British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co., 35 W. R. 590, 18 Q. B. D. 714, would seem to be that the company is not liable, by reason that the company have no power to bind themselves to the consequences of any such answer, because, if the company could so bind themselves, the company would be estopped from denying the existence of the certificate referred to in the certification, and no corporate body can be bound by estoppel to do something beyond its powers. The present case does not, of course, fall within the Charnwood Forest Railway Co.'s case so far as the facts are concerned, because there was no evidence nor suggestion before me that the clerk of the defendant company was acting for his own benefit in making the certification, but it does seem to me to fall clearly within the principle of that decision. I am afraid that I do not quite understand the judgment in the Charnwood Forest Railway Co.'s case, because I find it difficult to assent to it, and because I cannot reconcile the doctrine as to estoppel against corporations contained in those judgments, with the doctrine laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., for it seems to me that the Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co. had no power, under the 25th section of the Companies Act, 1862, or otherwise, to issue shares beyond the limit in the special Act any more than the Charnwood Forest Railway Co. had to issue the debentures, and that although the 31st section empowers and casts on companies created under the Companies Acts the duty of issuing certificates specifying shares held by any member of the company, yet this power or duty does not enable the company to issue certificates in respect of shares which have not in fact been issued by the company.

It is clear, however, that the Court of Appeal did not mean to overrule In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., which was not mentioned in the argument or judgment, and although it might well be argued from that case that as a company can estop itself, by the issue of a certificate, from denying, for the purpose of an action for damages, the genuineness of shares which it had no power to issue, so a company may, by representations made on its behalf by its officers, estop itself from denying that such a certificate has been issued, and it will be observed from an observation made by Lush, J., in that case that he seems to have considered that the estoppel might have been raised as well by writing a letter, as by issuing a certificate; yet on the whole I think that the statutory power and duty to issue certificates distinguish the two cases, and I have no right, whatever I may think of the decision, to disregard what seems to me the spirit of the decision in British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co.

It is further urged that the company is not liable, because the certification, being a representation as to credit within 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, could not bind the company unless under the seal of the company. The case of Swann v. Phillips, 8 A. & E. 457, shows that a representation as to the possession, by the party making the representation, of title deeds of a person seeking to get credit on the faith of the title deeds may be a representation within the statute, if the representation is made for the purpose that the owner of the title deeds may be trusted, and it is extremely difficult to say that a representation, which is made for the purpose of giving the holder of shares facilities for dealing with and transferring his shares, is not a representation made concerning the credit, ability, or dealings of the shareholder. It is clearly a representation made as to his ability to transfer, and made for the purpose of enabling the shareholder to obtain payment of the price of the shares purported to be transferred.

Upon the ground, therefore, that the facts of this case bring it within the principle of the decision in the Charnwood Forest Railway Co.'s case, and also upon the ground that the representation contained in the certification is a representation as to the ability, credit, or dealings of the person for whom credit is sought, I hold, so far as the issue of the certification is concerned, that although I have found in fact that the certification was made for the purpose of being acted upon, and was made to the broker as the agent of the vendor Lupton, and although I find that the money was paid on behalf of Bishop upon the faith of that certification, and that Bishop has been damaged to the extent of £38 15s., yet I feel bound to come to the conclusion that, for the reasons I have given, the company are not liable.

So far I have dealt with the case independently of the issue of the certificates. I have said during the course of the trial that I thought any amendment ought to be made which was necessary to raise the question between the parties as appears by the evidence taken before me; but I am of opinion that the issue of the certificates gives no cause of action whatever to Bishop or to Cuthberts, because in my opinion neither Bishop nor Cuthberts, upon the evidence before me, sustained any damage whatever, or altered their position in any respect to their detriment, by reason of the issue of those certificates, and I do not see that any amendment which could be made would assist the plaintiffs, or either of them, in this respect. It may very well be that Bishop in point of fact was damaged, because Bishop may have had to pay damages to Mr. Watson, the person to whom he sold in October, 1889; but there is no evidence before me of Bishop having to pay any such damages or having sustained any damage by reason of his non-performance of that contract. Under these circumstances my judgment will be for the defendants, with costs.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) April 16.

Ex parte DELMAR.
In re HEREPATH & DELMAR. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Surety—Right of surety to prove before payment—Practice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 37.

Under the provisions of section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the surety of a bankrupt is entitled to prove against the bankrupt's estate, although he has not paid the debt for which he is liable.

Appeal by a creditor against the rejection by the trustee in the bankruptcy of a proof of debt tendered against the bankrupt's estate.

The case raised the question as to the right of a person who is in the position of a surety for the bankrupt to prove against the bankrupt's estate before he has been called upon to pay the money for which he is so liable.

At the date of the receiving order the bankrupt, A. F. Delmar, was liable under a covenant in a deed bearing date the 23rd of August, 1886, to pay to one Marie Green during her life an annuity of £150 by quarterly payments, and in the event of her death to pay an annuity of £50 to each of her two children until they should reach the age of twenty-five years.

By this deed the appellant, who was the father of the bankrupt, became surety for him for the payment of these annuities, and had actually paid a sum of £175, for which proof was allowed.

The liability of the appellant as surety was also valued at a sum of £1,411, but the proof tendered in respect of this sum was rejected by the trustee on the ground that the creditor was not entitled to prove as surety until he had paid the debt, and, further, that he was not under any liability, and was in any case a secured creditor who had not valued or given up his security.

The creditor now appealed against the rejection of his proof.

Herbert Reed, for the appellant.—The deed of the 23rd of August, 1886, recites that on the death of a person named Walmesley a sum of £15,000 in Consols was left by him to his daughter, Jane Delmar, the mother of the bankrupt, for life, and after her death to her husband, the present appellant, for his life, and after his death to such child as Mrs. Delmar might appoint. The bankrupt was the only son of Mrs. Delmar, and in 1886 she executed a power of appointment in his favour. It is further recited that the bankrupt, being desirous of settling an annuity on Mrs. Green, charged his interest in the fund with the payment of the annuity, and that his father joined in the deed as surety, the fund being charged finally to indemnify the appellant against any payments which he might be compelled to make. If the creditor cannot prove until he has actually paid he can never prove at all. The annuities go on for twenty-five years at any rate, and by that time the bankruptcy will be wound up. Moreover, the case clearly falls within the words of section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The section provides that "all debts and liabilities, present or future, certain or contingent, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the receiving order, shall be deemed to be debts provable in bankruptcy." I admit that the courts formerly held that a surety could not prove until payment, but those decisions turned on the particular words of the Act then in force, and the words of the present Act are wide enough to include this claim. The appellant has clearly no security, but if he has he is quite willing to give it up.

Lane, Q.C., for the trustee.—The terms of section 37 are very wide, but unless the position of a surety is altered by this section it is clear he cannot prove until payment. The question of a surety was always dealt with as a special matter of legislation up to the Act of 1869, and it is not extreme to say that section 37 could not be meant to include the special subject of sureties, which had been before specially dealt with. Upon the words of section 37, as it stands, there seems to be no reason why the liability of a surety should not be included just the same as any other contingent liability. But if the liability can be proved, is that liability one which can be fairly estimated? That cannot be, when another fund is liable. [Cave, J.—The estimate may make allowance for the probability that a great number of these payments will come out of the estate.] In any case the estimate now set up is wrong. The actuary who made the estimate has not taken into any account that, at some time or other, there will be a fund available. The amount proved for is, therefore, clearly incorrect.

Cave, J.—The best way for me to dispose of this case is to declare that the creditor is entitled to prove for something and leave it to be determined for what amount the proof shall stand. I decide that the liability is a provable liability, and that there can be a proof of some kind tendered. The case must then stand over for the parties to settle what the amount of the proof is to be, and there will be liberty to apply.

Order accordingly.

Lawrance v. Norreys. (a.)

Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 26—Concealed fraud—Vexatious action—Striking out statement of claim.

Should a plaintiff's claim to land be barred by the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27) unless he can show that he has been fraudulently deprived of it, within the 26th section, it is essential for him to prove that he, or some person through whom he claims, has been deprived of his land by the particular fraud proved, and further, that it could not, with reasonable diligence, have been known or discovered for a longer period than the statutory one before the action was brought.

The allegations of fraud in such an action must be definite and precise, leading to the reasonable inference that the fraud complained of was the cause of the deprivation. In the absence of such averments the court may dismiss the action as an abuse of the powers of the court.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (39 Ch. D. 213, 37 W. R. Dig. 145) dismissing the action as vexatious and oppressive and an abuse of the process of the court.

The whole proceedings in the case will be found stated in Lord Herschell's judgment.

April 22.—Lord Herschell.—This is in some respects an extraordinary case. The present appellant, who is the plaintiff, commenced an action in the Queen's Bench Division in June, 1886, against the same defendants, claiming to recover possession of the Towneley Estate, in the county of Lancaster. By his statement of claim he alleged title alternatively, as the heir-at-law of Richard Towneley, who died in 1706, and as the heir-at-law of Jonathan Lawrance, the younger, who died, seised of the premises claimed, in 1816. A summons was taken out to dismiss the action on the ground that no reasonable cause of action was disclosed, and that it was frivolous and vexatious. This summons was referred by the judge at chambers to the Divisional Court, and whilst the matter was pending there the appellant took out a summons for leave to amend, which was also referred to the Divisional Court to be heard with the other summons. The proposed amendments were framed with the view of showing such a concealed fraud as would prevent the lapse of time operating, by virtue of the Statute of Limitations, as a bar to the action. In the result the court made an order dismissing the action. This was admitted to be inevitable unless the proposed amendments were allowed; and the court considered that under the circumstances before them leave to amend ought not to be granted. The present action was then brought in the Chancery Division against the same parties, upon the same title, and to recover the same estate, the allegations designed to avoid the operation of the Statute of Limitations comprising those embodied in the proposed amendments. Where an action is thus brought on a title which accrued more than seventy years ago, to dispossess those who, or whose predecessors, have been in possession during that length of time, it is obvious that the allegations by which it is sought to prevent the statute being a bar need to be closely scrutinized.

I will first call attention to what a plaintiff must prove in order to oust the ordinary operation of the statute. The Act says: "In every case of a concealed fraud, the right of any person to bring a suit in equity for the recovery of any land or rent of which he, or any person through whom he claims, may have been deprived by such fraud, shall be deemed to have first accrued at, and not before, the time at which such fraud shall, or with reasonable diligence might, have been first known or discovered." It is not enough, therefore, to prove a concealed fraud; the person bringing the suit must show that he, or some person through whom he claims, has been by such fraud deprived of the land which he seeks to recover, and that the fraud could not with reasonable diligence have been known or discovered more than the statutory period before the action was brought.

I proceed now to consider the allegations made in the statement of claim. It is noteworthy at the outset that testamentary disposition has been apparently unknown in the family, for every person named in the pedigree is alleged to have died intestate. The connecting link between the families of Towneley and Lawrance is said to have been Mary, the daughter of Richard Towneley, who married one John Lawrance, and died in America in 1742. She became heiress of Richard Towneley on the failure of the issue of his son Charles. When this event occurred is not stated, but it appears to have taken place many years before 1816, for it is alleged that Jonathan Lawrance, the younger, was "for many years, and until shortly before his death, out of possession of the premises." He came from America, where he resided, to establish his title to the property, but at what date is not stated. He employed solicitors in England, and brought an action or actions, in what court does not appear. He made a compromise with one John Towneley, whose position in regard to the property is not disclosed. "Partly by means of such actions, and partly under or by virtue of the deed of compromise," Jonathan Lawrance recovered possession of the Towneley Estates. He died in 1816, seised in fee and in possession of those estates. He left behind him, as his heir-at-law, his son, Lebius Lawrance, who was then grown up, and had a son born to him two years afterwards. But until 1886 Lebius Lawrance and the persons claiming under him remained ignorant of their title to the property. That is the story told in the statement of claim.

The story of the fraud, which is said to be a concealed fraud within the meaning of the Statute of Limitations, and to have deprived Lebius Lawrance and those claiming under him of the property in question, is equally singular. It is this: On the death of Jonathan Lawrance his solicitors in England, who had in their possession the evidences of his title and the deed of compromise, were about to communicate to Lebius Lawrance, whose address in America they knew, the facts that his father had recovered the estates and died intestate seised of them. But John Towneley, the party to the deed of compromise, having wrongfully taken possession of the Towneley Estates, intervened and fraudulently induced them not to make the communication. He further fraudulently, and with intent to deprive Lebius Lawrance of the property, induced the solicitors to deliver to him the evidences of Jonathan Lawrance's title to the property, including the deed of compromise, and having thus obtained possession of them, he fraudulently, and with the intent aforesaid, destroyed those documents. It is also alleged that John Towneley fraudulently, and with the same intent, procured to be taken up and destroyed the tombstone erected over the grave, at Walpole, in the State of Massachusetts, of Mary Towneley, afterwards Mary Lawrance, and her husband, "on which certain material particulars establishing the identity of the said Mary Towneley, and certain material particulars of her family, were inscribed," Lebius and his son being ignorant of the facts inscribed on the tombstone.

Assuming that it could be proved that the solicitor abstained, at the instance of John Towneley, from communicating to Lebius Lawrance the facts with which they would otherwise have made him acquainted, how would this show that the non-communication of these facts by the solicitors deprived Lebius Lawrance or his successors in title of the estate? It does not appear to me to be a natural or necessary consequence. He knew that he was the heir-at-law of his father, and I take it that he knew also that his father had gone from America to England for the purpose of establishing his title to the estate. I say this because in paragraph D., where the state of ignorance of Lebius Lawrance at the time of his father's death is as to certain facts elaborately averred, he is not alleged to have been ignorant of this. An heir-at-law of one who, as far as appeared to him, had died intestate (for if he knew nothing of any will he would naturally assume this) would ordinarily be led to make inquiries for the purpose of ascertaining what property his ancestor had died possessed of, and the more so if he knew that the person to whom he was heir laid claim to an estate, and had shortly before his death gone to England to establish his title to it. The fraud, if committed, shut up one avenue only by which Lebius Lawrance could have ascertained his rights; it left all others open. And I am not prepared to say that, if it were proved beyond doubt, it would make good the essential element in the chain of proof—namely, that the plaintiff had thereby been deprived of the estate. What is there to show that, in spite of the fraud, Lebius or his successor might not with diligence have ascertained their rights? No circumstances are stated here to show how in the present case the fraud had an effect which, as I have said, does not appear to me to be a natural or necessary consequence of it. This was the view taken by Stirling, J.; and I think the same observation applies to the suggested destruction of the tombstone. What is there to show that Lebius Lawrance or his successors knew of the existence of the tombstone or would have done so but for its destruction, or that with due diligence they could not otherwise have ascertained the facts which they would have derived from an inspection of it? Stirling, J., however, thought the allegation that John Towneley had fraudulently obtained possession of the deed of compromise and other evidences of title and destroyed them would, if established, be sufficient to sustain a charge of concealed fraud within the meaning of the statute. The Court of Appeal expressed no opinion upon this point. I propose to take the same course. But I must observe that it is not stated how or when the fraud was discovered. For aught that appears, so far as the facts are stated, the rights of the appellant's predecessors might have been ascertained, and the means of establishing them obtained, half a century ago.

The statement of claim being of the character I have described, I think it becomes important to consider the history of the litigation by which the appellant has sought to assert his alleged right, and to ascertain the origin of the allegations which it contains. Stirling, J., was disposed at first to treat these allegations as mere fiction, but he ultimately allowed the plaintiff to adduce evidence to show that they were not so. The court had therefore before it all the explanation which the plaintiff or his advisers have to offer of the development which the charges of fraud undoubtedly exhibit since they first took shape, and all the facts which can be suggested to show that the claim is a genuine one. The suggestion of a concealed fraud appears for the first time in a crude form in the amended statement of claim submitted to the Queen's Bench Division. The alleged reason why the original statement of claim was silent on the subject was, in substance, this: That Colonel Jaques, the agent of the plaintiff, late in the American army, who had been called to the bar in America, would neither take the law from his own counsel nor trust his own solicitors with the facts, lest perchance they should fall into the hands of the enemy. He had read a reported case which led him to differ from the counsel who was advising him, and he had reason to believe, he says, that some other solicitors whom he had previously instructed "to follow up the clues" which he gave them in reference to the claim had betrayed his confidence. A comparison of the statement of claim in this action with the proposed amendment in the Queen's Bench Division shows a distinct growth in the charges of fraud. Neither the tombstone, nor Jonathan Lawrance's litigation, nor the deed of compromise, has any place in the amended statement of claim submitted to the Queen's Bench Division. There was, however, an allusion in the course of the argument to a tombstone, and the appellant's solicitor is careful to explain that the story of the tombstone was, in substance, to be found in the instructions laid before counsel to settle the amendments, but he is unable to say why it was omitted from the proposed amendments. I can only draw the inference either that it was not then thought of sufficient importance to be put forward, or that it was known to be incapable of proof. The story of the litigation and of the deed of compromise seems to be of later origin, and to owe its existence to the discussion in the Queen's Bench Division. The only allegation in the statement of claim then prepared was, that John Towneley obtained from the solicitors and destroyed "the evidence of title to the said premises." The counsel who was resisting the application to amend, argued upon this that the best thing that could happen to the heir-at-law would be to destroy the deeds. What was the answer given by the counsel for the plaintiff? He said that the case had been argued as if the documents which constituted evidence of title must have been deeds, but when the heir-at-law claims through a pedigree, as Lawrance did, the best evidences of title are the certificates of births, deaths, and marriages. Not a word about actions ending in a deed of compromise by which the ancestor obtained possession of the estate. And yet the destruction of this deed is one of the most, indeed perhaps the most, material allegation in the present statement of claim. The main point to which the learned judges in the Queen's Bench Division directed the attention of the appellant's counsel was the apparent impossibility of bringing forward any proof of such a fraud as that alleged to have been committed so far back as the year 1816. As to this the learned counsel stated that reliance would be placed on one Richardson, who was said to have been a clerk in the office of the solicitors who acted for Jonathan Lawrance. Richardson was said to be in America, and it was admitted that he must at that time have been probably upwards of ninety years of age. Extracts were read from two letters of his, written more than thirty years ago, to certain persons whose connection with the present case did not appear, referring apparently to some claim to the personal property of a Lawrance, and offering his assistance for a £5 note. But these letters contained no allusion of any kind to any fraud. Then it was said that Richardson had made some verbal communication to somebody in court "in connection with the fraud." And beyond that counsel could not go. On the materals before them the Queen's Bench Division thought the story unworthy of serious attention. Stirling, J., as I have said, though at first disposed to treat the allegations in the statement of claim as fiction, gave the plaintiff an opportunity of filing affidavits. The affidavit of Colonel Jaques was accordingly filed. I agree with the Court of Appeal that it is impossible to conceive anything more shadowy or unsatisfactory than that gentleman's affidavit. It does not show how or when the alleged fraud came to be discovered. It does not show, as might easily have been done if the allegations were true, when and in what court the alleged action or actions were brought. It proffers no explanation of the strange circumstance that Lebius Lawrance never inquired or never learned what his father, whose heir he was, died possessed of. There is no reference in it to Richardson, nor is there any suggestion that any means of proving the appellant's allegations can be found in any other quarter.

It cannot be doubted that the court has an inherent jurisdiction to dismiss an action which is an abuse of the process of the court. It is a jurisdiction which ought to be very sparingly exercised, and only in very exceptional cases. I do not think its exercise would be justified merely because the story told in the pleadings was highly improbable, and one which it was difficult to believe could be proved. But the Court of Appeal did not proceed on that ground. They took into consideration all the circumstances of the case. We have, to begin with, a statement of claim, which, if it discloses a concealed fraud within the meaning of the statute, does so in the barest fashion, with much that is most material left vague and undefined, when there ought to have been distinctness and precision. Moreover, this is not the first but the third edition of a statement of claim delivered with the object of recovering the Towneley Estate; and when we review the history of the litigation, there is much to lead to the belief that important allegations now made were an afterthought, the result of criticisms of the earlier form in which the charges of fraud were presented, and that the charges thus raised against persons long dead are wholly incapable of proof. These impressions might have been dissipated by the affidavits filed on behalf of the appellant; but they have not been so. On the contrary, I think they have been strengthened. Both in what it says and in what it does not say Colonel Jaques' affidavit confirms in my mind the impression that the case has not a solid basis capable of proof, but that the story told in the pleadings is a myth, which has grown with the progress of the litigation, and has had no substantial foundation. For these reasons I concur with the Court of Appeal in thinking that the action is an abuse of the process of the court. I accordingly move your lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord WATSON.—This is a case of a very unusual character. Your lordships are of opinion that its circumstances are such as to justify the exceptional treatment with which it met in the Court of Appeal. I shall endeavour, without entering into minute details, to indicate the reasons which have led me to the same conclusion. At the time when this suit was brought on the chancery side of the High Court, more than seventy years had elapsed from the date at which the title alleged by the appellant accrued; and during the whole of that period the respondents and their predecessors remained in the undisturbed possession of the lands which he is now, for the second time, and upon substantially the same grounds, attempting to recover from them. It is sufficiently obvious, on the face of the previous common law action, as well as of the present proceedings, that the appellant's claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations, unless he can show, in the terms of section 26, that he has hitherto been fraudulently deprived of his estate and of the means of recovering it. The 26th section of the Act reserves no remedy against purchasers for value; but the respondents do not stand in that position, and it is conceded that they are affected by the acts of their ancestor, John Towneley, to whom the frauds alleged in his pleadings are imputed by the appellant. But it is not any and every fraud which will elide the provisions of the statute, and keep alive a right of action for recovery of the lands. In order to constitute a fraud which will have that effect these statutory requirements must be fulfilled. In the first place, it must be a fraud which has deprived the plaintiff of his land; and, in the second place, it must be a concealed fraud in this sense, that it was not only unknown to the plaintiff and to those through whom he derives right, but could not, with reasonable diligence, have been discovered by him or them before the commencement of the twelve years immediately preceding the institution of his suit. The onus is, therefore, upon the appellant to allege and prove that the frauds of which he complains were of such a nature, or were perpetrated in such circumstances, that neither he nor his predecessors entitled for the time being could have come to the knowledge of them, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, during the fifty-nine years which followed the death of his great-grandfather, Jonathan Lawrance, in 1816.

In my opinion, a plaintiff, who desires to avail himself of the provisions of section 26, is not released from the ordinary rule of pleading applicable to cases of fraud, which was thus expressed by Lord Selborne, C., in Wallingford v. Mutual Society, 29 W. R. 81, 5 App. Cas. 685): "General allegations, however strong may be the words in which they are stated, are insufficient to amount to an averment of fraud of which any court ought to take notice." It is not a sufficient compliance with the rule to state facts and circumstances which merely imply that the defendant, or someone for whose action he is responsible, did commit a fraud of some kind. There must be a probable, if not necessary, connection between the raud averred and the injurious consequences which the plaintiff attributes to it; and if that connection is not sufficiently apparent from the particulars stated, it cannot be supplied by general averments. Facts and circumstances must in that case be set forth, and in every genuine claim are capable of being stated, leading to a reasonable inference that the fraud and the injuries complained of stood to each other in the relation of cause and effect. When a plaintiff, in order to escape from the Statute of Limitations, brings charges of concealed fraud, for the first time, at a distance of seventy years, it appears to me that the duty of making a full and candid statement is specially incumbent upon him. And unless the nature of the frauds alleged is in itself calculated to suggest the improbability of their being discovered by ordinary research, it is equally his duty to state the considerations to which he ascribes his ignorance of their existence. The amount and kind of explanatory statement required in order to impart relevancy to such charges will necessarily vary according to circumstances. But I have rarely seen a case in which fulness and candour of statement were more imperatively required than in the present; and I have met with no other case in which both were so studiously withheld. The appellant argued, as might have been expected, that he could not make a fuller statement without detailing his evidence. That is the usual excuse put forward when an attempt is made to launch a tentative charge of fraud in vague and general terms; and it rests on no better foundation than the fallacious assumption that a statement of facts and circumstances admitting of proof is the same thing with a statement of the evidence required to substantiate them. I purposely avoid particular criticism of the defects of averment which I find in the appellant's statement of claim.

One observation I think it right to make, and it is this: that his averments, so far from excluding, seem to me to point directly to the inference, that the alleged frauds (if they ever were committed) could, with due diligence, have been easily discovered at any time after the news of Jonathan Lawrance's death became known to his relatives in America. Stripped of its general assertions, which are of no relevancy, the statement of claim presents, to my mind, a tissue of improbabilities which ought not to be sent to proof. Such being the opinion which I entertain with respect to the character of the appellant's allegations, I concur with the Court of Appeal in thinking that the present action is, in the strictest sense of the words, vexatious and oppressive. With a view to that result, it is legitimate to examine not only the pleadings in this suit, but the whole probabilities of the case, and the judicial history of the claim, from first to last, which is a very singular and suggestive one. These considerations satisfy me that the order appealed from ought to be sustained, not in pursuance of any order or rule, but in virtue of the inherent jurisdiction of the court to prevent abuse of its procedure.

Lord Macnaghten.—I concur.

Storer & Co. v. Johnson. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37—London agents.

The court, under its general jurisdiction, but not under section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), has power to tax part of a solicitor's bill of costs.

Part of an agency bill of costs may be ordered to be taxed subject to the payment into court of the amount claimed by the agents.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed, with a variation.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Lindley, and Bowen, L.JJ.), reported as Re Johnson & Weatherall, 36 W. R. 374, 37 Ch. D. 433.

On the 4th of January, 1886, Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall delivered to Messrs. Storer & Co. their yearly bill of agency charges for the year 1885.

The bill contained charges in respect of a number of actions and matters, the charges relating to each action or matter being stated separately, and one of the actions in respect of which charges were made was Mellor v. Swire.

On the 3rd of January, 1887, Messrs. Storer & Co. took out a summons asking for the taxation of that part of the bill which related to Mellor v. Swire.

North, J., held that the applicants were entitled to a taxation only on the terms of the whole bill being taxed.

Messrs. Storer & Co. appealed.

The Court of Appeal suggested that taxation of the charges in Mellor v. Swire alone should be ordered on the terms of the appellants paying to the respondents within ten days the cash balance claimed to be due—viz., £1,188 1s. 4d., subject to an undertaking to refund.

These terms were not accepted by the appellants, and the appeal was dismissed, with costs.

It appeared that the cash balance claimed at the time of the hearing before the Court of Appeal was less than £1,188 1s. 4d., and at the hearing of the present appeal it had been reduced to £746 3s. 9d.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and E. L. Levett, for the appellants.—These charges are not part of a bill. But, if so, there is a general jurisdiction to direct, in a proper case, taxation of part of a bill of costs. This is a case which can fairly be investigated by itself. The terms imposed in the Court of Appeal were outside the jurisdiction of the court.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the respondents.—It is the settled practice not to order taxation of an agency bill, or part of it, unless the whole amount claimed is brought into court: Ostle v. Christian, Turn. & R. 324; Jones v. Roberts, 8 Sim. 397; Lees v. Nuttall, 2 My. & K. 284; Tidd's Practice, 9th ed., 1828, p. 332; Merrifield's Law of Attorneys, p. 226. Smith v. Edwards, 37 W. R. 112, 22 Q. B. D. 10, was also referred to. If the balance claimed by the last cash account is paid into court, the respondents make no objection to the taxation asked for.

Sir H. Davey replied.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—It seems to me that there has been a considerable error about this case throughout. The summons, I cannot entertain any doubt, was intended to be taken out under the Solicitors Act. The reference to that portion of the Solicitors Act which makes the costs dependent upon the proportion which is taxed off convinces me, apart from the argument in the court below, that the parties intended to insist upon their right to have this part of the costs severed from the rest, and to have that taxed by itself. I am of opinion, in common with all the courts who have considered the subject, that that course is erroneous; and I believe that your lordships are all of opinion that in a proceeding under the Solicitors Act we cannot do what is asked to be done by the appellants. But it was, of course, open to the court to pronounce a judgment which would do justice between the parties when once the case was brought before them. This was not a case in which the summons absolutely bound the court as to the remedy which they should administer; and I think it is quite clear that the Solicitors Act did not deprive the court of the jurisdiction which they always possessed to do justice in the premises when dealing with one of their officers, and that they might, therefore, order that the costs should be taxed, although not in terms of the Solicitors Act, and they might have selected one particular portion of the bill of costs to be taxed. The moment it was taken out of the region of the Solicitors Act and brought within the general jurisdiction of the court, then the court could exercise its own jurisdiction in the way it might think fit: and I am of opinion that the court rightly exercised its jurisdiction so far as it was advised of what were the real facts. On the other hand, I agree that it was unreasonable, in the then state of the account between the parties, to insist upon the whole amount, £1,188 1s. 4d., being either paid into court or paid to Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall. If, as a matter of fact, the truth was that there was at that time only £1,000 due (although only £746 is due now), it would have been unreasonable to insist that more should be paid than was either due or claimed by the parties. I am, therefore, of opinion, and move your lordships, that the order of the Court of Appeal should be varied to this extent, that upon payment into court of £746 3s. 9d. the order sought for to tax these particular items as distinguished from the rest of the bill should be permitted, and that that should be done within the time limited by the Court of Appeal, and that otherwise the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Then, having arrived at that conclusion, the question comes to be considered who is responsible for this case having been presented to your lordships without these matters having been adjusted; and I certainly am of opinion that the appellants are themselves to blame. In the first instance, they insisted upon what now, by the judgments of all the courts and by your lordships' judgment, turns out to be an untenable proposition; and then, when an offer was made to them by the Court of Appeal, according to the practice of the court in such cases, that they should pay into court that which (as the Court of Appeal of course meant) according to the practice of the court would have been payable, if there had been an error in the figures, those who were there on behalf of the appellants ought to have put the figures right, and if there was an error in directing the money to be paid to Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall, instead of into court, they then ought to have intervened and to have called attention to that circumstance. Instead of doing that, they allowed the Court of Appeal to make that order upon the hypothesis on which they then proceeded, and it was not until the matter came before your lordships that the facts were accurately stated. Therefore, although I propose that there should be a variation of the order of the Court of Appeal in pursuance of what I have stated, I believe your lordships will think it right that the appellants, who are responsible for what has occurred, should pay the costs in this House, although they are to a certain extent successful.

Lord WATSON.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It appears to me that the bill referred to throughout the 37th section of the Solicitors Act, 1843, is the bill delivered containing all these items; and upon considering the terms of that section I am unable to assent to the argument which has been addressed to us on behalf of the appellants, which seems to have been the only argument pressed upon both the courts below, to the effect that under the statute the court has the power to direct that one item or one branch of the bill delivered shall be taken and remitted to the taxing master for examination.

Now, I have just referred to the course which this case took in the court below. I think that the application was intended to be an application in terms of the Solicitors Act. The reference to the statute, and the whole scope of it, appears to me to point to that result. At the same time I do not think that your lordships are precluded, in a matter like this, from exercising the power which is vested in the court apart from the terms of the statute. North, J., dealt, and, in my opinion, dealt quite rightly, with the case that was presented to him, and went no further. In the Court of Appeal their lordships were prepared to dispose of the case upon the same principle which had been followed by North, J., in the court below; but at the same time they ex gratiâ stretched out to the appellants an offer which had certainly not been pressed upon them at the instance of the appellants. The intention of the court obviously was to give them that which they asked, a separation of the branches of the account, as they only could do under their jurisdiction apart from statute, and subject to the condition upon which alone that jurisdiction has been exercised since the time of Lord Thurlow. I think, in these circumstances, we cannot listen to any argument or any suggestion made as to the amount which was fixed by the court below. In that respect the court appears to have received no assistance whatever, not a single hint even, from the party at the bar whose interest it was to make the suggestion. Therefore it appears to me that throughout, even at your lordships' bar, the appellants have repeated a contention which, to my mind, is ill-founded. They rejected in the court below the principle which they are now prepared to accept, and which they ask us to apply to the case; and any error in its application in the court below, I think, is due to the appellants themselves, and I therefore think that they ought to bear the consequences, because any miscarriage which there has been is entirely due to themselves.

Lord MORRIS.—I concur in the judgment which has been pronounced by the noble and learned lords who have preceded me. We concur in the principle of the decision embodied in the order made by the Court of Appeal. It is corrected only in two matters—one a matter of figures, and the other of procedure as regards the lodgment of money in court, in place of payment over to Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall. Neither of these matters, as it appears to me, would have altered the course taken by the appellants if they had been aware at that time that the sum due would have been only £1,000 instead of £1,188, or that they should lodge it in court instead of paying it to Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall. Of course, it would have been more beneficial to Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall to get the money into their pockets, by which they could obtain interest upon it pending the taxation of the costs, instead of having it lodged in court where they would get no interest upon it. I therefore concur entirely in the judgment.

Ordered, that the order of the court below be varied by inserting the sum of £746 3s. 9d. instead of the sum of £1,188 1s. 4d., and by inserting the words "pay into court" instead of the words "pay to Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall." That the appellants do pay to the respondents the costs of the appeal to this House.

Endowed Schools Act, 1869, ss. 5, 11, 13, 14 (1), 16, 29, 39, 42—Educational endowments—Maintenance of scholars—Conscience clauses—Rights of patronage.

Held, that, though a discretionary power may have existed in the first governors of Christ's Hospital to devote their endowments more or less to purposes unconnected with education, yet as, in fact, those endowments had been applied to educational purposes almost since the original foundation, they came within the meaning of section 5 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869; and that, under section 29, endowments applied to the maintenance of scholars were likewise educational.

Also, that endowments given subsequently to the 2nd of August, 1819, and legitimately spent in the maintenance of the hospital property, need not be ascertained and removed from the operation of the scheme; and that the consent of the governing body to their inclusion was not necessary under section 14, sub-section 1.

Also, that the scheme was faulty in respect that it directed persons in charge of boarding-houses to allow their boarders exemption, under the "conscience clauses" (sections 15—18), from attendance on religious worship or teaching. The proper course was to direct provision to be made "for enabling the scholars to attend the school and have such exemption as a day scholar" (section 16).

Also, that donation governors' rights of patronage were not vested interests under section 13, or educational interests under section 11; and that a scheme which paid substantial regard to such rights was in conformity with the Act; but that donation governors, as persons directly interested, had a right to be heard on the question whether the scheme was in accordance with section 39, sub-section 3.

Also, that the Corporation of London, having no power of management, though being a portion of the governing body, and legally seised of its estates, had no locus standi as the governing body under section 39.

Also, that Guy's Hospital, having no powers of management, though exercising a right of patronage corresponding to an annuity payable by it to Christ's Hospital under the will of the founder, Thomas Guy, had no locus standi under section 39.

Also, that, under the 42nd section, no appeal could be brought relating to endowments which, during the three years preceding the commencement of the Act, had an annual gross income of not more than £100.

These were certain appeals, originally twenty-eight in number, under the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, s. 39, amended by section 14 of the Act of 1873, against a scheme of the Charity Commissioners in relation to Christ's Hospital.

The nature of the scheme, and the grounds of the appeals against it, appear in their lordships' judgment.

Rigby, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the governors of Christ's Hospital, contended that the endowments dealt with were only in part educational, and were excluded from the operation of the scheme by section 8 of the principal Act. The scheme is not in accordance with section 24, nor do the governors assent to it. Funds applicable to charitable uses are diverted therefrom. The governing body is altered in reference to all the endowments dealt with. Charitable endowments given less than fifty years before 1869, and not mixed with old endowments, have been interfered with: section 25. The founder's regulations as to religious instruction according to the doctrine of the Church of England has been violated. [They referred to section 19 (sub-section 2) and section 16 of the Act of 1869.] The scheme interferes with the designs of the founder, and abolishes the discretionary powers given under the original charter.

They cited Clephane v. Lord Provost of Edinburgh, 4 Macq. 603, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 417; In re Hallett, 28 W. R. 732, 13 Ch. D. 696; and In re St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, Parochial Schools, 33 W. R. 756, 10 App. Cas. 304.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the donation governors (whose locus standi was objected to), urged that sufficient regard had not been paid to their rights of patronage.

He referred to In re Shaftoe's Charity, 3 App. Cas. 872, 26 W. R. Dig. 208.

Finlay, Q.C., and Methold, for the Fishmongers' Company.—[Lord Selborne referred to section 42 of the Act of 1869. Lord Halsbury, C.—Their lordships do not desire to hear the respondents on the appeals of the City of London and the donation governors, or on the appeal of the governing body upon the point whether or not the general resources of Christ's Hospital should be excluded from the scheme as not being an educational endowment within the meaning of the Act.]

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Romer, Q.C. (Joyce with them), for the Charity Commissioners, contended that with regard to endowments given since 1819, and expended as mentioned in section 25, they were impossible to separate from old endowments. [Reference was made to section 4 and section 14, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1869.] Such recent endowments as have been mixed with other investments representing old endowments have been fairly apportioned. All endowments subject to section 14, sub-section 1, have been dealt with accordingly. As to the conscience clause, there was nothing to show that the scholars were required to be instructed in the doctrines of any particular church. The scheme is therefore in accordance with sections 15 and 16 of the Act. Guy's Hospital and the Fishmongers' Company have no vested interest under section 13. They are not governors, and have no locus standi.

Rigby, Q.C., replied for the Governors of Christ's Hospital and for Guy's Hospital.

Methold replied for the Fishmongers' Company.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14, 1889.—The judgment of their lordships (Lord HALSBURY, C., the Earl of SELBORNE, Lord HOBHOUSE, Lord MACNAGHTEN, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, and Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH) was delivered by Lord HALSBURY, C.—The scheme framed by the Charity Commissioners in this case has given rise to a great number of appeals, five of which have been argued before their lordships. They are as follows:—

A.—An appeal by the Governors of Christ's Hospital as constituted by Act of Parliament, 22 Geo. 3, c. 77.

B.—Nine appeals by donation governors of the hospital, now heard as a single appeal.

C.—An appeal by the Corporation of the City of London, and by the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and certain common councillors, members of the acting governing body of the hospital.

D.—An appeal by Guy's Hospital.

E.—An appeal by the Fishmongers' Company.

These appeals raise questions affecting the general character and objects of the foundation as well as its governing body: and it will be convenient first to state the material parts of the instruments which determine those points.

In December, 1547, King Henry VIII. executed an indenture and letters patent by which he granted to the corporation of the City of London the church of the late Grey Friars (thenceforth to be called Christ Church) and the site of their house and other property lately belonging to the Grey Friars and to the hospital of St. Bartholomew. He also granted to them licence to hold lands to the extent of 1,000 marks a year.

The king's motive for the grant is thus described in the recitals of the indenture:—

"The kinge consideringe the myserable estate of the poore aged sick sore and ympotente people as well men as women lyinge and goinge about begginge in the common streates of the saide Cittye of London and the Suburbes of the same to the greate paine and sorrow of the same poore aged sick and ympotente people to the greate infeccion hurte and noyance of his Grace's lovinge subjectes which of necessitie muste dailie goe and passe by the same poore sick sore and ympotente people beinge infected with divers greate and horrible sickuesses and diseases his highness of his moste bountifull goodness and charitable mynde mooved with greate pittye for and toward the reliefe aide succour and helpe of the said poore aged sick sore and impotente people and for thadvoydinge of the great daunger and infeccion which dailye dooth and maye ensue to his lovinge subjectes by reason of the greate sicknesses and horrible diseases of the same sick and sore people and for dyvers other good and godlie purposes and intentes."

By the indenture the corporation covenanted that they would maintain certain clergy and almspeople, with details not material for the present purpose; and that besides the specified objects, the whole profits of the lands then granted or to be taken under the licence should go to the relief and sustentation of the poor.

In the month of June, 1553, King Edward VI. executed an indenture and letters patent, by which he granted to the Corporation of the City of London his Manor House of Bridewell, and all the possessions belonging to the late Hospital of the Savoy. He also granted to them power to hold lands to the yearly value of 4,000 marks, "to the use and sustentation of the poor of the new erected Hospital of Christ Church in London for the time being, and to the sustentation of the poor of the new erected Hospital of St. Thomas in the borough of Southwark in the county of Surrey for the time being, and to the sustentation of the poor from henceforth to be found and brought up in the said Manor House or place of Bridewell."

The king's motive for the grant is thus stated in the indenture:—"The king of his mere mercy having pity and compassion on the miserable estate of the poor fatherless and motherless children, and sick, sore, and impotent people, and most graciously considering the good and godly endeavours of his most humble and obedient subjects the mayor and commonalty and citizens of London who diligently by all ways and means do travail for the good provision of the said poor and every sort of them and that by such sort and means as neither the child in his infancy shall want virtuous education and bringing up neither when the same shall grow unto full age shall lack matter whereon the same may virtuously occupy himself in good occupation or science profitable to the commonweal neither the sore nor sick when they shall be healed shall be permitted nor suffered to wander as vagabonds in the commonweal but shall likewise be put to labour and good and wholesome exercise and so be made profitable members of the same."

In this record (Joint App. A., Vol. I., pp. 87—103) are printed, under the head of "The Order of the Hospitals of King Henry VIII. and King Edward VI., viz., St. Bartholomew's, Christ's, Bridewell, St. Thomas's," certain ordinances made by the Corporation of London as governors of those hospitals. It appears that they established a general body of governors for the joint affairs of the four hospitals, with separate bodies for the separate affairs of each. And it is mentioned that in Christ's Hospital there was a grammar school in which "suche of the children as be preguant and very apt to learninge be reserved and kept . . . in hope of preferment to the universitie." (See p. 91).

As early as the year 1557 different objects of the foundations had been distributed to different houses, viz., education to Christ's Hospital, the cure of sickness to St. Thomas's, and correction of malefactors to Bridewell. This appears from a minute of a general court holden at Christ's Hospital on the 27th of September, 1557, printed at p. 103 of the volume.

"And it is further ordered by this generall assemblye in consyderacon that as the good houses of Christ's hospitall hathe bene erected for the vertuouse bringinge vp of the myserable youth, and St. Thoms hospitall for the releuynge of the neadyne and deseased, and Bridewell for thenforcinge of the lewde and naughtie sorte to labor and worke So, for asmoche as the aforesaid Christ's and St. Thoms hospitalls have hetherto had no perfeccon that is to saye anye directe or plaine order for the maintenaunce of either of the said hospitalls That therfore one generall Renter to be assigned shall yelde and paye vnto the Treasaurer of St. Thoms hospitall for the furniture of the charges of the same all the whole reuenewes and profects that shall come of the lands and rents in any wyse belongingo to the said hospitall vntill other or further order shalbe taken for the same And that the Scruteners and gatherers of Legacies shall make an Accompte of all their collecions at all suche tymes as they shalbe called vnto any generall courte And that the treasaurers and Scruteners of the said hospitalls shall receaue suche legacies and conteyne the same in their accomptes as from hensforth shalbe geven to anye of the said hospitalls And that no Treasaurer of any hospitall shall medle wth the legacie in any wyse that is bequethed to another.

"And also that Christ's hospitall shall be stayed wth the monethlye collecion graunted of the citizens and of suche ysseues as shall aryse and growe of thoffice of Blackwell hall."

The distribution of functions and funds thus effected has never been disturbed. It does not appear that Christ's Hospital retained any of the property granted by the charter to the Corporation of London except the site of its buildings. The bulk of its endowments is derived from subsequent donations.

The arrangements made in 1557 with respect to the government of the hospitals gave rise to disputes between the City of London as governors of all the hospitals on the one hand, and the officers and acting governors of the several hospitals on the other; and in the year 1782 the Act 22 Geo. 3, c. 77, was passed for the purpose of giving validity to a settlement agreed on by the disputing parties. Thereby was established a separate governing body for Christ's Hospital, with full powers of management over its possessions and affairs. That is the body whose appeal comes first in the list, and raises the most important questions.

APPEAL A.

The main objection is one which strikes at the very root of the scheme, for it is contended that the emoluments which the Charity Commissioners have treated as educational endowments within the meaning of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, are not really such, but are either excluded from the Endowed Schools Act, or, on the view most favourable to the interests of education, are endowments of a mixed character, such as are dealt with by the 24th section of the Act. This contention is supported on two grounds.

First, it is pointed out that the grant of Henry VIII. contemplates, not education specifically, but general eleemosynary objects; and that the grant of Edward VI., though it does contemplate education, does so only among other objects equally important. Therefore it is argued that the first governors, the City of London, being intrusted with the application of these properties to various objects, might have applied the whole so as to exclude education; and so the endowments are, by the terms of section 8 (4) of the Endowed Schools Act, excluded from its operation.

Their lordships think that the answer to these arguments lies on the face of the instruments above cited. They do not agree that, under the grant of Edward VI., education could have been wholly neglected by the administrators of the funds. But passing by any question as to what the first governors might in their discretion have done, they did in fact take the reasonable and wise course of separating, as regards locality and property and management, the various public objects which they had to promote. This was done almost immediately after the foundation. Ever since that time the original site of Christ's Hospital and the large gifts made to it have been applied to education; and its governing body, acting separately from 1557 onwards, and placed separately upon an indubitably legal footing in 1782, has been concerned with educational funds. This long-continued application of these funds clearly brings them within section 5 of the Act.

But then it is said that a large portion (and calculations are made to show that it is much the larger portion) of the funds have been expended on the physical sustenance of the boys admitted to the school; and it is argued that funds employed in maintenance or clothing are not within the Act unless according to the terms of section 29 they are endowments attached to a school for that purpose.

It appears to their lordships that this argument attributes to section 29 an effect precisely the reverse of what was intended. If a donor has given property for no other purpose than that of maintenance or clothing, there might be a doubt whether it should be taken as a purely educational endowment under section 5, though it be attached to a school. Section 29 is adapted to remove this doubt, but not to cut down the definition of educational endowments given in section 5. It certainly would be a strange result if it were found that the Act treats endowments for maintenance of scholars as being general educational endowments if only they are attached to a school, and yet treats general educational endowments as being mixed if in fact they have been applied in maintaining as well as teaching the scholars. Their lordships think that no such anomaly is to be found in the Act. In their judgment funds are applied for the purposes of education at school within the meaning of section 5, whether the system followed be that of teaching only, or that of taking in the scholars and maintaining as well as teaching them.

Their lordships, therefore, are of opinion, with reference to the first objection of the governors, that the scheme is right in treating all the general endowments of Christ's Hospital as educational within the meaning of section 5 of the Act, and in treating those which have been given to it for maintenance of scholars as educational under the terms of section 29.

Some objections have been made to the mode in which the commissioners have dealt with recent endowments, or endowments given subsequently to the 2nd of August, 1819, which, by section 14 (1) of the Act, are excluded from the operation of schemes except with the assent of the governing body. Some of these objections were abandoned in the course of the argument, because it was found that the principles contended for by the appellants would not yield results more favourable to them than those adopted by the commissioners. But Mr. Rigby still contended that where recent endowments had been spent in improving or maintaining the old property, the amount spent should be ascertained and removed from the operation of the scheme.

To this contention their lordships cannot assent. It may be that some gifts have been taken by the governors and brought into the year's expenditure, part of which has been devoted to the maintenance of the hospital property. But the accounts to which their lordships have been referred in p. 258 and in pp. 300 to 307 of the Appendix A, vol. I., do not show, and there is nothing else in the record to show, that the governors have done anything except to apply in the maintenance of their property funds lawfully applicable for that purpose, as any other wise and prudent landowner might do. The accounts are not very clear upon this point, and probably were not made out with any such thought in the accountant's mind; but, assuming that general legacies have been brought in to aid the year's income, and have not been funded or kept to any separate account, the result is that the money has been spent, and spent in legitimate ways, to trace such money would be impossible, and, if possible, would be wrong.

Another important objection taken to the scheme rests on what are commonly called the conscience clauses of the Act, sections 15 to 18. The scheme embodies them with a modification to be mentioned presently. The governors contend that their foundation is one of those which, by force of section 19, are partially excepted from the provisions of the preceding sections, being, as they say, specially attached to the Established Church. Section 19 excepts any educational endowment the scholars educated by which are "required by the express terms of the original instrument of foundation, or of the statutes or regulations made by the founder or under his authority, in his lifetime or within fifty years after his death (which terms have been observed down to the commencement of this Act), to learn or to be instructed according to the doctrines or formularies of any particular church, sect, or denomination."

The instruments of foundation contain no directions on the subjects to be taught. To bring the case within section 19, the governors rely first on an injunction issued by Edward VI. to all schoolmasters of youth commanding them to teach in their schools the catechism of a certain godly and learned man, probably John Day; but this injunction, whatever its validity, is not a statute or regulation for Christ's Hospital, nor is Day's Catechism a formulary of the Church of England. The governors next rely on a number of minutes entered in their books, and recording orders made by them from time to time. From these it appears that in the year 1570 the children were furnished with Dean Nowell's Catechism, that a person was appointed to give them instruction in "the Catechisme," and that attendance at the catechetical lessons was required of the officers of the house and of two governors. Nowell's Catechism never was a formulary of the Church of England. It is doubtful whether orders of the kind produced, for appointing an officer, for providing books, for prescribing the places and times of instruction and the persons to attend thereat, are statutes or regulations of the kind contemplated by section 19. It is certain that we cannot find in them any such express terms for requiring instruction in the doctrines and formularies of the Church of England as are necessary to fulfil the requirements of that section.

But this part of the scheme (section 80) contains a provision which, so far as their lordships know, is quite novel. It provides that when exemption from attendance on religious worship or teaching has been claimed for a scholar in the way prescribed by section 16 of the Act, every person in charge of a boarding-house of any school of the foundation shall allow such exemption. To this the governors object, and their lordships think that it is not warranted by the Act. In section 16 it is enacted that (when section 19 does not apply) "in every scheme . . . the commissioners shall provide that if the parent . . . of any scholar who is about to attend such school, and who but for this section could only be admitted as a boarder, desires the exemption of such scholar . . . but the persons in charge of the boarding-house of such school are not willing to allow such exemption, then it shall be the duty of the governing body of such school to make proper provisions for enabling the scholar to attend the school, and have such exemption as a day scholar." The commissioners are here ordered to insert in their scheme the exact provisions of the section. If exemption is claimed for a boarder, and the persons in charge of the boarding-house are not willing to allow it, what is to be done? The Act says that provision shall be made "for enabling the scholar to attend the school, and have such exemption as a day scholar." The scheme says that the persons in charge of the boarding-house shall be bound to allow the exemption. These two directions are contradictory of one another, and in this respect their lordships are of opinion that the scheme is erroneous.

APPEAL B.

The case of the donation governors is that at the passing of the Act of 1869 they were entitled to the right of presenting children for adoption into the hospital in rotation with other governors; and that opportunities for presentation occurred, on an average, every 3½ years. Section 93 of the scheme materially curtails this privilege, for it provides that a donation governor shall not present a child as long as there is on the foundation any child presented by him; and also that one-third of the presentees shall be girls. The donation governors therefore object that the scheme is not in conformity with the Act because it has not had regard to their patronage as directed by section 13.

Their lordships agree with the appellants that they are persons directly affected by the scheme, and are therefore entitled to be heard on the question whether the scheme is or is not in conformity with the Act, section 39 (3); but on that question the decision must be against the appeal. It is impossible to deny that regard, and substantial regard, to the patronage in question has been paid in framing the scheme. The appellants contend that it is not sufficient regard; but they have not in their case or through their counsel suggested any measure of the regard that should be paid, except that the patronage should be left wholly untouched, or that a full equivalent should be given in exchange for it.

Their lordships cannot put such a construction on the Act. Section 11 enacts that, when a scheme abolishes or modifies the educational advantages of any class of persons, the commissioners shall have due regard to the educational interests of that class; and section 39 is careful to provide an appeal to her Majesty in Council by the governing body on that very point. Section 13 first enacts that the commissioners shall save or make due compensation for certain vested interests; and section 39 expressly provides an appeal on that very point by the persons directly affected. Those vested interests do not include the rights of patronage claimed by the donation governors. They are dealt with by a separate sentence in section 13, which directs the commissioners to have regard to them, and no express mention of them is made in section 39. If the Legislature intended what the donation governors allege, rights of patronage should simply have been set down in section 13 as one of the vested interests to be saved or duly compensated. But they are dealt with in different terms, and are clearly placed on a different footing both from vested interests and from those educational interests to which due regard is to be had. Their lordships hold that this scheme, which pays regard, not illusory but substantial, to the rights of patronage in question, cannot be successfully impeached as not being in conformity with the Act in that respect.

APPEAL C.

The position of the appellants in this case is a little complicated. They are a portion of the governing body established by the Act of 1782. They represent especially the Corporation of the City of London, which was the original grantee of the endowments of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., and, as their lordships understand, is still legally seised of the estates of the hospital, though without any powers of management. The City has made gifts to the hospital, and there have been accorded to the governors who specially represent it certain privileges of presenting children who are received upon the foundation. They now complain of the scheme because it has not due regard to their rights of patronage. But they also assume the position of a governing body, and take objections to the scheme of the same character as have been dealt with in Appeal A., and the additional objection that the scheme has not due regard to the educational interests of the destitute poor of certain localities.

So far as regards rights of patronage, the case stands on the same footing as the case of the appellants in Appeal B., and the appeal must be rejected for the reasons there assigned.

As regards the other objections, their lordships consider that the appellants are not in those matters directly affected by the scheme, and are not the governing body to which by section 39 the right of appeal in such matters is confined. It is true that the expression "governing body" is by section 7 of the Act defined in wide terms, which, though not strictly grammatical, may include persons who have the right of holding any endowment dealt with by the scheme. And it may be that in some foundations there are more bodies than one who for different purposes of the Act have to be considered as governing bodies. But no such question arises now.

In section 7 the meaning given to the term governing body is expressly stated to be "unless the context otherwise requires," and by section 39 the governing body which is invested with the important power of appealing on several grounds of general interest to the objects of the foundation, must be that body alone which is charged with the power and the duty of general management. These appellants, therefore, have no locus standi to be heard on appeal, except as regards their rights of patronage.

Appeal D.

The appeal of Guy's Hospital has relation to a gift made in the year 1724 by Thomas Guy, the founder of the hospital, to Christ's Hospital. By that gift the funds of Guy's Hospital were charged with the payment of £400 a year to Christ's Hospital upon condition that Guy's Hospital should have liberty to put in Christ's Hospital every year four poor children, with a preference to founder's kin.

From that time to the present the annual payment of £400 has been made, and every year four children of Guy's family have been appointed to Christ's Hospital by Guy's Hospital. In the year 1830 Christ's Hospital, finding that the charge of maintaining and teaching Guy's children exceeded the value of the annuity, endeavoured to renounce it, but was compelled to continue it by a decree of the Court of Chancery.

The annuity has been carried into, and administered as part of, the ordinary income of Christ's Hospital, and as such is operated on by the scheme. Guy's Hospital now complains of certain clauses of the scheme—viz., of section 85, which restricts the benefits of the foundation to such as stand in need of assistance, and requires contributions of those whose parents are able to contribute substantially; of section 86, which imposes certain conditions as to the character and health of the children; and more especially of section 99, by which only eight places on the foundation are reserved for Guy's family, and those only for the period of twenty years from the date of the scheme. Guy's Hospital claims to be a governing body of Christ's Hospital, so far as regards the endowment in question, and therefore to have the right of appealing under section 39 (4) of the Endowed Schools Act on behalf of Guy's family.

The claim to be a governing body within the meaning of section 39 of the Act is inconsistent with the construction above placed on that section. Guy's Hospital is under an obligation to pay £400 a year to Christ's Hospital, upon the conditions of Guy's will. But the Governors of Christ's Hospital are the general managers of that sum as of the other revenues of their hospital. What remedy Guy's Hospital may have against a breach of the conditions of Guy's will by Christ's Hospital is a question of law which can only be decided in a suit properly constituted for the purpose. For the purpose of this appeal Guy's Hospital can only be considered as a body corporate directly affected by the scheme, and objecting to it as not being in conformity with the Act because it does not pay regard to the rights of patronage. So far as that consideration goes their lordships think that this case does not substantially differ from that of the donation governors, and that the objection to the scheme cannot be sustained. As regards the educational interests of Guy's children, Guy's Hospital have no locus standi under section 39. The right of appeal on this point is given to the Governors of Christ's Hospital alone.

Appeal E.

The appeal of the Fishmongers' Company relates to a gift made by Mark Quested in the year 1642, and to a compromise between the company and Christ's Hospital in the year 1683. Under the compromise the company paid to Christ's Hospital the sum of £200, and Christ's Hospital became bound to receive forthwith six poor children on the appointment of the company. It was also arranged that the company should be entitled to have six nominees always in Christ's Hospital, paying the sum of £4 3s. 4d. a year for each. This arrangement has continued up to the present time. The company object to the scheme on the ground that it does not pay proper regard to the rights of the company or to the educational interests of their nominees.

Probably the considerations which would govern this appeal on its merits are substantially the same as apply to Appeal D. But their lordships are precluded from entering into such considerations, because the 42nd section of the Endowed Schools Act forbids appeals having relation only to endowments which during the three years preceding the commencement of the Act have had an average annual gross income of not more than £100.

As to all the Appeals.

The general result is that, in their lordships' opinion, all the petitions of appeal should be dismissed, except the petition of the Governors of Christ's Hospital. Upon that petition their lordships think that the proper course will be to remit the scheme to the Charity Commissioners, with a declaration that it is erroneous so far as it fails to embody the provisions required by section 16 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, and so far as it requires persons in charge of a boarding-house to allow exemptions from prayers and religious worship.

They will humbly advise her Majesty accordingly.

In re Lord Egmont's Settled Estates. (a.)

Settled Land Acts (Amendment) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 30), s. 1—Terminable rent-charge for defraying expenses of improvements—Redemption out of capital money—Payment of bonus.

Where a tenant for life of settled land has created a terminable rent-charge in pursuance of any Act of Parliament for the purpose of repaying money borrowed for improvements, it is allowable for the trustees of the settlement, under section 1 of the Settled Land Act of 1887, in applying capital money to the expenses of redeeming such rent-charge, to include in such expenses a payment by way of bonus to the lender for taking repayment before the proper time.

In re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates, 36 W. R. 162, 37 Ch. D. 123, disapproved.

Appeal from a decision of North, J.

Lord Egmont was the tenant for life of certain estates at Banstead and elsewhere under a settlement dated the 10th of February, 1870. Being desirous of effecting some drainage improvements on the settled lands, he borrowed various sums of money from the Lands Improvement Co. for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the work; and by orders of the Inclosure

(a.) Reported by F. G. Rucker, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Commissioners made in pursuance of the Lands Improvement Co.'s Acts the settled lands were charged with certain rent-charges in favour of the company extending over a fixed number of years by way of repayment of the sums advanced. The tenant for life was, as between himself and the remaindermen, bound to pay the instalments which should become payable during the continuance of his interest. The instalments were duly paid by the tenant for life for some years.

Subsequently money came to the hands of the trustees, which was applicable as capital money arising under the Settled Land Act, 1882; and Lord Egmont requested the trustees to apply such money to the redemption of the rent-charges. The company were willing to have the rent-charges redeemed, but only on condition that they were paid a sum of money by way of bonus for accepting repayment of the loan before the proper time. The trustees being doubtful whether they had power to redeem on those terms, Lord Egmont applied to the court, asking that the trustees might be at liberty to apply the money in their hands to the redemption of the rent-charges, including the payment by way of bonus.

North, J., thinking he was bound, on the authority of the decision of Kay, J., in the case of In re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates, 36 W. R. 162, 37 Ch. D. 123, to hold that the trustees could not pay any sum by way of bonus to the company, made the following order:—That the trustees might properly, out of money in their hands, being capital money, or money applicable as capital money, arising under the Settled Land Act, 1882' redeem or otherwise provide for payment of so much of the instalments accruing, or to accrue due, of the rent-charges as represented or was appropriated to the payment of capital sums.

Lord Egmont appealed.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C. (Reginald Winslow with him), for the appellant.—By section 21 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, "capital money arising under this Act, subject to payment of claims properly payable thereout, and to application thereof for any special authorized object for which the same was raised, shall, when received, be invested or otherwise applied wholly in one, or partly in one and partly in another or others, of the following modes, (namely) . . . (ii.) In discharge, purchase, or redemption of incumbrances affecting the inheritance of the settled land." In the case of In re Knatchbull's Settled Estate, 33 W. R. 569, 29 Ch. D. 588, where terminable rent-charges had been created under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, it was held that the tenant for life was not entitled to have the charges paid off out of capital money. In consequence of that decision the Settled Land Act of 1887, was passed, section 1 of which enacts:—"Where any improvement of a kind authorized by the Act of 1882 has been, or may be made, either before or after the passing of this Act, and a rent-charge, whether temporary or perpetual, has been or may be created in pursuance of any Act of Parliament with the object of paying off any moneys advanced for the purpose of defraying the expenses of such improvement, any capital money expended in redeeming such rent-charge, or otherwise providing for the payment thereof, shall be deemed to be applied in payment for an improvement authorized by the Act of 1882." The payment by way of bonus which the court is now asked to allow clearly comes within this section. In re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates is distinguishable from the present case; but if necessary that case ought to be overruled.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the tenant for life borrowed money to pay for improvements on the estate, such improvements being of a kind authorized by the Settled Land Act, 1882, and by way of repaying the loan he created terminable rent-charges. After paying the instalments of the rent-charges for some years he desired to have them redeemed by the trustees. North, J., thought that the money had been properly borrowed, and that the trustees had in their hands money with which they might redeem the rent-charges; but he felt constrained by the decision of Kay, J., in Lord Sudeley's case to say that he could not allow payment of part of the money which the trustees would have to pay for redemption—namely, a bonus by way of compensation to the lender, who is willing to be redeemed at a certain price. What is the meaning of the words in section 1 of the Settled Land Act of 1887, "money expended in redeeming such rent-charges, or otherwise providing for the payment thereof"? "Money expended in redeeming such rent-charges" means money which will have to be expended in redeeming. The words must be construed to include what the lender will accept for redemption of the rent-charge. Then was North, J., right in saying that this payment of bonus could not be allowed? Lord Sudeley's case was not a case of redemption; the order there asked for was for the payment of the instalments of the rent-charge, from time to time, out of capital money in the hands of the trustees. That case, therefore, does not govern the present. But I think that Kay, J., took too strict a view of the Act in that case, and failed to give effect to the words, "or otherwise providing for the payment thereof." This is a case of redemption pure and simple. I think that North, J., could have allowed payment of this bonus, and the appeal must be allowed. If the trustees desire to go into the question of the amount of bonus, the case must go back to North, J.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case turns on the true construction of section 1 of the Settled Land Act of 1887, which was passed to remedy the defect brought to light in Knatchbull's case. [His lordship read the section.] No distinction is drawn between a rent-charge redeemable by contract and a rent-charge not redeemable by contract. We are asked to apply the Act to a rent-charge not redeemable by contract. The borrower, in order to redeem, must come to terms with the lender. The lender says, I am willing to be redeemed, but I must have something to compensate me for the loss of a good investment. The object of the Act is to enable capital money to be expended in redeeming rent-charges, whether temporary or perpetual; and the payment of the proposed bonus by way of compensating the lender, being part of the expense of redemption, seems to me to be authorized by the Act. It is said that this is not in accordance with Lord Sudeley's case. But that case was different from this; there the summons only asked that the capital money might be from time to time applied in payment of the instalments, it did not ask for redemption. However, I agree with the Master of the Rolls that Kay, J., in that case took too limited a view of the Act.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed.

court, under ord. 37, r. 6a, can only be made where it is sought to examine witnesses under the order, and the court has no jurisdiction to make such an order where production of documents alone is asked for.

Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (Denman, Charles, and A. L. Smith, JJ.)

The defendants who had obtained an order for a commission to examine witnesses before a special examiner in France, took out a summons for an order that letters of request should issue under ord. 37, r. 6a, to the French court for the purpose of obtaining upon the examination production of certain documents which were in the possession of the French court. The defendants alleged that these documents could only be obtained by means of letters of request. The court, reversing the decision of Lawrance, J., at chambers, ordered the letters of request to issue. A similar application, where the facts were the same, is reported sub nom. Mason & Barry v. Comptoir d'Escompte, ante, p. 685. The plaintiffs appealed.

Finlay, Q.C. and F. M. Abrahams, for the plaintiffs.

Bigham, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson, for the defendants.

The COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.) allowed the appeal. The application was made under ord. 37, r. 6 a, and by that rule forms 37a and 37b in appendix K. were to be followed. According to those forms it was clear that the examination of witnesses was the foundation of the issue of letters of request. The examination of witnesses was the necessary essential in an order for the issue of letters of request, and upon that examination there might be production of documents and copies of those documents taken. In the present case the summons did not ask for the examination of any witnesses, and therefore the court, upon the present materials, had no jurisdiction to issue letters of request. Upon this ground, therefore, the application for letters of request must be refused.

Appeal allowed.

The Railway Commissioners having decided, under sections 2 and 3 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, that the plaintiffs were giving an undue preference to another company over the defendants in their rates for carriage, the defendants sought to set off, in an action brought against them by the plaintiffs, the amount by which the rates paid by them under protest exceeded the rates paid by the other company.

Held, on the authority of Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. Denaby Main Colliery Co., 33 W. R. 491, 14 Q. B. D. 209, that the set off could not be maintained.

A claim on the writ for interest is not a good demand in writing for the purposes of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28.

Appeal from the decision of Grantham. J.

The plaintiffs had charged the defendants for the carriage of coal rates in excess of those which they charged the Dowlais Iron and Coal Co. On the 10th of June, 1887, the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs to the effect that they intended to apply to the Railway Commissioners in respect of this undue preference, and that from that date they should only consider themselves liable to pay such rates as might be found by the commissioners to be proper, and that any excess above such rates would be subject to recovery.

The Railway Commissioners, by an order dated July 26, 1888, enjoined the plaintiffs to desist from giving an undue preference to the Dowlais Co., and ordered them to carry for the defendants on equal terms with that company.

The defendants had continued to pay under protest the rates charged by the plaintiffs up to July 26, 1888.

The plaintiffs having brought the present action to recover the balance of an account, the defendants claimed to set off the amount so paid by them in excess of the rates paid by the Dowlais Co., as being shown by the decision of the commissioners to be overcharged.

The indorsement on the writ claimed interest on the amount claimed at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the date of the writ.

Grantham, J., on the authority of Denaby Main Colliery Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 11 App. Cas. 97, 34 W. R. Dig. 159, gave judgment for the plaintiffs, with interest.

The defendants appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and W. Graham, for the appellants.—Although no action will lie for a breach of section 2 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, yet where an undue preference has been established by a decision of the commissioners the money overcharged and paid under protest can be recovered. Such an action is not in contravention of section 6. In Denaby Main Colliery Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. Lord Halsbury expressly reserved this question: Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. v. Greenwood, 21 Q. B. D. 215, 36 W. R. Dig. 172. Secondly, the claim on the writ for interest is not a demand in writing within 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28, which contemplates a demand before action.

Bompas, Q.C., and R. S. Wright, for the respondents, were only called upon to argue the second point.—Interest may be given as damages for non-payment of the debt, and therefore the claim on the writ is a good demand within section 28.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The main point in this case has, in my opinion, been already decided in this court in Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. Denaby Main Colliery Co., 33 W. R. 491, 14 Q. B. D. 209. We there held that the only remedy where there has been a breach of section 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, was by application to the Railway Commissioners under section 3. and that the only remedy they can give is as to the future, and not as to the past. That view was expressly supported by Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords, and was certainly not overruled by the other lords. We are therefore bound by that decision, which I entirely adopt, to say that the appellants are not entitled to set off this amount.

As to the point of interest, I think the appellants are right, and that the amount of the plaintiffs' judgment must be reduced by so much.

FAY, L.J.—I agree. The provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, give certain remedies in cases contemplated by the Act. But certain rights already existed, and therefore the Act deals with two classes of rights. The old rights are left intact, but the new rights are only to be enforced in the manner specified by the Act. That seems to me the plain meaning of the Act, and it is the meaning given to it by this court and by Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LOPES, L.J.—The principal question is, I think, concluded by the decision of this court which has been cited. As to the interest, I do not think that the claim on the writ is a demand in writing within the meaning of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28.

Judgment varied.

CRAWFORD v. MAY. (a.)

Executor—Retainer—Loan by wife to husband—Death of husband intestate and insolvent—Administration of husband's estate—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 3—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10.

A married woman advanced money to her husband for the purposes of his business. The husband died intestate and insolvent without repaying the advance, and the widow became his administratrix. An action was brought by creditors for the administration of the husband's estate. The widow, as administratrix, received considerable personal estate of her husband, and claimed to retain out of the balance in her hands the amount of her advance to him. On a summons in the administration action for payment of the balance into court, Held, that the widow, as executrix, was entitled to retain out of the balance of the personal estate the amount of the advance made by her to her husband.

Adjourned summons.

The question for decision was whether the widow and administratrix of a trader whose estate was insolvent had a right of retainer out of personalty received by her as such executrix, in respect of money lent by her to her husband for the purposes of his business.

The administratrix, Frances Emily May, married John Venables May on the 11th of October, 1883, and in February, 1885, advanced to him £143 5s., which he received by a cheque, payable to him, which he paid into his bank to his business account and used for the purposes of his business.

John Venables May died on the 3rd of December, 1889, intestate, and letters of administration to his estate were granted to the administratrix on the 17th of January, 1890. The estate proved to be insolvent. The widow, as administratrix, received considerable personal estate of her husband, and the balance in her hands was £213 8s. 7d., out of which she claimed to retain £143 5s. in repayment of the advance made by her to her husband.

The summons was taken out by William Henry Crawford, a creditor of the intestate, in an action for the administration of the intestate's estate brought by him, on behalf of himself and all other creditors, for the payment into court, by the administratrix, of the sum of £213 18s. 7d., the balance of the intestate's estate.

E. C. Macnaghten, for the summons.—The widow has no right of retainer, as administratrix, in respect of the £143 5s., as by section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, her claim is postponed to the claims of the other creditors of the husband in the event of his bankruptcy, and by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the provisions of section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, are incorporated into the administration of insolvent estates; so that she has no right of retainer as against the other creditors. She has no debt owing to her until the claims of the other creditors are satisfied.

He referred to In re Genese, 34 W. R. 79, 16 Q. B. D. 700; Ex parte Taylor, 28 W. R. 205, 12 Ch. D. 366.

W. Baker, for the widow.—This is not a case of bankruptcy; and the widow is seeking to retain as administratrix, not to prove her debt. Section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, does not refer to retainer, and must be construed strictly.

He referred to In re Count D'Epineuil, Tadman v. D'Epineuil, 30 W. R. 423, 20 Ch. D. 217; Lee v. Nuttall, 27 W. R. 805, 12 Ch. D. 61.

E. C. Macnaghten replied.

NORTH, J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—With regard to the question of proving that the money was lent to the intestate for the purposes of his trade or business, there is the case of In re Genese, in which it was held that a woman who seeks to prove under her husband's bankruptcy for money lent by her to him must show that the money was not lent for the purposes of his trade or business. The natural inference would be that the money was lent for the purposes of his trade or business. The onus of proof is on the person seeking to show that it was not an advance for such purposes, and this has not been done.

Then section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, provides that "any money or other estate of the wife lent or intrusted by her to her husband for the purpose of any trade or business carried on by him or otherwise shall be treated as assets of her husband's estate in case of his bankruptcy under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor for the amount or value of such money or other estate after, but not before, all claims of the other creditors of the husband for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied." It is clear on the evidence that the money was lent as a debt, and is due from the intestate as a debt. Under this section it is treated as a debt. The words "subject to reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor for the amount or value of such money," &c., show that it is treated as a debt. The Act recognizes her "as a creditor" in respect of it. In this case the husband was not a bankrupt, although he died insolvent. It is not a case of bankruptcy; but it is said that the case is brought within the provisions of section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, by virtue of section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875. That section does not incorporate the rules of bankruptcy for all purposes, but only for particular things. It provides that in the winding up of companies, and in administering the estates of deceased persons, where the assets prove insufficient, "the same rules shall prevail and be observed as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors, and as to debts and liabilities provable, and as to the valuation of annuities and future and contingent liabilities respectively, as may be in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt."

Now the widow is the legal personal representative of her husband. She has received considerable personal estate, and she seeks, not to prove, but to retain the money she has lent her deceased husband out of the estate she has received. That claim cannot be denied unless by virtue of section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, through section 10 of the Judicature

Act, 1875. But the right of retainer is not affected by the Judicature Act, as was decided in Lee v. Nuttall, where it was held that an executor's right to retain a debt due to himself did not make him a secured creditor within the meaning of the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10, and that his right to retain was not affected by that section. This was not because he was a secured creditor, for, if so, he would have a right of retainer against creditors of a higher degree, and not only against creditors of equal degree to himself. If the widow were seeking to prove, it would depend on her right to prove. But here she is only seeking the right of retainer. The right of retainer is not affected by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, and therefore, in my opinion, she has a right to retain the debt.

Attachment—Non-payment of money—Persons acting in fiduciary capacity—"Possession or control"—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4, sub-section 3.

Trustees and executors improperly sold certain bonds, part of their testator's estate, which they had appropriated to answer a certain legacy. In an action by the legatees to compel the trustees to make good the value of these bonds, an inquiry was directed as to what was their market price on the day of the judgment, and the trustees were ordered to pay to the plaintiffs within a specified time the value as ascertained. The value of the bonds had increased between the date of their sale and the date of the judgment. The money not having been paid, the plaintiffs moved for leave to issue a writ of attachment against the trustees.

Held (following Cronin v. Twinberrow, 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 44, W. N., 1887, p. 201), that the sum ordered to be paid, so far as it represented the difference between the value of the bonds on the day they were sold and their market price on the day of the judgment, had never been "in the possession or under the control" of the defendants within the meaning of sub-section 4 of section 3 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and that payment could, therefore, not be enforced by attachment.

Motion.

By the judgment (dated the 26th of February, 1890), in an action brought against the defendants, John Saunders Walker and Robert Walker Smith, to make them responsible for a breach of trust in improperly selling certain bonds, forming part of the estate of William John Walker, of whose will they were trustees and executors, it was declared that they "duly appropriated a moiety of the value of two bonds of the South Yorkshire and River Don Railway Co., one for £700 and one for £500, to answer the legacy of £600 bequeathed by the said will to the children of Walter Walker" (the plaintiffs), "and that the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs for one-half of the market value of this day of the said two bonds, or the securities representing the same, which bonds were improperly sold by the defendants in the month of June, 1881, together with interest on £600 at the rate of £4 10s. per cent. per annum from the 26th day of December, 1887, to this day." And it was ordered that the defendants should, "on or before the 4th of March, 1890, pay to the" plaintiffs "£27 18s. 6d., being the unpaid balance of £57 1s. 9d., the amount of interest due as aforesaid after deducting £29 3s. 3d. received on account." And it was ordered that an inquiry should be made as to what was "the value, at the market price of this day, of one moiety of" the two bonds "or of the securities then representing the same," and that the defendants should "within three months after the date of this order pay to the" plaintiffs "the amount which shall be certified to be the value of the said bonds or securities on this day, together with interest thereon at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum from this day until payment." And it was further ordered that "in default of the defendants paying to the plaintiffs the said sum of £27 18s. 6d., for interest by the time aforesaid," the defendants should "within seven days from the date of the chief clerk's certificate pay to the" plaintiffs "the said sum of £27 18s. 6d., together with the amount which shall by the said certificate be certified to be such value as aforesaid."

The chief clerk certified, on the 21st of April, 1890, that the two bonds in question had, on the 16th of July, 1874, been converted into 4½ per cent. debenture stock of the same amount of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., and that the market value, on the date of the judgment, of £600, being one moiety of £1,200 of this stock, was £840.

The defendants had not paid either of the sums of £27 18s. 6d. or £840 pursuant to the judgment.

Farwell, for the plaintiffs, moved for leave to issue a writ of attachment against the defendants for their contempt in not paying these sums, or, in the alternative, that the defendants might be committed to prison for such non-payment.

A. à B. Terrell, for the defendants, was not called upon.

Barrett v. Hammond, 27 W. R. 471, 10 Ch. D. 285; Marris v. Ingram, 28 W. R. 434, 13 Ch. D. 338; Holroyde v. Garnett, 30 W. R. 604, 20 Ch. D. 532; Middleton v. Chichester, 19 W. R. 369, L. R. 6 Ch. 152; Cronin v. Twinberrow, 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 44, W. N., 1887, p. 201, were referred to.

STIRLING, J.—In my opinion this order cannot be enforced by attachment. The defendants were in possession as trustees of certain bonds, and improperly sold them. For that they were, upon the judgment, held liable. The sale was held to be a breach of trust, and they were ordered to make good, not the amount they had received for them, but their value at the date of the judgment. An inquiry was directed as to what was the value of the bonds at the market price on that date, and the defendants were ordered to make that good. It was admitted that their value at the date of the judgment was greater than at the time when they were sold, and that the difference between the amount produced by the sale and the sum which they were ordered to pay by the judgment never came into the hands of the defendants. No doubt they were liable for that, and the judgment, if I may say so, most properly ordered them to make it good. But it is now sought, the money not having been paid, to enforce the judgment by attachment, and the question is, not whether the defendants are liable to pay, but whether the judgment is one which, having regard to the provisions of the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4, can be enforced by an attachment. It is said that the case falls within the third exception: "Default by a trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity and ordered to pay by a court of equity any sum in his possession or under his control." Part of the sum which the defendants were ordered to pay did not come into their possession, and was not under their control. For so holding I have the decision of North, J., in Cronin v. Twinberrow, in which the same point appears to have arisen, and the learned judge refused to issue an attachment on the same ground. That case is undistinguishable from the present; but I think that, even without it, I should, having regard to Middleton v. Chichester, have arrived at the same conclusion. The motion must therefore be refused, but without costs.

Will—Construction—Power of appointment—Exclusive or non-exclusive—Objects designated nominatim—Gift over to same persons in default of appointment—Death of one in lifetime of appointor—Validity of appointment—"Representatives"—"Vest"—Marriage settlement—Covenant to settle property of wife—Law of Powers Amendment Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 37).

If a power is given by will to appoint a fund among several persons nominatim, with a gift over in default of appointment to the same persons nominatim, or their representatives, and all the objects of the power survive the testator, the death of some of the objects during the lifetime of the donee of the power will not affect the validity of the power over the whole fund.

The principle of Boyle v. Bishop of Peterborough, 1 Ves. jun. 299, followed and applied.

Where a gift is given by will to a person and his "representatives," the term "representatives" means executors and administrators, not next of kin, in the absence of any special words in the will to control or restrict such ordinary meaning.

In re Crawford's Trusts, 2 W. R. 341, 2 Drew. 230, followed.

A reversionary interest which becomes vested in the wife during coverture, liable to be divested by the exercise of a power of appointment, is included in a covenant by the husband contained in a marriage settlement to settle all personal estate which shall come at any time during coverture to him or shall vest in him in right of his intended wife, or in her by bequest, gift, or otherwise.

Originating summons by the plaintiff, Samuel Cumberlege, the surviving trustee and executor of the will of Samuel Ware, for a declaration under ord. 55, r. 3, as to who were the persons entitled to the investments representing two sums of £10,000 bequeathed by that will, and in what shares and for what interests.

The testator by his will, dated the 5th of July, 1859, bequeathed to each of the persons thereinafter named, to and for his or her own absolute use and benefit, the sum affixed to his or her name, except as thereinafter limited, that was to say, to John Cumberlege, Anne Cumberlege, the plaintiff, Samuel Cumberlege, and Catherine Cautley, each a sum of £10,000, and limited the above use and benefit of the capital sum of the legacies to the said John Cumberlege and Anne Cumberlege as follows, "so that the sums may be left by them respectively after their deaths in such proportions as they may appoint to their brothers or sisters (sic), Charles Cumberlege, Samuel Cumberlege (the plaintiff), and sister, Catherine Cautley, in failure of appointment to be equally divided between the three or their respective representatives." And the testator further directed that the legacies given to Anne Cumberlege and Catherine Cautley should be invested as his trustees should approve, and the interest arising therefrom should be in trust for them for their separate use. And in case either of them should become a bankrupt or insolvent debtor, or should sell, assign, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of the annual interest bequeathed to her, the same should cease and fall into his residuary estate as though she were then actually dead, except in respect of Catherine Cautley, whose legacy should go to her children according as she should appoint, and in default thereof to them absolutely. The will further contained a devise and bequest of residuary estate. The testator died on the 12th of December, 1860.

Catherine Cautley died on the 9th of July, 1867. John Cumberlege died on the 6th of March, 1869, having, by a second codicil to his will, dated the 23rd of February, 1869, which referred to the death of Catherine Cautley, appointed one-third of his £10,000 to his brother, Charles Cumberlege, then Charles Ware, and the other two-thirds to the plaintiff.

Anne Cumberlege died on the 17th of October, 1889, having by her will, dated the 10th of September, 1887, in exercise of her power of appointment contained in the will of the testator, appointed her £10,000 in equal shares between the plaintiff and Charles Ware, her brother, as tenants in common.

Charles Ware died on the 22nd of September, 1888, predeceasing Anne Cumberlege. He left a widow, six children, and grandchildren, issue of a son who had predeceased him.

Upon the marriage of Catherine Cautley a settlement, dated the 12th of July, 1843, had been executed, which contained a covenant by her future husband for the settlement of all personal estate which, upon the marriage, or at any time during the coverture, should come to or vest in him in right of his then intended wife, or in her by bequest, gift, or otherwise.

The plaintiff was the surviving executor of the wills of John Cumberlege, Anne Cumberlege, and Catherine Cautley.

Three questions were raised for the decision of the court, first, whether Catherine Cautley, one of the objects of the power, having predeceased John Cumberlege, and both Catherine Cautley and Charles Ware, two of such objects, having predeceased Anne, the appointments made by John and Anne were respectively valid; secondly, whether "their respective representatives" meant legal personal representatives, or issue, or next of kin; and, thirdly, if legal personal representatives, whether the share which Catherine took in default of appointment was subject to the covenant to settle after-acquired property in the marriage settlement of 1843.

H. A. Giffard, Q.C., and A. Bailey, for the plaintiff.—This is an exclusive power of appointment: In re Veale's Trusts, 25 W. R. 122, 4 Ch. D. 61, 5 Ch. D. 622. So, the appointment by John is valid, although executed before 37 & 38 Vict. c. 37. Anne exercised her power after that statute was passed, so her appointment was good. Charles Ware predeceased Anne, so that share goes as in default of appointment. [They also referred to Doe d. Thorley v. Thorley, 10 East, 438.] The death of any of the objects of the power before the testator will to that extent only defeat the power and the devise over; the power and devise over will remain as to the shares of the survivors; Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 421; 2 Jarm. Wills, pp. 265-6, 4th ed.; Farwell on Powers, p. 134; Reade v. Reade, 5 Ves. 744. If an object of a power survive the testator, but die before the donee of the power, the power and devise over remain: Boyle v. Bishop of Peterborough, 1 Ves. jun. 299; Butcher v. Butcher, 9 Ves. 382, 1 V. & B. 79; Woodcock v. Renneck, 4 Beav. 190, 1 Phil. 72; Paske v. Haselfoot, 11 W. 1089, 33 Beav. 125. This is a power to leave which is equivalent to an appointment by will. It is to be a power to appoint the whole in favour of those who survive the appointor. The plaintiff takes two-thirds of the £10,000 belonging to John Cumberlege, and Charles Ware's representatives take the other third. As to Anne Cumberlege's fund, the plaintiff takes one moiety, and also one-third of the other moiety, which appointment fails by reason of the death of Charles in Anne's lifetime.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and W. Cowell Davies, for the defendants, C. Cumberlege Ware, E. Cumberlege, and H. M. Cumberlege, the executors of Charles Ware and the defendant E. Cumberlege, a beneficiary under the will of Charles Ware.—"Representatives" means legal personal representatives: In re Crawford's Trusts, 2 W. R. 341, 2 Drew. 230; Walker v. Marquess Camden, 16 Sim. 329. That case is entirely different from In re Horner, 36 W. R. 348, 37 Ch. D. 695. The executors of Charles Ware are entitled to share in the moiety of Anne's fund.

Wace, for Charles E. C. Ware, as nex tof kin (a grandson of Charles Ware).—"Representatives" means statutory next of kin: Booth v. Vicars, 1 Coll. 6; Stockdale v. Nicholson, 15 W. R. 986, L. R. 4 Eq. 359; Walter v. Makin, 6 Sim. 148; King v. Cleaveland, 26 Beav. 26, 166, 7 W. R. 602, 4 De G. & J. 477. The fund, in default of appointment, comes to Charles E. C. Ware in the evtnes which have happened.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Lemon, for Joshua Cautley, the husband of Catherine Cautley.—"Representatives" means legal personal representatives. This is a non-exclusive power. Mrs. Cautley's share, in default of appointment is not bound by her settlement. The term "vest" means indefeasibly vested, or vested in possession: In re Jackson's Will, 28 W. R. 209, 13 Ch. D. 190; In re Mackenzie's Settlement, 15 W. R. 662, L. R. 2 Ch. 345; Ricketts v. Loftus, 4 Y. & C. Ex. 519. [STIRLING, J., referred to Sweetapple v. Horlock, 27 W. R. 865, 11 Ch. D. 745.]

Buckley, Q.C., and J. G. Butcher, for H. Mordant and H. W. Lyall, the trustees of Catherine Cautley's settlement.—A vested interest is created which passes to the representatives of all parties. Upon the death of Mrs. Cautley in 1867 the power came to an end altogether. "Representatives" means legal personal representatives. As to John Cumberlege's fund, that must go in thirds, it is a bad appointment: Woodcock v. Renneck; In re Crawford's Trusts; In re Jackson's Will. The power is non-exclusive: White v. Wilson, 1 W. R. 47, 1 Drew. 298.

J. Austen Cartmell, for John C. Cautley, son of Mrs. Cautley.—"Representatives" means next of kin by blood or children; this is shown by the gift over. The legacy includes everything which Mrs. Cautley may take.

Giffard, Q.C., was not called upon to reply.

STIRLING, J.—I can dispose of part of this case at once. The first question arises upon the meaning of the words "their brothers or sisters, Charles Cumberlege, Samuel Cumberlege, and sister, Catherine Cautley," which are not strictly grammatical. I assume, without thinking it necessary to decide it, that the gift is in such proportions as John and Anne may respectively appoint to these three persons. John and Anne have made appointments under that power, and the question is, whether, under the circumstances of the case, those appointments are valid. In support of them has been cited the well-known case of Boyle v. The Bishop of Peterborough, followed as it has been by Ricketts v. Loftus, and it is said that those cases show that the power subsisted and was exercisable in favour of the survivors of the three persons who were named. A distinction was sought to be drawn between the present case and those to which I have referred, on the ground that the gift there was to a class, and that in the present case it is to named individuals. But it is to be observed that no case has been cited which is a decision that the doctrine laid down in Boyle v. The Bishop of Peterborough does not apply to a case where the objects of the power are named, and not simply described as a class. The doctrine has been applied in the case of Boyle v. The Bishop of Peterborough to gifts to children as a class. It was extended, or perhaps I ought not to say extended, but applied, in the case of Ricketts v. Loftus to a gift where the objects of the power were all of them named, but described as the sons and daughters of a certain person by his wife, and I am asked at this time after the passing of the Act of 1874, which abolished the doctrine altogether as to non-exclusive powers, not to extend it to a case where the persons who are the objects of the power are indicated by name and not by description so as to constitute a class. There is no authority that compels me to adopt that contention, and it seems to me that it is inconsistent with the view which has been taken by the profession as indicated by the three text-writers who have been referred to in the course of the argument—namely, Mr. Jarman, Lord St. Leonards, and Mr. Farwell.

In Mr. Jarman's book the law is laid down thus (4th ed., p. 268):—"Where a power is given by will to appoint property amongst several objects, and the subject, in default of appointment, is given to them individually (and not as a class) as tenants in common, a question sometimes arises whether by the death of any of the objects the power is defeated in respect of the shares of those objects. The established distinction seems to be that if all the objects survive the testator, and one of them afterwards dies in the lifetime of the donee of the power, the power remains as to the whole. But, on the other hand, if any object dies in the testator's lifetime by which the gift lapses pro tanto, the power is defeated to the same extent." So that Mr. Jarman does not treat the doctrine as resting on the objects being described as a class; but he appears to indicate his opinion to the contrary, because he refers to the subject in default of appointment being given to them individually, and not as a class. Then I have been unable, in the course of the examination which I have given to the passage referred to in Lord St. Leonard's book, to find any indication of his view being otherwise; and when we come to the last writer of all, he apparently takes the view that the doctrine applies whether or not the objects of the power are described as a class or are named.

In Mr. Farwell's book (p. 134, s. 17) the law is laid down in this way:—"Where a power is given by will to appoint property among several objects, and the subject, in default of appointment, is given to them nominatim, and not as a class, as tenants in common, the death of any of the objects of the powers before the testator will to that extent defeat the power and the devise over; the power and devise over will only remain as to the shares of the survivors." Then he goes on:—"If, however, an object of a power survive the testator, but die before the donee of the power, the power and the devise over will remain."

Seeing that there is no decision to the contrary, and seeing, as I gather from the text-writers, that the view that has been taken by the profession is that the doctrine extends to a case in which the objects of the power are described nominatim as well as a class, I think I ought not to draw the line in the way which I am asked to do, especially having regard to the fact that the Legislature has since intervened, and, by the Act of 1874, has really abolished altogether the doctrine on which the cases rest—namely, that where the power is given to appoint, as I hold here, to three persons, you must appoint something to each of them, otherwise the exercise of the power is bad. I think, therefore, that the exercise of the power by the wills of John and Anne is good.

But then that does not quite exhaust the case. There is a lapse as regards the will of Anne, by reason of her brother Charles having died in her lifetime, and that raises the question how it is to go in default of appointment. The will runs thus :—"In failure of appointment to be equally divided between the three or their respective representatives." Several questions arise as to the force of the word "representatives," and I shall reserve my judgment on this part of the case.

June 21.—STIRLING, J.—I have now to decide what is the construction of the will of the testator with reference to the devolution of a moiety of the legacy of Anne Cumberlege which goes as in default of appointment. The question turns upon what meaning is to be attributed to the words "their respective representatives" in the gift over of that legacy in default of appointment. The meaning of the word "representatives" was considered in a well-known case before Kindersley, V.C., In re Crawford's Trusts. He there laid down that the word was to be taken, in the absence of any context to the contrary, as meaning the executors or administrators of the person represented, not the next of kin. That case has been repeatedly cited with approval, and it has been repeatedly followed, and the principles laid down in it would be binding on me, whatever my own individual opinion about them might have been; but I desire to say that, so far from feeling any doubt or desire to differ, I find myself, after having read the judgment most carefully, in entire accord with what is laid down there.

That being so, all I have to consider is this, whether there is anything in this will which would lead me to infer that the testator used the word "representatives" in any other than its primary legal sense. In the first place, it is to be observed that the gift in which the word occurs is not an immediate gift, but one after the determination of prior life interests and in default of appointment; and, as is pointed out by the Vice-Chancellor in In re Crawford's Trusts, there is no presumption under that state of circumstances that the testator used the word otherwise than in its primary meaning—namely, executors or administrators. The only circumstance which is in favour of an opposite construction in the present case is, that the testator has twice used the words "executors and administrators" in the course of his will. I cannot think that the mere appointment of executors is a circumstance to which any weight is to be attached. It occurred in the case of In re Crawford's Trusts, and was disregarded by the Vice-Chancellor, but in that case, it is true, the word "administrators" did not occur. In the present case the words occur, in the first instance, in connection with the word "trustees," when the testator declares that his trustees, their heirs, executors, or administrators, shall only be chargeable for such moneys as they may respectively actually receive by virtue of the trusts; and, in the second instance, in the limitation of the testator's residuary real and personal property to the residuary devisee and legatee. The Vice-Chancellor, in the case to which I have referred, says emphatically that he adheres to the principle laid down by Lord Cottenham in The Attorney-General v. Malkin, 2 Phil. 64, at p. 68, that slight circumstances ought not to be considered as affording sufficient evidence of the testator's intention to use the term which he has chosen to employ otherwise than in its ordinary legal sense.

In my judgment, although no case has been cited precisely on all fours with this, there is not sufficient in this will to afford any evidence that the testator intended to employ the words "their representatives" otherwise than in their ordinary legal sense, and I hold that by "representatives" in this will is meant the legal personal representatives of the persons referred to. A further question arises as to the share which, under these circumstances, was given to Mrs. Cautley of the legacy in which Anne Cumberlege took a life interest. It is said that it ought to go to her children, under the clause in the will which directs that her legacy in certain events is to go to her children according to her appointment, and in default to them absolutely. The question, therefore, is whether the word "legacy," as used in that part of the will, includes the share of each of the legacies which, in default of appointment, were given to "the three or their respective representatives." I have read the will very carefully, and it seems to me that throughout, down to the passage in question, whenever the testator speaks of a legacy to Miss Cumberlege or Mrs. Cautley, or John Cumberlege, he means the sum of £10,000, in which those persons respectively take the limited interests which were conferred by the will. I see no reason to suppose that, when he directed the legacy of Mrs. Cautley to go to her children in the manner mentioned, he used the word in any other sense. I think, therefore, that this share of the legacy given to Anne Cumberlege does not go to Mrs. Cautley's children under the clause to which I have referred.

The next question that arises is, whether this share is bound by the covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in Mrs. Cautley's marriage settlement. Is it, in fact, personal estate which, at any time during the intended coverture, came to or vested in Mr. Joshua Cautley in right of his intended wife or in the said Mary Cumberlege, his wife, by bequest, gift, or otherwise? What was the nature of the interest conferred by the will of Samuel Ware which I have read? It has plainly conferred on Mrs. Cautley a vested interest, an interest which, upon the death of the testator, became vested in Mrs. Cautley, liable to be divested by the exercise of the power of appointment conferred on Miss Cumberlege. Does such an interest fall within the terms of the settlement? It did vest in Mrs. Cautley by bequest during the coverture, and I can see no reason for holding that the word "vest" there is used otherwise than in its strict legal sense, which means a vested interest, and not vesting in possession. In my judgment, therefore, the share of Mrs. Cautley is bound by the covenant in the settlement, and goes accordingly. I may add that it seems to me that the case of In re Jackson's Will, although not on all fours with the present case, is an authority in favour of the conclusion to which I have come.

REG. v. WILLIAMSON. (a.)

Gas—Metropolis—Chief gas examiner—Right of gas company to appear before chief gas examiner "by counsel"—Agents—Gas Light and Coke and other Gas Companies Acts Amendment Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. clxxxi.), s. 12.

By a section of a Metropolitan Gas Act a gas company is entitled to appeal from the decision of a gas examiner to the chief gas examiner, whose decision, after hearing the parties, shall be final and conclusive.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, although the gas company could appear on the hearing of such appeal by their "agents," they could not, as a matter of right, appear by "counsel," as counsel cannot be "agents" in such cases, and that it is in the discretion of the chief gas examiner whether he will hear counsel or not.

Rule calling on Professor Williamson, "chief gas examiner" under the Metropolitan Gas Acts, to show cause why he should not "hear counsel" in a case in which the Gas Light and Coke Co. had appealed to be heard before him.

The Metropolis Gas Act, 1860, provides for the appointment of "gas examiners" for testing the illuminating power and purity of gas, and the Gas Light and Coke and other Gas Companies Acts Amendment Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. clxxxi.), which applies to, amongst other metropolitan companies, the Gas Light and Coke Co., provides that if a company think themselves aggrieved by the report of a "gas examiner," they may appeal to the "chief gas examiner." In a dispute affecting the Gas Light and Coke Co. the company appealed from the decision of a "gas examiner" to Professor Williamson, "chief gas examiner," the right of appeal being given by section 12 of the Act, which provides that "if the company think themselves aggrieved by any report of a gas examiner they may . . . appeal to the chief gas examiner, whose decision, after hearing the parties, shall be final and conclusive." In the particular case that had arisen, the company wished to be represented and heard by counsel before the chief gas examiner, but Professor Williamson refused to hear counsel on the appeal, and the present rule was for a mandamus to compel Professor Williamson to "hear counsel" in the matter, and the question now was whether he was bound to hear counsel.

In his affidavit filed in answer to the rule Professor Williamson said: "The questions which arise on such appeals are to some extent of a scientific character, but in many cases the only matter to be considered is whether the gas examiner has followed with sufficient precision the mode of testing prescribed by the gas referees. These questions are as a rule best settled by hearing the gas examiner on the one side, and the scientific or practical officers on the other, and they are seldom susceptible of legal argument. There is no limit to the number of appeals a company may bring. There may be an appeal from the report of every gas examiner for each day at each testing place. Having regard to the subject-matter and to the power given to each company to be represented by its officer, it has appeared to me that the Act does not require me to hear counsel on every appeal against a daily test, and that a discretion is left to me in the matter. During the thirteen years from my first appointment I have never been requested to hear counsel on such appeals, nor have any complaints been made as to my practice, which works well. I have laid down no rule that I will not hear counsel in any case, and whenever a particular case appears to require argument by counsel I am ready to consider the application, but I do not admit the claim as of right."

R. S. Wright, showed cause against the rule.—Professor Williamson does not say that he will not hear counsel in any case, he merely says that he has a discretion in the matter whether he will hear counsel or not, and exercising this discretion in this particular case he refuses to hear counsel, as he thinks it quite unnecessary. There is no compulsion upon the chief gas examiner in such a case to hear counsel: Collier v. Hicks, 2 B. & Ad. 663; Ex parte Evans, 9 Q. B. 279; In re Macqueen, 9 C. B. N. S. 773.

English Harrison, for the London County Council, supported the same view, but did not argue.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C. (Danckwerts with him), in support of the rule.—The company are entitled to appear by their "agents." Who is to choose the "agents" by whom the company are to be represented? Professor Williamson says he is entitled to choose them, but that cannot be so, as persons so chosen would not be the agents of the company. The company are entitled to appear by "agents," and it follows that they must be entitled to choose what "agents" they please, and they can choose counsel to appear for them as their "agents." Counsel are properly described as "agents" of the persons for whom they appear. The chief gas examiner has no discretion in the matter, as he is bound to hear the company or their "agents," he is bound to hear counsel whom the company choose.

POLLOCK, B.—This is an application for a mandamus against Professor Williamson, chief gas examiner under the Gas Act, commanding him to "hear counsel" in an appeal brought before him by the Gas Light and Coke Co. Now I can have no doubt whatever that the gas company desire to assert their right to be heard by counsel. I do not think they have such a right. My judgment proceeds on this, that for a long time in this country it has been a well-known distinction when persons apply by themselves or by counsel. I cannot believe that counsel would allow themselves to be mere agents or machines in the way contended for. Professor Williamson says, I am bound by Act of Parliament to hear you by some agents, but it is in my discretion whether I shall hear you by counsel. It is clear to my mind that that is the correct view, and on that ground it seems to me that this mandamus ought not to go.

DAY, J.—This is an application for a mandamus commanding Professor Williamson to hear "the Gas Light and Coke Co. by counsel" in this matter. My answer is that I think he is not bound to hear the Gas Light and Coke Co. by counsel.

ROBERTS v. WOODWARD. (a.)

Weights and Measures Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21), s. 29, sub-sections (1) (2)—Sale of coals—False statement as to weight by servant of seller—Liability of seller.

In order to support a conviction under section 29 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, there must be a false representation as to the weight of the coals sold by the seller of them. Where, therefore, the seller of the coals made no representation as to their weight, but his servant, in the course of delivering them, made an untrue statement as to their weight,

Held, that the master was not liable for the representation of his servant, and could not be convicted.

Case stated by Mr. Haden Corser, a metropolitan police magistrate.

The facts were as follows:—The respondent, a seller of coals, received an order for five hundredweight of coal. He thereupon directed his servant, Watson, to deliver to the purchaser, at his house, five sacks of coal which were standing in his shop at the time. Watson put the sacks so indicated upon a cart and was proceeding to the purchaser's house when the appellant, an officer appointed by the London County Council for the purposes of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, met him and asked the weight of the sacks. Watson replied that each sack weighed one hundredweight. The appellant then weighed the sacks and found that they were all seriously deficient in weight. The respondent was then charged under section 29, sub-section (2), of the Act with having sold sacks of less weight than that represented by the seller. Sub-section (1) gives power to the proper officer to enter places where coal is sold, to stop any vehicle carrying coal for sale or delivery to a purchaser, to test weights, and to "weigh any load, sack, or other less quantity of coal found in any such place or vehicle or which is in course of delivery to any purchaser."

By sub-section (2), "If it appears to a court of summary jurisdiction that any load, sack, or less quantity so weighed is of less weight than that represented by the seller, the person selling or keeping or exposing the coal for sale, or the person in charge of the vehicle as the case may be, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding five pounds."

The magistrate was of opinion that the respondent had not made any representation as to the weight of the coals, and refused to convict. The question was whether he was right in so refusing.

Meadows White, Q.C., for the appellant.—There was a representation by the respondent as to the weight of these sacks. Five hundredweight was ordered, and when the respondent told Watson to deliver those five sacks that was a representation that they contained the quantity ordered. The representation of Watson was the representation by his master. In Mullins v. Collins, 22 W. R. 297, L. R. 9 Q. B. 292, the master was made criminally responsible for the act of his servant in selling liquor to a constable on duty.

Nevill, for the respondent, was not called on.

POLLOCK, B.—The forcible argument of Mr. White has raised a doubt in my mind as to whether the Legislature has provided a remedy in all cases where honest people would wish a remedy to exist. But looking at the section on which the prosecutor relies it seems to me that to support a conviction there must be a representation by the seller as to the weight of coal sold. It is clear that in this case there was no verbal representation. Where coal is ordered by a customer and immediately sent off, or where coals are sold by a person hawking them in the street, there would usually be a verbal representation as to the quantity sold. [His lordship then briefly stated the facts as above set out, and continued:—] Upon these facts there is no ground for saying that there was a representation by the seller that the sacks were of full weight. The next point is this—that the person in charge of the vehicle when asked the weight stated what was untrue, and that therefore not the servant but his master should be convicted. I cannot think that that is so. I know of no instance of a master being made criminally liable for the act of his servant unless in some such case as where the master is allowing the servant to do some illegal thing and is getting a profit out of it. I think, therefore, that the magistrate was right and that his decision must be upheld.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I also think that Mr. Corser was right when he refused to convict the master here. We have to apply the statute to the facts of the present case. I quite agree that this Act was passed for the protection of poor people who are often defrauded through receiving short weight of coals. But the question is whom has the Legislature brought within its net? When you read section 29 it is quite clear that there must be a representation by the seller. By sub-section (1) the inspector may pounce on the coal either in the shop or during its transit to the purchaser's house; that is during all modes of delivery from the shop to the purchaser on the men's backs as well as in a vehicle. In the present case it was not the servant who was selling, and therefore he cannot be hit, and the master cannot be hit either because he made no representation. It is said that he authorized the representation here. I cannot find that in the facts: all he did was to tell his servant to take the sacks to the vendee. Then it is said that the representation of the servant is the representation of the master, and cases were relied on where a servant in a public-house sold drink to a policeman on duty or allowed gambling to go on without the knowledge of the landlord. Those are strange cases but they are law: they were decided, however, under special and stringent Acts as to the regulation of beer-houses, and they do not govern this case. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF THE BOROUGH OF SALFORD v. LEVER. (a.)

Principal and agent—Bribery of agent—Action against briber to recover excess price fraudulently obtained—Right of briber to plead satisfaction by agent.

Where an agent under the influence of bribes persuades his principal to pay a price for goods obtained from the briber which is in excess of the market price, the principal has two distinct causes of action. He may sue the agent to recover the bribes which the agent has received, and at the same time he may sue the agent and the briber, either jointly or severally, for damages for the loss occasioned by their joint fraud; and in an action against the briber the defendant is not entitled to rely upon an agreement made between the principal and his agent, the effect of which is to discharge the agent from his liabilities, either because, according to Denman and Charles, JJ., the agreement only operates as an accord and satisfaction of the action for bribes, and has no bearing upon the action for damages for fraud, or because, according to Vaughan Williams, J., although the agreement may purport to be in accord and satisfaction of both causes of action, it is one which the plaintiffs, being a municipal corporation, were not entitled to make, and it cannot, therefore, be given any effect to in a court of law.

Motion for a new trial.

The plaintiffs, who were the proprietors of the Salford Gas Works, employed, during the years 1875 to 1887, as manager of their gasworks one Samuel Hunter, whose duty it was to examine tenders for the supply of coal and to report and advise the plaintiffs thereon.

The defendant was a coal merchant, and during the years 1875 to 1878 submitted tenders for the supply of coal to the plaintiffs, and with a view of procuring the acceptance of these tenders by the plaintiffs the defendant corruptly agreed to pay Hunter a commission or bribe of 1s. per ton on the quantity of coal tendered for. In order to recoup himself for such commission to Hunter, he charged for the coal prices which were in excess of the market prices by 1s. per ton. On the advice of Hunter the tenders of the defendant were accepted by the plaintiffs, the coal was delivered to the plaintiffs under contracts so obtained, and the total amount paid to the defendant under such contracts exceeded the current market value of the coal by £2,329. Of the commission promised, Hunter in all received from the defendant about £1,500. Hunter had, during his term of office, received similar bribes from other contractors, for which those contractors recouped themselves in a similar manner, but there was no evidence that the total amount of the excess value obtained by the various contractors (defendant included) exceeded the sum of £10,000.

In August, 1889, the plaintiffs, who had discovered the frauds, entered into an agreement with Hunter in the following terms:—

1. Hunter to deposit forthwith in the Lancashire and Yorkshire Bank, King-street, Manchester, securities which the said bankers will guarantee shall realize the sum of £10,000 in the name of the Mayor of Salford and J. C. Walker (Hunter's solicitor), such securities to remain in the hands of the bankers until the date hereinafter named as a guarantee that the sum of £10,000 will then be paid over to the Corporation of Salford on the date hereinafter mentioned, and the bankers shall give such a guarantee.

2. The corporation shall, at the request of Hunter, proceed with any pending actions against former contractors with the corporation, or at the instance of Hunter to institute further actions against such contractors for the purpose of recovering any bribes or commissions received by Hunter or promised to be paid to him from such contractors.

3. Hunter to give such information and evidence as may be necessary for the purpose of any such actions or proceedings, and also to pay all costs of or incidental to any such actions or proceedings from this date.

4. Any sums of money that may be recovered and received in any such actions or proceedings, or which may be paid either to the said S. Hunter, or to the corporation by any contractors by way of settlement, without action or after action brought, and as to the sufficiency of such payment, the said S. Hunter shall be the sole judge, shall be paid over to or retained by the corporation, and after deducting costs therefrom, the net balance shall be taken in part satisfaction of the sum of £10,000, it being understood that the corporation are to receive a clear sum of £10,000 irrespective of a sum of £442 10s. (some time since recovered by the corporation) and all costs and expenses as before mentioned, and no more.

5. On the 31st day of December, 1889, in case the corporation shall have been unsuccessful in recovering any sum or sums of money in connection with the said actions or proceedings, the said securities or a requisite part thereof shall be realized, and the sum of £10,000 shall be paid over to the corporation, and the said Hunter shall in addition thereto pay to the corporation all costs and expenses of and incidental to the said actions or other proceedings which they may have incurred and cannot recover from any other person or become liable to from this date until the 31st day of December, 1889, and in case the corporation succeed in recovering and receiving any sum less than the said £10,000, then the difference between such sums as may have been so received (after deducting all other costs and expenses) and the said sum of £10,000 shall be paid over to the corporation.

6. The corporation shall at any time prior to the said 31st day of December next at the request of the said Hunter or his solicitor discontinue all or any such actions or proceedings as before mentioned, and thereupon the said sum of £10,000 shall be payable to the corporation, together with any such costs as before mentioned.

7. On the receipt by the corporation of the said sum of £10,000, together with all such costs and expenses as aforesaid, the corporation shall give to the said Hunter a full and complete discharge, and in the meantime they shall take no steps in the chancery action pending against him and one John Graves Hawkins, but the same shall be stayed.

8. Upon payment into the Lancashire and Yorkshire Bank of any sum of money (to the credit of the Mayor of Salford and J. C. Walker), recovered from the contractors as aforesaid, the said Samuel Hunter shall be entitled to receive and have returned to him a corresponding portion of the said securities deposited.

And upon being satisfied that any contractor has paid a sum satisfactory to the said Samuel Hunter as aforesaid, the said corporation shall thereupon give the said contractor a complete and sufficient release from all claims in connection with the said matter.

In pursuance of this agreement Hunter lodged with the bank securities to the value of £10,000. Actions brought against the other contractors resulted in the recovery by the corporation of sums to the amount of £4,000; and in October, 1889, the plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant to recover the sum of £2,329 as damages for fraud in relation to the contracts for the supply of coal by him to them and alternatively as money had and received to the plaintiffs' use. To this the defendant pleaded that if he had paid any bribes to Hunter, Hunter had paid the same to the plaintiffs or had accounted to or compounded with them in respect thereof upon the terms that the plaintiffs should seek to recover and should stand possessed of the moneys claimed in this action as trustees for Hunter. On the trial of the action before Day, J., and a special jury, at the Yorkshire (West Riding) Assizes, the judge directed the jury that the agreement between the plaintiffs and Hunter had no bearing upon the rights of plaintiffs and defendant inter se. The jury found for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, and defendant moved for a new trial on the grounds that the judge misdirected the jury by telling them that there was no evidence that they could take into consideration with a view to reducing the amount of damages claimed, and that the judge ought to have directed the jury to find whether or not (or to have held that) the plaintiffs had been paid by or had compounded with Hunter, and whether the action was being maintained for his benefit, and should therefore have given judgment for the defendant, or should have directed the jury to take into consideration some or all of the above matters, or should otherwise have had regard to the agreement of August 6, 1889, between the plaintiffs and the said Hunter, with a view to assessing the amount of damages which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Lawson Walton, Q.C., for the defendant.—In this case there is no evidence that the total amount of loss sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the excess charges exceeded the sum of £10,000. Of that sum £4,000 has already been obtained, and as to the remaining £6,000 the plaintiffs have, in substance, been paid by Hunter, for since the 31st of December, 1889, is now past the plaintiffs are in a position to realize Hunter's securities. These plaintiffs are in the position of seeking to be paid twice over. But, whatever their loss, plaintiffs cannot sue for the balance. Their action here is, in substance, for damages for a conspiracy to which Hunter was a party; and the agreement of the 6th of August, together with the deposit of securities, amounts to an accord and satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim against Hunter in respect of that conspiracy, and satisfaction by one of two joint tort-feasors is an answer to an action against the other: Brinsmead v. Harrison, 20 W. R. 784, L. R. 7 C. P. 547. Any satisfaction, however small, suffices; even a mere release to one wrongdoer discharges all, on the ground that a release is as good a satisfaction in law as a satisfaction in deed: Cocke v. Jenner, Hob. 66; Hilman v. Uncles, Skinner, 391; Bird v. Randall, 3 Burr. 1345. Any moneys recovered are, under the agreement, to go in relief of Hunter's liability under his guarantee; thus the plaintiffs are really seeking to recover for the benefit of their own fraudulent servant.

Waddy, Q.C., and Henn Collins, Q.C. (C. Gould with them), for the plaintiffs.—Plaintiffs had two distinct causes of action. They had an action against Hunter for the amount of the bribes as for money received by him for their use. They had also a right of action either against Hunter and the defendant jointly or severally to recover the excess prices of which they had been defrauded as damages in tort, or against the defendant alone to recover the excess prices as money received by him to plaintiff's use. Now, satisfaction of the first cause of action is no satisfaction of the second, for the remedies are cumulative, and it was the first cause of action alone that was satisfied by the agreement of the 6th of August. It is a mere accident that in this case the amounts of the bribes promised to Hunter and the amount of excess charges received by the defendant happen to be identical; the bribe might have consisted of something else than money. There are two distinct actions, and it can make no difference which of them is brought first.

Lockwood, Q.C., replied.

CHARLES, J., read the judgment of himself and DENMAN, J.—The plaintiffs in this case sought to recover from the defendant £2,329 as damages "for fraud and misrepresentation in and in relation to contracts for the supply of coal and goods to the plaintiffs from the year 1875 forward, and for the secret and fraudulent payment of bribes and commission in respect of such contracts to the plaintiffs' late gas manager and servant, Samuel Hunter." In their pleadings the plaintiffs claimed the money either by way of damages for the defendant's fraud, or alternatively as a liquidated sum wrongfully in the defendant's hands—in other words, as money received for the plaintiffs' use.

The cause was tried at the last Yorkshire (West Riding) Winter Assize before Day, J., and a special jury, when the following facts were proved:—From the year 1875 to 1887 Samuel Hunter was the gas manager and servant of the plaintiffs. The defendant was, during the same period, a coal merchant carrying on business near Salford, and in 1875, 1877, and 1878 he obtained contracts from the plaintiffs, through the intervention and on the advice of Hunter, for the supply of coal to them at prices in excess of the current market price to the extent of 1s. per ton, or £2,329.

This excess the defendant agreed to pay, and did in part pay, to Hunter by way of secret commission or bribe, in order to procure his recommendation to the plaintiffs of the various contracts which they made with the defendant. It was not disputed that the plaintiffs were primâ facie entitled to recover in some form or other this excess in price from the defendant.

But the defence was based upon an agreement dated the 6th of August, 1889, before the commencement of the action between Hunter and the corporation, which it was said prevented this action from being maintained against the defendant. It becomes important, therefore, to consider what the provisions of that agreement were. It was in the following terms:—[He read the agreement above set out.] Mr. Waddy, for the plaintiffs, suggested that the agreement only applied to "former contractors," against whom actions were pending, and against whom subsequent actions might be brought. But we cannot take this view of its provisions. We think it applies to all former contractors, including Lever, and is not limited in the manner suggested to such former contractors as were actually then defendants in actions.

Its language is not free from ambiguity, but its general effect appears to be this: that Hunter, who had had received bribes from many other contractors besides the defendant, was to deposit with the Lancashire and Yorkshire Banking Co. securities guaranteed by the bankers to realize £10,000, and they were then to continue or commence actions at his cost and his request against the contractors who had received excess prices, and to apply the sums recovered for his benefit by from time to time returning him securities equivalent in amount to the sums recovered. Hunter, until the 31st of December, 1889, was constituted absolutely dominus litium and could until then direct the commencement of or the discontinuance of any actions against the contractors. This agreement was acted upon: Securities to the value of £10,000 were lodged in the bank, and this action (amongst others) was commenced, and it was not disputed that the amount recovered under it would go under clause 4 as other moneys amounting altogether to £4,000 had already gone, in part satisfaction of the sum of £10,000, and so in relief of Hunter. The learned judge, however, was of opinion that the defendant could not rely upon the agreement, and what had been done under it, either as a defence or in reduction of damages; that the plaintiffs had a separate and distinct personal right against him to recover the excess of price which they had paid; and that the mode in which the plaintiffs used the sum recovered was immaterial. They were at liberty, he thought, to apply it, if they could do so consistently with the corporate duty, to the relief of Hunter's securities without any way impairing their right of action against the defendant. He accordingly directed a verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed. A new trial was moved for on behalf of the defendant, or that judgment should be entered for him "upon the ground that the judge misdirected the jury by telling them that there was no evidence which they could take into consideration with a view to reducing the amount of damages claimed, and that he ought to have directed the jury to find whether or not (or to have held that) the plaintiffs had been paid by or had compounded with their servant Hunter, and whether the action was being maintained for his benefit, and should therefore have entered judgment for the defendant, or should have directed the jury to take into consideration some or all of the above matters, or should otherwise have had regard to the agreement of August 6, 1889, with a view to the amount of damages which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover."

It was contended for the defendant that Lever and Hunter were joint tort-feasors, and that the agreement of the 6th of August, 1889, amounted to payment or satisfaction by one of them, and therefore was an answer to an action against the other. Numerous cases were cited in support of this contention, the correctness of which, indeed, was not disputed. We think, however, that those cases are inapplicable. We are of opinion that the plaintiffs had two separate and distinct rights of action, one against Lever alone, or against Hunter and Lever (for no doubt Hunter might have been made a co-defendant with Lever), and another against Hunter alone. Their right against Lever was to recover the excess price he had received over the market price either as damages for the fraud he had committed jointly with Hunter or, if the excess price had been exactly ascertained before action, as money received for the plaintiffs' use. Their right against Hunter was to recover from him the bribe or commission which had actually been paid, and is based upon the well-known and frequently enunciated rule that no agent shall make a secret profit for himself in any transaction he conducts for his principal: see Parker v. McKenna, 23 W. R. 271, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 96; Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Grant, 11 Ch. D. 918, 27 W. R. Dig. 43. It is the latter right which they have compounded for with Hunter, and the arrangements which they have thought fit to make with him cannot, in our opinion, be treated as a payment or satisfaction of the tort which Lever has committed. In this case the bribe coincided in amount with the excess price. But it might have been more or less, or it might not have been made in money at all. In any point of view it was a gift to the agent which the principal was entitled to have at once handed to him. With reference to that gift the plaintiffs might, we think, so far as their corporate duty allowed, make what arrangements they pleased with their servant without prejudicing their right to recover from Lever the full excess price paid. It is true that the amount recovered will go in relief of some of the securities deposited by Hunter, but assuming the plaintiffs have power so to mitigate the loss which would otherwise fall upon their servant, we do not think the defendant can avail himself of that circumstance, either as reducing the amount payable by him for the fraud to which he was a party, or as a bar to the action. There has been no payment or satisfaction by Hunter in respect of the cause of action against the defendant, but only in respect of the separate cause of action against himself, an action to which the defendant could not have been a party, although no doubt Hunter could have been made a co-defendant in the action against him in so far as it is an action to recover damages for the fraud which, in concert with Hunter, he had committed.

We therefore have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was right in the course which he took at the trial, and dismiss this motion, with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., delivered the following written judgment:—I have also come to the conclusion that this motion must be refused, but I prefer to state my own reasons for this conclusion. The action is for damages for fraud, and in the alternative for money received to the use of the plaintiffs—viz., the sums received by the defendant for the purpose of covering bribes to Hunter, the servant of the corporation, to procure his recommendation of the defendant's tender for the supply of coal to the corporation. In my opinion this action sounds in damages, and will not lie in the alternative form for money received. The bribes did not necessarily come out of the pockets of the corporation. The damage sustained by the corporation depends upon how far the price charged to them was in excess of the market or fair and ordinary price of the coal supplied. The bribes might come out of the defendant's profit. I do not think that the plaintiffs can hold to the contract and recover back a portion of the contract price as money received to the use of themselves. It is not like the case where money has by mistake been overpaid under a contract, because then the recovery of the money overpaid is consistent with the contract. In the present case it would be inconsistent. It follows that, in my opinion, the plaintiffs can only recover damages for having been induced by fraud to enter into a contract in excess of the price which they would have had to pay but for the corruption of their servant. The defence set up in the sixth paragraph of the defence seems to consist of two parts. The first part is accord and satisfaction with Hunter, a co-wrongdoer, with the defendant by payment in full or by payment of a composition. The second part seems to be an allegation of an assignment of the benefit of the action to Hunter. It may be that this defence has not been pleaded according to its proper legal result, but now one has not to plead in that form, the defence now has to be set forth in the matter of substance relied on, and the matter of substance relied on in this paragraph is that the plaintiffs have entered into an agreement with Hunter which prevents them from successfully suing the defendant Lever. Now I agree that when a contractor bribes a servant in order that a servant may get for the contractor the master's orders, the master has two distinct causes of action—one against the servant for the profit he has made by the bribes—the other against the contractor and the servant jointly and severally for any loss that the master may have suffered by the joint fraud of the contractor and the servant. I agree further that the master, even though he takes from the servant the bribes which the servant has received from the contractor, is under no obligation to give credit for those bribes in reduction of the damages which the master has suffered by the joint fraud of the contractor and the servant unless indeed the master knew of the servant taking the bribes and allowed him to do so.

Now let me consider the effect of the agreement in this case between the master and the servant—that is to say, between the corporation and Hunter. It seems to be this: Hunter, the servant, is to deposit with the master £10,000 of securities. This £10,000 may, I think, be taken as the amount of the bribes which Hunter had received from the various contractors, probably including Lever. In consideration of this deposit the master—that is, the corporation—is to bring and continue such actions against the fraudulent contractors, at the expense of the servant Hunter, as Hunter may direct, and the proceeds of such actions are to be paid into a bank, and when the amount arrives at £10,000 Hunter, the servant, is to receive back his securities and to receive a full and complete discharge from the corporation: see clause 7. I think that, having regard to the terms of this agreement, this means that Hunter is to be discharged from all claims of the master, as well as claims in respect of the bribes as claims in respect of the joint frauds of Hunter and Lever, the servant and contractor.

The question is whether this agreement in any way prevents the master, the corporation, suing Lever, the contractor. If the agreement does afford an answer to the action it must be, it would seem, on one of the following grounds—viz.:—(1) That it operates as a release of one of the two joint tort-feasors; (2) Because it operates as an agreement by way of composition, to the benefit of which all the wrongdoers are entitled; (3) Because it operates as an assignment of the cause of action to Hunter, and that Lever has a good answer to Hunter as participes criminis. I do not think that it operates as a release; but I am not very certain of this. The test is whether Hunter could have successfully pleaded the agreement if, after the deposit of the £10,000, the corporation had brought this action against Hunter and Lever jointly. If Hunter could have so pleaded the agreement I think that the action against Lever must fail.

Now, in my opinion, Hunter could not have successfully pleaded the agreement, but not because the intention of the parties was not such that, as between them, the agreement was intended to operate as a release of Hunter, but because it would have been a good replication to such a plea—at all events, if pleaded by Lever—that the agreement between the corporation and Hunter was illegal, ultrà vires, and of no effect. I think that the agreement was illegal and ultrà vires because the corporation had no right to present to Hunter the amount he had received in bribes on account of the corporation; and I further think that an agreement to present an intended witness with moneys proportioned to the effect of his evidence is an immoral agreement and void as against public morality. I have assumed for the purpose of these observations that the effect of the agreement, if operative at all, was to give to the corporation any surplus recovered in the actions beyond £10,000; but I am by no means clear that the true effect is not that if £10,000 was recovered before the 31st of December, or paid by Hunter to the corporation before that date, the whole proceeds of such actions were not to go into the pocket of Hunter; but if, as I think, this agreement is of no effect or validity, its construction is immaterial.

I do not think that the agreement operates even when £10,000 is paid by way of payment or composition, for the £10,000 is not paid by Hunter, nor does it come out of his pocket. Nothing, in fact, is given or paid by Hunter to the corporation, who only receive what is their own.

I do not think that the agreement operates as an assignment so as to let in defences against Hunter, because I am inclined to think that if the agreement is operative at all the surplus beyond £10,000 belongs to the corporation. I am aware that the illegality of the agreement is not replied by the corporation, but this does not prevent the court from refusing to give effect to an illegal agreement.

REG. v. COUNTY COUNCIL OF HEREFORD. (a.)

Local government—Superannuation allowance—Lunatic asylum—Officer of or in asylum—Chaplain not residing in asylum—Right of chaplain to pension—Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97), s. 57.

A chaplain of a lunatic asylum, appointed under the Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853, is an officer of the asylum, although he does not reside therein or give his whole time to the duties of his office therein, and as an officer of or in the asylum he is qualified to receive a superannuation allowance, under the 57th section of the Act, if the visitors in their discretion think right to grant him such allowance.

Rule for a mandamus calling on the county council for the county of Hereford to show cause why they should not pay to the Rev. C. Bulmer a certain sum as a superannuation allowance, which had been granted by the visiting justices, and confirmed by the quarter sessions, before the county council was established.

Mr. Bulmer had been for eighteen years the chaplain of the Hereford Lunatic Asylum, appointed under the Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97), section 55 of that Act enabling the visiting justices to appoint a chaplain, who shall be in priests' orders and licensed by the bishop.

By that section the chaplain is to perform in the chapel of the asylum the service of the Church of England, but he was not required by the Act to reside in the asylum, as some of the other officers were.

Mr. Bulmer did not reside in the asylum, but he resided at a benefice which he held about two miles distant from the asylum, and he came from his residence to the asylum when he performed the duties of chaplain there.

His salary as chaplain was £150 a year; he was fifty-four years of age and he wished to resign the chaplaincy on the ground of his age and increasing infirmity, and that he was incapable of performing satisfactorily the duties of the chaplaincy in addition to those of his benefice.

The visiting justices granted him a superannuation allowance of £50 a year, and this was confirmed by the sessions, but the county council of the county refused to pay it, as some objection was made that Mr. Bulmer was still able to perform the duties of the chaplaincy.

Section 57 of the Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853, enacts:—"In case any superintendent, chaplain, matron, or any officer or servant of any asylum become, from confirmed sickness, age, or infirmity, incapable of executing the office in person, or have been an officer or servant in the asylum for not less than twenty years, and be not less than fifty years of age, it shall be lawful for the committee of visitors of such asylum, if in their discretion they think fit so to do, but not otherwise, to grant to such superintendent, chaplain, &c., such annuity by way of superannuation as they, in their discretion, think right."

The same words are used in the Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 280, with the exception that fifteen years' service is substituted for the twenty years' service in the Act of 1853.

A rule was accordingly obtained, on behalf of Mr. Bulmer, calling on the county council to show cause why they should not pay to him the superannuation allowance granted by the visiting justices.

Jelf, Q.C., and Austin, showed cause.—The Act was not intended to give an allowance to a person in the position of Mr. Bulmer. If a person lives in the asylum and gives up his whole time to his duties there, it is quite right that he should have certain advantages. This gentleman did not live in the asylum, and was, therefore, not an officer in the asylum. It is a different thing to deal with a person living in the asylum and with a person outside the asylum, who has a good living outside the asylum. Mr. Bulmer was not an officer in the asylum, and does not come within the class of persons entitled to allowances. There is a second ground why he should not have this pension. To bring the case within the Act a person must be incapacitated by "confirmed sickness, age, or infirmity." Mr. Bulmer does not come within that description, as he was only fifty-four years of age, and there is no suggestion that he could not still perform the duties of the chaplaincy if he gave up his time to them. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—If you are wrong on the first point, then this point goes also, as it is a matter in the discretion of the justices.] That is so. This rule ought to be discharged.

Asquith, Q.C., and A. T. Lawrence, in support of the rule.—The answer to the argument on the other side is twofold—in the first place, the distinction between an officer in the asylum and an officer of the asylum is a casual distinction; in the second place, if it is not so, this gentleman is an officer in as well as an officer of the asylum. If the Legislature had intended to confine the right to a pension to persons living in the asylum they would have said so. Mr. Bulmer was an officer in the asylum, as he performed the duties of chaplain in the asylum.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—If the second point taken by Mr. Jelf had stood alone, I confess I should be of opinion that he had a case. But that point is not for us to consider, it is for the justices. I am of opinion, however, that Mr. Jelf has failed on his first point. The words of the Act seem to be clear. The 55th section gives power to appoint a chaplain, and the duties of the chaplain are specified in that section. The section gives the visiting justices power to appoint a medical officer, "who shall be resident in such asylum." The chaplain need not be resident, though the superintendent must be. Then by the same section the visitors are to fix the salaries according to the services. That is the 55th section. Then the 57th section is the one we have to deal with. Now Mr. Jelf says there is a marked distinction between officers of and officers in the asylum, and that although they are all officers of the asylum, they are not all officers in the asylum. I can see no such marked distinction and no such marked antithesis as he contends for. I see no such distinction in that phraseology, and I see no good reason for making such distinction. The chaplain, while he performs his duties, must perform them in the asylum, and while he performs the services in the asylum he must be an officer in it. It is said that that is not so, and that a person to be an officer in the asylum must be a person who has given his whole time to the duties of his office in the asylum. There is nothing in the Act of Parliament which says so, and I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I agree in every word my lord has said.

Rule absolute.

GOVERNING BODY OF CHARTERHOUSE SCHOOL v. LAMARQUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Inhabited house duty—Charterhouse School—Charity school—Exemption from duty—14 & 15 Vict. c. 36—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B., case 4.

The Charterhouse School was founded in the reign of James I., under a charter for founding "one hospital, house, or place of abiding for the relief of poor or impotent people," and also "one free school for the instructing, teaching, maintenance, and education of poor children or scholars." In 1867 the school was removed to the country, but the hospital still remained in London. In 1888 the school buildings were assessed to inhabited house duty. There were scholarships and exhibitions at the school, and a large number of paying pupils, and the school was to a large extent self-supporting, though a number of the pupils derived a benefit from the charitable foundation. Exemption from inhabited house duty was claimed for all the school buildings (except the masters' residences) under 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B., case 4, as being a charity school within the exemption in favour of "a hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons," and the Commissioners of Income Tax decided that they were not exempt under that section.

Held, that the school, being mainly self-supporting, was not a "charity school" within the meaning of the exemption, and that, therefore, the school buildings were not exempt from inhabited house duty.

Case stated by Commissioners of Income Tax acting for the division of Godalming, in the county of Surrey.

The governing body of Charterhouse School appealed against an assessment to inhabited house duty, and they claimed that the school buildings (except the masters' residences), which constituted the Charterhouse School, were exempt from such duty, as being a charity school within the meaning of the exemption in 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, case 4, which exempts from the inhabited house duty "any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons." In 1867 the school was removed from Smithfield, in the county of Middlesex, to Godalming, in Surrey, but the hospital remained in Smithfield, and there was now no question as to the hospital.

The surveyor of taxes assessed the school buildings to inhabited house duty, and this assessment was confirmed by the commissioners, except as to a sanatorium called "Uskites," which was a building apart from the other buildings, and which was used for sick boys. This sanatorium was held to be exempt, and as to this there was no appeal.

The facts and cases cited during the arguments are fully set out in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jeune, Q.C., and Coward, for the appellants.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., and Dicey, for the respondent.

April 29.—The following written judgment of the court was read by

POLLOCK, B.—The governing body of Charterhouse School appeal against an assessment for inhabited house duty made by the commissioners acting for the division of Godalming on the 3rd of December, 1888, upon premises used as a sanatorium called "Uskites," and also upon the schoolhouse and buildings connected therewith other than the portions occupied by the head master and assistant masters as residences. The school consists of the school itself and the head master's and two assistant masters' houses, each under one roof and adjoining to each other, and of a chapel, library, large hall, and classrooms, two sanatoriums, and other buildings which are not in actual communication with the main building, but all in a group, except the sanatorium called "Uskites."

The inhabited house duty is now payable by virtue of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36. By section 2 the provisions of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B. (which had been repealed by 4 Will. 4, c. 19), are by reference re-enacted. By that schedule the duty is made payable upon "all inhabited dwelling houses" the occupiers of which for the time being are made chargeable, and rules are made for charging the duty. The schedule also contains a table of exemptions, and by one of these, "case 4," "any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons" is exempted. The appellants contended that the whole school premises except the masters' houses come within this exemption. The commissioners decided against this contention, and we have now to say whether they were right in so doing.

The foundation of Charterhouse dates from a royal charter granted 9 James 1, whereby Thomas Sutton was empowered to found and establish in "the late dissolved Charterhouse beside Smithfield, in the county of Middlesex," one hospital house or place of abiding for the finding, sustentation, and relief of poor, aged, maimed, needy, or impotent people; and the founder, and after his death the governors, were empowered to place in the hospital a master and such poor people, men and children, as should from time to time be convenient. By the same charter further power was given to Thomas Sutton to found and establish at the same place one free school for the instructing, teaching, maintenance, and education of poor children or scholars, and similar power was given to the founder, and after him the governors, to place in the school such numbers of poor children or scholars as should be from time to time convenient. The foundation of the hospital (in which the school was included) was confirmed by the 3 Car. 1 and by another statute of the same year, whereby provisions were made for the constitution, management, and conduct of the establishment. The poor brothers to be placed in the hospital were not to exceed four score in number. The scholars of the foundation were limited to forty. They were fed and received certain clothing. This was the character of the hospital and school in the 17th century.

The school, however, underwent a considerable development, and a large number of pupils became attached without participating in any of the advantages of the foundation. In 1867 it was thought desirable that the school should be moved into the country, and to give the necessary powers for this purpose the Charterhouse School Act, 30 & 31 Vict., c. 8 (Private), was passed. By this the governors were empowed to sell the school buildings in Charterhouse and purchase a site not exceeding 100 acres elsewhere, with all the requisite appurtenances, on which they might erect buildings for the purpose of a school, with a chapel, dwellings, and suitable offices, playground, yards, garden, approaches, conveniences, and appurtenances. All scholarships, exhibitions, and endowments belonging to the then existing school were to belong to the school when removed, and all powers and provisions contained in the royal charter and other statutes before mentioned were to continue in full force and effect, except so far as they were inconsistent with the Act. Under the powers of this Act a site was purchased at Godalming, all the requisite buildings were erected, and the school was removed there, the hospital remaining at the original site in London. In pursuance of the Public Schools Act, 1868, special commissioners were appointed for determining and establishing the constitution of the new governing body; and in 1871 a statute was framed by them containing provisions for that purpose; and under the statute for the government of the school, as altered by an Order in Council of March 3, 1883, the mode of enjoying the privilege of the foundation is modified and altered, and a system of scholarships and exhibitions is established, whereby senior and junior scholarships, with certain rules and regulations as to their number, value, and the qualifications of the competitors for them, now exist. The senior scholarships are not less than thirty in number and of the annual value of £80. Admission to such scholarships is by competitive examination, and open to all boys who have been at the school at least twelve months previous to the commencement of the examination and between the ages of fourteen and sixteen. The junior scholarships are thirty and of the annual value of £60, and the competitors are from twelve to fourteen years of age, but in the case of these scholarships the governing body have power, if it appears to them that any successful candidate is in point of circumstance not fit to receive the aid of an endowment, to withhold from the scholarship to which such candidate shall have been elected the payment of £60 per annum. Besides these there are ten exhibitions of the annual value of £20 open to all boys at the school under fourteen years of age and tenable till sixteen; twenty exhibitions tenable after quitting the school of the annual value of £80, and also an exhibition called Lady Holford's Exhibition. With regard to the payment of the scholarships at the school, the governing body pay out of the school fund to the master of a boarding-house for every senior scholar in such house £55 per annum, and for every junior scholar in such house £35 per annum, and in the case of exhibitioners a sum of £20; and, further, they also pay out of the school fund to the "tuition fund" for every scholar the annual tuition fee of £25. Lastly, with regard to the fees payable by scholars not on the foundation, the annual "tuition fee" for every boy is £25, payable in equal instalments at the end of each term; the boarding-house charges for each boy (not a scholar) are £80 per annum; an annual capitation charge of £5 is made on each boy with the exception of the scholars for the purpose of increasing and maintaining the school buildings; and in the case of the three boarding-houses forming part of the main school building, the amount of £3 6s. 8d. per term for every boy not holding a scholarship is set aside to form a fund to be applied at the discretion of the governing body for certain purposes.

From this state of facts it would appear that at the date of the passing of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, the buildings of Charterhouse in Middlesex would be properly described as that of a "hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons," and so would be exempt at that time from house tax. This Act, however, was repealed, and its provisions were dormant until they were revived by the Act of 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36). At this date also the buildings of the Charterhouse were all still in Middlesex. Whether or no the character of the institution, in so far as the school was concerned, had been so altered as to deprive the school buildings of the benefit of the exemption seems open to some doubt, but it is unnecessary for us to decide this. Even if the exemption still applied, this falls far short of establishing what the appellants are called upon to prove in order to support their contention—viz., that the buildings in question, which are at Godalming, were at the time of their assessment within the exemption. There is nothing in the language of the Act or in its intention to show that the liability to or the exemption from taxation is to be fixed when the Act which authorized the taxation was passed. The whole language and object of the Act militate against this, and point to the conclusion that whether a particular building is taxable or not is to be determined by its status when the incident of taxation arises. At this date that portion of the foundation of the Charterhouse which consisted of a hospital remained in Middlesex. The school had before then been removed to Godalming, in Surrey, where new buildings, including those assessed, were erected for the purpose of carrying it on as remodelled by the new scheme and statutes. There is now at Godalming no hospital, giving to that word the widest meaning that it will bear. The hospital remained in London, and the buildings at Godalming are built for and used as a school only. Then arises the question, can it be said that the buildings are those of a "charity school," giving to these words, as we think we ought to give, the largest interpretation that can fairly be put upon them in favour of those to whom the exemption applies? The case for the appellants was based upon the ground that, the original foundation of the Charterhouse having been of an eleemosynary character, however its objects may have been altered or its buildings and their character varied, the original exemption must attach; and further that, so long as some portion of the original character of the foundation remains, the exemption should be held to continue in its entirety, although by the diversion of the objects of the foundation in part it had to this extent lost its eleemosynary character. We cannot think that either of these arguments ought to prevail. As to the first, the language of the exemption in case 4, coupled with that used in case 1, whereby the royal residences and public buildings are exempted, indicates clearly the intention to protect from taxation house property whence no profitable occupation is derived. It seems only necessary to apply this principle to the school buildings of Charterhouse at Godalming to show that they come neither within the letter nor the spirit of the exemption. Here are class rooms, hall, chapel, library, sanatoriums, and other buildings all necessary for and incidental to the carrying on of a large public school of a high class with 500 scholars who are thereby furnished with all the requirements of comfort and refinement, and who on their part, by themselves or their parents, pay an annual tuition fee of £25 each boy, and a further amount of £5 per head, annual capitation charge, for increasing and maintaining the school buildings, some boys also contributing £3 6s. 8d. a term for other purposes. If the school in its present condition were of recent origin, we cannot conceive for a moment that it could properly be called a charity school, and, if not, to say that it formerly was such seems to us to be as much beside the question as if it were said of an ancient royal palace or public building now converted into a warehouse or factory. As to whether some portion of the eleemosynary character of the foundation still remains, and to what extent, this is a question mostly of fact, and as far as it is one of pure fact it is for the commissioners to decide rather than for this court; but our conclusion is not arrived at upon this ground, for no doubt it is a mixed question of law and fact, and as such is a proper subject for appeal. It must be a question of degree, because upon the facts stated it cannot be said that no part of the benefits obtained by the scholars is derived from the funds of the foundation, especially when reference is made to the scholarships; but with respect to the particular buildings which have been assessed the charitable character of the school generally bears no relation to one portion of the buildings rather than another, and therefore they cannot be severed so as to make the exemption apply to some of them and not to others. We can only deal with this part of the case in the way in which all questions of degree in which the court is challenged to point out what is the dividing line ought to be dealt with—namely, by saying we must look at the matter substantially, and ask ourselves whether, taken as a whole, the modern school of Charterhouse is a charity school. One mode of testing this would be by considering whether by far the larger portion of the school could not be carried on without the aid derived from the charitable foundation, and as to this there seems to be no doubt that it could. Any number of instances may be suggested bearing more or less upon the question. One was dealt with by Denman, J., in Blake v. Mayor of London, 35 W. R. 212, 18 Q. B. D. 445, where he says, "A hospital would not be the less entitled to the exemption because certain fees were taken from rich persons who chose to take the benefit of the hospital." We entirely agree with this. Where, however, a school is in the main self-supporting, we do not think it could properly be called a charity school because a small proportion of the scholars derive benefit from the charitable foundation whence it originally sprung. As each case depends upon its own particular facts rather than the application of the language of the exemption to those facts, it cannot be expected that much authority should be obtained bearing immediately upon the matter before us. We were referred, however, to Needham v. Bowers, 37 W. R. 125, 21 Q. B. D. 436, where buildings were assessed to the inhabited house duty which belonged to an institution for the reception of insane persons, which was founded by charitable donations, but unendowed. It was vested in trustees, and managed gratuitously by a committee, and supported wholly out of payments made by the patients, of whom some paid more, some less, than the cost of their maintenance, and a few were maintained gratuitously. After paying expenses there was an annual surplus of profits, which were expended in enlarging and improving the institution. It was held that the institution, being wholly self-supporting, was not exempt as a "hospital" within the exemption we are now dealing with, which, it was said, must be restricted to hospitals maintained wholly or in part by charity. Here there was no charitable element whatever. The language of the court as to a hospital maintained "in part by charity" might seem to militate against our view, but the judges clearly had no such case as is now before us in their minds when this remark was made. The case of Blake v. The Mayor of London was cited on behalf of the appellants as showing that the school buildings and ground of the City of London School were held to be exempted from income tax. This case, however, presents no true analogy, for the assessment and the decision of the court were based upon the language of section 61, r. 6, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, which provides that allowances in respect of property tax, levied under Schedule A of the Income Tax Acts, are to be made by the commissioners for the duties charged "on any hospital, public school, or almshouse in respect of the public buildings, offices, or premises belonging thereto." The court held that the application of these words was not limited to public schools maintained wholly by charity, but that they applied to a public school maintained partly by charitable endowments and partly by fees charged for instruction. One ground for this construction was based on the consideration that the same rule exempts any college or hall in any of the Universities of Great Britain in respect of the public building and offices belonging to such college or hall. Denman, J., in giving judgment, says:—"The enactment seems to have been drawn with a mixed intention—namely, to exempt charitable institutions and to exempt certain institutions partly depending on charity, perhaps in view of the beneficial character of the objects of those institutions." The case of The Queen v. The Commissioners of Income Tax, 37 W. R. 294, 22 Q. B. D. 296, was also cited for the appellants, but as this was an assessment not for inhabited house duty, but for income tax, and depended upon the proper meaning to be given to the words "charitable purposes," we do not feel that any benefit would arise from our dealing with it upon the present occasion. In the result we hold that the commissioners came to a correct conclusion when they decided that the buildings in question are not entitled to the exemption from inhabited house duty which was claimed for them by the appellants, and we dismiss the appeal, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

OVERSEERS OF MANCHESTER v. GUARDIANS OF ORMSKIRK UNION. (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—Illegitimate child under sixteen—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.

An illegitimate, like a legitimate, child under sixteen years of age, cannot acquire a settlement for itself, but must follow its parentage settlement.

Special case stated by consent under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, from which the following facts appeared.

The respondents, the Guardians of the Ormskirk Union, had obtained an order of justices adjudging the place of the last legal settlement of Eleanor Bailey, a pauper, and her illegitimate child to be in the appellants' township.

The pauper, Eleanor Bailey, a single woman, was the illegitimate daughter of Emily Bailey, and was born at Worsley, near Manchester (without the appellants' township), in June, 1874, and remained there till December, 1876, when she was taken by her mother to Manchester, to the house of her mother's aunt, Martha Corrigan, where she and her mother resided together within the appellants' township until June, 1877.

In June, 1877, the pauper's mother left Manchester and went into service in the township of North Meols, within the respondents' union, where she had ever since resided, never having received parochial relief. She left her daughter, the pauper, at Manchester, with Martha Corrigan, with whom the pauper resided within the appellants' township until December, 1881. From that month until June, 1882, the pauper resided with Martha Corrigan at Harpurhey, within the Prestwich Union, when Martha Corrigan died; thenceforth until the 6th of December, 1888, the pauper resided with Marion Corrigan, the daughter of Martha Corrigan—viz., at Harpurhey to November, 1883; at Manchester, within the appellants' township, from November, 1883, to February, 1887; and at Cheetham, within the Prestwich Union, from February, 1887, until the 6th of December, 1888, on which day the pauper was fetched by her mother from Marion Corrigan's, at Cheetham, and taken to North Meols, within the respondents' union, where she remained and resided, supported by her mother, at her mother's expense, until February, 1889, when she (the pauper) was admitted into the workhouse at Ormskirk, where her child was born.

The case then proceeded to set out facts relating to the visits of the pauper to her mother, and of the latter to the pauper, while the pauper was residing with the Corrigan's, and stated that the pauper's mother paid nothing either to Martha or Marion Corrigan for the pauper's maintenance, but occasionally bought for her articles of clothing.

The respondents contended, and the appellants denied, that, upon the facts stated in the case, the pauper and her child were settled in the appellants' township by reason of an uninterrupted residence therein of the pauper for a period of three years under the provisions of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34.

The question for the court was whether or not the legal settlement of the pauper and her child was in the township of Manchester.

Aspland, Q.C., and Evans, for the appellants, the Overseers of Manchester.—A child under sixteen, whether legitimate or illegitimate, cannot acquire a settlement for itself: Reigate Guardians v. Croydon Guardians, ante, p. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465; Guardians of West Derby Union v. Guardians of Atcham Union, ante, p. 361, 24 Q. B. D. 117; Mitford Union v. Wayland Union, ante, p. 632, 24 Q. B. D. 122. The Divided Parishes Act, 1876, s. 35, supersedes the words "or shall acquire a settlement in its own right" applicable to an illegitimate child by section 71 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76.

Smyly, for the respondents, the Guardians of Ormskirk Union.—The House of Lords, in the Reigate case, merely decided that an illegitimate child after sixteen was upon the same footing as a legitimate child after that age. Section 35 of the Act of 1876 was intended to override a particular decision: Reigate Guardians v. Croydon Guardians. An illegitimate child only retains the settlement of its mother when it has not acquired a settlement in its own right: Reg. v. Leeds Union, 27 W. R. 708, 4 Q. B. D. 323.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am far from saying that an ingenious argument might not be raised upon the phraseology of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, for that section is so expressed as to afford many opportunities for argument; but we must look at the language there used as it has been interpreted by the highest court of the realm. It has been pointed out by the Master of the Rolls in Guardians of West Derby Union v. Guardians of Atcham Union (and I entirely concur with him), that where in the House of Lords one of the learned lords gives an elaborate explanation of the meaning of a statute, and some of the other learned lords present concur in the explanation, and none express their dissent from it, it must be taken that all of them agreed in it. Now a most elaborate explanation of the meaning of this section has been given in the case of Guardians of Reigate Union v. Guardians of Croydon Union by Lord Watson, in whose judgment the Lord Chancellor and Lords FitzGerald and Macnaghten all concurred, Lord Macnaghten giving the same explanation in different language; they decide in substance that the meaning of the Act of Parliament is, as far as possible, to assimilate the position of illegitimate to that of legitimate children. Heretofore there had been a difference in their positions in a variety of incidents, but by this statute Parliament intervened once for all, and the interpretation placed upon the statute is, that a legitimate child under the age of sixteen shall not be capable of acquiring a settlement for itself, but shall follow its parentage settlement under that age, and that an illegitimate child is to be treated as far as may be as though it were legitimate; it cannot, of course, be in all respects so treated. Now it is admitted by the respondents that there would be nothing to be said on their behalf if the pauper were under sixteen and were legitimate; it must, in that case, take as its parentage settlement that of its father or mother; but we are asked to bring in the old Act of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, for the purpose of differentiating the case of a legitimate from that of an illegitimate child in cases where the recent Act shows that it is not desired to make any such difference, and to fly in the face of the judgment of Lord Watson and the intention of the recent statute. The object of that statute has been explained by the House of Lords, and that object has been accomplished as far as it was possible to accomplish it; the matter is one which can be properly effected by legislation, and the conclusion to which I have come, following the evident meaning of the judgments in the House of Lords, is that an illegitimate, like a legitimate, child cannot gain a settlement for itself while under the age of sixteen.

KENRICK & CO. v. LAWRENCE & CO. (a.)

Copyright—Drawing of no artistic merit—Limitation of copyright—"Author" entitled to registration—Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68).

The plaintiffs, as proprietors, registered a card upon which was drawn a hand holding a pencil in the act of completing a cross within a square, with a view to such cards being used at parliamentary and other elections for the guidance of voters. They stated in the memorandum that J. was the author of the drawing, whereas J. had employed an artist to make it. The card had no artistic merit, and after it had been registered the defendants published similar cards for a similar purpose.

Held, that no action for infringement of copyright would lie, because (1) the plaintiffs' drawing was only entitled to protection against an exact reproduction; (2) because J. was not the author, and the registration was therefore void.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

This was an action for infringement of copyright in an original drawing under the Copyright (Works of Fine Arts) Act, 1862.

The case was tried by Wills, J., and a common jury, but the jury were discharged and the damages agreed at forty shillings if the judge should decide in the plaintiffs' favour.

WILLS, J.—The plaintiffs in this case are A. J. Kenrick and F. T. Jefferson, trading in partnership at West Bromwich as the Free Press Co. They are printers and publishers. During the pendency of the partnership it occurred to Mr. Jefferson that it was very difficult without a picture to convey to a voter who cannot read, in respect to parliamentary and other elections at which voting is effected by means of a cross put in a certain place on a piece of paper, how he is to vote; and it occurred to him that a card or paper, on which there should be a picture of a hand holding a pencil and in the act of completing a cross within the proper square upon the paper, would be likely to sell. He is unable to draw himself, but he drew upon a piece of paper the proper lines dividing a representation of the ballot paper into the proper spaces, and told a Mr. Bott, an artist in the employment of himself and his partner, to draw a hand carrying a pencil and in the act of finishing a cross inclosed in a square. The artist made him a sketch, which he directed the artist to alter as to the position of the hand, and this drawing, so arrived at, Mr. Jefferson registered under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68 as a drawing of which he, Mr. Jefferson, was the author, and of which his firm were the proprietors.

The defendant has published a similar card with a hand, in a slightly different position, also holding a pencil, in the act of finishing a cross upon the proper spot in a voting paper, and I have no doubt that he took the suggestion from the plaintiffs' card. The plaintiffs complain of this as an infringement of their copyright under the Act. It was in evidence that more than a million copies of the card of the plaintiffs have been sold since the year 1885, and that they have been used at nearly every election in the kingdom. It was urged, probably with truth, that such a card was practically the only mode of instructing the illiterate voter how to record his vote, and it is obvious that if the privilege of instructing the illiterate voter how to vote by the only vehicle by which the act of voting can be represented to the eye, and the instructions how to vote, and whom to vote for, can be brought home to him, be vested in the plaintiffs for seven years beyond the termination of a life which may very well subsist for half a century longer—for Mr. Jefferson is now only thirty-six years of age—and be their monopoly, it is difficult to put an adequate value upon their property in such a right. If that period should shortly arrive which to many politicians appears to be a kind of constitutional millennium, when all the remaining ignorance, male and female, of the three kingdoms shall be swept into the electoral fold, the amount of political power which may become vested in the plaintiffs or their assignees will be greater than it is possible to estimate, and the destinies of the country may be placed in the hands of the fortunate owner of the talisman. A prospect is open which may be described in well-known language as a "potentiality of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice," and legislation might even be necessary to prevent so potent an engine of political power from becoming vested in an infant or a madman, an official receiver or a trustee in bankruptcy, or from being bought or sold at auction or remaining permanently the heritage of any one political party. The importance of the question raised in this particular instance cannot, therefore, be put too high, and justifies the elaborateness and seriousness with which the case was opened by Mr. Aston, and which, until I came to reflect upon the constitutional aspect of the case, I confess I thought a little exaggerated.

The first question which arises is what is and what is not the nature of the right conferred under the Act upon the author by the registration of the drawing of which he is the author. It is perhaps easier to say what it is not than to give a satisfactory definition of what it is, and I think that I am upon very safe ground in saying that the mere choice of subject can rarely, if ever, confer upon the author of the drawing an exclusive right to represent the subject, and certainly where the subject chosen is merely the representation to the eye of a simple operation which must be performed by every person who records a vote, there cannot possibly be an exclusive right to represent in a picture that operation. It may well be that something special in the way of artistic treatment, even of this simple operation, if it existed, might be the subject of copyright, but nothing of the kind is suggested or exists in the present case, and if it does exist without being discovered it has not been imitated, for there is nothing which, by any flight of imagination, can be called artistic about either the plaintiffs' or the defendants' representation of a hand making the mark of a cross. It may be also that even the coarsest or the most commonplace or the most mechanical representation of the commonest object is so far protected on registration that an exact reproduction of it, such as photography for instance would produce, would be an infringement of copyright. But in such a case it must surely be nothing short of an exact literal reproduction of the drawing registered that can constitute the infringement, for there seems to me to be in such a case nothing else that is not the common property of all the world. It is possible that in this case the proprietors of the drawing registered may have a right to be protected from a reproduction of their picture of a hand drawing a cross in which every line, dot, measurement, and blank space shall be rendered exactly as in the original, or in which the variations from such minute agreement shall be microscopic. But I cannot see how they can possibly make a higher claim, or say that because they have registered a drawing of a hand pencilling a cross within a square that no other person in the United Kingdom is at liberty to draw a hand pencilling a cross within a square for perhaps the next half century.

The plaintiff, Mr. Jefferson, put his case as high as that proposition, for he said he might wish to claim applications of the picture to subjects other than the voting cards. It is obvious that, unless there be a copyright in the subject, any other person who wishes to draw a hand pencilling a cross within a square cannot help producing something so like the plaintiff's design as to look very like a colourable imitation of it. Now it may or may not be very shabby conduct on the part of the defendants to wish to represent a hand pencilling a cross within a square, notwithstanding that the plaintiffs were first in the field, and notwithstanding that but for the picture used by the plaintiffs they might never have thought of making theirs, but I cannot see why they should be precluded, for the next fifty years perhaps, from representing in a picture the act which every voter performs when he records his vote, simply because one of the plaintiffs first thought of doing so, any more than, if a new article of commerce were introduced of extensive distribution and very simple and definite shape and proportions, and a drawing of it were made for one firm, all other persons should be precluded from making a drawing which, if it truthfully represented the same thing, must be exceedingly like the first drawing, nor even though the draftsman of the second drawing might never have seen the original article, or might have derived his knowledge of its existence and aspect solely from the first drawing.

If a new and very simple tea-caddy were represented first by A. in a drawing which he registered, I cannot conceive that he could during his whole life prevent B. from drawing the same tea-caddy, and even from drawing it from his recollection of A.'s picture, nor that A. could claim copyright except in the extremely limited and useless sense in which I have suggested that possibly a copyright might exist for a registered drawing of even such a subject.

In the present instance what the plaintiffs claim is really a right to prevent anyone else from drawing the same subjects as that of Mr. Jefferson's drawing. If they have a copyright in the subject there is a colourable imitation because the subject is not altered by changing the position of the hand and adding the indications of a shirt sleeve. But it is clear that there is no copyright in the subject. As for the manner of treating the subject there can be no copyright in that, for if the thing to be represented be represented at all it is impossible to treat it in any other way. It seems to me, therefore, that although every drawing of whatever kind may be entitled to registration, the degree and kind of protection given must vary greatly with the character of the drawing, and that with such a drawing as we are dealing with the copyright must be confined to that which is special to the individual drawing over and above the idea—in other words, the copyright is of the extremely limited character which I have endeavoured to describe. A square can only be drawn as a square, a cross can only be drawn as a cross, and for such purposes as the plaintiffs' drawing was intended to fulfil there are scarcely more ways than one of drawing a pencil or the hand that holds it. If the particular arrangement of square, cross, hand, or pencil be relied upon, it is nothing more than a claim of copyright for the subject, which, in my opinion, cannot possibly be supported.

I have endeavoured to discuss this part of the subject without putting any limitation upon the kind or nature of the drawing for which copyright may be claimed. But it is clear that in the opinion of Bowen, L.J., in Nottage v. Jackson, 32 W. R. 106, 11 Q. B. D. 627, the statute relates only to works of art of some sort or other. He says: "Parliament treats photography as a fine art. It puts it on a level, for the purposes of registration, with paintings and drawings" (at p. 636). It would be absurd to speak of such drawings as those in the present case as works of art. Possibly it would be a more correct view of his lordship's judgment to say that he considered that it was the product of the artistic faculty that was intended to be primarily, at all events, the subject of copyright—the thing to be protected by the Act. The difference, after all, is one rather of words than of practical effect. The title of the statute is "An Act for amending the Law relating to Copyright in Works of the Fine Arts, and for repressing the Commission of Fraud in the Production and Sale of such Works." The title of a statute does not go for much in construing it, but I do not know that it is to be absolutely disregarded. The cases on the subject are collected, and their effect stated, in Master Wilberforce's very careful and able treatise on Statute Law, at pages 272—276. The title of Lord Campbell's Act was certainly referred to as not without significance in a considered judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Blake v. Midland Railway Co., 18 Q. B. 93, 109. As far as it goes the title would certainly seem to point to the notion that it is the product of the artistic faculty which is the primary thing to be protected. And although it might not be right on that account to cut down the generality of the expression "every drawing," yet it may serve to point to the character of the protection intended. The phrase "artistic faculty" which I have used is vague enough, but here again it is easier to say what is not the product of any artistic faculty than to define what is so, and here it is easy to pronounce that no such faculty has been exercised. No kind of value is given to the article produced by reason of its being a pleasing, a particularly accurate, or a tasteful representation upon paper of the object represented, or by reason of that object itself, or the method of treating it, appealing in any way to imagination, affection, memory, or association. It has less even of such properties than the geometrical figures which illustrate a proposition of Euclid, and the kind of moral claim, if I may so speak, which such a drawing has to protection is far more of the nature which attaches to a trade design than to that which belongs to a work of art—a production which has merit or value as and in its character of a drawing, a painting, or a photograph, and not simply because it conveys, by way of a picture, a description or direction which could be just as well put into words, if words were not to many people a sealed book.

Without going further, therefore, my judgment would be for the defendants; other objections, however, have been raised to the right of the plaintiffs to recover, even supposing that the design in question comes within the purview of the statute. First, it is said that the plaintiffs can be the proprietors only by assignment from the author—and by section 3 of the Act the assignment is to be in writing—and that, whoever be the author, there is no such assignment. I think, however, this objection is not valid. By section 1, if the drawing is executed for pay or valuable consideration for a particular person the copyright is to belong to that person, and here the drawing was executed by Mr. Bott for the plaintiffs, for money paid by them to him. And, therefore, the copyright belongs to them, and they are properly registered as proprietors.

But then it was said the registration in this case did not satisfy the Act, inasmuch as the Act requires the name or place of abode of the proprietor to be stated, and the actual registration is that of the firm or style under which the plaintiffs carry on business. This question, however, seems to me to have been decided in favour of the registration of the firm name by the case of Rock v. Lazarus, 21 W. R. 215, L. R. 15 Eq. 104. It would do a great deal of mischief to unsettle the law upon this point, when, no doubt, a great deal of valuable property is protected only by registration effected in a similar manner on the faith of that decision.

There remains, however, a more serious objection to the registration. Mr. Jefferson is registered as the author of the drawing. It seems to me he was not the author. The expression is, no doubt, an unhappy one. But I do not see how a gentleman who is incapable of drawing even such a very simple picture as a rough sketch of the human hand, and who did not, in fact, set pencil to paper in the matter, can be called the author of the drawing. He suggested the subject, and made such limited suggestions as to the treatment as the subject admitted of, but it seems to me that in an Act which gives copyright to drawings, the author must mean a person who has, at least, some substantial share in putting the touches on to paper. Such was very clearly the view of every member of the Court of Appeal in Nottage v. Jackson, and although that case might perhaps have been decided without saying what is meant by the author of a drawing or painting, and so, perhaps, in a very strict sense the observation was extra-judicial, still it was very nearly necessary to the determination of that case, and I should follow it even if I differed from it. But as it entirely expresses my own view I can act upon my own view with the less hesitation. It may possibly be that Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Bott were joint "authors" of the drawing, but I cannot understand how the man who did all that was done in the way of drawing can be excluded from all participation in the authorship of the thing drawn by him.

In my opinion, therefore, the defendants are entitled to judgment with costs.

Nuisance—Thistles on neighbouring land—Negligence of occupier—Right of action.

There is no right of action for the nuisance created by thistledown blown from the land of one man to that of another, for, as between adjoining occupiers, there is no duty to keep down the natural growth of the soil.

This was an appeal from the Leicester County Court.

The action was brought to recover damages for injury done to the plaintiff's land by thistle seed blown from the defendant's land. The defendant was in occupation of land which had been originally forest land, but which for more than seven years had been brought into cultivation. The result of cultivation had been to produce a great crop of thistles, which the defendant neglected to keep down. In consequence of this neglect there were thousands of thistles in full seed in the years 1887 and 1888, the seeds from which took root in plaintiff's land and caused damage. The judge left the question to the jury whether the defendant had been guilty of negligence in not cutting the thistles. The jury found that he was negligent, and judgment was given for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

Toller, for the defendant.—The judge was wrong in leaving the question of negligence to the jury, as the facts disclosed no cause of action. There was no duty on the defendant to protect the plaintiff from the result of any natural growth upon his land. [He was stopped by the court.]

R. Bray, for the plaintiff.—The defendant entered into occupation of this land with the cause of nuisance upon it, and was under an obligation to his neighbour to prevent any injury to his land. In Crowhurst v. Amersham Burial Board, 27 W. R. 95, 4 Ex. D. 5, an occupier of land was held responsible for the consequence of neglecting to cut yew trees, so as to prevent them from overshadowing his neighbour's land.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I never heard of such an action as the present. There can be no duty, as between adjoining occupiers, to cut the thistles—the natural growth of the land. The appeal must be allowed.

JONES v. PADGETT & CO. (a.)

Sale of goods by sample—Implied warranty of merchantableness—Extent of.

The defendants, manufacturers, contracted to supply to the plaintiff a quantity of indigo cloth according to sample. The cloth was delivered and accepted according to sample, but the plaintiff, who was a tailor as well as a woollen merchant, used the cloth for the purpose of making liveries, for which it proved to be unsuited. It was proved that cloth of the same description was commonly used for making liveries, but the defendants were unaware of the purpose for which the plaintiff bought the cloth in question. It was not proved that the cloth was unsuitable for any other purpose than that of making liveries. In an action against the defendants for breach of an implied warranty of merchantable quality, the judge left the question to the jury whether the cloth was merchantable for a woollen manufacturer, and refused to leave to them the question whether an ordinary use for the cloth was the making of liveries.

Held, that there was no misdirection.

This was an appeal from the Westminster County Court.

The plaintiff, who was both a woollen merchant and a tailor, ordered of the defendants, who were woollen manufacturers, a quantity of "indigo blue cloth" to be made according to sample. The defendants supplied the plaintiff with the goods in accordance with the sample, but were not aware of the particular purpose for which the goods were required.

The plaintiff made the cloth into liveries for the use of servants in a London club, and it was admitted that the cloth was unsuitable for this purpose. There was evidence to show that cloth of a similar description was ordinarily used for the purpose of liveries, but it was admitted that it was also used for other purposes, and no evidence was adduced to show that the cloth supplied was unsuitable for any of these other purposes. The plaintiff, having sued the defendants for breach of an implied warranty that the cloth was merchantable, the judge left the question to the jury whether it was merchantable as supplied to woollen merchants, and refused to leave to them the question whether cloth of this description was ordinarily used for the making of liveries. The jury found for the defendants, and the plaintiff moved for a new trial on the ground of misdiscretion.

Danckwerts, for the plaintiff.—The judge was guilty of a misdirection in not explaining to the jury the meaning of the word "merchantable"; merchantable means fit for all the purposes to which the purchased article is usually applied. [Lord ESHER.—By the person to whom it is supplied.] The plaintiff was a woollen merchant, and the defendants ought to have known that this cloth might be used for the particular purpose of making liveries. Jones v. Bright, 5 Bing. 533, and Mody v. Gregson, 17 W. R. 176, L. R. 4 Ex. 49, establish that a manufacturer supplying goods to a purchaser undertakes that they shall be fit for the purpose to which he knows that the purchaser intends to apply them. In Drummond v. Van Ingen, 36 W. R. 50, 12 App. Cas. 284, the same doctrine is carried still further, and extends the implied warranty to all the purposes to which the manufacturer ought to know that the goods are to be applied. This is to be found in the language of Lord Selborne, at p. 287, and of Lord Herschell, at p. 293. The county court judge, therefore, ought to have told the jury that "merchantable" meant that the cloth possessed all the essential qualities which cloth of that kind usually does possess.

Guiry, for the defendants, was not called on.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that in this case the direction of the county court judge to the jury was right, and that there was not any such non-direction as made his direction amount to a misdirection. There is no doubt that if a manufacturer sells an article which he knows is bought for a particular purpose he impliedly warrants that it is fit for that particular purpose. That is a principle which was established some sixty years ago, in the case of Jones v. Bright, and has been acted upon ever since. But the present case is not within that rule, because nothing was mentioned to the seller as to the particular purpose for which this cloth was bought, and there was nothing to fix him with knowledge of that purpose. Here all that was shown was that the seller on the one side was a manufacturer and the buyer on the other side was a woollen merchant. No doubt it was possible that the buyer might sell the goods to some person or other who might use them for a purpose for which they were not fit, and I may assume that the goods here were unfit for the particular purpose to which the plaintiff applied them. But there was nothing beyond the position of the parties to show that the seller knew the specific purpose for which they were bought, and it could not be denied that they might have been used for a variety of other purposes for which they were fitted. The plaintiff might have sold them to be used for purposes for which they were applicable. But then it is said that the case of Drummond v. Van Ingen in the House of Lords, carries the law further than Jones v. Bright.

In my opinion that is not so. There was no intention on the part of the Lords to extend the old rule. Lord Macnaghten expressly said that he did not go beyond it; so, also, did Lord Selborne. And Lord Herschell, on whose judgment special reliance has been placed, was particularly careful to explain that he did not intend to carry the doctrine further. He said:—"It was argued for the appellants by the Attorney-General in his able argument at the bar that it would be unreasonable to require that a manufacturer should be cognizant of all the purposes to which the article he manufactures might be applied, and that he should be acquainted with all the trades in which it may be used. I agree. Where the article may be used as one of the elements in a variety of other manufactures, I think it may be too much to impute to the maker of this common article a knowledge of the details of every manufacture into which it may enter in combination with other materials." If the plaintiff is to succeed it must be on the ground of the reasonableness of imputing such knowledge to the manufacturer. I do not see that there was any evidence that the making of liveries was the only purpose, or even the most usual purpose, for which this particular kind of cloth was ordinarily used, and unless that is so there is nothing to fix the manufacturer with knowledge which would bring the case within the rule.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question which was left by the judge to the jury, and the sufficiency of which is now complained of, was whether the cloth supplied by the defendants to the plaintiff was merchantable as supplied to woollen merchants. The cloth in question was ordered under a particular name—namely, "indigo blue cloth"—by a woollen merchant of a woollen cloth manufacturer to be made according to sample. It was not denied that the cloth supplied answered the name, nor was it disputed that it agreed with the sample.

But it was said that there was a breach of an implied warranty that it should be fit for the particular purpose of being made into liveries. Now, the rule with regard to the implied warranty of fitness which arises in the case of a sale of goods is that which is laid down in Jones v. Just, 16 W. R. 643, L. R. 3 Q. B. 197, in the fourth of the five classes there enumerated:—"Where a manufacturer or a dealer contracts to supply an article which he manufactures or produces or in which he deals to be applied to a particular purpose, so that the buyer necessarily trusts to the judgment or skill of the manufacturer or dealer, there is in that case an implied term or warranty that it shall be reasonably fit for the purpose to which it is applied." Those are the limits of the warranty. Here the goods were ordered by a woollen merchant. He, no doubt, happened also to be a tailor; but that fact was unknown to the defendant. The purpose for which a woollen merchant buys cloth is to sell it again to others. There was, indeed, evidence that such cloth as this, if sold to a tailor, was not fit for one of the purposes to which a tailor might apply it. But there was no evidence that it was not fit for other of the purposes, even of a tailor. Moreover, the cloth might have been sold by woollen merchants to fifty other classes of persons besides tailors. There was no evidence that woollen manufacturers know that woollen merchants sell to tailors at all. The manufacturer here was not told, either expressly or by implication, that the goods were ordered that they might be sold to tailors. Then, is there any authority which establishes that where goods are ordered by a woollen merchant of a cloth manufacturer the latter must be taken to know that they may be ordered to be sold to tailors?

The case referred to in the House of Lords is no authority for such a proposition, for there the goods were ordered under the designation of "coatings," which necessarily imported that they were intended to be made up into coats, and therefore the facts of that case came within the precise terms of the fourth rule in Jones v. Just. It is suggested that every woollen manufacturer is bound to know all the ordinary purposes to which a woollen merchant may put the cloth which he buys—that is to say, he is bound to be acquainted with all the trades to which the woollen merchant may resell it—but that is the very proposition which Lord Herschell expressly denies. "It would be unreasonable," he says, "to require that a manufacturer should be cognizant of all the purposes to which the article he manufactures might be applied, and that he should be acquainted with all the trades in which it may be used." Though he adds that, "There seems nothing unreasonable in expecting that the maker of 'coatings' should know that they are to be turned into coats." And Lord Selborne says that, although, "if the goods being of a class known and understood between merchant and manufacturer as in demand for a particular trade or business, and being ordered with a view to that market, are found to have in them when supplied a defect practically new, not disclosed by the samples, but depending on the method of manufacture, which renders them unfit for the market for which they were intended," the doctrine of implied warranty applies; yet that doctrine "ought not to be unreasonably extended so as to require manufacturers to be conversant with all the specialities of all trades and businesses which they do not carry on, but for the purposes of which goods may be ordered from them." The Lords decided that case on the ground that it came within the fourth proposition in Jones v. Just, which proposition they held to be applicable to a case in which the goods were bought by sample. But here there is no evidence to bring the case within that proposition. The direction of the county court judge was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Ex parte SHERIFF OF ESSEX.
In re LEVY. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Sheriff—Costs of execution—Right to possession money where receiving order made before sale—Delay of sale—Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), s. 20—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 46, sub-section (1)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 118.

On the 2nd of September, 1889, the goods of the bankrupt were seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa., and in consequence of interpleader proceedings the possession was continued without selling until the 2nd of October, 1889, when, on notice of a receiving order having been made against the bankrupt, the goods were delivered by the sheriff to the official receiver. The sum of £5 10s. having been taxed by the master off a charge made by the sheriff in his bill of costs of £7 10s. for thirty days' possession money from the 2nd of September to the 2nd of October, 1889, the sheriff applied that the decision of the taxing master might be reviewed.

Held, that the proper order would be that the amount should be allowed unless the official receiver, within seven days, required the sheriff to take out a summons before the master to have the costs disposed of. If such summons were taken out, the official receiver to be at liberty to appear on it, and to contend, if so advised, that the claimant or the execution creditor ought to pay the possession money in dispute.

Application by the sheriff of Essex for a review of the taxation of certain costs of execution.

The case raised an important question with reference to the right of a sheriff to charge possession money where he has been prevented from selling the goods within the ordinary time by reason of proceedings being taken by third parties, and notice of a receiving order is subsequently given to him before the goods are actually sold.

On the 29th of August, 1889, a writ of fi. fa. was lodged with the sheriff against the goods of the bankrupt under which the sheriff seized on the 2nd of September, 1889. On the 10th of September a claim was made to the goods and interpleader proceedings were directed, an order being made on the 18th of September requiring the claimant to bring a certain sum into court within a week, or, in default of this, that the sheriff sell the goods. The sheriff was preparing to sell when, on the 30th of September, notice of a receiving order against the bankrupt was served on him, and on the 2nd of October the sheriff withdrew from possession in accordance with section 46, sub-section (1), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

A bill of costs was subsequently brought in by the sheriff against the official receiver under rule 118 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, in which, in addition to the usual officer's fee and mileage, a charge was made of £7 10s. for thirty days' possession money at 5s. a day from the 2nd of September to the 2nd of October, 1889. From this item of £7 10s., however, the sum of £5 10s. was taxed off by the master, on the ground that the sheriff was not entitled to charge any possession money during the time the sale was delayed by reason of the interpleader proceedings, and that in such case only reasonable expenses, and not what might be called extraordinary expenses, could be allowed.

The sheriff now applied for a review of this taxation.

Herbert Reed, for the sheriff.—Of course, if the sheriff delays and stops in for thirty days, he cannot get thirty days' possession money; but when the sheriff is compelled to stay in, and when, if he had sold, he could have deducted the costs, it is very unfair to say that if there is a bankruptcy before the sale he cannot have the costs. It was not intended by the Bankruptcy Act that the right of the sheriff should be lost, and there is no case which goes to the length of saying that possession money is not part of the costs of execution. The question is of much importance, and I ask that some general rule may be laid down by the court.

The official receiver and the parties to the interpleader proceedings did not appear.

CAVE, J.—It is difficult to lay down any rule in the absence of parties who might be affected, except that primâ facie a sheriff who does what has been done as part of his duty, and is doing nothing wrong, ought to get these costs out of someone or other. The costs have really been caused by the claimant and the execution creditor disputing as to who was entitled to the proceeds of the goods, and in an ordinary case the person who was wrong would be ordered to pay the costs. Assuming, for example, that the claim was a got up claim, it would be very hard for the creditors to have to pay what the claimant ought to pay himself. In the present case the difficulty may be got over if I make the following order: Amount allowed, unless the official receiver, within seven days after service of this order, requires the sheriff to take out a summons before the master to have the costs disposed of. If such summons is taken out the official receiver to be at liberty to appear on it, and to contend, if so advised, that the claimant or the execution creditor ought to pay the possession money in dispute. If the summons goes before the master he may, if he finds a difficulty in it, refer it back to me.

ADMINISTRATION:—

1. Account—Executor—Retainer—Set-off—Ord. 15, r. 1; ord 55, r. 10a.—An order for accounts under ord. 15, r. 1, without a decree for administration, made in an administration action, does not prevent a creditor of the estate from suing the executor, or the executor from paying a debt due from the estate.

By a marriage settlement a husband covenanted to pay to a trustee certain sums of money upon trust to pay the income to the wife for life, with an ultimate trust for himself absolutely, and died without performing his covenant, having appointed his wife sole executrix. His creditors brought an administration action against the executrix and obtained an order for accounts under ord. 15, r. 1, without a decree for administration, and the executrix was afterwards appointed trustee of the marriage settlement, and the testator's estate proved insolvent.

Held, that the executrix, notwithstanding the order for accounts, was entitled to apply the assets in her hands as executrix in payment to herself as trustee of the debt due on the covenant in the marriage settlement.—Whitaker v. Barratt, CH.D. NOR., J. 59—43 Ch. D. 70; 59 L. J. Ch. 218.

2. Accounts—Inquiries in chambers—Cross-examination of witnesses—Discretion of judge—Ord. 38, r. 18.—Although no hard and fast rule can be laid down that, in proceedings in chambers after judgment, no fresh evidence can be adduced after cross-examination —that being a matter in the discretion of the judge —there is nothing reprehensible in the practice which has grown up in chambers, and is well known to practitioners there, that liberty to cross-examine is, in the absence of special circumstances, only accorded on the footing that all the evidence will be completed before cross-examination. In ordinary cases, and under ordinary circumstances, this practice is a good and convenient one.—Issard v. Lambert, C.A. 584—44 Ch. D. 253; 59 L. J. Ch. 516; 62 L. T. 584.

3. Annuity — Deficiency — Tenancy for life.—A. devised all his real estate (except two specified estates) to trustees upon trust for his son for life, with remainder in strict settlement. He devised the two specified estates upon trusts in favour of his two daughters respectively for life, with remainders to their respective issue. By a deed executed on the marriage of his son, the testator covenanted to pay an annuity to the son or his wife during their joint lives. The testator's personal estate proved insufficient to provide for the payment of the annuity.

Held, that the three real estates ought to contribute rateably towards payment of the annuity, and that each tenant for life would have a charge upon the corpus of the estate in respect of the proportion of the annuity paid by him or her, but that he or she would have to keep down the interest on the amount so charged.—Townson v. Harrison, CH.D. NOR., J. 265—43 Ch. D. 55; 59 L. J. Ch. 169; 61 L. T. 762.

4. Annuity—Insolvent estate—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10—Ord. 55, rr. 3, 4.—A testator covenanted to pay to trustees during the life of D. an annuity of £500 for the benefit of her and her children. After the testator's death the trustees issued an originating summons for the administration of his estate, on the ground that it was insufficient to provide for the payment of the annuity in full. No payment of the annuity was at the time in arrear.

Held (affirming the decision of North, J.), that, although section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, gives a right to an annuitant to prove in administration proceedings for the capital value of an annuity, yet it confers no right upon the annuitant to obtain an order for administration so long as the annuity is punctually paid, although the estate may be insolvent, and that the summons must therefore be dismissed.—In re Hargreaves, Dicks v. Hare, C.A.—44 Ch. D. 236; 59 L. J. Ch. 375; 62 L. T. 819.

5. Annuity—Security—Leaseholds—Conversion.—A., after bequeathing certain legacies and annuities, declared that the residue of his property, after payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies and annuities, should be divided among his next of kin and heiresses as though he had died intestate. The testator died possessed of real estate, consisting of freeholds and leaseholds, of large value. The leaseholds and part of the freeholds were subject to mortgages. All the testator's debts, other than the mortgage debts, and his funeral and testamentary expenses had been paid out of the personal estate, and there was a balance of £2,000 in the hands of the surviving executors. The annuities had been punctually paid. The annuitants claimed to have the testator's leaseholds sold and the mortgage debts paid out of the proceeds, and a sufficient sum invested to provide for their annuities.

Held, that the annuitants were not entitled to have the leaseholds sold, but were only entitled to have the annuities properly secured.

Webber v. Webber, 1 Sim. & S. 311, and King v. Molcot, 9 Ha. 692, approved.—Scott v. Leak, CH.D. NOR., J. 226—43 Ch. D. 70; 61 L. T. 386.

6. Bond—Sureties—Bankruptcy—Official Receiver.—Where a grant of administration was made to the Chief Official Receiver in Bankruptcy, the court, though requiring an administration bond, dispensed with sureties.—In the Goods of Cope, P.D. & A.D. 688—15 P. D. 107.

7. Bond—Sureties—Lunacy of administratrix—Grant to committee.—An administratrix became a lunatic, and was so found by inquisition. £11,150, part of the estate, had been paid into the Chancery Division, but an administrator was required to receive the remainder, £850, due on a mortgage. On the application of the committee for administration for the use and benefit of the lunatic, the court allowed the security to be given by the sureties to be limited to twice the amount of the balance outstanding, but required the bond given by the administrator to be for the full amount.—In the Goods of Morris, P.D. & A.D. 496—15 P. D. 9; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 16; 61 L. T. 652.

8. Charitable gift—Discretion of executor—Payment out of court—Affidavit.—A. bequeathed money to his executor in trust for such charitable purposes as he might think right.

Held, that, though the executor was entitled to exercise his own discretion in selecting the charities, the court would not order payment of the money out of court without an affidavit by the executor stating how he intended to apply it.—Hagan v. Duff, M.R. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 516.

9. Compromise by administrator.—In an administration suit the chief clerk found that the next of kin at the date of the testator's death were M. and E., both of whom had since died, and that their respective personal representatives were B. and D. M. had died in 1860, and her will was duly proved, and in 1885 a grant of administration de bonis non, with the will annexed, was made to B. The Court of Appeal in Ireland held that a bequest of all the testator's property, subject to certain life interests, under which bequests the defendant claimed, was void, and that B. and D. were entitled to the personal estate in equal shares. While an appeal to the House of Lords was pending, a compromise was made, and judgment was given reversing the order of the Court of Appeal, and declaring that the defendants were entitled to half the fund in court, and B. and D. were entitled to the other half.

Held, that B. and D. were competent to effect the compromise.—Smithwick v. Hayden, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 475.

10. Fraud of solicitor — Share of administratrix in estate.—P. was the administratrix of H., and was entitled, as one of his next of kin, to a share in the residue of his estate. Before H.'s death P. had by a settlement covenanted to settle her after-acquired property. The proceeds of sale of a part of H.'s estate were misappropriated by P.'s solicitors.

Held, that neither P. nor the trustees of her settlement could take any part of the personal estate of H. till she had replaced the sum for which, as administratrix, the fraud of her solicitors had made her liable. —Short v. Parratt, CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 429.

11. Insolvent estate—Transfer to bankruptcy—Discretion of court—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 123 (4).—The power to transfer proceedings for administration of the estate of an insolvent deceased debtor to the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy given by section 125 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is, on the true construction of the Act, a discretionary, not an imperative power.

Higgs v. Weaver, 33 W. R. 874, 29 Ch. D. 236, approved.

The fact that the mode of administration of assets in chancery differs from that in bankruptcy—as, for instance, by reason of the recognition, in the chancery mode of administration, of the executor's right of retainer, and of the executor's right to refrain from pleading the Statute of Limitations against, and thereby to favour, the creditor who obtains an administration order—does not render it imperative on the court to make an order for transfer under section 125 (4).

Quære, whether, if a transfer were made, the executor's right of retainer would be destroyed.—In re Baker, Nichols v. Baker, C.A. 417—44 Ch. D. 262; 62 L. T. 817.

12. Interest—Life estate—Residuary gift.—A. by his will gave pecuniary legacies and gave his residuary estate to M. for life, with a bequest over. The investments representing the general estate produced, on the average, less than four per cent., which income was more than four per cent. on the amount of the legacies.

Held, that the difference between the actual interest on the legacies and interest thereon at four per cent. should be deducted from the capital of the residue from the testator's death, and that M. was entitled to the actual interest on the net residue.—Massy v. Gahan, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 518.

13. Intestacy—Grant to attorney—Form of oath.—P. died intestate, leaving a brother, S. P. was married in 1860, but her husband, a sailor, had not been heard of for twenty years. S., who was resident in America, appointed J., a solicitor, as his attorney to apply for administration.

The court refused to modify the form of the oath by allowing J. to swear that he believed the intestate to be a widow at the date of her death.—In the Goods of Pridham, P.D. & A.D.—61 L. T. 302.

13a. Intestacy—No next of kin—Grant ad colligenda bona.—Under a grant ad colligenda bona, made to the Solicitor to the Treasury, the court gave leave to the administrator to pay all pressing claims for rent, rates, and taxes, to take the accounts of the manager of the intestate's business, and to dispose of the said business. —In the Goods of Oddy, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 643.

14. Limited grant—Administration ad colligenda bona—Grant to creditor.— A woman died intestate without known relatives, and it was not known whether she had ever been married.

The court granted administration ad colligenda bona to an unsecured creditor, and allowed his solicitor to swear that he was informed and verily believed that the deceased died a widow without known relatives, and intestate.—In the Goods of Ashley, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 120.

15. Limited grant—Administration de bonis non—Administration pendente lite—Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.—F. by his will appointed his wife sole executrix. The widow proved the will, and died, leaving a will, and leaving part of her husband's estate unadministered. The validity of the widow's will was disputed by A., one of her residuary legatees.

The court made a grant of administration pendente lite of F.'s unadministered estate to a person to be selected by the registrar.—In the Goods of Fawcett, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. J. P. D. & A. 87; 61 L. T. 303.

16. Limited grant—Infant—Guardian ad litem.—A guardian ad litem of an infant had been appointed in the Chancery Division in an administration action to obtain letters of administration. All money received by the administrator would be paid into court in the administration action.

The court made a grant of administration to the guardian ad litem.—In the Goods of Mustapha, P.D. & A.D.—59 L. J. P. D. & A. 61; 62 L. T. 606.

17. Limited grant — Lunacy — Pauper lunatic — Grant to nominee of guardians.—The husband of an intestate was a pauper lunatic confined in a county asylum at the charge of a board of guardians.

The court, after notice to the next of kin and no entry of an affidavit, made a grant of administration to the nominee of the guardians, for the use and benefit of the lunatic, limited to such time as he should remain insane.—In the Goods of Eccles, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 1; 61 L. T. 652.

18. Married woman—Canadian domicil—Grant to attorney of children of deceased.—Where a person entitled by English law to administration of the estate of a married woman who died intestate and domiciled in Canada had been cited and had not appeared, the court made a grant of administration to the attorney of the children of the deceased.—In the Goods of Babin, P.D. & A.D.—59 L. J. P. D. & A. 46; 62 L. T. 185.

19. Married woman—Presumption of husband's death.—Where a husband had not been heard of for more than seven years, the court refused to allow a party applying for administration to the estate of his wife to presume the husband's death, but held that the applicant would be entitled to take the grant on swearing her belief that the deceased died a widow.—In the Goods of Clark, P.D. & A.D. 448—15 P. D. 10; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 6; 61 L. T. 697.

20. Marshalling — Personal estate not specifically bequeathed.—A. by his will directed payment of his debts as soon as convenient after his death, and specifically devised his real estate. There were also certain pecuniary and specific bequests.

Held, that the whole personal estate not specifically bequeathed must be applied to payment of debts before the real estate was resorted to.—Bate v. Bate, CH.D. KAY, J.—43 Ch. D. 600; 59 L. J. Ch. 277.

21. Proof—Distribution—Creditors not to be found. —Creditors brought in proofs under an administration decree made in 1866, but, owing to an insufficiency of assets, the proceedings were not completed. In 1888, other assets having been realized, there was a sufficient fund to pay all the creditors, some of whom could not be found.

Held, that a sum representing the debts, with interest, due to the creditors who could not be found must be retained in court, the residue of the fund being fully administered.—Macalpin v. Macdonald, CH.D. CHI., J.—59 L. J. Ch. 231.

22. Proof—Executors carrying on business—Debt incurred by executors.—An action was brought to administer the estate of A., who had directed his executor to carry on his business. Creditors whose claims had arisen since A.'s death applied for leave to attend the proceedings.

Held, that leave ought not to be granted till the executors were proved not to be in default.—Morris v. Latchford, M.R. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 333.

23. Revocation of grant—Absence of administrator —Grant to next of kin.—Where an administrator could not be found, having absconded after threatening to commit suicide, and the only estate remaining unadministered was a claim for debt against a bankrupt's estate, the court without citation revoked the grant, and made a new grant to one of the next of kin.—In the Goods of Covell, P.D. & A.D. 79—15 P. D. 8; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 7; 61 L. T. 620.

24. Special circumstances—Disputed claim—Compromise—Probate Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 77), s. 73.—A doubt, depending on the validity of a marriage of the grandmother of one of two persons, having arisen as to which of them was the sole next of kin of the deceased, who died intestate, an agreement was made between them that one of them should apply for a grant of letters of administration to the deceased's estate, and, after payment of all expenses and costs, divide the residue between them.

Held, that there were special circumstances in the case which authorized the court to grant such letters of administration to the applicant under section 73 of the Probate Act, 1857.

In the Goods of Hopkins, L. R. 3 P. & D. 235, 23 W. R. Dig. 7, followed.—In the Goods of Minshall, P.D. & A.D. 80—41 P. D. 151; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 69; 61 L. T. 257.

25. Will annexed—Married woman—No appointment of executor.—A wife who had been separated from her husband for twenty-seven years made a will bequeathing all her property to A. There was no appointment of an executor.

The court refused to grant administration with the will annexed to A. without citing the next of kin.—In the Goods of Miles, P.D. & A.D.—59 L. J. P. D. & A. 59.

ADULTERATION:—

1. Margarine—Exposure for sale—Margarine Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 29), s. 6.—By section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887, "if such margarine be exposed for sale by retail, there shall be attached to each parcel thereof so exposed, and in such manner as to be clearly visible to the purchaser, a label marked in printed capital letters, not less than one and a half inches square, 'Margarine.'"

A customer asking for margarine was served from a parcel of margarine then in the shop and unlabelled, but placed behind a screen so as not to be visible to customers.

Held, that the margarine was not "exposed" for sale, within the meaning of section 6, because it was not exposed in the shop so as to be visible to customers and so as to induce them to buy it without knowing that it was margarine; and, that a summons against the vendor for exposing it for sale without a label, contrary to the provisions of the section, was rightly dismissed by a magistrate.—Crane v. Lawrence, Q.B.D. 620—25 Q. B. D. 152.

2. Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 9—Milk—Evidence—Guilty knowledge.—In a prosecution under section 9 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling an article of food which has been so altered by abstraction of any part of it as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature, it is not necessary to prove that the seller had knowledge of the alteration; but he may be convicted of an offence under the section, even if he had no knowledge of such alteration.—Pain v. Boughtwood, Q.B.D. 428—24 Q. APPRENTICE:—

Wrongful dismissal.—Measure of damages.—The plaintiff bound himself as an apprentice to the defendants for 4 years, the defendants covenanting to instruct him and provide him with food and lodging. If the plaintiff showed a want of interest in his work, the defendants were to be at liberty to cancel the deed on a week's notice. The defendants dismissed the plaintiff without notice, alleging acts of insubordination and other misconduct. In an action for wrongful dismissal the jury found that the plaintiff had not been guilty of misconduct, and that there was no ground for dismissing him without notice, though there were sufficient grounds for dismissing on a week's notice. The judge directed the jury that they were not bound to limit the damages to the value of the week's notice which had not been given.

Held, that there was no misdirection.—Maw v. Jones, Q.B.D. 718—25 Q. B. D. 107.

ARBITRATION:—

1. Agreement to refer—Stay of proceedings—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), s. 11.—A lessor covenanted with the lessee to lay down all apparatus necessary for supplying with water a reservoir of the lessee's, and to cause to be delivered such a quantity of water as would enable the lessee to furnish his works with the supply necessary for the purposes of his business, such supply not to exceed a certain limit. The lease contained a clause for referring to arbitration any dispute "touching these presents or any clause, matter, or thing herein contained, . . . or any matter in any way connected with these presents, . . . or the rights or liabilities of either party in connection with the premises." Several years afterwards, during the continuance of the lease, an agreement in writing was entered into between the plaintiff and the lessor, the effect of which was to some extent to modify the rights of the parties under the lease and to impose fresh liabilities on the lessor; there was no arbitration clause in the agreement. The plaintiff (an assignee of the original lessee), after the date of the agreement, commenced an action against the lessor, and, by the statement of claim, alleged breaches by the defendant of the stipulation contained in the agreement and also breaches of the covenant contained in the lease, and claimed damages "by reason of the matters aforesaid." The defendant, before putting in a statement of defence, took out a summons for a stay of the action, and that all matters in dispute should be referred to arbitration.

Held, that the arbitration clause in the lease did not cover matters arising under the subsequent agreement, and that, even if it did, the judge had properly refused to refer the action under this clause, as the action raised questions as to the construction of the agreement and its effect on the previous lease which could not come within the powers of the reference under the clause.

Held, also, that it would not be right to separate the litigation into two actions by referring to arbitration the questions arising under the lease, and allowing the action to proceed only as to matters not arising under the lease.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.—Turnock v. Sartoris, C.A. 340—43 Ch. D. 150; 62 L. T. 209.

2. Award—Setting aside—Extension of time—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 26—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 17—Ord. 64, rr. 7, 14.—The court has jurisdiction, under ord. 64, r. 7, to extend the time for applying to set aside an award, even if the time limited for the purpose by 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, s. 2, as modified by ord. 64, r. 14, has expired.—Oliver v. Scott, CH.D. KEK., J. 476—43 Ch. D. 310; 59 L. J. Ch. 148; 61 L. T. 552.

3. Award—Setting aside—Time—Ord. 64, r. 14.—A notice of motion to set aside the award of an arbitrator is an "application" within the meaning of ord. 64, r. 14, and is in time if given before the last day of the sittings next after such award has been made and published, even if the motion cannot be heard until after the expiration of the sittings.

Mayor of Huddersfield v. Jacomb, 23 W. R. 100, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 92, and Smith v. Parkside Mining Co., 29 W. R. 154, 6 Q. B. D. 67, followed.—Gallop v. Central Queensland Meat Export Co., Q.B.D. 621—25 Q. B. D. 230; 62 L. T. 834.

4. Landlord and tenant—Compensation for quitting—Valuation—Execution—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 12, 27.—An agreement made between the purchaser of a close of land and the tenant, who was a nurseryman and market gardener, provided that the tenant should give up possession before the expiration of his lease, and that the amount of compensation to be paid to him (a) in respect of such giving up possession, (b) in respect of various plants and shrubs taken by the purchaser, should be determined by two named arbitrators, one of whom was a seedsman and the other a market gardener, and, in case of dispute, by an umpire to be appointed by the arbitrators.

The arbitrators differed, and the amount of compensation was assessed by an umpire appointed by them.

Held, that this was a valuation, and not an award, and that the tenant was therefore not entitled to issue execution under the Arbitration Act, 1889.—In re Hammond and Waterton's Arbitration, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 808.

5. Partnership—Dissolution—Stay of proceedings.—The plaintiff claimed an account of the dealings between himself and the defendant under articles of partnership, and to wind up the partnership. The defendant moved to stay further proceedings in the action, and for a reference to arbitration of all matters in dispute under a clause in the articles.

The court ordered the motion to stand over till the trial of the action.—Joplin v. Postlethwaite, CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 629.

6. Stay of proceedings—Discretion of court—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 4, 19.—The court has a discretion under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, as to staying legal proceedings commenced by one of the parties to an instrument of submission to arbitration against the other party, and will not stay proceedings where the question to be decided is a question of law only.—In re Carlisle, Clegg v. Clegg, CH.D. NOR., J. 638—44 Ch. D. 200; 59 L. J. Ch. 520; 62 L. T. 821.

7. Stay of proceedings—Injunction—Partnership—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25 (8).—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 12.—Partnership articles provided that, in case any dispute should arise between the three partners relating to the partnership, they should forthwith each nominate a referee, and that the referees should determine all matters in dispute, or, in default of agreement, appoint an umpire. Questions arose, and two of the partners appointed referees to "settle and determine all questions, disputes, differences, and matters that may be in dispute or difference" between the partners. The third partner objected that there was no point in dispute within the clause. He asked for information as to the alleged differences, and was told that particulars would be furnished at the proper time. He now moved to restrain his partners from proceeding with the arbitration finally, or until they had specified what disputes they wished to refer, or that he might be at liberty to revoke the submission to arbitration.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to grant the injunction, but that an arbitration without particulars and without the consent of the plaintiff would be merely futile; and that there was no ground for restraining the proceedings.—Farrar v. Cooper, CH.D. KEK., J. 410—44 Ch. D. 322; 52 L. J. Ch. 506; 62 L. T. 528.

1. Contempt of court—Judicial separation—Molestation by respondent.—A wife molested her husband after he had obtained a decree of judicial separation.

Held, that the wife could not be attached for contempt of court.—Smith v. Smith, P.D. & A.D.—59 L. J. P. D. & A. 15.

2. Contempt of court—Newspaper—Company—Examination of witness—Costs—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 115.—Publication of examinations taken under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, is a contempt of court.

A company in liquidation brought an action against A. and others. A. was examined under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862. B., who was the printer and publisher of a newspaper in which was published what purported to be an account by A. of what had occurred during the examination, was ignorant of the contents of the newspaper.

Held, that B. was responsible for the contempt of court, and must pay the costs of a motion to commit him.—American Exchange Co. v. Gillig, CH.D. STI., J. —58 L. J. Ch. 706.

3. Divorce—Permanent maintenance—Non-payment.—The court will not grant an attachment for non-compliance with an order for payment of permanent maintenance.—De Lossy v. De Lossy, P.D. & A.D. 511—15 P. D. 115; 62 L. T. 704.

4. Garnishee order—Bankruptcy dividend—Order on official receiver—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 58, 125—Ord. 45, r. 1.—A dividend payable in a bankruptcy cannot be attached in the hands of the official receiver to answer a judgment obtained against the creditor to whom it is payable.—Prout v. Gregory, Q.B.D. 204.—24 Q. B. D. 281; 59 L. J. Q. B. 118.

5. Judgment debtor—Committal—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5—Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), s. 14 (1) (c).—A judgment debtor, against whom a committal order has been made under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, is not entitled, on his arrest, to claim to be taken to a safe and convenient dwelling-house for twenty-four hours before being taken to prison, since such a committal order is not an "attachment for debt" within the meaning of section 14 (1) (c) of the Sheriffs Act, 1887.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (37 W. R. 798, 23 Q. B. D. 373) affirmed.—Mitchell v. Simpson, C.A. 565—25 Q. B. D. 183; 59 L. J. Q. B. 355.

6. Notice of motion—Non-appearance—Ord. 44, r. 2; ord. 67, r. 4.—The defendant, a trustee, had not entered an appearance, and the writ and statement of claim had been filed. An order that the defendant should pay money into court within seven days had been served personally upon the defendant, and was not obeyed. Notice of motion for leave to issue a writ of attachment had been filed.

Held, that the filing of the notice was sufficient service.—Morris v. Fowler, CH.D. CHI., J. 522—44 Ch. D. 151; 59 L. J. Ch. 407; 62 L. T. 758.

7. Trustee—Breach of trust—Bankruptcy—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 9.—By an order made on the 5th of April, 1889, the defendant was directed as trustee to pay two sums of cash into court on or before the 6th of May. He did not comply with the order. On the 13th of May, 1889, a receiving order was made against him on his own petition, and he had not obtained his discharge. The plaintiffs moved for liberty to issue a writ of attachment against him, the notice of motion being dated the 22nd of April, 1890.

Held, that the property and person of the debtor were protected by section 9 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the court had no jurisdiction to direct a writ of attachment to issue against him.—Simes v. Newbery, CH.D. KEK., J. 570.

8. Trustee—Breach of trust—"Possession or control"—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4, sub-section 3.—Trustees and executors improperly sold certain bonds, part of their testator's estate, which they had appropriated to answer a certain legacy. In an action by the legatees to compel the trustees to make good the value of these bonds, an inquiry was directed as to what was their market price on the day of the judgment, and the trustees were ordered to pay to the plaintiffs within a specified time the value as ascertained. The value of the bonds had increased between the date of their sale and the date of the judgment. The money not having been paid, the plaintiffs moved for leave to issue a writ of attachment against the trustees.

Held (following Cronin v. Twinberrow, 32 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 44, W. N., 1887, p. 201), that the sum ordered to be paid, so far as it represented the difference between the value of the bonds on the day they were sold and their market price on the day of the judgment, had never been "in the possession or under the control" of the defendants within the meaning of section 4 (3) of the Debtors Act, 1867, and that payment could, therefore, not be enforced by attachment.—Walker v. Walker, CH.D. STI., J. 766.

BANKRUPTCY:—

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—

1. Assignment for benefit of creditors—Informal direction—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (a) (b).—On the 22nd of November a debtor, at the instance of his creditors, gave by letter an authority to an auctioneer whom he had instructed to sell certain furniture and effects, which constituted practically the whole of his property, to pay the proceeds of sale into a bank to the joint account of certain persons, who were to hold it for the benefit of his creditors.

Held, that there was not an act of bankruptcy within section 4 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, since the conveyance or assignment there mentioned must be a formal conveyance or assignment by deed, and did not include any dealing with the property by agreement or declaration of trust.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (38 W. R. 368) reversed.—Ex parte May, In re Spackman, C.A. 497—24 Q. B. D. 728; 59 L. J. Q. B. 306; 62 L. T. 849.

2. Suspension of payments—Notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1).—A notice by a debtor to his creditors that he is about to suspend payment of his debts is not an act of bankruptcy unless it is unqualified and unconditional, and unless an ordinary man of business would understand from it that, if the creditors would not accept less than what was due to him, the debtor would have no alternative but to suspend payments.

A trader sent the following notice to his creditors: "Being unable to meet my engagements as they fall due, I invite your attendance at a meeting, when I will submit a statement of my position for your consideration and decision."

Held (Fry, L.J., diss.), that the debtor had not committed an act of bankruptcy.—In re Crook, Ex parte Crook, C.A.—24 Q. B. D. 320.

3. Tender of debt—Refusal—Petition—Receiving order—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g).—After an act of bankruptcy a debtor tendered to one creditor payment of his debt, but the creditor refused to receive it, and subsequently joined in a bankruptcy petition presented against the debtor, upon which a receiving order was made. The debtor appealed against the receiving order, on the ground that, by reason of the tender, there was no good petitioning creditor's debt.

Held, that, at the time when the tender was made, an act of bankruptcy having been committed by the debtor, of which the creditor had knowledge, he was justified in refusing to accept payment, and the receiving order was rightly made.—Ex parte Lowe, In re Lowe, Q.B.D., BKCY. 560—62 L. T. 263.

ADJUDICATION—

4. Partnership—Composition — Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 60), ss. 343, 353.—Three partners presented a petition for arrangement, and offered to their creditors a composition for both their joint and their separate liabilities. The proposals of one of the debtors were not accepted.

Held, that the three partners were rightly adjudicated bankrupts.—In re Lore, C.A. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir 365.

APPEAL—

5. "Criminal cause or matter"—Committal for contempt—Wilful failure to deliver property to the trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 24 (4), 104 (2)—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 47.—A bankrupt is entitled, under section 104 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to appeal to the Court of Appeal against an order for committal for contempt of court for wilful failure to deliver up to the trustee property forming part of the bankrupt's estate.—In re Ashwin, Ex parte Ashwin, C.A.—25 Q. B. D. 271.

6. Jurisdiction—Three orders made in county court —One notice of appeal and one deposit—Fees—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 39—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 131.—On appeal to the county court judge from the rejection by the trustee of three proofs tendered against the bankrupt's estate, three orders were drawn up affirming the trustee's rejection. An appeal was brought from the decision of the county court judge to the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy, only one notice of appeal being duly stamped and one deposit lodged on the appeal.

Held, that the court could not hear the appeal until the additional payments had been made, and that the case must stand over in order that the necessary requirements might be complied with.—Ex parte Smith, In re Smith & Sons, Q.B.D. 719.

7. Notice — Receiving order — Official receiver — Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 134—Ord. 58, rr. 2, 15; ord. 64, r. 7.—Where the ground of an appeal is that no receiving order ought to have been made, service of notice of appeal need not be made on the official receiver, nor need he be brought before the court in any way.—Ex parte Harris, In re Harris, C.A. 195.

8. Notice — Receiving order — Official receiver — Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 130, 134—Ord. 58, rr. 2, 15.—In all cases of appeals against receiving orders, notice of appeal must be served on the official receiver within twenty-one days.—Ex parte Webber, In re Webber, C.A. 195—24 Q. 9. Notice—Service by post—Ord. 58, r. 2—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 130, 132.—A notice of appeal in bankruptcy did not reach the respondent till after the expiration of twenty-one days from the date of the order, though it was posted before the twenty-one days had expired.

Held, that the service was too late.—Ex parte Cochrane, In re Faulconer, Q.B.D., BKCY.—61 L. T. 56.

10. Stay of proceedings—Discretion of registrar—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 7 (4), 95, 97.—A judgment debtor cannot, on the ground that an appeal from such judgment is pending, claim a stay of bankruptcy proceedings for the judgment debt as of right, as a stay on such grounds is entirely in the discretion of the registrar under section 7 (4) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The presentation of a bankruptcy petition in a wrong court by inadvertence will not invalidate the jurisdiction, as, by section 97 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, when read with section 95, the proceedings can be removed into the proper court.

Ex parte May, 33 W. R. 598, 14 Q. B. D. 37, approved.—Ex parte Ball, In re French, C.A. 52—24 Q. B. D. 63; 62 L. T. 93.

COMPOSITION—

11. Instalment—Action by creditor—Injunction—Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 58), s. 66.—A composition being payable by instalments, a creditor brought an action on his original debt, alleging that an instalment was unpaid. The debtor, alleging that the creditor had purposely kept out of the way of payment, applied for an injunction to stay the action.

The court ordered the issue of fact to be tried before itself.—In re L., BKCY. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 528.

DISCHARGE—

12. Condition—Consent to judgment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28 (6).—In imposing as a condition of granting a bankrupt his discharge that he shall consent to judgment being entered against him for the balance of the provable debts under section 28 (6) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the court ought to have regard to public morality and to the interests of the public generally, and, unless the court finds a man in receipt of an income which is more than sufficient to keep his family in the enjoyment of the ordinary necessities of life according to their station, or unless it is satisfied that he is likely to succeed to property, it is not a wise proceeding to grant an order of discharge subject to such a condition.

In 1886 a bankrupt, who had previously been employed as an assistant to a linendraper, took over the business of a chemical manufactory, which he carried on until 1888, when he became bankrupt. On application by the bankrupt for his discharge, the official receiver reported that he had continued to trade after knowing himself to be insolvent, and had brought on his bankruptcy by rash and hazardous speculations, and the county court judge granted the discharge on condition that the bankrupt should consent to judgment being entered against him for the sum of £4,038, being the amount of the unsecured debts provable under the bankruptcy unsatisfied at the date of the order, with costs, such judgment to remain in force until all the creditors had been paid 5s. in the pound on their debts. The bankrupt appealed against this order, it being stated that he was a married man with four children, and that his present earnings only amounted to £150 a year, with no prospect of an increase.

Held, that the order of the county court ought to be varied, and that a proper order under the circumstances would be that the discharge of the bankrupt be suspended for three years.—Ex parte Shackleton, In re Shackleton, Q.B.D., BKCY. 288.

13. Discretion of court—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 24, 28 (2), (3), (5), (6).—The court is entitled, in exercising its discretion as to the granting of an order of discharge to a bankrupt under section 28 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to take into consideration any conduct of the bankrupt connected with or relevant to the bankruptcy, and is not limited to the matters mentioned in section 28 nor section 24.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (38 W. R. 429) affirmed.—Ex parte Jones, In re Jones; Ex parte Constable, In re Barker, C.A. 609—25 Q. B. D. 285; 59 L. J. Q. B. 331.

14. Liquidation—Close—Resolution—Registration—Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, r. 303—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), s. 125 (10)—Bankruptcy Discharge and Closure Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 66), s. 2.—In 1882 a debtor presented a petition which resulted in a liquidation by arrangement, and in 1884 resolutions were passed at a meeting of creditors closing the liquidation and refusing the debtor his discharge. In 1889 a further meeting of creditors was held, at which the debtor obtained a resolution granting him his discharge, and he applied to the county court registrar, under section 125 (10) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, to register the resolution.

Held, that the registrar was right in refusing to register the resolution, and that the proper course was for the debtor to apply for his discharge under section 2 of the Bankruptcy Discharge and Closure Act, 1887.—Ex parte Hart, In re Hart, Q.B.D., BKCY., 32—58 L. J. Q. B. 440; 61 L. T. 256.

15. Refusal—Misconduct—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28 (3).—The official receiver reported that a bankrupt had committed offences under section 28 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; that he had occupied a fictitious residence, and filed a petition himself when he knew that a creditor's petition had been filed; that he had traded with spurious bills of exchange; and that he had asked his brother to put in a false proof.

Held, that the bankrupt's discharge was rightly refused.—Ex parte Cook, In re Cook, Q.B.D., BKCY.—61 L. T. 335.

16. Refusal—Second application—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 28, 104.—If a bankrupt whose application for his discharge has been refused makes a second application for it, such application should be by way of review, and the bankrupt must make out a primâ facie case.—Ex parte Lloyd, In re Lloyd, Q.B.D., BKCY.—62 L. 17. Suspension—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28.—A bankrupt was reported by the official receiver to have committed two offences under section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. He was receiving a small salary.

Held, that the bankrupt's discharge should be suspended for three years.—Ex parte Freeman, In re Freeman, Q.B.D., BKCY.—62 L. T. 367.

PETITION—

19. Amendment—Act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4.—A bankruptcy petition was presented against E. L. which alleged "that the said E. L. within three months before the date of this petition has committed the following act of bankruptcy—namely, non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice issued out of this court on the 13th day of May, 1890, and duly served upon the said E. L. on the 13th day of the said month." Objection was taken by the debtor that the act of bankruptcy was not sufficiently alleged upon the face of the petition. The registrar upheld the objection, and the creditor appealed.

Held (allowing the appeal), that the registrar ought to have amended the petition, and heard the case on the merits, and that, as that had not been done, the case must go back to him.—Ex parte Constable, In re Lorrimar, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 943.

19a. Notice—Interest on judgment debt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 136.—Where a creditor seeks to issue a bankruptcy notice on a judgment debt, he is entitled to add to the judgment debt the interest which has accrued due upon it, and to have a bankruptcy notice issued for the full amount.—Ex parte Husluck, In re Lehmann, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 941.

19b. Substituted service—Debtor out of the jurisdiction—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 141, 154, 156.—Rule 154 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, which provides for the substituted service of a bankruptcy notice or petition where the debtor is keeping out of the way to avoid personal service, applies to a case where the debtor has gone out of the jurisdiction for that purpose.

PROOF—

20. Contingent liability—Annuity—Limit of time for rejection by trustee—Assent to creditors' estimate of proof—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 37, schedule 11, r. 2—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 219, 228.—On the 22nd of May, 1885, proofs were put in by A. V. against the estates of J. D. and M. D. for £240 (being arrears of an annuity of £120 a month arising out of a covenant by J. D. and M. D. to pay the same), and for £7,000, the estimated value of the annuity for the residue of A. V.'s life.

A. V. was seventy-four years of age, and on the 20th of September, 1885, she died.

On the 7th of January, 1890, both proofs were rejected by the trustee to the extent of £5,920, on the ground that the annuity was determined by A. V.'s death. On motion to reverse this decision, Held, that the trustee's calculation was correct; that he had not assented to the creditors' estimate of the annuity; and that the proofs must be rejected to the extent he had named.

Held, further, where a creditor sends in a proof for a contingent liability, and also estimates the value of such liability for the purposes of proof, the trustee is not bound, if he dissent from the proof, to reject it in twenty-eight days under rule 228.—Ex parte Vaughan's Executors, In re Dodds, Q.B.D., BKCY.—59 L. J. Q. B. 403, 62 L. T. 837.

21. Partnership—Proof by partner.—A partnership between A. and B. was dissolved, B. receiving a sum of £11,642, which he left on mortgage. B. afterwards became bankrupt, his debts being £23,700 and his assets £3,842. Joint creditors of the old firm proved for £7,000 against B.'s separate estate.

Held, that A. could not prove against B.'s estate for £11,642.—Ex parte Hind, In re Hind, Q.B.D., BKCY.—62 L. T. 327.

22. Secured creditor — Company — Articles of association—Lien on shares—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 6, 168.—A limited company presented a petition in bankruptcy. The debtor had obtained judgment against a registered shareholder in the company declaring that the latter was a trustee of some of his shares for the debtor. The articles of association gave the company a first and paramount lien on all shares for all money due to the company from the registered holders or other persons for the time being entitled to them.

Held, that the company had no lien for debt due, and was not a secured creditor.—Ex parte Mexican Santa Barbara Mining Co., In re Perkins, C.A. 710—24 Q. B. D. 613; 59 L. J. Q. B. 226.

23. Surety—Right of surety to prove before payment—Practice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 37.—Under the provisions of section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the surety of a bankrupt is entitled to prove against the bankrupt's estate, although he has not paid the debt for which he is liable.—Ex parte Delmar, In re Herepath & Delmar, Q.B.D. 752.

RECEIVING ORDER—

24. Domicil—Dwelling-house in England—Single creditor — Stay of proceedings — Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 6 (1) (d).—A debtor, a Frenchman domiciled in France, and having apartments in Paris, against whom a judgment had been obtained in France by an English creditor, which judgment had not been satisfied, came to London to conduct an action upon an entirely distinct claim against the same creditor. He rented per month five furnished rooms on different floors in a house occupied by an agency office on the ground floor, and the lessor retained another room for his own use. He brought his wife and some servants, and stayed for three months. After the date of the issue of the writ in the second action the creditor brought an action in this country against the debtor to enforce the French judgment. He obtained judgment, and upon the failure of the debtor to comply with a bankruptcy notice, presented a petition against him. The debtor's action against the creditor was still pending, and the debtor alleged that there was no other creditor than the petitioner, and that there were no assets. The registrar made a receiving order.

Held, that the debtor had "a dwelling-house in England" within the meaning of section 6 (1) (d) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that, if he had such a dwelling-house within a year of the date of the presentation of the petition, no extent of the time of such occupation was necessary to make him liable to bankruptcy proceedings.

Held, further, that there was no principle of law that the fact of there being no other creditor and no assets must be a bar to bankruptcy proceedings; that such facts must be shown upon the examination of the debtor, and not upon the making of the receiving order; and that such facts and the fact of other legal proceedings being pending were merely grounds for the exercise of the registrar's discretion.—Ex parte Baird, In re Hecquard, C.A. 148—24 Q. B. D. 71.

25. Foreign bankruptcy—Stay of proceedings.—A firm had its head office in Paris, and a branch office in London. The partners were adjudicated bankrupts in France, and a syndic was appointed to administer the estate. A bankruptcy petition was afterwards presented in England, and an interim receiver was appointed. There was no evidence as to the domicil of the debtors, but two of them resided, and had assets, in England.

Held, that the receiving order was rightly made, and that the foreign bankruptcy was no ground for ordering a stay of proceedings.—Ex parte Hermanos, In re Chale, C.A.—24 Q. B. D. 640; 59 L. J. Q. B. 254; 62 L. T. 781.

26. Solicitor — Counsel's fees. — On application by a barrister for an order that the trustee in bankruptcy of a solicitor might be directed to pay counsel's fees alleged to have been received by him in respect of the bankrupt's bills of costs as a solicitor in certain matters, it was contended that payments had been made by the bankrupt to the applicant on general account, which included the fees claimed, and also that an agreement had been come to between the trustee and the clients, whereby a lump sum was accepted in settlement of the bills of costs, exclusive of fees to counsel.

Held, that the matter must be referred to the registrar to inquire what fees had been received by the trustee, and whether any of such fees had been paid by the bankrupt to the applicant either specifically or generally, the applicant to be at liberty, on the registrar's finding, to raise before the court the question whether it was competent for the trustee to enter into an arrangement with a client of the solicitor to receive a less sum than was claimed by a bill of costs after deducting counsel's fees.—Ex parte Colquhoun, In re Clift, Q.B.D., BKCY, 688.

TRUSTEE—

27. After-acquired property—Assignment by bankrupt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.—All transactions entered into by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing bonâ fide with him for value, before the trustee intervenes, with respect to his after-acquired property, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid against the trustee.

An undischarged bankrupt, having brought an action for the wrongful conversion of certain goods acquired by him during the bankruptcy, assigned the cause of action for value to the plaintiff, who knew that he was an undischarged bankrupt. The bankrupt recovered a verdict, and before the money was paid over the plaintiff gave notice that he claimed the money under the assignment. The trustee in bankruptcy also claimed it.

Held, that the assignment, being bonâ fide on the part of the plaintiff, and having been completed before the trustee intervened to claim the money, was valid as against the trustee.—Cohen v. Mitchell, C.A. 551—25 Q. B. D. 262.

28. Chose in action—Will—Executory interest—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 3, 4. —A. by his will gave his wife the right of possession and enjoyment of all his pictures during her life, and, subject to this, bequeathed the pictures to his son, T., for his absolute use and benefit. T. afterwards executed a mortgage assigning all his interest under his father's will in the money, hereditaments, and premises thereby devised and bequeathed, expectant on his mother's death. T. was afterwards adjudicated a bankrupt.

Held, that T.'s interest in the pictures was a chose in action, and did not pass to the trustee in bankruptcy. —Ex parte Singleton, In re Tritton, Q.B.D., BKCY.—61 L. T. 301.

29. Compromise—Committee of inspection—Dissentient creditors—Resolution—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 57, 89.—A compromise agreed upon by the trustee in respect of a claim made against the bankrupt's estate was approved by the committee of inspection, but, at a subsequent general meeting of the creditors, a resolution was passed refusing to accept the compromise. The trustee applied to the court for leave to carry out the compromise, notwithstanding the resolution.

Held, that, the resolution of the creditors having been passed bonâ fide, and with a view to their own interests, the compromise ought to be abandoned.—Ex parte Hurlbatt, In re Ridgway, Q.B.D., BKCY. 432 —62 L. T. 647.

30. Disclaimer—Lease—Assignment—Mortgage—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 55.—Where the owner of leasehold premises, burdened with onerous covenants, assigns such premises by way of mortgage for the whole of the residue of the term granted by the lease, and subsequently becomes bankrupt, the equity of redemption which vests in the trustee in bankruptcy is not property burdened with onerous covenants within section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and an application for leave to disclaim the lease need not be made by the trustee.—Ex parte Board of Trade, In re Gee, Q.B.D., BKCY. 143—24 Q. B. D. 65; 59 L. J. Q. B. 16; 61 L. T. 645.

31. Disclaimer—Lease—Mortgage—Sub-demise—Assignment by mortgagee to trustee for himself—Exclusion of mortgagee and his assignee—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 55, sub-section (6). —Where a mortgagee by sub-demise has, after the bankruptcy of the lessee, assigned his mortgage to a trustee for himself, he is still liable to have an order made against him at the instance of the lessor under section 55, sub-section (6), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, excluding him from all interest in, and security upon, the demised property, unless he elect to take an order vesting the property in him, subject to the bankrupt's liabilities in respect thereof at the date of the filing of the petition.

Such an assignment in trust is, as between the mortgagee and the landlord, absolutely void.—Ex parte Hepburn, In re Smith, C.A. 744.

BILL of EXCHANGE:—

Evidence—Fraud—Burden of proof—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 30 (2).—Under section 30 (2) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the onus is on the owner of a fraudulently-negotiated bill to prove, not only that he has actually given value for the bill subsequently to the alleged fraud, but that he gave such value in good faith without notice of the fraud.—Tatham v. Hesler, Q.B.D. 109—23 Q. BILL of SALE:—

1. Attestation—Description of witness—Address—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 8—10, schedule.—A bill of sale which does not contain both the address and the description of the witness attesting the bill of sale is not "made in accordance with the form in the schedule" annexed to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and is void.—Parsons v. Broad, Coulson v. Dickson, C.A. 388—25 Q. B. D. 110; 59 L. J. Q. B. 189; 62 L. T. 479.

2. Chattels—Insufficiency of description of chattels —Statutory form.—Stock comprised in a bill of sale had been described in the schedule to the bill as follows:—"Roan horse, 'Drummer,'" "brown mare and foal," "three rave carts."

Held, that the horse and mare were sufficiently specified within the requirements of the Bills of Sale Acts, and that, in the absence of evidence showing want of identification of the particular carts, the expression "three rave carts" would be a sufficiently specific description.

Carpenter v. Deen, 23 Q. B. D. 566, and Witt v. Banner, 36 W. R. 115, 20 Q. B. D. 114, distinguished. —Hickley v. Greenwood, Q.B.D. 686—25 Q. B. D. 277.

3. Chattels real—Statutory form—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 9.—A bill of sale had been drawn mainly in the form set out in the schedule of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, but to "all and singular the several chattels and things specifically described in the schedule" there had been added the words "together with all tenant-right, valuation, and goodwill, tillages, and interest of the mortgagor" in a certain farm, and these interests were further specified in the schedule, together with various personal chattels.

Held, that the document was void as a bill of sale, on the ground that it was not drawn in the statutory form, and had not the same legal effect, since it included chattels real in the security, whereas the Bills of Sale Acts only contemplate advances on the security of chattels personal.

4. Mortgage—Judgment—Priority.—A. having mortgaged a house with trade fixtures, afterwards executed a bill of sale of the chattels on the premises, including the trade fixtures. The chattels and trade fixtures were taken in execution.

Held, that the grantee of the bill of sale was entitled to the goods as against the execution creditor. —Usher v. Martin, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 272; 59 L. J. Q. B. 11; 61 L. T. 778.

5. Registration—Affidavit—Description of grantor—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 11.—The grantor of a bill of sale had described himself in the affidavit as "residing at 20, Avington-grove, in the hamlet of Penge, in the county of Surrey." In the bill of sale he was described as "of 20, Avington-grove, and of 72, Beckenham-road, both in the hamlet of Penge, and of 100, High-street, Croydon, all in the county of Surrey." The grantor had offices at all three places, but he resided only at the first. The goods scheduled in the bill of sale were distributed among all three places.

Held, that the grantor was sufficiently described in the affidavit. — Greenham v. Child, Q.B.D. 94—24 Q. B. D. 29; 61 L. T. 563.

6. Registration—Assumed name—Grantor giving bill of sale in assumed name by which he was known—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10, sub-section 2.—The grantor of a bill of sale gave the same under an assumed name, the only name by which the grantees of the bill of sale knew the grantor, and this assumed name was the name by which the grantor was known in the neighbourhood for some three years, and under which he had carried on business for that time, and the bill of sale was registered in the assumed name. Judgment had been previously obtained by other persons against the grantor under another name.

Held, that the bill of sale was duly registered under sub-section 2 of section 10 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and was valid, as it was registered in the name by which the grantor was known and recognized at the time, and the section does not necessarily require a bill of sale to be executed and registered in the real name of the grantor.—Central Bank of London v. Hawkins, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 901.

7. Registration—Building agreement—Mortgage—Power of entry—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 8.—By a mortgage deed the plaintiff assigned to the defendants certain land, and buildings in course of erection thereon, "and also all bricks, timber, slates, and other building materials which may at any time hereafter be brought by or for the mortgagor into the said premises for completing the buildings." The plaintiff covenanted that all such building materials should be considered as immediately attached to, and forming part of, the fee simple of such premises; none were to be removed without the concurrence of the mortgagees; and, in default of completion of the premises to the satisfaction of the mortgagees, a power to enter, seize, and take possession of all such building materials was given to them. Power was further given to the mortgagees, in case of default by the mortgagor, to sell all or part of the premises, and all building materials, bricks, timber, &c., standing and being thereon, or on any part thereof, either together or in parcels.

Held, that, as the deed gave a power to sell the building materials, independent of the powers of entry and of taking possession of the premises, and exercisable without the latter powers being exercised, it was an assurance of personal chattels, or a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt, within the meaning of section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and was a bill of sale, and void under section 8 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, for want of registration in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein.—Climpson v. Coles, Q.B.D. 110—23 Q. B. D. 345; 58 L. J. Q. B. 432; 61 L. T. 116.

8. Registration—Collateral security—Life insurance policy—After-acquired property—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 4.—By a registered bill of sale the grantor assigned as security for a loan "all and singular the several chattels and things described" in the annexed schedule, which described the chattels as "twenty-one milch cows" on the grantor's farm, and "all goods, chattels, and effects in or upon" the premises belonging to him. As a collateral security he deposited with the grantee a policy of insurance on his own life, but there was no memorandum of deposit, and the bill of sale did not refer to the policy. The grantor afterwards sold some of the cows, and bought others.

Held, (1) that the policy of insurance did not require registration as a part of the bill of sale; (2) that the bill of sale did not extend to any property afterwards brought upon the farm; (3) (Lopes, L.J., dissenting) that the words "twenty-one milch cows" were not a sufficient description of the chattels.

Judgment of Charles, J., reversed.—Carpenter v. Deen, C.A.—23 Q. B. D. 566; 61 L. T. 860.

9. Registration—Debenture—Incorporated company—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 4, 8—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 3, 17.—Debentures of an incorporated company are not bills of sale which require registration under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and are specially exempted under the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882.—Read v. Joannon, Q.B.D. 734—25 Q. B. D. 300.

10. Registration—Execution creditor—Bills of Sale (Ireland) Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 7), s. 8.—In 1883 a partnership between A. and B. was dissolved by deed. A. assigned to B. the premises, stock-in-trade, and goodwill in consideration of an annuity of £400 for his life. B. covenanted to pay the annuity, which was made a first charge on the premises, stock-in-trade, capital, and goodwill. Power of distress and entry for arrears of the annuity was reserved to A., with a further power if, after B.'s death, the annuity should be sixty days in arrear, for A. to sell the premises, stock-in-trade, and goodwill, and pay thereout the debts due on account of the business, including the money due for the annuity, and to retain one-half the surplus for his own benefit, and to pay the other half to B.'s executors or administrators, the annuity thereupon to cease. The deed was not registered as a bill of sale. In 1887 B. executed a trust deed for the benefit of his creditors. He died in 1888. In 1889 the stock and goods on the premises were seized by the sheriff in an action in which the firm were defendants.

Held, that the deed was not void against the execution creditor.—Cranfield v. Cranfield, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 555.

11. Registration—Hiring agreement—Bankruptcy—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict, c. 31) s. 4—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 8. — In 1887 a dissolution of partnership was agreed upon between the bankrupt and J. F. W., who had previously carried on business together as saw mill proprietors, and, in order to provide the sum of £365 required to pay out the retiring partner, the bankrupt applied to W. W., his partner's brother, who was a solicitor, to advance him £650. An agreement was come to between the bankrupt and W. W., by which the bankrupt sold to W. W. certain of his machinery in consideration of £650. The machinery was to remain in the possession of the bankrupt upon certain terms, and the £650 was to be repaid by instalments extending over ten years. A receipt was given by the bankrupt for the £650, which was specified to be in full payment for the engine, boiler, and machinery agreed to be sold at that price on the termination of the partnership, and a hire-purchase agreement was drawn up, purporting to be made between W. W., called the "owner," and the bankrupt, called the "hirer," whereby the said machinery was let to the bankrupt upon the terms and conditions therein specified. Neither the receipt nor the hiring agreement were registered under the Bills of Sale Acts, and, the bankrupt having filed his petition, the machinery was claimed by his trustee as forming part of the bankrupt's estate.

Held, that there was no document which required to be registered as a bill of sale, and that the trustee was not entitled to the proceeds derived from the sale of the machinery.—Ex parte Collins, In re Yarrow, Q.B.D., BKCY. 175—59 L. J. Q. B. 18; 61 L. T. 642.

12. Registration—Hiring agreement—Licence to take possession—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4.—A transaction purported to be a sale by delivery of certain goods for value, followed by an agreement in writing, under which the goods were let on hire by the alleged purchaser to the alleged vendor, with power to the alleged purchaser to retake possession on the happening of certain events. The real nature of the transaction was one of loan upon the security of the goods, and not a bonâ fide sale and hiring.

Held, that the court was not precluded by the form of the document from inquiring into the real nature of the transaction, and that the alleged hiring agreement was a bill of sale, it being a "licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt" within section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

Ex parte Collins, In re Yarrow, 38 W. R. 175, not followed.—Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Watson, C.A. 567—25 Q. B. D. 27; 59 L. J. Q. B. 394.

13. Registration—Hiring agreement—Receipt and inventory—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 8.—A sheriff having seized the plaintiff's goods, an order was made by consent giving the sheriff power to sell them by private contract to the defendants. The goods were sold for the amount of the execution debt; the money was paid, and a receipt with an inventory sent by post. On the same day the defendants let the goods to the debtor's wife on a hiring agreement. The debtor became bankrupt, and his trustee claimed the goods. The receipt and inventory were not registered.

Held, that the documents did not require registration under the Bills of Sale Act; and that the trustee was not entitled to the goods.—Jones v. Tower Furnishing Co., Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 84.

14. Registration—Names of attesting witnesses—Interest—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 10.—A bill of sale purported to assign the goods specified in the schedule as security for a loan of £50 and interest at the rate of £17 10*s.* for three years, the grantor covenanting to pay the principal and interest in thirty-six equal instalments of £1 17*s.* 6*d.*, commencing from the date of the instrument. The addresses and description of the attesting witnesses were not stated in the bill of sale, but were stated in the affidavit filed with the registrar.

Held, that the bill of sale was void (1) for not specifying the rate of interest; (2) for not stating the addresses and descriptions of the attesting witnesses. —Blankenstein v. Robertson, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 543; 59 L. J. Q. B. 315.

15. "True owner"—Partnership—Undivided moiety —Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 5.—The words "true owner" in section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, are used in their natural, and not in an artificial sense, and a man does not cease to be the true owner of personal chattels within the meaning of that section because they may be subject to some lien or equitable right.

In 1885 the bankrupts commenced to carry on business in partnership, and in 1888 a bill of sale was executed by the elder partner, with the consent of the younger, upon partnership property as security for an advance for partnership purposes. This bill of sale was set aside by the county court judge, on the ground that the grantor was not the "true owner" of either the whole or a moiety of the goods specified in the schedule within section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and the bill of sale holder was ordered to repay the value of the goods to the trustee in bankruptcy.

Held, that the county court judge was wrong in ordering the bill of sale holder to pay back the whole of the money; that the grantor was the true owner of his moiety of the goods; and that the bill of sale holder was entitled to retain one-half of the money realized.—Ex parte Barnett, In re Tamplin, Q.B.D., BKCY. 351—59 L. J. Q. B. 194; 62 L. T. 264.

BUILDING SOCIETY:—

1. Arbitration—Dispute—Retiring member.—By a rule of a benefit building society it was provided that every dispute between the society and any member on which the decision of the board should not be deemed satisfactory should be settled by a reference to arbitration, pursuant to the Building Societies Act, 1874; that five arbitrators should be elected by the members at a general meeting, and in each case of dispute the names of three arbitrators should be selected by lot out of the five as the persons to decide the dispute. A dispute having arisen between a member who had given notice of withdrawal and the society as to the amount which the member was entitled to receive on withdrawal, the member brought an action against the society to enforce his claim. After the writ had been issued, the society, for the first time, elected five arbitrators pursuant to the rule, and took out a summons to stay all further proceedings in the action, and to have the matter in dispute referred to arbitration.

Held, that, as no arbitrators had been elected at the time of the issue of the writ, the action had been properly commenced, and that the society could not, after litigation had been thus commenced, have the matter in dispute referred to arbitration.—Christie v. Northern Counties Building Society, CH.D. NOR., J. 280—43 Ch. D. 62; 59 L. J. Ch. 210; 61 L. T. 796.

2. Arbitration—Dispute—Withdrawing member—Alteration of rules.—In 1883 the plaintiff became a member of a building society, and in 1887 he gave notice of withdrawal. After his notice the society was incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874, the rules were altered, and a certificate of registration was granted. The original rules had provided for additions, repeals, alterations, and amendment of the rules. The amended rules provided that all disputes with members should be referred to arbitration.

Held, that the dispute between the society and the plaintiff must be referred to arbitration.—Davies v. Chatham Permanent Building Society, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 680.

3. Ultrà vires—Directors—Power to make advances on equitable mortgage of leaseholds—Advances on security of leasehold colliery—Negligence—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 12, 13, 25.—The rules of a benefit building society provided (a) that the directors should not be answerable for the insufficiency in title of any security unless the loss should happen through their own neglect, and that none of the directors should be answerable for the acts or default of the others; (b) that the funds of the society should be applied at the discretion of the board in making advances to members on legal or equitable mortgage of leasehold property.

The directors advanced £25,000 to J. upon a second mortgage of a leasehold colliery, taking also as a collateral security a charge upon a beneficial interest under a trust of personal estate. The advance was made upon a valuation and report of a competent surveyor selected by the chairman out of five names submitted by the borrower.

The chairman took an active part in the inquiry into the nature and value of the security, but the other directors acted simply in good faith on the materials submitted to them.

Held, (1) that the advance on the security of the leasehold colliery was not ultrà vires of either the society or the directors; (2) that the directors were not guilty of negligence in acting on the surveyor's report and taking a second mortgage as the principal security; (3) that the directors had also power by implication to redeem the first mortgage and to enter into possession of the mortgaged property and pay the rent and the proper expenses to maintain and work the colliery without rendering themselves personally liable therefor.

4. Ultrà vires—Investment—Trust funds—Trust Investment Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 32), ss. 3, 5, 6.—The funds of a building society which are invested in the name of the society, or in the names of trustees who have no power of investment, but are trustees for the society acting under the direction of the board of directors, are not within the Trust Investment Act, 1889.—In re National Permanent Mutual Building Society, CH.D. NOR., J. 475—43 Ch. D. 431; 59 L. J. Ch. 403; 62 L. T. 596.

5. Ultrà vires—Mortgage—Subrogation—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 15 (2).—Under section 15 (2) of the Building Societies Act, 1874, the amount for the time being secured to a building society by mortgages from its members is not limited to the principal moneys thereby secured, but includes also all such other sums as at the date of borrowing may be due in respect of interest, fines, or otherwise, and instalments not then accrued, but secured by the mortgages and outstanding.

Money was borrowed ultrà vires by a building society and applied in advancing members who gave to the society mortgages to secure the repayment of the advances.

Held, that the persons from whom the moneys were borrowed by the society in order to make the advances were entitled to follow their moneys into the hands of the advanced members, and claim against the mortgages held by the society for the amounts secured by the mortgages, notwithstanding that a premium was deducted from that amount by the society when advancing the members.

6. Winding up—Contributory—Advanced members—Borrowing members—Apportionment.—Under one of the rules of a building society, deficiences of income, by which the society might be prevented from meeting its anticipated expenditure and liabilities, were to be apportioned between the investing and borrowing members.

Held, that "liabilities" included the sums due to the investing members in respect of their shares, and that the borrowing members were liable to contribute rateably to any losses thereon incurred by the investing members.

Under another rule of the society, the property mortgaged to the society to secure advanced shares was to be so secured until the amount of such shares should be repaid to the society, with all fines and other payments incurred in respect thereof.

Held, that, under the last-named rule, a borrowing member was not entitled to redeem his mortgage, except on payment of what might be due from him in respect of his above-mentioned liability.—In re West Riding Permanent Building Society, CH.D. CHI., J. 376—43 Ch. D. 407; 59 L. J. Ch. 197; 62 L. T. 486.

7. Winding up — Dissolution, deed of — Withdrawing members. — The rules of a building society formed under the Act provided that a member wishing to withdraw should give three months' notice in writing to the secretary to repay the subscriptions standing to his credit, and that members having given notice of withdrawal should, "from the date of such notice, cease to take part in the affairs of the society." Sixty-nine members had given notice of withdrawal, but had not been paid off, when an instrument of dissolution was executed, which was signed by fifty-seven out of the seventy-four remaining members, but by none of the sixty-nine withdrawing members.

Held (affirming the decision of North, J.), that, upon the true construction of the rules (which would otherwise conflict with the Building Societies Act, 1874), withdrawing members were merely precluded from taking any part in the affairs of the society as a going concern, but that they were still "members" within the meaning of section 32 of the Act, and must therefore be taken into account in determining whether the instrument of dissolution had been signed by the requisite statutory majority of the members.

8. Winding up—Priority—Withdrawing members—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 32 (4).—By the rules of certain building societies it was provided that, "On and after the expiration of the first twelve months, any member may withdraw the subscription money which he may have contributed, with such an amount of interest as may be determined by the committee, such member to give notice of his intention to withdraw in writing to the secretary, and, should more than one member give notice to withdraw at one time, the members so giving notice shall be paid in rotation according to the priority of notice, provided always that the said society shall not be required or obliged to make such payment as aforesaid until they have sufficient funds in hand for that purpose, and also to meet the then existing legal liabilities of the society." Notices of withdrawal were given by certain subscribing and investing members after the insolvency of the society had become known, but before the winding up order had been made.

Held, that the withdrawing members were not entitled to be paid the amount of their subscriptions in priority to other shareholders in the winding up.

Held, also, that, in the absence of a determination by the committee under the above rule, no interest accrued in respect of the amount due to a withdrawing member.—Rawlinson v. King, Rawlinson v. Oliver, Rawlinson v. Wilkinson, Q.B.D. 509—24 Q. B. D. 394; 59 L. J. Q. B. 217; 62 L. T. 293.

CANADA, LAW of :—

1. Appeal to Privy Council—Special leave.—Even if a case is of a substantial character, and may involve matters of great public interest, and give rise to an important question of law, the judgment sought to be appealed from may be so plainly right or unattended with sufficient doubt as to justify the refusal of special leave to appeal.

A petition for special leave to appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, exempting the respondents from a tax specially imposed by a corporation, was refused because the statute under which the exemption was claimed did not appear to have been erroneously construed.—Montreal Corporation v. Ecclesiastiques de St. Sulpice, P.C.—14 App. 660; 59 L. J. P. C. 20; 61 L. T. 653.

2. Quebec, law of—Contract—Pledge—Tender.—Under the Civil Code of Lower Canada if the owner of a thing pledged for a specific debt tenders the amount of the debt and the lender is unable to restore the chattel, the tender is sufficient to prevent the lender from detaining the chattel for other debts of the borrower.

If a document purports to be an unilateral contract, binding the signor for an indefinite time to sell certain specified debentures of a company to one of its officers at a specified price, but the circumstances under which the contract was executed show that the intention of the parties was to limit for the common benefit their claims against the company, to facilitate a contemplated financial transaction, the said intention will control the contract, which cannot be treated as an agreement for sale.—Senecal v. Pause, P.C.—14 App. 637.

3. Quebec, law of—Corporation General Clauses Act, 1876, ss. 323, 326, 327—Taxation—Railway—Appeal to Privy Council—Special leave.—By the Quebec Corporation General Clauses Act, 1876, no part of a railway is taxable, except the land occupied as a road, and bridges and other superstructures are excluded.

If special leave to appeal is granted on the ground that the appellant desires to raise a question of general importance, the appellant cannot at the hearing contend that no such question arises, nor argue the appeal on a question of fact.—St. John's Corporation v. Central Vermont Railway Co., P.C.—14 App. 590; 59 L. J. P. C. 15; 61 L. T. 441.

4. Quebec, law of—Domicil—Acte de mariage.—By the Code of Lower Canada movable property is subject to the law of the owner's international domicil, and domicil, for purposes of marriage, is used in the sense of marriage.

An acte de mariage, signed in 1828, by the husband and wife, recited that the husband was a day labourer in the City of Quebec.

Held, that the recital did not amount to such a declaration by the husband of a Canadian domicil as would amount to a contract that his wife should have a commune en biens with him.—McMullen v. Wadsworth, P.C.—14 App. 631; 59 L. J. P. C. 7; 61 L. T. 487.

5. Quebec, law of—Public lands—Forest reserve—Location ticket—Timber cutting licence—Injunction.—The plaintiffs obtained from the Crown a location ticket within the boundaries of a forest reserve, any such grant by the Crown being prohibited by the Quebec Forest Act, 1883.

Held, that the plaintiffs, being in possession of land under the Crown for valuable consideration, were entitled to an injunction against interference by the holder of a timber cutting licence from which the plaintiffs' land was excepted.—Gilmour v. Maurott, P.C.—14 App. 645; 59 L. Injury to goods—Insurance risks.—The plaintiffs wrote to the defendants asking for their rates of shipment from Leghorn to Glasgow of marble and terra cotta busts and other goods. The plaintiffs' agent afterwards shipped with the defendants at Leghorn eight cases of goods described as "terra cotta bronzed." The goods were damaged on the voyage.

Held, that the exception of insurance risks did not relieve the defendants from their liabilities as common carriers.—Sutton v. Ciceri, H.L.—15 App. 144; 62 L. T. 742.

1. Corporation—Investment—Trust Investment Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 32), ss. 3, 5—7, 9.—A corporation incorporated by a special Act holding funds for charitable purposes is a trustee within the meaning of section 3 of the Trust Investment Act, 1889, and is entitled to invest any trust moneys in its hands on any of the securities mentioned or referred to in that section, unless expressly forbidden to do so by the instrument, if any, creating the trust; but a trustee cannot sell existing securities for the purpose of reinvesting the proceeds in the securities authorized by section 3, unless the instrument creating the trust contains a power to vary securities.—Manchester Royal Infirmary v. Attorney-General, CH.D. 2. Endowed Schools Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 56), ss. 5, 11, 13, 29 — Christ's Hospital.—The endowments of Christ's Hospital are educational endowments within section 5 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, and the endowments for maintenance of scholars are educational endowments within section 29. 3. Mortmain—Bridge tolls—Assignment—Mort- gage—Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36).—Trustees, incorporated by a special Act for the purpose of managing a harbour, were empowered to demand certain rates for the use of the harbour, to levy toll for the passage over certain bridges, and to lease any of the rates, dues, and tolls at a rent; and also to borrow, for the purposes of the Act, money, not exceeding a certain specified sum, "on mortgage of the several tolls, rates, and dues" by the Act authorized, the mortgagees being empowered to enforce payment of arrears of interest by appointing a receiver. All the moneys received by the trustees were to be paid to the credit of the harbour fund, and it was provided that the moneys from time to time carried to the credit of the harbour fund should be applied, first, in paying the interest on moneys borrowed under the Act and certain previous Acts; secondly, in maintaining the harbour, &c.; thirdly, in paying certain rent-charges; and fourthly, in paying sums required to be set apart to form a sinking fund to pay off the sums borrowed. The approaches to, and the land under, the bridges belonged to the trustees. The trustees borrowed under the Act money upon the security of bonds by which, in consideration of the payment of the amount expressed to be secured by the bonds respectively, the trustees granted and assigned to the persons named therein, their executors, administrators, and assigns, "such proportion of the several rates, tolls, rents, and other moneys arising and accruing by virtue of the said Act as the said sum of £ doth or shall bear to the whole sum which is or shall be borrowed upon the credit of the said rates, tolls, rents, and other moneys, to hold to the said [assignee] until the said sum of £ , with interest at per cent. per annum, shall be lawfully paid and satisfied," &c., &c.

Held, that the bonds amounted to an assignment specifically of the rates, tolls, and dues expressed to be assigned by them, which included the bridge tolls, but not to an assignment of the entire harbour fund, or an assignment of the general undertaking of the harbour trust; that the bridge tolls were payments made for permission to pass over the bridges, and therefore, the land leading to and supporting the bridges being the property of the trustees, over land belonging to the trustees, which land might, moreover, be had recourse to under the mortgagees' power of appointing a receiver; that such tolls were an interest in land; and that the bonds assigning them were within 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, and could not be given to a charity.

4. Mortmain—Corporation—Debentures—Bonds—Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 36).—A. bequeathed various sums of money to charities. The greater part of his estate consisted of bonds of the following corporations—viz., Batley, Bradford, Keighley, Dewsbury, Wakefield, and Leeds.

Held, that all the bonds, with the exception of that of the Keighley Corporation, constituted interests in land within 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, and could not validly be bequeathed to charities.—Bedford v. Teal, CH.D. STI., J. 249—59 L. J. Ch. 249; 61 L. T. 671.

5. Schoolmaster—Dismissal—Action—Consent of Charity Commissioners.—Section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, applies only to actions or proceedings whereby administration of the trusts of a charity is sought; but, where an action is brought merely to enforce common law rights or obtain equitable relief in respect of such rights, or to enforce an individual equitable right not relating to the administration of the trusts of the charity, the section does not apply, even though a question relating to the charity may incidentally be decided.

A schoolmaster, having received notice of dismissal from persons claiming to be the trustees or managers of a charity school, brought an action for an injunction to restrain them (on the ground that they were not duly appointed trustees or managers within the trust deed) from dismissing him, and from appointing anyone else in his place, and from ejecting him from the school-house. The plaintiff had not, before commencing his action, obtained a certificate from the Charity Commissioners under section 17 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853.

Held (reversing the decision of Kay, J.), that, even in the case of an action to which section 17 does apply, the obtaining of a certificate under that section is not a condition precedent to bringing the action, and that such an action ought not to be at once dismissed at the hearing if the certificate has not been previously obtained, but that the hearing ought to be allowed to stand over to see if the certificate can be procured.

Held, also, by Bowen and Fry, L.JJ. (Cotton, L.J., dissenting), that the present action was one coming within the class (above described) to which section 17 does not apply; that an action is not taken out of that class by the mere fact that a question relating to the charity may incidentally be decided; and that, even though such an action should be ultimately found to involve the decision of something further, which might bring it within the scope of the section, it would be time enough for the court, when that occurred, to bring the section into application; all the court has to do at the time the case comes before it is to judge whether the action, as it is then presented, is one to which the section applies.

6. University—College—Exhibitions—Universities Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 48), ss. 2, 12, 14, 17, 51.—P., who died in 1726, by his will, dated in 1723, gave certain property to a corporation upon trust that the income thereof should "be equally divided between ten of the servitors of Christ Church College in Oxford, such as the dean, two of the canons, and six of the senior students of the said college shall recommend under their hands for their sobriety, diligence at their studies, and of parts fit for a minister of the Gospel and designed for holy orders." By the Universities Act, 1877, commissioners were appointed, who were empowered to make new statutes for any college (inter alia) for altering or regulating the conditions of eligibility or appointment to any emolument or office held in and connected with a college. The Act also provided for appeals against such statutes when made, and enacted that, in framing them, the commissioners should have regard to the original intention of the founder. Under this Act the commissioners made certain statutes for Christ Church, one of which provided that the P. foundation should be applied to the support of college exhibitioners, who should be elected after examination in such subjects and in such manner as the governing body should determine. No appeal was made by the corporation against this provision.

Held, that the commissioners had power under the Act to make this provision, and that, inasmuch as no appeal against it had been made by the corporation, it was now binding, and that the P. exhibitions must now be regulated thereby, without regard to the provision contained in the will relative to the fitness of the exhibitioners for ministers of the Gospel and designed for holy orders.—Sons of the Clergy Corporation v. Christ Church, Oxford, CH.D. In the case of a company limited by shares, calls made by the liquidator in the winding up form part of the capital of the company; and, accordingly, where the memorandum and articles of association of a company limited by shares give a power to mortgage the uncalled capital of the company, such a mortgage, when made by the directors while the company is a going concern, is effectual to operate after the winding up upon calls made in the winding up by the liquidator, and entitles the mortgagee to be paid out of such calls in priority to the unsecured creditors of the company.

4. Allotment—Contract—Repudiation—Relief after commencement of winding up.—In May, 1889, S. applied for shares in a company, believing that the directors had subscribed for and would pay for their qualification shares in the ordinary way. In June, 1889, he received notice of allotment of the shares; but, as S. had not paid the application money, he being absent at the time, no certificate of shares was sent to him. Shortly afterwards S. ascertained that the directors had not paid, and did not intend to pay, for the shares taken by them; that they had in fact obtained their shares for nothing, with the exception of one small sum; and that, as he said, the company was a bogus company. S. then gave notice to the secretary that he withdrew his name from the company. A few days later S. received a letter from the secretary informing him that the affairs of the company had been placed on an entirely different footing, but S. destroyed the letter without answering it. On a subsequent occasion the managing director informed

S. that the directors had been advised that they could not make S. pay as a shareholder. Accordingly S. never took any steps to have his name removed from the register of shareholders.

In November, 1889, an order was made for the winding up of the company, and S.'s name was placed on the list of contributories. Thereupon S. applied to the court that his name might be removed from such list.

Held, that S.'s application could not, under the circumstances, be acceded to, his name being properly on the list of contributories.

5. Evidence—Allotment—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 154.—On the 20th of August, 1888, K. had been validly allotted 200 ordinary shares, and he subsequently, as was admitted, applied for 300 preference shares, and received an allotment of them. No minutes were kept after the 20th of August, but the company's allotment book showed that 300 shares were alloted to K. on the 29th of September, 1888. The company was afterwards ordered to be wound up, K.'s name being then on the register as the holder of 500 shares.

Held, that, as K. was a contributory in respect of the 200 shares, the allotment book was, under section 154 of the Companies Act, 1862, primâ facie evidence against him of an allotment made on the 29th of September, 1888, and threw upon him the burden of proving that the allotment was invalid.

6. Paid-up shares—Registration—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25.—The conditions required by section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, to exempt shares from being issued and held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash are (1) the existence of a contract; (2) that the contract be duly made in writing (3) that the contract be filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, and these three things must be in existence and be done at or before the date of the issue of the shares, and, therefore, a document containing what purported to be an agreement to issue shares as fully paid up, which is executed by one of the parties thereto only, and, being so executed, is filed at or before the date of the issue of the shares, does not, by reason of the acceptance of its terms by the other party after the issue of the shares, constitute a contract "duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares" within section 25.—In re New Eberhardt Co., Ex parte Menzies, C.A. 97—43 Ch. DEBENTURE—

7. Mortgage—Winding up—Receiver—Possession of assets—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 87, 163—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 19, 24.—Where a limited company, which has mortgaged property to debenture-holders, is being wound up, a receiver appointed by the debenture-holders under their deed, has a right to possession of the mortgaged property, though it is necessary, in order to avoid committing a contempt of court, to apply for the permission of the court for him to take possession.

A limited company charged all its present and future property and undertaking with payment of debentures, which provided that, at any time after a winding-up petition against the company had been presented, the debenture-holders might appoint a receiver of all the property charged, as if they were mortgagees within the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and that such receiver should have power to take possession of the property, carry on the business of the company, sell or let the property, and call up capital. After a petition had been presented, and an order made to wind up the company, the debenture-holders appointed a receiver, and applied to the court for leave for him, notwithstanding the appointment of an official liquidator, to take possession of the assets.

Held, that leave to the receiver to take possession ought to be given, the applicants consenting that it should be without prejudice to any question as to the receiver's powers other than the powers to take possession of and sell the property.

DIRECTOR—

8. Appointment—Evidence—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), Table A., arts. 52, 53, 58, 61, 62, 66.—All the subscribers to a memorandum of association had signed a document appointing four persons to be the first directors. These four did not retire from office at the first ordinary meeting of shareholders as provided by art. 58 of Table A., but a resolution was passed at the meeting authorizing them to continue to act as directors.

Held, that, though the subscribers to the memorandum had not met together to appoint the first directors, the appointment in writing signed by them was a valid appointment; that the resolution passed at the general meeting was valid to the extent of continuing in office the then directors, and that allotments of shares made by those directors were binding.—In re Great Northern Salt and Chemical Works, Ex parte Kennedy, CH.D. STI., J.—44 Ch. D. 472; 59 L. J. Ch. 288.

8a. Bill of exchange—Acceptance on behalf of company—Incorrect name of company—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 41, 42.—A bill of exchange payable to order, and addressed to the "Salt Water Baths Co. (Limited), South Shields," which was registered as the "South Shields Salt Water Baths Co. (Limited)," and had no power to accept bills, was accepted by the defendants, who were the chairman and two of the directors of the company, as follows: "Accepted, payable Messrs. Hodgkin, Barnett, & Co.'s Bank, South Shields, John S. Wardle, Chairman; Thomas S. Blues, Joseph Pollard, Directors; South Shields Salt Water Baths Co."

Held, that the two variations from the proper designation of the company were sufficient to bring the defendants within the provisions of section 42 of the Companies Act, 1862, and to render them personally liable to the plaintiff for the amount of the bill by reason of their having signed a bill, being officers of the company, on its behalf, wherein the name of the company was not mentioned as required by section 41 of that Act.—Atkin v. Wardle, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 23.

8b. Calls—Validity—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 67.—Certain directors of a company were appointed at a meeting which was convened after a notice of only thirteen days had been given of such meeting, whereas by the deed of settlement of the company fourteen days' notice of such meeting ought to have been given. The appointment of such directors was afterwards confirmed by a confirming meeting and at the next annual general meeting. The directors made a call, which the defendant resisted on the ground that it was an invalid act, as the directors had been illegally appointed. The defect in the appointment was not discovered till after the making of the call.

Held, that the call was properly made, as the defect in the appointment of the directors had been cured, and their acts validated by section 67 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89; and that there was nothing in that section to limit its operation to the validation of acts and contracts affecting persons outside, and not members of the company.—Briton Medical General and Life Assurance Association v. Jones (No. 2), Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 384.

9. Meeting—Misfeasance—Negligence—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 165.—The summary process under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, is not limited to acts partaking of a criminal character, but applies to every case in which misfeasance by the directors can be established. Misfeasance includes such nonfeasance as is negligence amounting to a breach of trust.

Directors of a company (acting within their authority) resolved that all the powers of the directors (other than to make calls) be delegated to three of the directors as a committee. The resolution did not appoint a quorum.

Held, (1) that, though unanimity of the committee might not be necessary to make their acts valid, they must all be present at a meeting; (2) that they had no power to appoint other members of the committee, either in addition to or to fill a vacancy on the committee.—In re Liverpool Household Store Association, CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. T. 873.

10. Promoter—Gift of shares.—During the negotiations between the promoters of a company and the company, one of the promoters gave to one of the directors certain shares in the company.

Held, that the company had the option of claiming from such director the shares, or their highest value while held by him.—Eden v. Ridsdale's Railway Lamp and Lighting Co., C.A. 55—23 Q. B. D. 368; 58 L. J. Q. B. 579; 61 L. T. 444.

11. Remuneration — Trustee — Prospectus — Misfeasance—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 165.—The articles of association of a company provided that the remuneration of the directors should be by way of annual salary. The directors issued a prospectus which contained a statement that "the vendor pays all expenses up to allotment." An insufficient number of applications for shares having been received, no allotment was made on the faith of that prospectus. The directors continued to carry on the business of the company to the best of their ability, and issued a second prospectus which did not contain the statement in question. Before allotment, and before the expiration of a year from the incorporation of the company, the directors voted themselves certain sums in respect of their quarter's salary, which were applied in payment of the amounts uncalled up on the shares which they had agreed to take. Six months later the company was ordered to be wound up.

Held, (1) that, as no shares were allotted on the faith of the first prospectus, the directors were not bound by the statement contained in it; (2) that the directors were not trustees for the creditors of the company; (3) that the directors, having acted bonâ fide in the interests of the company, were entitled to vote themselves remuneration before the expiration of the year.

LIQUIDATOR—

12. Discovery—Examination of witnesses—Discretion of court—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 115, 117.—A liquidator is not entitled as of right to an order for examination of a person under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862; it is in the discretion of the court to grant or refuse such an order. There is no hard and fast rule as to when it would be proper and when improper to make such an order; but the pendency of an action by the liquidating company, and the fact of discovery in such action having been ordered or refused, are material considerations.

A company, after the passing of a resolution for voluntary winding up under the supervision of the court, instituted an action against another company, and made an application in that action that the defendant company should give immediate discovery, which application had been refused by the judge, on the ground of its being premature. The liquidator of the plaintiff company then obtained an order in the winding up under section 115 for examination of the secretary of the defendant company, and in the course of examination put a question to the secretary for the purpose of obtaining the discovery sought in the action, but the secretary refused to answer. The liquidator then applied for and obtained from the judge in the winding up an order that the secretary should attend at his own expense and answer the question.

Held, that the order should be discharged, on the ground that the question had been put in aid of the discovery for the purposes of the action which had been refused by the judge in the action, and that the information sought to be elicited by the question was not wanted for the purposes of the winding up.

Semble, a person who is summoned to attend for examination by an order under section 115 has a locus standi to appeal from such order.

MEETING—

14. Notice—Extraordinary meeting—Special resolution—Injunction—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 51.—The construction of a notice convening an extraordinary general meeting of shareholders is not a technical matter. It is of the greatest importance that such notices should be perfectly clear, and bear the sense in which the business men to whom they are addressed would reasonably understand them.

The articles of association of a company provided that seven days' notice in writing, specifying the place, day, and hour of meeting, and, in the case of special business, the general nature of such business, should be given to the members before any general meeting. On the 3rd of July, 1889, notice was sent to the shareholders that an extraordinary general meeting would be held on the 12th of July at a given hour and day, for the purpose of passing special resolutions for the voluntary liquidation and reconstruction of the company, and adding that, "should such resolutions be duly passed, the same will be submitted for confirmation as special resolutions to a subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company which will be held on the 29th of July, 1888, at the same time and place." The first meeting having been held and the resolutions duly passed, a financial newspaper, containing a full report of the meeting, the report being specially marked to call attention to it, was, on the 15th of July, sent by post to every shareholder.

Held (affirming the judgment of Chitty, J.), that the notice ought to be construed in the sense in which business men in the position of the shareholders to whom it was addressed would, as reasonable men, understand it at the time they received it; that such men would understand from the notice in question that the second meeting would only be held in the event of the proposed resolutions being passed at the first meeting, and the notice was therefore a notice conditional upon an uncertain future event, and that such a notice was not sufficient; that the subsequent sending of the newspapers did not cure the defect or make a good notice; and that the resolutions were invalid, and an injunction ought to be granted.—Alexander v. Simpson, C.A. 161—43 Ch. D. 139; 59 L. J. Ch. 133; 61 L. T. 708.

15. Notice — Validity — Amendment — Decision of chairman—Waiver.—By the provisions of the deed of settlement of a bank, notice of an extraordinary general meeting had to be advertised at least twenty-one days before the holding of such meeting, and the objects for holding the meeting had to be specified. Notice of an extraordinary general meeting for the 4th of April, 1889, was advertised by the directors of the bank on the 7th of March, 1889, stating that a special resolution would be proposed for altering the deed of settlement of the bank in the following particulars: "To alter the scale of voting by giving to every qualified proprietor one vote for every share held by him or her." On the 1st of April, 1889, the directors issued a circular to the proprietors stating that the full resolution to be proposed would be, "That every proprietor shall have one vote for every share, provided that no proprietor shall be entitled to vote at any general meeting in respect of any share unless registered as holder of such share for at least six calendar months prior to such general meeting."

The plaintiff, a proprietor, attended the meeting and made a speech objecting to the disqualification of a shareholder by the resolution unless some words could be added with reference to the qualification of a director, and intimated that he proposed to move an amendment, but the chairman ruled that the resolution as it stood must be either accepted or rejected, and the plaintiff then said he would move the rejection of the resolution. The plaintiff did not put before the chairman, either orally or in writing, the terms of his proposed amendment. The resolution was put and carried, and was confirmed at a subsequent meeting.

The plaintiff brought an action against the bank for a declaration that the resolution was invalid, on the grounds that it was not covered by the notice convening the meeting, and also that his amendment was not put to the meeting.

Held, that the notice was valid, and that, as the plaintiff had not challenged the ruling of the chairman, he must be taken to have waived any irregularity in the chairman's ruling.—Henderson v. Bank of Australasia, CH.D. CHI., J.—62 L. T. 869.

15a. Notice—Validity—Directors.—The articles of association of a company provided that the number of the directors should not be less than three; that the continuing directors might act, notwithstanding any vacancies in their body, as long as there remained three directors qualified to act; that the office of a director should be vacated if he should absent himself from the meetings of the directors during the three calendar months without special leave of absence from the directors. Of the four directors of the company, two—D. and R.—were both absent at the same time. D. was resident in Nova Scotia, and was appointed a director to secure his influence there, and was charged with duties for the performance of which residence there was essential. R. was travelling abroad, and it was not known where he was.

Held, that, during such absence of D. and R., it was not essential for the validity of every board meeting that notice of the meeting should be sent to them, and the other two directors were entitled to act as a board to bind the company.—Halifax Sugar Refining Co. v. Francklyn, CH.D. STI., J.—59 L. J. Ch. 591; 62 L. T. 563.

15b. Notice—Validity—Directors.—The articles of association of a company, which was incorporated on the 20th Oct., 1888, provided that there should be not more than ten nor less than three directors; that the first directors should be appointed by the subscribers of the memorandum of association; that the directors should hold meetings for the despatch of business at such times and places, and might adjourn and otherwise regulate such meetings as they thought fit, and might determine the quorum necessary for the transaction of business; and that a resolution in writing signed by all the directors should be as valid as if passed at a meeting duly called and constituted. They also provided that the shares should be allotted by the directors to such persons at such times and on such terms as they should think fit. On the 22nd Oct., 1888, the subscribers of the memorandum of association duly appointed five directors. On the 24th Oct. a meeting was held at which only two directors were present. The two directors passed a resolution that two directors should be a quorum, and allotted to S. one hundred £5 shares, for which he had applied, and then adjourned the meeting to the 26th Oct. On the 25th Oct. S. withdrew his application. On the same day a third director signed a resolution appointing two directors a quorum; and on the 26th Oct. I., a fourth director, handed in his written assent to the same resolution. At the adjourned meeting on the 26th Oct. the previous allotments were confirmed.

Held, that there was no evidence that I., who was not present at the meetings of the 24th or the 26th Oct., but who signed the document on the 26th Oct., had received proper notice of the meeting of the 24th Oct.; that he had not waived his right to the notice which he ought to have received; that the meetings of 24th Oct. and 26th Oct. were both irregular; and that S. was entitled to have his name removed from the register.—In re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, Steele's case, C.A.—42 Ch. D. 160; 62 L. T. 88.

PROSPECTUS—

16. Contract — Illegality — Concession — Foreign lottery—9 Geo. 1, c. 19, s. 4—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 66, s. 1.—A company, incorporated in England for the purpose of carrying on financial and other operations in Persia, issued a prospectus stating that it was intended to acquire under a certain contract a concession from the Shah, which granted the exclusive privilege of floating lotteries and similar loans in Persia; that the headquarters of the scheme would be in Persia, but that agents would be employed in the chief cities of Eastern Europe for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions; and that "five issues have to be made annually in Persia, with minimum drawings of £10,000, and it is estimated that these operations should return continuously-increasing dividends."

A shareholder moved to restrain the company from acquiring the concession, or advertising the lottery loans or similar enterprises.

Held, that the purchase of the concession was legal, and that the issue of the prospectus containing the statement of the five annual issues was not a notice of a foreign lottery within 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 66.—Macnee v. Persian Investment Corporation, CH.D. CHI., J. 596—44 Ch. D. 306; 62 L. T. 894.

16a. Contract — Misrepresentation — Rescission. — W. applied for shares on the faith of a statement in the prospectus that certain persons were members of the council of administration of the company (which statement was untrue), and certain material facts were further suppressed from the statement in the prospectus.

Held, that the statement was so materially untrue as to be calculated to deceive, and that W.'s contract must be rescinded and the deposit money repaid.—Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association, Wainwright's case, CH.D. KAY, J.—62 L. T. 30.

SHARES—

17. Allotment—Contract—Ratification.—A. and B. applied for and were allotted shares in a company on the 24th of October, 1888. The allotment was made at a meeting of directors of which no notice had been given to one of the directors, so that the directors who made the allotment were not able to bind the company. On the 25th of October A. returned the letter of allotment, and asked to be excused taking the shares, but he never, in fact, repudiated the contract. On the 24th of December the company brought an action against A. to enforce payment of the moneys payable by him on allotment of the shares. On the 31st of October B. paid the allotment moneys on the shares allotted to him, alleging, however, that he paid "under protest," but there was no evidence that this protest was communicated to the company.

At a meeting of directors held subsequently to the above dates, and before either A. or B. had, in fact, repudiated, the allotment of shares made at the meeting of the 24th of October, 1888, was confirmed and ratified by the company.

Held, following Bolton v. Lambert, 37 W. R. 434, that this subsequent ratification related back to and confirmed the invalid allotment of the 24th of October, 1888, and that A. and B. were bound thereby.—In re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, Badman's and Bosanquet's cases, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. T. 179.

17a. Certificate—Executor—Pledge—Brokers—Mercantile law—Estoppel — Domicil. — The registered owner of shares in a New York company held certificates which stated that the shares were held by him and were transferable in person or by attorney only on the surrender and cancellation of the certificate by an indorsement thereon.

The indorsement was in the form of a transfer for value received, blank in the names of transferor and transferee with a power of attorney in blank to carry out the transfer. On the death of the owner, his executors, who had proved his will and, in order that the shares might be registered in their names, signed as executors the transfers on the back of each certificate, without filling up the blanks, and sent the certificates to their broker, who fraudulently deposited the certificates with a bank, who took them, bonâ fide and without notice, as security for advances.

The bank retained the certificates and took no steps to obtain registration. By the mercantile usage of both the New York and the London Stock Exchange, transfers so signed by executors are not treated as being in order unless duly authenticated.

The executors brought an action against the bank to establish their title to the certificates.

Held, that as all the dealings with the certificates were transacted in England by persons domiciled there, the rights of the parties must be determined by English law; that the conduct of the executors was consistent either with an intention to sell or pledge the shares, or to have themselves registered as owners, and did not estop them from setting up their title as against the bank.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (38 Ch. D. 388) affirmed.—Colonial Bank v. Cady and Williams, London Chartered Bank of Australia v. Cady and Williams, H.L.—15 App. Cas. 267.

18. Transfer—Want of title in transferor—Certification—Ultrà vires—Representation as to credit or ability—Lord Tenterden's Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 14), s. 6.—The plaintiffs were the transferees of certain shares in the defendant company. Before the transfer form had been executed by the plaintiffs, or the price paid, the stockbrokers procured the defendants to place upon it (partly by means of a stamp, partly in writing) the following words:—"Certificate lodged. The Balkis Consolidated Co. (Limited). J. V. Thomas, for secretary." The defendants subsequently discovered that the transferor had had no title to the shares specified in the transfer, and thereupon, notwithstanding their "certification," refused to recognise the plaintiffs' title to the shares. The plaintiffs then brought an action to recover the price of the shares paid by the brokers upon the faith of the "certification."

Held, that, although the "certification" was a representation by the defendants that a genuine certificate covering the shares denoted by the numbers in the transfer had been lodged with them, and that the transferor had a good title to the same, and, further, that such representation was made with the intent that a subsequent purchaser should act upon it, yet the action was not maintainable, upon the grounds (1) that the "certification" was ultrà vires, and (2) that it was a representation as to the credit and ability of the transferor within the 6th section of Lord Tenterden's Act, and, not being under the seal of the defendants, could not bind them.—Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Co., Q.B.D. 750—25 Q. B. D. 77.

WINDING UP—

19. Execution—Sheriff in possession—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 85, 87, 163.—The sheriff, before the presentation of a winding-up petition, entered the premises and took possession of the chattels of a company, and after the commencement of the winding up received moneys paid by the public for admission to the premises.

Held, that the execution was, as to these moneys, put in force after the commencement of the winding up, and was void under section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862.—In re Opera Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 637; 62 L. T. 859.

20. Failure of object of company.—A company was incorporated to purchase and work the R. mine. Other objects mentioned in the articles of association were to acquire mines and other properties in New South Wales and elsewhere, and to carry on the business of mining and milling in all its branches. Nearly two years after the incorporation of the company the directors reported to the shareholders that the R. mine was a failure. The shareholders then passed a resolution requesting the directors to endeavour to obtain suitable property in which to invest the remaining assets.

Held, that, the main object of the company's incorporation having failed, the company must be wound up.—In re Red Rock Gold Mining Co., CH.D. KAY, J. —61 L. T. 785.

21. Jurisdiction—English company carrying on business in Australia—Subsequent compulsory winding-up order in Australia—Practice.—Where a company, having its registered office in England, but having a branch office and the bulk of its business in Australia, resolved to wind up voluntarily, and shortly afterwards an order was made in Australia for the compulsory winding up of the company, it was held that the compulsory order in Australia did not supersede, or interfere with, the voluntary winding up in this country, any order made by the Australian courts for winding up in Australia being merely ancillary to any winding up taking place in this country.—North Australian Territory Co. v. Goldsbrough & Co., CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 716.

21a. Jurisdiction—Resolution for voluntary winding-up after presentation of petition—Amendment of petition—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 79, 147.—Where a company has passed resolutions to wind up voluntarily after the presentation of a petition for a compulsory winding up, but before the same comes on for hearing, the court has jurisdiction to make a supervision order dispensing with the amendment of the petition by stating the resolutions to wind up voluntarily, and also with re-advertisements. The court will exercise this jurisdiction where the resolutions to wind up voluntarily appear in the affidavits filed in support of the petition.—In re Marine and General Land, Building, and Investment Co.—CH.D. CHI., J.—62 L. T. 723.

21b. Jurisdiction—Sale of undertaking.—The court has jurisdiction to wind up a company whose undertaking is constituted for the public benefit, and will make a winding-up order in such a case on the petition of a shareholder who makes out a case for such an order, although it may possibly be necessary to obtain an Act of Parliament to authorize a sale of the company's undertaking.

28. Proof — Managing director — Salary — Companies Act, 1862, s. 38.—A company was formed for the purpose of buying and carrying on a business formerly carried on by the vendor, and it was agreed that the vendor should, for a period of ten years, act as the managing director of the company. The articles of association provided that the vendor should receive a fixed annual salary as the managing director, and that every director should be the holder of a certain number of shares. The company having gone into liquidation before the ten years expired, the vendor claimed in the winding up as a creditor for a sum due to him for arrears of salary as managing director, and for a sum assessed as damages for breach of the contract to employ him as such for ten years.

Held, that these sums were not due to the claimant "in his character of a member, by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise," within section 38 (7) of the Companies Act, 1862, and therefore he was entitled to prove for them in the winding up, in competition with the other creditors.—In re Dale & Plant, CH.D. 29. Proof — Priority — Voluntary winding up—Damages due before winding up — Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 133, 163.—Section 133 of the Companies Act, 1862, which provides that, on the voluntary winding up of a company, its property shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, has the effect of disentitling a person who has established a right to damages against the company, but has not enforced it by execution, before the date of the winding up, from obtaining priority over the creditors of the company, although, under section 163 proceedings to recover such damages against the estate and effects of the company would not be void, that section applying only to the case of a company being wound up by the court, or subject to supervision.—In re Thurso New Gas Co., CH.D. KAY, J. 156—42 Ch. D. 486; 61 L. T. 351.

30. Proof—Rent-charge—Mortgage—Covenant remaining with land.—G. conveyed land to the use that an annual rent-charge should be paid thereout to himself, his heirs and assigns, with powers of distress and entry in case of default, and subject thereto to the use of L. in fee, and L. covenanted for himself, his heirs and assigns, for payment of the rent-charge. A building society having become mortgagees in fee in possession of the land, leased it to W., who sub-let it to a tenant. The society was now being wound up as an unregistered company under section 203 of the Companies Act, 1862, and the assets having, by an order of the court, been vested in the liquidators, they continued for some time to receive the rent from the tenant and pay the rent-charge. Finding that they were paying more than they were receiving for the land, they got the permission of the court to dispose of it, and gave notice both to the tenant and to G. that they renounced their possession of, and interest in, the property. They afterwards conveyed it to a person for a nominal consideration. G. having died, the executors and trustees of his will brought in a claim to prove in the winding up for arrears of the rent-charge accrued due between the dates of the notice to renounce and the conveyance for a nominal consideration.

Held, that at the commencement of the winding up there was no liability for future payments of the rent-charge capable of being valued and proved as a debt in the winding up within section 158 of the Companies Act, 1862; that the society were only liable to pay the rent-charge as long as they were holders of the land; that the notice to renounce was sufficient to put, and did put, an end to their holding of it; and that the covenant to pay the rent-charge did not run with the land.

The company never made any profits during the six years of its existence; it was now doing no business, and all the paid-up capital had been lost, except enough to show a balance of £337 of assets over liabilities. It still had offices. 2,400 shares out of 100,000 had been issued. There were no debts, except directors' fees, which would not be claimed except in a winding up. A contributory, supported by a minority of shareholders, presented a winding-up petition.

Held, that the court had power, where the substratum of a company had gone, to order a winding up, even against the wishes of the majority of the shareholders, where there were no debts, and on a shareholder's petition; that the shareholders had a right to refuse to have the business continued at the cost of the reserve fund, which they had contracted to subscribe to only in the event of a winding up; that the subject-matter of the company had failed; and that a winding-up order must be made.—In re Bristol Joint-Stock Bank, CH.D. The notice of dissent, wherein U. was styled the liquidator, was never returned to the dissentient member, and no objection was made to it until one month after the date of the meeting at which the special resolution was confirmed. The liquidator moved to restrain the dissentient member from proceeding to arbitration.

Held, that the notice of dissent was a continuing notice and valid, and that the liquidator's motion must be dismissed.—In re London and Westminster Bread Co., CH.D. CHI., J. 277—59 L. J. Ch. 155; 62 L. T. 224.

A company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, was voluntarily wound up, and, after paying all expenses and returning the capital advanced by each shareholder, there was a large surplus. The shares consisted of preference shares fully paid up and ordinary shares partly paid up. There were no provisions in the articles regulating the distribution of assets in case of a winding up.

Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, 36 W. R. 769, 39 Ch. D. 1), that the surplus must be divided amongst the holders of all the shares in proportion to the shares held by them respectively.—Birch v. Cropper, H.L. 401—14 App. 525; 59 L. J. Ch. 22; 61 L. T. 621.

36. Transfer of assets—New company—Shares in new company — Dissentient shareholder — Delay —

Companies Act, 1862, s. 161.—A company passed a special resolution to wind up the company and to transfer the assets to a new company, every shareholder to be at liberty to exchange his shares for shares in the new company on giving notice within a month to the liquidator. By a later resolution a further period of a month was allowed for exercise of the option. The plaintiff, a shareholder in the company, did not then exercise the option. Afterwards, by an agreement between the new company and the liquidator of the old company for the transfer of the undertaking, it was agreed that each member of the old company should be entitled to demand shares in the new company paid up for 17s. 6d. each. The plaintiff wrote to the liquidator expressing dissent from this arrangement. The shares in the new company rose in value.

Held (Fry, L.J., diss) that the plaintiff could not claim an allotment of shares in the new company.—Weston v. New Guston Co. C.A.—62 L. T. 275.

39. Transfer of assets—New company—Specific performance—Injunction—Companies, Act, 1862, s. 23.—In 1883 the N. company was incorporated, and purchased gold mines from a syndicate, of which M. was a member, the consideration being principally fully paid-up shares in the purchasing company. The plaintiff and others became entitled to M.'s interest as a member of the syndicate, but the shares were never allotted to him, and in 1885 the N. company was wound up voluntarily. The assets were transferred to the new N. company, formed for the purpose of purchasing and working the mines of the old N. company. By the agreement each member of the old company was entitled to require an allotment of as many shares in the new company as he held in the old one, subject to the immediate payment of 2s. per share, and the payment of 1s. per share at some future time. The new company had notice of the position of M. and those claiming under him. The 2s. per share was never paid to the new company on shares claimed by them. In 1886 the new company was wound up, and the mines sold to the V. company, the consideration consisting partly of cash and partly of paid-up shares in the V. company, which were afterwards at a premium. Before the sale was completed an action was brought to decide whether the plaintiff and others were entitled to participate in the consideration given by the V. company to the new N. company in respect of M.'s interest.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled neither to specific performance nor to an injunction.

CONTRACT:—

1. Acceptance—Withdrawal—Additional terms—Sale of land—Statute of Frauds—Specific performance.—The defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff offering to sell him a lease and goodwill at a certain price, the offer to remain open for ten days; and the plaintiff, in reply, accepted the offer. The solicitors of the parties prepared a memorandum of agreement, containing additional formal terms, and the plaintiff wished also to insert a clause restraining the defendant from carrying on business within five miles. After further negotiations about this clause, the defendant, before the expiration of the ten days, declined to proceed further in the sale. The plaintiff claimed specific performance of the contract contained in the two letters, without regard to the subsequent communication.

Held, that the clause in question was a substantial, not a formal, addition; that the question whether the two letters were evidence of a complete contract was independent of the Statute of Frauds; that the whole correspondence must be considered, and that showed that the plaintiff himself thought that the contract was not concluded; that the circumstances that the withdrawal of the offer was within the ten days, and that the negotiations were partly by the principals and partly by the solicitors, made no difference; and that specific performance must be refused.

2. Corporation—Seal—Extra work—Metropolitan Burials Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 85), ss. 24, 31.—A builder had entered into a contract with a burial board under the seal of the board for the execution of certain repairs to the buildings at the board's cemetery; the repairs to be done and the terms upon which they were to be done were specified in the contract. Further repairs were necessary, and were executed by the builder at the instance of the board's surveyor, and approved by him when done.

Held (Mathew, J., dissenting), that the builder was not entitled to recover in respect of the further repairs, there being no contract under seal as to them.—Stevens v. Hounslow Burial Board, Q.B.D. 236—61 L. T. 839.

3. Illegality—Highway—Prosecution for obstructing—Agreement for withdrawal—Stifling a prosecution—Specific performance.—There can be no valid agreement for the withdrawal of a prosecution where the offence is a matter of public concern, because, even though there may be no injury to the public, the determination of what ought to be done in such a matter ought not to be withdrawn from the ordinary administration of the law and taken into the hands of private individuals. Such an agreement amounts to stifling the prosecution—i.e., putting a stop to it otherwise than in the ordinary course of law, and is none the less a diversion of the course of justice, though the terms of the contract be in fact such as to carry out the object of the prosecution.

At the trial of an indictment brought by a local board against certain persons for obstructing a highway, an agreement was come to that the defendants should restore the highway within seven years; that in the meantime the indictment should lie in the office; and that when the defendants had carried out their undertaking to restore the highway the board should consent to a verdict of "Not guilty." The terms were approved by the court. The defendants not having restored the highway within the agreed term, the board brought an action for specific performance of the agreement.

Held (affirming the decision of Stirling, J.), that the prosecution in the present case was in respect of a matter of public concern; that the effect of the agreement was to put an end to that prosecution in a manner not depending on the ordinary course of the administration of justice; and, consequently, though the agreement was not entered into in consideration of any personal benefit to the prosecutors, it was illegal, and could not be enforced.

5. Lunatic—Necessaries—Implied contract.—Where sums of money have been expended for necessaries supplied to a lunatic not so found by inquisition, by a person who intends to be repaid for so doing, an obligation will be implied on the part of the lunatic to repay out of his estate the sums so expended.

Whether the sums so expended were for necessaries or not must be determined according to the circumstances in each particular case.

A lunatic, not so found by inquisition, lived for many years in an asylum partly at her own cost and partly at the cost of other persons. After her death her estate was administered in court, and these persons applied for repayment to them out of her estate of the amount paid by them in maintaining her beyond her own income.

Held, that an obligation could be implied to indemnify them for money spent in supplying her with necessaries; but, on the evidence, that repayment had not been expected, and could not be allowed.

There was no express agreement to repay the £50. After more than six years had expired, A.'s administrator sued B. for the £50 as money lent.

Held, that the action could not be maintained.—Cassidy v. Cassidy, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 577.

7. Necessaries—Implied contract—Poor law.—A person suffering from delirium tremens became violent in his own house, used threats, and broke the windows and furniture; a relieving officer of the union was sent for, who ordered his removal to the workhouse, where he was kept for some days. He was then examined by a doctor and brought before the magistrates as a lunatic, but, as the magistrates held that he was not a lunatic, he was discharged. Certain expenses were incurred by the guardians in respect of these services.

Held, that, apart from the Lunacy Acts, there was a common law liability upon such person to repay to the guardians the expenses so incurred, and that the guardians, therefore, could recover such money as necessaries expended by them.—West Ham Guardians v. Pearson, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 638.

The rent-charges were paid till February, 1887, but not afterwards.

Held, that the purchaser of the rent-charges was entitled to personal judgment for the rent-charges and arrears, and to an inquiry to ascertain the parcels.

Judgment of Kay, J., 37 W. R. 730, affirmed.—Searle v. Cooke, C.A.—43 Ch. D. 519; 59 L. J. Ch. 259; 62 L. T. 209.

2. Enfranchisement — Tenancy in tail — Barring the entail.—A tenant in tail of land forming part of a copyhold manor in which there was a custom to entail died, having by his will devised his real estate to trustees upon certain trusts, under which his only daughter (who was his heiress in tail) was beneficially entitled to such real estate. The trustees were admitted tenants of the copyhold land upon the trusts of the will, and in 1876 the lord of the manor executed an enfranchisement to the trustees upon the trusts of the will, and the trustees shortly afterwards executed a conveyance to the testator's daughter in fee. The enfranchisement was not made under the Copyhold Acts.

Held, that the effect of the enfranchisement and conveyance was to bar the estate tail in the copyholds.—Ex parte School Board for London, CH.D. NOR., J. 61—58 L. J. Ch. 752.

3. Inclosure Act—Reservation to lord of manor— Shooting rights.—Where, under an Inclosure Act, lands in a manor have been inclosed and allotted as freehold, and, by a reservation clause, certain rights over the lands so allotted are reserved to the lord, the reservation clause, being in derogation of the right of freehold given by the Act, will be construed most strictly against the lord, and nothing short of a positive reservation to the lord, either expressly or by necessary implication, of rights, such as the right of shooting, will suffice to entail upon the lands allotted as freehold a burden inconsistent with the ownership in fee.

COPYRIGHT:—

Infringement—Works of art—Drawings—Author —Copyright (Works of Art) Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68).—J., a member of a firm of printers, being himself unable to draw, employed an artist in the service of the firm to make, under J.s' directions, a drawing on cards, used at elections, representing a hand holding a pencil in the act of completing a cross within a square; the object being to instruct illiterate voters. The firm registered the drawing under the Copyright (Works of Art) Act, 1862, and in the memorandum stated J. to be the author.

The defendants subsequently published similar cards with a similar drawing, which was not, however, an exact reproduction of the other. Neither drawings were works of artistic merit.

Held, that the printers' firm could not maintain an action for infringement of copyright (1) because the defendants' drawing was not an exact reproduction of the registered copyright drawing, and (2) because J. was not the author.—Kenrick v. Lawrence, Q.B.D. 779—25 Q. B. D. 99.

COSTS:—

1. Administration action—Unnecessary inquiries— Ord. 65, r. 38.—The plaintiff was the sole executor and trustee under the will of D., the testator, who died in 1878, having left his property in trust for his wife during widowhood, with power to carry on his business, and on her death or marriage on trust for sale, the residue to be divided among the testator's children and the then living issue of any deceased children. In 1879 the plaintiff issued a writ, and in 1880 he delivered a statement of claim, alleging difficulties in the administration of the trust. The defendants were the testator's widow and son. The plaintiffs obtained an order for accounts and inquiries, but no certificate was made till 1879. The estate was realized in the action for £370.

Held, that the plaintiff should not be ordered to pay the costs of the action.—Stubbs v. Dale, CH.D. KAY, J.—62 L. T. 28.

2. Appeal—Admiralty action—Collision—Inevitable accident.—It is a general rule in all cases that, in the absence of special circumstances, the successful party obtains the costs of an appeal and the unsuccessful party has to pay them.

In an admiralty action the Court of Appeal, reversing the decision of the court below, held that a collision was the result of inevitable accident.

Held, that the case fell within the general rule, but that, having regard to the particular manner in which the case had been conducted, there were such special circumstances as to entitle the court to order that each party should pay their own costs in the court below.—The Batavier, C.A. 522—15 P. D. 37; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 54; 62 L. T. 406.

3. Appeal—Documents for use of judges—Ord. 58, r. 8.—It is the duty of the appellant on the hearing of an appeal involving the construction of documents to supply the Court of Appeal with three copies of each material document, and it is the practice to allow the costs of such copies on taxation.

Where the appellant in such a case failed to supply three copies of such documents, the appeal was ordered to stand over, the costs of the adjournment to be borne by the appellant.—Cannot v. Oppenheim, C.A. 1.

4. Bankruptcy—Deposit on appeal—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 131.—Where an appellant who has paid the £20 into court as security for the costs of his appeal under the provisions of rule 131 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, afterwards abandons his appeal and pays the costs, such money will be paid out to him on his application, and will not be made subject to a claim for costs incurred by the appellant at an earlier stage of the litigation which remains unpaid at the time of abandoning his appeal.—In re Scott & Mitchell, Ex parte Scott, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 840.

5. Bankruptcy—Witness—Solicitor—Loss of time—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 71—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 50, r. 16.—The decision in Collins v. Godefroy, 1 B. & Ad. 950, that an attorney who has attended on subpœna as a witness in a civil suit cannot maintain an action against the party who subpœnaed him for compensation for loss of time, does not interfere with the statutory right of a witness in a bankruptcy proceeding to payment for expenses and loss of time.—Chamberlain v. Stoneham, Q.B.D. 107—24 Q. B. D. 113; 59 L. J. Q. B. 95; 61 L. T. 560.

6. County court—Discretion of judge—Appeal—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 49—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116.—A writ in an action founded on contract was specially indorsed for a sum of £49 10s. 11d. More than twenty-one days after service of the writ the plaintiff obtained, under order 14, final judgment for £23 15s., leave being given to the defendant to defend as to the remainder. An order was afterwards made directing the case to be tried in a county court, but subsequently the plaintiff abandoned the remainder, except £4, which was by consent ordered to be paid to the plaintiff, with costs to be taxed. A judge at chambers gave the plaintiff his costs on the High Court scale. The defendant appealed.

Held, that, under section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the judge at chambers had a discretion to give costs on the High Court scale, and that, having exercised his discretion as to the costs, no appeal lay from his order.—Bazett v. Morgan, Q.B.D. 108—24 Q. B. D. 48; 59 L. J. Q. B. 54; 61 L. T. 434.

7. Divorce.—A wife, who had been a prostitute before her marriage, left her husband in Australia without his consent, and came to England, where she repeatedly committed adultery with the co-respondent, who did not at first know she was married, though he had had intercourse with her before her marriage. The intercourse continued after the co-respondent had become aware of the marriage.

The court refused to condemn the co-respondent in costs.—Learmouth v. Learmouth and Austin, P.D. & A.D.—59 L. J. P. D. & A. 14; 62 L. T. 608.

8. Divorce—Appeal—Queen's Proctor—Wife's costs—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 51—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 2—Judicature Act, 1877 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 49.—Although, in proceedings for divorce, a wife as a general rule is allowed her costs, the allowance is, under the Divorce Act, 1857, s. 51, in the discretion of the court, and there is no appeal from the refusal of the court to order the wife's costs to be paid.

Costs occasioned to a wife by the Queen's Proctor's intervention are also within the discretion of the court, and no appeal will lie from an order refusing them.—Butler v. Butler, C.A.—15 P. D. 126; 62 L. T. 344.

9. Divorce—Damages—Apportionment.—The costs of settling a scheme for apportionment of damages are recoverable from the co-respondent.—Irwin v. Irwin and Layard, P.D. & A.D.—59 L. J. P. D. & A. 53; 62 L. T. 612.

10. Patent—Infringement.—The defendant in an action for infringement of a patent denied the infringement. Judgment was given for the plaintiff on the issue as to infringement, but for the defendant on the ground of want of novelty.

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to the costs of the issue as to the infringement.—Phillips v. Ivel Cycle Co., CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. T. 392.

11. Patent—Infringement—Particulars of objection—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 29 (6)—Ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 20, 21.—In an action for infringement of a patent, the defendant denied the infringement and also delivered particulars of objections to the validity of the patent. The action was dismissed with costs, on the ground that there had been no infringement, the question of validity not being gone into. The defendant did not apply to the judge to certify, under section 29 (6) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, that his particulars of objections were reasonable and proper, and his costs of those particulars were, on that ground, disallowed en bloc by the taxing master, without being gone into in detail as on taxation. The plaintiff then brought in a bill of costs alleged to have been occasioned by the defendant's particulars of objections, and claimed to have such costs set off, under ord. 65, r. 27, against the costs payable by him to the defendant, but the taxing master considered he had no power to go into the question of the propriety of the objections, or, consequently, to allow the plaintiff the costs he claimed.

Held (affirming the decision of Kay, J.), that disallowance of costs, or some specified costs, of a party, on the particular grounds specified by sub-rule 20, as that the proceedings in respect of which those costs had been incurred were improper, vexatious, or unnecessary, is, in the absence of an express direction under the same rule by the judge to the taxing officer, a condition precedent to the right of the other parties to have any costs occasioned to them by such proceedings paid by the offending party or set off against costs payable to him; and that, the costs of the defendant's particulars having been disallowed merely because they were not certified for by the judge, the condition precedent was not fulfilled, and the taxing master, having no jurisdiction to go into those costs as on taxation, nor to consider the question whether the proceedings in respect of which they were incurred were improper, unnecessary, or vexa-tious within sub-rule 20, had no power to allow the plaintiff's claim to set off or to payment of any costs occasioned him by such proceedings.

Parties who desire, under such circumstances, to raise the question whether, in consequence of any proceedings improperly taken by other parties, such first-mentioned parties have been put to costs, ought to ask the judge to direct the taxing master to look into that question, and, if he finds in the affirmative, tax those costs and order them to be paid by the parties by whose proceedings they have been occasioned.—Garrard v. Edge, C.A. 455—44 Ch. D. 224; 59 L. J. Ch. 379; 62 L. T. 510.

12. Priority—Administration action.—The conduct of an administration action was given to the B. company, as a creditor. A summons by the company for an order on a firm of solicitors to refund money received out of the estate for costs was dismissed, the company being ordered to pay the costs of the solicitors. The company was wound up, and proved to be insolvent. All the costs of the action had been paid except those of the summons against the solicitors. The fund in court was not sufficient to pay the costs of either the company or the solicitors.

Held, that the fund in court must be paid to the solicitors.—Blundell v. Blundell, C.A. 707—44 Ch. D. 1; 59 L. J. Ch. 269; 62 L. T. 620.

13. Priority—Harbour commissioners—Mortgage—Receiver—Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 16), s. 60.—The plaintiffs were solicitors, who had recovered judgment against commissioners for the amount of their bill of costs incurred in litigation on their behalf, and in an action brought to enforce the judgment obtained the appointment of a receiver and an order for inquiries as to the commissioners' property and debts and the priorities of incumbrancers. The chief clerk made his certificate, and the plaintiffs, on further consideration, asked for their costs of the action out of funds in court in priority to those of other parties. The funds were derived from rates and tolls, and formed part of the property mortgaged to the various incumbrancers.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled, in priority to other parties except the commissioners, to their costs of the action so far as they had been incurred for the benefit of the other parties except the commissioners.

The commissioners were constituted by special Acts of Parliament, one of which incorporated the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847.

Held, that, under section 60, the commissioners were entitled to their costs of the action as between solicitor and client out of the funds in court in priority to the claims of all the other parties.—Batten v. Dartmouth Harbour Commissioners, CH.D. KEK., J. 603—62 L. T. 861.

13a. Priority—Mortgage—Administration action—Trustees' costs.—Where a puisne incumbrancer brought an action against other incumbrancers and the trustees of a will for administration of the estate,

Held, that, so far as the administration proceedings were proper, and for the benefit of the prior mortgagees, the plaintiff was entitled to his costs of such proceedings out of the estate in priority to the prior mortgagees, but must add the rest of the costs to his security.

Held, also, that the trustees' costs of the action, so far as such costs were costs of administration of which the prior mortgagees had had the benefit, must come out of the fund as between solicitor and client.—Lee v. Barne, CH.D. KAY, J.—62 L. T. 922.

14. Security—Appeal—Married woman—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Ord. 58, r. 15.—The fact that an appellant is a married woman having only separate estate subject to a restraint on anticipation, is a special circumstance which will induce the Court of Appeal to require such appellant to give security for the costs of the appeal.—Whitaker v. Kershaw, C.A. 497—44 Ch. D. 296; 62 L. T. 776.

15. Security—Assets of plaintiff in defendant's hands—Delay.—An order for security for costs will not be made if the defendant holds money of the plaintiff, nor if there has been delay in making the application, and the plaintiff has since incurred expense.—Duffy v. Joyce, M.R. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 42.

16. Security—Bankruptcy of plaintiff—Rent—Estoppel.—The plaintiff having brought an action for the rent of certain premises demised by him to the defendant, the defendant discovered that at the time of the lease the plaintiff was a bankrupt, and that his discharge had been made conditional upon his paying his creditors 5s. in the pound. This sum had not been paid. The defendant thereupon applied that the trustee in bankruptcy should be made plaintiff, or that the defendant should be ordered to give security for the costs of the action.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the defendant was estopped from denying the plaintiff's title and setting up the title of the trustee; that the mere fact of bankruptcy was not of itself sufficient ground for ordering security for costs; and that the plaintiff was not a mere nominal plaintiff suing on behalf of his trustee in bankruptcy, as he would gain a benefit if he succeeded in the action, and that he could not be required upon that ground to give security for costs.

17. Security—Company in liquidation.—The fact of a plaintiff company being in liquidation is a reason for believing, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that it will be unable to pay costs if the action is unsuccessful. Therefore, in such case the defendant is entitled to security for costs under section 69 of the Companies Act, 1862.—Pure Spirit Co. v. Fowler, Q.B.D. 686—25 Q. B. D. 235.

18. Stay of proceedings—Unpaid costs of former action.—Where a plaintiff, having failed in one action, commences a second action for substantially the same matter, the second action will be stayed until the costs of the first action have been paid.

19. Taxation—Death of client.—Costs incurred after the death of a client will be disallowed on taxation, even if the solicitor could not possibly have been aware of his client's death when the costs were incurred.—Pool v. Pool, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. J. P. D. & A. 67; 61 L. T. 401.

20. Taxation—Lien of solicitor—Statute of Limitations.—M. acted for many years as solicitor for C. In June, 1888, C., becoming dissatisfied with M., signed an authority to other solicitors to obtain and receive from M. all deeds and documents in M.'s possession belonging to C. or relating to his property. The new solicitors wrote to M. requesting him, if he had any claim to a lien upon C.'s deeds, &c., to send them full particulars, and inclosing a copy of their authority. In further correspondence they asked for an early appointment for delivery up of C.'s deeds and documents, and intimated that C. only required M. to deliver particulars of any unsettled bill of costs M. might have against him. In July, 1888, C. took out an originating summons as plaintiff against M. as defendant for taxation and delivery up of deeds, &c., instead of proceeding by the usual petition of course (the summons containing no undertaking by C., such as would have been contained in a petition of course, to pay what should be found due on the taxation), and obtained an order for delivery by M. to C., within fifteen days of service of the order, of a bill of M.'s fees and disbursements in all matters in which M. had been employed as solicitor for C., with a reference to the taxing master to tax and settle "the said bill," and to certify the amount due on either side, and for payment of the amount certified. It was further ordered that C. should be at liberty to pay £350 into court, and that M. should thereupon deliver up to C. on oath all C.'s documents which were in M.'s possession or power, and that M.'s lien on such documents should attach to the £350 when paid into court, and that the delivery of the documents should be without prejudice to M.'s lien. The taxing master, in taxing the bill, struck out the items incurred more than six years previous to the proceedings, on the ground that they were statute-barred, without reference to their propriety in other respects.

Held, that, the real object of the proceeding being clearly to obtain delivery up of C.'s documents, and for that purpose to ascertain the amount of M.'s lien on them, it must have been intended by the order to treat all the items as "due," whether they were recoverable by action or not, and that the taxing master ought to have taxed them all, whether barred or otherwise.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Quære, whether there was in the correspondence any acknowledgment sufficient to take the items, which would otherwise have been barred, out of the Statute of Limitations.—Curwen v. Milburn, C.A. 49—42 Ch. D. 424; 62 L. T. 278.

21. Taxation—London agent—Payment into court—Jurisdiction—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73) s. 37.—Section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, does not empower the court to direct taxation of a part of a bill of costs; but the court has an inherent jurisdiction so to direct.

Taxation of a part of a London agency bill may be directed on the terms of payment into court of the amount claimed by the agent.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (36 W. R. 374, 37 Ch. D. 433) affirmed, with a variation.—Storer v. Johnson, H.L. 756—15 App. Cas. 263; 62 L. T. 710.

22. Taxation—Party and party costs—Advice of counsel.—The costs of procuring the advice of counsel to institute a motion to attach a person for contempt of court are not taxable against such person as party and party costs.—Lynch v. Macan (2), EX.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 388.

23. Taxation—Review—"Objection in writing"—Ord. 65, r. 27 (39) (41).—An application by a party to a judge under ord. 65, r. 27 (41), for an order for a review of taxation of a bill of costs as to any item or part of an item contained therein cannot be entertained unless the party applying has first carried in an objection in writing with respect to each such item or part of an item.

Decision of Stirling, J., affirmed.—Strousberg v. Sanders, C.A. 117.

24. Taxation—Separate actions by one solicitor—Ord. 65, r. 27.—Three shareholders in a company, W., T., and G., brought separate actions to have their names removed from the list of shareholder. The same solicitor acted for the plaintiff in each action. W.'s action was decided first, and it was arranged that the evidence taken in that action should be used in the other two, which subsequently came on and were decided by the same judge on the same day, judgment being given for the plaintiff in each case, with costs. T.'s costs were taxed in the usual way, but the taxing master struck out en bloc a number of items in G.'s bill, on the ground that the two actions were similar, and that duplicate copies of documents ought not to have been prepared; he therefore disallowed the charges for copies which had already been allowed in T.'s bill. The same counsel appeared for the plaintiff in each case, and the taxing master reduced their fees in G.'s bill.

Held, that the whole bill must be referred back to the taxing master, with the direction that, except as regards attendance or other matters which were, or ought to have been, done at one and the same time in both actions, the plaintiff's solicitor was entitled to charge in G.'s action as if he had not been engaged in T.'s action.—In re Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association, Grieb's case, CH.D. KEK., J. 462—59 L. J. Ch. 532; 62 L. T. 561.

25. Taxation—Shorthand notes—Ord. 58, r. 4—Ord. 78, r. 1.—The costs of shorthand notes of evidence are never allowed on taxation without a special direction, and though the court, in the exercise of its discretion, can give such a direction, the discretion is only exercised under very special circumstances, and any application to the court to exercise such discretion should be made at or immediately after the time when the judgment is given.—Glasier v. Rolls, C.A. 113—59 L. J. Ch. 63; 62 L. T. 305.

26. Taxation — Special circumstances — Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.—Solicitors to trustees delivered to their clients in the years 1883 and 1884 bills of costs for work done for them as trustees, which were paid without taxation, the solicitors not having informed their clients that, if administration proceedings were subsequently brought and the bills were moderated in those proceedings, the trustees would have to pay out of their own pockets the amounts by which the bills were reduced on moderation. The solicitors also delivered to the manager of an asylum carried on by the trustees as part of the trust estate, other bills of costs for work done for the trustees. It was admitted that the bills delivered to the trustees were honest and not excessive.

Held, as to the bills paid without taxation, that the fact of the solicitors not having given such information to their clients was not a special circumstance justifying taxation after payment; and, as to the bills delivered to the manager of the asylum, that delivery to him was not, in the absence of proof that he was authorized to receive bills for the trustees, delivery to the trustees.

In re F——, 16 W. R. 749, distinguished.—In re Layton, CH.D. NOR., J. 652.

27. Taxation—Third party—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 38.—The common form allegation in a petition of course that the solicitor "delivered to your petitioners his bill of fees and disbursements" is a material allegation which is not satisfied by a merely constructive delivery.

The ordinary practice as to delivery of bills of costs by mortgagees' and by trustees' solicitors stated.—In re Robertson, CH.D. CHI., J. 170—42 Ch. D. 553; 58 L. J. Ch. 833; 62 L. T. 38.

28. Tender—Payment into court—Ord. 22, r. 7.—In an action for money lent the statement of defence alleged that the only sum due was £38, which the defendants had tendered and brought into court in satisfaction of the whole claim, it not being stated that the tender was made before action. The plaintiff took the £38 out of court in satisfaction of his claim.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to have his costs taxed, as there was a plea of tender on the record, which was not disposed of, and that it was not essential to allege that the tender was before action if that fact could be inferred.—Griffiths v. Ystradfodwg School Board, Q.B.D. 425—24 Q. B. D. 307; 59 L. J. Q. B. 116; 62 L. T. 151.

29. Third party—Indemnity.—At the trial of an action for specific performance the defendant was held to be liable to the plaintiff on the contract, but entitled to an indemnity from the third party.

Held, that the third party must pay the costs of the third-party proceedings between him and the defendant, but that the defendant must pay the costs of his unsuccessful defence.—Blore v. Ashby, CH.D. KEK., J. 141—42 Ch. D. 682; 58 L. J. Ch. 779; 61 L. T. 766.

COUNTY COURT:—

1. Appeal — Admiralty — Interlocutory order — County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 26—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120—Costs—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 50, r. 16.—There is no appeal from any interlocutory decree or order of a county court having admiralty jurisdiction in an admiralty cause without the permission of the judge where the decree or order appealed from is not made at the hearing of the suit.

Section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, providing for the manner in which, and the conditions subject to which, appeals may be brought from the judgment, direction, or decision of a county court judge where any party is dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, has not given a right of appeal from interlocutory orders made in admiralty actions previous to or after the hearing of the suit.

Semble, ord. 50, r. 16, of the County Court Rules, 1889, directing that "the costs of witnesses, whether they have been examined or not, may, unless otherwise ordered by the judge, be allowed, though they have not been summoned," is not to be construed as authorizing a judge of county courts to order, as a general rule of practice, that in admiralty actions the costs of witnesses not called shall be disallowed, unless it be otherwise ordered by himself. — The Cashmere, P.D. & A.D. 623 — 15 P. D. 121; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 57; 62 L. T. 814.

2. Appeal—Security for costs.—The court will not, as a rule, require security for the costs of an appeal from a county court where the judge has given unconditional leave to appeal.—Ex parte Apothecaries' Society, Q.B.D. 478.

3. Costs—Scale—Certificate—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 50, r. 8—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 119.—Ord. 50, r. 8, of the County Court Rules, 1889, provides that, "where a judge certifies under section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the certificate shall be entered at the end of the minutes of the court of the day on which it is given, and shall be signed by the judge."

In an action brought in the City of London Court the judge made an order for costs on the higher scale, but omitted to give the certificate required by section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888, on the same day. On a subsequent day he signed a certificate, which was entered at the end of the minutes of the court of the day on which he gave the order.

Held, that the judge was not prevented by ord. 50, r. 8, from adopting this course.—Badcock v. Hunt, Q.B.D. 255.

4. Jurisdiction—Admiralty—Wages—Action in rem —County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3 (2).—The mate of a vessel who has finished his articles and been paid off, but remains on board as chief officer and superintends the unloading of the cargo, and generally looks after the vessel while in port, is entitled to proceed in rem in the county court against the vessel for his remuneration.—Reg. v. Judge of City of London Court, Q.B.D. 638—59 L. J. Q. B. 427.

5. Jurisdiction—Administration action—Metropolitan district—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 74, 75, 84.—Section 84 of the County Courts Act, 1888, must be construed as forming an exception to section 75 (3), and, therefore, where the plaintiff or the defendant in administration proceedings carries on business within the district of a metropolitan county court, the judge of that court has jurisdiction, even if neither the deceased nor his executor had their place of abode within that district.—Reg. v. Judge of Bloomsbury County Court, Q.B.D. 320—24 Q. B. D. 309; 62 L. T. 286.

6. Jurisdiction — Carrying on business — Scotch defendants—Branch office—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 74, 164.—A Scotch firm carrying on business in Scotland, but having a branch office within the jurisdiction of a county court, was served at the branch office with a county court summons.

Held, that the service was valid.—Weatherley v. Calder, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 508.

7. Jurisdiction—Defendant residing out of jurisdiction—Waiver—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 74.—A summons from a county court having being issued at the instance of a plaintiff and served upon a defendant residing out of the jurisdiction without leave for the commencement of the action having been first obtained under section 74 of the County Courts Act, 1888, the defendant appeared, but, after one of the causes of action had been heard and determined againt him, objected to the jurisdiction.

Held, that the practice under this section was analogous to that in the High Court in cases requiring leave for notice of service of a writ upon a defendant residing out of the jurisdiction, and that the defendant, having appeared and contested the action, had waived his right to raise any objection to the jurisdiction of the court.—Moore v. Gamgee, Q.B.D. 669—25 Q. B. D. 244.

7a. Jurisdiction—High bailiff—Notice of proceedings—Bankruptcy—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 53, 54, 186—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 45.—Where a motion made in the county court by the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order declaring that he was entitled to certain property of the bankrupt which had been seized by the high bailiff under a writ of execution was dismissed by the county court judge, on the preliminary objection being taken that formal notice of the motion had not been given,

Held, that the provisions of section 53 of the County Courts Act, 1888, by which, before an action is commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of the Act, formal notice in writing must be given to the defendant, do not apply to a motion made in a bankruptcy; and that the case must go back to the county court judge to be heard upon the merits.—Ex parte Poppleton, In re Locke, Q.B.D., BKCY.—62 L. T. 942.

8. Jurisdiction — Set-off — "Admitted set-off"—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 57.—Section 57 of the County Courts Act, 1888, gives the county court jurisdiction to try a case "where the debt or demand claimed consists of a balance not exceeding £50, after an admitted set-off of any debt or demand claimed or recoverable by the defendant from the plaintiff."

Held, that a set-off, to be an "admitted set-off" within the meaning of this section, must be a set-off admitted by both parties, so that, in a claim above £50, a plaintiff cannot, by giving credit for a sum which is not admitted by the defendant, reduce his claim below £50, so as to give the court jurisdiction to try the case.—Hubbard v. Goodley, Q.B.D. 639—25 Q. B. D. 256; 59 L. J. Q. B. 285; 62 L. T. 736.

9. Particulars — Signature by solicitor — Lithographed stamp—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 6, r. 10.—Under ord. 6, r. 10, of the County Court Rules, 1889, read with the Appendix, in order to entitle a plaintiff to the costs of entering a plaint by a solicitor, the solicitor must sign the particulars, and it is not sufficient for him to enter them on a form which bears his lithographed name (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting).

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (38 W. R. 207, 24 Q. B. D. 60), affirmed.—Reg. v. Cowper, C.A. 408—24 Q. B. D. 533; 59 L. J. Q. B. 275; 62 L. T. 583.

10. Payment into court—Return day—Transfer of action—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 107, 186—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11 (1).—A summons was issued in a county court on the 14th of March; the return day was the 12th of April; on the 1st of April the action was transferred to another county court, where the return day was the 15th of April. The defendants paid money into court under County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 9, r. 11 (1), on the 8th of April.

Held, that the return day was the 15th of April, not the 12th of April, and that the payment in was made five clear days before the return day within the meaning of the rule.—Stevens v. Hounslow Burial Board, Q.B.D. 236—61 L. T. 839.

11. Remitting action—Payment after action—Reduction below £100—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65.—Where, in an action of contract, the claim indorsed on the writ is reduced to a sum not exceeding £100 by payment of part after action brought, there is no jurisdiction under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to remit the action for trial in a county court.—Hodgson v. Bell, C.A. 325—24 Q. B. D. 525; 59 L. J. Q. B. 231; 62 L. T. 481.

12. New trial—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 93.—A judge of a county court can only grant a new trial upon the grounds on which a new trial can be granted in the High Court, and he is bound by the principles laid down by the High Court as applicable to the granting of new trials, notwithstanding the terms of section 93 of the County Courts Act, 1888.—Murtagh v. Barry, Q.B.D. 526—24 Q. B. D. 632; 59 L. J. Q. B. 388.

COVENANT:—

1. Restraint of trade—Injunction.—The plaintiff carried on the business of "ladies' outfitting" on premises held under lease containing a covenant by the lessor not to consent to the business of "ladies' outfitting" being carried on at or upon the adjoining premises, also belonging to the lessor. The defendants became lessees of these adjoining premises, with notice of this covenant, and began to carry on thereat the business of "fancy drapers and hosiers," in the course of which they sold some articles the sale of which constituted part of the business of "ladies' outfitting" also. The plaintiff brought an action to restrain the defendants from carrying on the business of ladies' outfitting. It appeared that the businesses of "fancy draper and hosier" and "ladies' outfitting" overlapped in respect of the sale of the above articles.

Held, assuming that the effect of the covenant was such as to make it obligatory upon the defendants, having notice of the covenant, not to carry on the business of "ladies' outfitting," as to which the court gave no decision, that such an obligation was not broken by reason of the defendants selling, in the course of their business as "fancy drapers and hosiers," some of the articles the sale of which constituted part of the business also of "ladies' outfitting," as the terms of the covenant did not prohibit the sale of any specific articles sold in the course of the business of "ladies' outfitting."

2. Restrictive covenant—Covenant not to carry on the trade of retailer of wine, spirits, or beer—Sale at refreshment bar of theatre—Injunction.—The lessee of a theatre, for the purpose of facilitating egress therefrom, bought a plot of ground adjoining it, which (as he had notice) was subject to a covenant against carrying on the trade of a retailer of wine, spirits, or beer, and upon that plot he built an annexe to the theatre containing a staircase and exits from the theatre. He also put up on each floor or landing of the annexe a refreshment bar, at which any person paying for admission to see the theatrical performances could purchase wine, spirits, and beer to be drunk on the premises, but which was not otherwise open to the public.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.) that the lessee's conduct amounted to carrying on the trade of a retailer of wine, spirits, and beer, and was a breach of the covenant which must be restrained by injunction.

CRIMINAL LAW:—

1. Acquittal—Costs—Director of Public Prosecutions—Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 17), s. 1—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 35), s. 2—Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 22), s. 7.—By section 7 of the Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879, where any criminal proceeding is undertaken by the Director of Public Prosecutions, it shall not be necessary to bind over any person to prosecute, "and, if any person is so bound over, or has given security for costs, he shall, upon the Director of Public Prosecutions undertaking the case, be released from such obligation, and the security shall be deemed to have been cancelled, and the Director of Public Prosecutions shall be liable to costs in lieu of such person."

In a prosecution for conspiracy, the justices refused to commit; the prosecutor was bound over to prosecute, but no security for costs was given. On the finding of a true bill the Director of Public Prosecutions undertook the case. The defendants were acquitted.

Held, that the section only transferred to the Director of Public Prosecutions the burden of the costs, if any, for which the original prosecutor was liable under his security, and that an order made against the Director of Public Prosecutions to pay the costs was invalid.—Stubbs v. Director of Public Prosecutions, Q.B.D. 607—24 Q. B. D. 577; 59 L. J. Q. B. 201; 62 L. T. 399.

2. Assault—Autrefois convict—Security for good behaviour—Estoppel.—To an indictment for unlawfully wounding, unlawfully inflicting grievous bodily harm, assault occasioning actual bodily harm, and common assault, the prisoner pleaded as a plea in bar a conviction before a court of summary jurisdiction upon the same facts; but that court had inflicted no punishment beyond requiring the defendant to give security to be of good behaviour.

Held, that the conviction was a good plea in bar.—Reg. v. Miles, C.C.R. 334—24 Q. B. D. 423; 59 L. J. M. C. 56; 62 L. T. 572.

4. Attempt — Bestiality — "Animal" — Fowl — Crown case reserved—Plea of guilty—Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 61.—A conviction for an attempt at an offence may be supported, even if the attempt could not possibly have culminated in the full offence in the manner intended.

Reg. v. Collins, 12 W. R. 886, L. & C. 47, overruled.

A fowl is an "animal" within section 61 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861.

It is not a condition precedent to give jurisdiction to the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved that a point of law arising at the trial should be formally taken at the trial.

T. 596.

6. Conspiracy—Abortion—Woman not pregnant.—A woman was jointly indicted with others for conspiring to procure her miscarriage by unlawful means. There was no evidence of her being with child so as to render the acts criminal if done by herself alone.

Held, that she might nevertheless rightly be convicted of conspiracy to commit a felony.—Reg. v. Cross, C.C.R. 336—24 Q. B. D. 420; 59 L. J. M. C. 77; 62 L. T. 124.

Held, that the prisoner was rightly convicted of inflicting grievous bodily harm under section 20 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861.

DAMAGES:—

1. Libel—Apology—Payment into court—Excessive damages.—In giving evidence in a London police court D. stated that the plaintiff was not an "Invincible." This was correctly reported in a newspaper of which the defendant was proprietor. On the following day it was stated in the next issue of the same newspaper that D. had sworn that the plaintiff was an "Invincible." The plaintiff brought an action for libel, and the defendant paid £50 into court, with an apology. The jury found that the apology was insufficient, but they could not agree as to whether there was actual malice, and they assessed the damages at £1,000.

Held, that the damages were excessive, and that the verdict must be set aside.—Harris v. Arnott, C.A. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 55.

2. Railway—Compulsory purchase—Minerals—Evidence.—In an action for the value of land compulsorily taken the jury assessed damages in respect of subjacent coal, though the expert evidence on the subject was conflicting Held, that the verdict ought not to be set aside.—Brown v. New South Wales Railway Commissioner, P.C.—15 App. 241; 62 L. T. 469.

3. Shipping—Collision—Profits—Future voyage.—A collision occurred between the ships A. and B. after the owners of The A. had contracted to proceed on another voyage after the completion of the voyage then in progress. The repairs necessitated by the collision delayed the ship from sailing till after the time fixed for commencing the second voyage.

Held, that damages in respect of the loss of the earnings of the second voyage were not too remote to be recovered from The B. in respect of the collision.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal (reported 37 W. R. 210, 13 P. D. 191) affirmed.—The Argentino, H.L.—14 App. 519; 61 L. T. 706.

4. Shipping—Wrongful detention of cargoes—Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), s. 2.—Lord Cairns' Act gives no jurisdiction to award damages where no wrongful act has been committed; and therefore, if an action is brought for an injunction in respect of a threatened injury, and no actual wrong has been committed by the defendant, the court cannot award damages instead of an injunction.

The plaintiff sued for delivery of certain goods then at sea, for an injunction to prevent the defendants from receiving them, and for damages for detention. The defendants claimed the right to receive the cargoes. By a consent order the defendants received some of the cargoes, on the terms of rendering accounts for the proceeds. At the trial the judge ordered an inquiry as to the damages sustained by the defendants' wrongful detention of the goods. The case was ultimately taken to the House of Lords, when the judgment was varied by allowing to the defendants the expenses incurred in respect of the cargoes received under the consent order. The chief clerk made a certificate, awarding damages in respect of the detention of the cargoes.

Held (Bowen, L.J., dissenting), that the chief clerk's certificate was correct, and that he could not award nominal damages.—Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co., C.A.—43 Ch. D. 317; 62 L. T. 511.

5. Trespass—Excessive damages—New trial.—A new trial will not be granted on the ground of the damages being excessive, unless the court is of opinion that there was no reasonable proportion between the damages and the facts as proved.

In an action of trespass to land the jury may give exemplary damages if they believe that the defendant knew that his mode of entry was illegal.—Reeves v. Penrose, EX.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 141.

DEED:—

1. Assignment of assets for creditors—Resulting trust.—A trading firm, by a deed, which recited the inability of the firm to pay its creditors in full, assigned the business and all the estate and effects of the firm to trustees on trust in their discretion either to carry on the business or at any time to sell the same, and to divide the clear residue after payment of all costs incurred in the execution of the trusts of the profits of the business while carried on, and of the moneys arising from the sale when sold, among the creditors of the firm, in rateable proportions according to the amounts of their debts; and the creditors, whose names were scheduled to the deed and who were parties to and executed the deed, thereby released the assignors from all debts and claims of such creditors. The deed contained a declaration that the trustees might pay off in full, or compromise with, any of the creditors whose debts or claims were under £30. There was no express declaration of trust as to any ultimate surplus remaining after all the creditors had been paid in full.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that, on the true construction of the deed, there was a resulting trust of such surplus in favour of the assignors.—Cooke v. Smith, C.A. 641.

2. Covenant—Deed poll—Restrictive covenant—Injunction.—The plaintiffs bought part of a building estate under conditions of sale which referred to stipulations contained in a "deed poll of mutual covenants which has been or is intended to be executed by the vendors, and shall be executed by each of the purchasers." The deed was executed by the vendors and the plaintiffs. It recited that "it is intended that the respective purchasers shall set and subscribe their respective names and seals to this deed," "and, whereas it was a part of the various contracts, and it is intended to be a part of all future contracts for sale of the said plots or parcels of land respectively, that the several purchasers respectively should execute this deed and should thereby be severally and respectively bound by all the stipulations hereinafter contained." The deed then witnessed that, "in consideration of the premises," the purchasers covenanted with each other, and with all persons entitled to the land, not to build except upon certain conditions. The deed contained no covenant by the vendors, who now proposed to sell some of the unsold lots upon conditions which were admittedly inconsistent with the original scheme, and without requiring that the purchasers should execute the deed poll.

Held, that the deed poll must be treated as made inter partes; that the intention of the vendors had been expressed in order to induce the plaintiffs to buy, and that they were not at liberty to alter that intention; that, if not bound by covenant, they were bound by implied agreement; that the agreement was not void for remoteness; that it made no difference that there was no covenant by the proposed purchasers; and that the vendors must be restrained from authorizing any purchaser to build contrary to the terms of the building scheme.—Mackenzie v. Childers, CH.D. KAY, J. 243—43 Ch. D. 205; 59 L. J. Ch. 188; 62 L. T. 98.

DENTIST:—

Erasing name from Dentists' Register—Discretionary duty—Judicial or ministerial act—Action for wrongfully erasing name—Dentists Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 33), s. 11.—Section 11 of the Dentists Act, 1878, provides that a register of dentists shall be kept by the registrar, and sub-section 5 provides that every registrar shall in all respects in the execution of his discretion and duty in relation to any register under the Act conform to any special directions given by the general council.

The general council having wrongfully directed the name of a person to be erased from the register on the ground that he had lost his qualification, a mandamus was issued directing them to restore his name to the register. In an action to recover damages for such wrongful erasure.

Held, that, as the duty imposed upon the general council by the Act as to giving directions to the registrar in regard to the register was discretionary, the duty was of a judicial character, and not merely ministerial, and the action was not maintainable without proof of malice.—Partridge v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration, C.A. 729—25 Q. DESIGN:—

1. Infringement—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 60.—The respondents registered a design for a kitchen range fire door with a moulding on the top which had the effect of closing the range to cold air. The appellants manufactured a range fire door with a moulding on the top which had the same effect.

Held, that, in considering whether there had been an infringement, the court ought not to take into consideration whether the two designs accomplished the same useful object; but that there had in fact been infringement by obvious imitation.—Hecla Foundry Co. v. Walker, H.L.—14 App. 550; 59 L. Held, that the difference of material did not make the design "new or original" within section 47 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, and that it must be removed from the register.

DISCOVERY:—

1. Inspection—Privilege—Communication with legal advisers—Instructions to counsel.—L. brought an action of libel against B. in respect of an advertisement in a newspaper containing an account of certain chancery proceedings in which B. had successfully sued L. and others for infringement of his rights in a trade-mark. In an affidavit by B. mention was made of a draft advertisement prepared by him and settled by counsel before the publication complained of.

Held, that L. was not entitled to an order for the production of the draft advertisement for inspection.

2. Inspection—Title deeds—Specific performance—Lease—Right of way—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 2.—The defendant agreed to accept from the plaintiff a lease of a house and land, with stipulations for the free use of a drive leading to the house. In an action for specific performance of the agreement to accept the lease, the defendant denied the plaintiff's title, alleging restrictive covenants, and that the drive was not on the land of the plaintiff, who had no power to grant an easement over it. The defendant applied for production of plaintiff's title deeds, which had been scheduled as referring only to the freehold title.

Held (varying the order of North, J.), that the defendant was not entitled to the deeds showing the plaintiff's title to the right of way, nor of any other title deeds to the property.—Jones v. Watts, C.A. 725—43 Ch. D. 574; 62 L. T. 471.

3. Interrogatories—Infant.—An infant will not be ordered to file an affidavit in answer to interrogatories.—Mayor v. Collins, Q.B.D. 349—24 Q. B. D. 361; 59 L. J. Q. B. 199; 62 L. T. 326.

4. Interrogatories—Libel—Payment into court—Newspaper.—In an action of libel against a newspaper, where the defendant takes upon himself the responsibility of defending the action, the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to inquire by interrogatories as to the sources of the defendant's information, even though the only issue in the action is as to the amount of damages, and the object of the interrogatories is to increase the damages by showing gross recklessness on the part of the defendant.

Hennessy v. Wright, 36 W. R. 879, followed.

Where the plaintiff asks how many copies of the paper containing the libel were issued to the public, the defendant cannot decline to give the number on the ground that it is inconvenient or even impossible to do so, but he must give the number approximately.—Parnell v. Walter, Q.B.D. 270—24 Q. B. D. 441; 59 L. J. Q. B. 125; 62 L. T. 76.

5. Interrogatories—Privilege—Fraudulent removal of goods by tenant—Action by landlord for double value—11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3.—An action brought by a landlord under 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 3, to recover double the value of goods fraudulently removed to avoid distress is a penal action, and the plaintiff cannot administer interrogatories to the defendants.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 639) affirmed.

Jones v. Jones, 37 W. R. 479, 22 Q. B. D. 425, approved.—Hobbs v. Hudson, C.A. 682—25 Q. B. D. 232; 62 L. T. 764.

6. Interrogatories—Privilege—Incrimination—Jurisdiction.—Where a person refuses to answer an interrogatory on the ground that his answer might tend to incriminate him, the court has jurisdiction to compel an answer if it be clearly satisfied that there is no reasonable ground for believing the answer would have that effect. But if a corpus delicti is shown to exist, very clear evidence must be produced to the court that danger to the deponent cannot reasonably be apprehended in order to induce the court to compel an answer.—Bradley v. Clayton, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 405.

7. Interrogatories—Privilege—Libel—Newspaper—Name of author of libel.—If the proprietor of a newspaper when sued for libel admits the publication of the words complained of, the plaintiff cannot interrogate him as to the name of the writer of those words, unless the writer's identity is a fact material to one of the issues raised in the case.—Gibson v. Evans, Q.B.D.—23 Q. B. D. 384; 58 L. J. Q. B. 612; 61 L. T. 388.

8. Interrogatories—Privilege—Solicitor—Corporation—Town clerk.—In an action by a corporation the defendant administered interrogatories for the examination of the town clerk.

Held, that the town clerk could not object to answer any of the interrogatories on the ground that the information had been obtained by him as solicitor to the plaintiffs for the purpose of the action.—Mayor, &c., of Salford v. Lever, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 695; 59 L. J. Q. B. 248; 62 L. T. 434.

9. Interrogatories—Security for costs—Discretion of court—Jurisdiction—Ord. 31, r. 25, 26—The court or a judge has power to dispense with payment of the deposit imposed by ord. 31, r. 26, on a party seeking discovery.

Boarder v. Lindsay, 34 W. R. 473, disapproved.—Newman v. London and South-Western Railway Co., Q.B.D. 348—24 Q. B. D. 454; 59 L. J. Q. B. 341; 62 L. T. 290.

10. Interrogatories — Shipping — Collision. — Two vessels, The A. and The B., came into collision, and, in consequence of the collision, The A. sunk, and many of those persons on board her who would have been material witnesses on her behalf were drowned. Subsequently the owners of The A. instituted an action of damage against The B., for the recovery of the damages they had sustained, and, before delivering their statement of claim, caused interrogatories to be administered to the owners of The B., interrogating them respecting the circumstances of the collision. The owners of The B. refused to answer certain of such interrogatories, which, if answered, would have supplied the same information as was contained in their preliminary act.

The court, taking into consideration the difficulty the plaintiffs would have in obtaining evidence in support of their claim if the interrogatories were not fully answered, made an order requiring the owners of The B. to file a further and better answer.—The Isle of Cyprus, P.D. & A.D. 719—15 P. D. 134.

11. Interrogatories—Striking out—Prolixity—Ord. 31, r. 7.—Under ord. 31, r. 7, there is no power to strike out any part of a set of interrogatories. The objection that any particular interrogatories are prolix and unnecessary must be taken in the affidavit in answer.—Sammons v. Bailey, Q.B.D. 605—24 Q. B. D. 727; 59 L. J. Q. B. 342.

12. Production of documents — Order on third party—Jurisdiction—Ord. 37, r. 7.—The court has no jurisdiction under ord. 7, r. 37, to order the production before trial of documents by persons not parties to the action.

The object of that rule was not to increase rights as against third persons, but to give further facilities for enforcing rights which already exist.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division reversed.—Elder v. Carter, C.A. 612—25 Q. B. D. 194; 59 L. J. Q. B. 281; 62 L. T. 516.

13. Production of documents—Privilege—Affairs of State—Agent of Colonial Government—Jurisdiction—Ord. 31, rr. 12—14.—An action was brought against the Agent-General to a Colonial Government by persons who had entered into a contract with that Government and who claimed relief in respect of a sum of money which they alleged had been received by the defendant from that Government as trustee for the plaintiffs, and afterwards, in breach of trust, repaid by him to that Government. The defendant made an affidavit specifying certain documents, but objecting to produce some of them on the ground that they were the property of the Colonial Government (which was not a party to the action) and had been acquired by him merely in his capacity of Agent-General, and subject to the directions of that Government; and that the Prime Minister of the colony had directed him not to produce the documents, except under an order of the court, and to object to their production on the ground of the interest of the State and of the public service.

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction to order him to produce the documents in question.—Wright v. Mills, CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. T. 558.

DIVORCE:—

1. Adultery of petitioner — Divorce — Marriage before decree absolute.—A. obtained a decree nisi for a dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery. He married B. before the decree was made absolute, though six months had expired since the decree nisi. The decree was made absolute with the Queen's Proctor's consent, and A. and B. were remarried. B. afterwards committed adultery.

Held, that A.'s cohabitation with B. before the decree absolute did not bar his claim to relief.—Styles v. Styles and Jackson, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 613.

2. Adultery—Confession of wife—Dispensing with co-respondent.—A wife confessed to having committed adultery with A., but her statement was the only evidence against A. A.'s address was unknown to the petitioner.

Held, that A. must be made a co-respondent.—Cornish v. Cornish, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 131; 62 L. T. 667.

2a. Adultery—Confession of wife—Dispensing with co-respondent.—Where no evidence was obtainable against the man whom the respondent had indicated as the father of one of her illegitimate children, and who was believed to be in America, the court gave the petitioner leave to proceed without citing the alleged adulterer as a co-respondent.—Bagot v. Bagot, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 612.

3. Citation—Service out of the jurisdiction.—The respondent and co-respondent were living in Switzerland. The co-respondent was a foreigner, and, by the Swiss law, anyone serving him with the citation would be liable to an action for damages.

The court dispensed with personal service, and allowed the petitioner to serve the citation by inclosing it in a registered letter, sending also in the same way a copy to the respondent, who was living in the same house with the co-respondent.—Trubner v. Trubner and Christiani, P.D. & A.D. 464—15 P. D. 24; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 56; 62 L. T. 186.

4. Petition—Substituted service—Registered letter.—The court ordered substituted service on a husband of a divorce petition and citation by registered letter, the service not to be deemed complete service till the court should be satisfied that the respondent had actually received the registered letter.—Cox v. Cox, P.D. & A.D.—61 L. T. 698.

5. Collusion — Concealment of material facts — Cross suits—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), ss. 30, 31—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 144), s. 7.—An agreement between the parties to a divorce suit to withhold from the court knowledge of material facts tending to support a counter-charge of adultery amounts to collusion within the meaning of section 30 of the Divorce Act, 1857, and section 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, even if the facts suppressed prove insufficient in the event to establish the counter-charge; and therefore a party petitioning for dissolution of marriage is, by those sections, deprived of the right to a decree, where such an agreement has been entered into by such party and has been acted upon, though the suppressed facts in the event come to the knowledge of the court and prove insufficient to establish a matrimonial offence against such petitioning party.

A wife presented a petition for dissolution of marriage against her husband for cruelty and adultery with four named persons, and the husband presented a counter-petition against the wife for adultery with a named person. After the trial had begun it was agreed between them that the charge against the wife and the charges of adultery against the husband with three of the four persons named should be dropped, but that his adultery with the fourth should be proved, together with the charge of cruelty, so as to allow the wife to get a decree. The husband acted on the agreement, and, though the wife's counsel refused to do so, the jury found the wife not guilty of the adultery charged against her, and the husband not guilty of adultery with the three named persons, but guilty with the fourth, and guilty of cruelty. The court granted a decree nisi, but referred the case to the Queen's Proctor, who accordingly intervened. At the second trial the jury found that there had been collusion, and that material facts had been withheld from the knowledge of the court, but, on the question whether the wife had committed adultery, they disagreed and brought in no finding. Upon these findings Butt, J., discharged the decree nisi.

Held, that the decree nisi was rightly discharged, although the facts withheld had, when disclosed, proved insufficient to establish the wife's adultery.

Hunt v. Hunt, 47 L. J. P. D. & A. 22, 26 W. R. Dig. 79, approved.

Alexandre v. Alexandre, 18 W. R. 1087, L. R. 2 P. & D. 164, doubted.—Butler v. Butler (2); Butler v. Butler and Burnham (2), C.A. 390—15 P. D. 66; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 25; 62 L. T. 344.

6. Damages.—A claim for damages for adultery is founded on the assumption that the husband has suffered injury by the co-respondent's acts, and it must be proved that the injury was caused by the latter, without any fault of the husband. The duty of the jury is not to punish the co-respondent, but to compensate the petitioner. In estimating the damages, the jury may consider the wife's life before marriage, and also any earnings of hers of which the husband has had the benefit.—Darbishire v. Darbishire and Baird, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 664.

7. Desertion.—A husband brought to his house a woman with whom he had had immoral intercourse. The wife said that either she or the other woman must leave the house. The husband said that she might do as she pleased, but the other woman would remain. The wife left the house, and no further cohabitation took place.

Held, that the husband had been guilty of desertion. —Dickinson v. Dickinson, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 330.

8. Dismissal of suit—Decree nisi—Decree absolute—Delay.—A wife obtained a decree nisi for a dissolution of marriage, and afterwards presented a petition for permanent maintenance. While the petition was before the registrar, the respondent applied to dismiss the suit for want of prosecution, on the ground that there had not been an application to make the decree absolute.

Held, that the application must be refused with costs.—Southern v. Southern, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 668.

9. Evidence.—In a husband's suit for divorce it was proved that the petitioner and a police officer traced the respondent and co-respondent to the house of the sister of the latter, and that admissions were there made by the respondent, also that certain allegations were made against the co-respondent, who said nothing in reply.

Held, that there was not sufficient evidence of adultery.—White v. White and Jerome, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 663.

10. Lunacy of petitioner—Guardian ad litem—Jurisdiction—Divorce Rules, r. 196.—An order ought not to be made, under rule 196 of the Divorce Rules, appointing a guardian ad litem to a person alleged to be of unsound mind where there is a substantial and bonâ fide dispute whether such person is or is not of unsound mind.

Order of Butt, J., affirmed.

Semble (per Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.), that the power given by rule 196 to appoint a guardian ad litem to a person of unsound mind is only exercisable where such person has been so found by inquisition.—Routh (otherwise Fry) v. Fry, C.A. 615—15 P. D. 50; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 43; 62 L. T. 501.

11. Maintenance—Deed—Dum sola clause—Discretion of judge—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32.—It is within the discretion of the judge, under the 32nd section of the Divorce Act, 1857, upon a decree for dissolution of marriage being made, to order the husband to secure to the wife, by way of maintenance, an annual sum for her life absolutely, without limiting the payment of it by a "dum sola clause." This discretion ought to be exercised in each case with regard to the facts thereof and the conduct and circumstances of the parties, as prescribed in the section, and no primâ facie rule ought to be laid down with reference to the insertion or omission of the above words limiting the payment of the annual sum to the wife with respect to the contingency of her marrying again.

Decision of Butt, J., affirmed.—Lister v. Lister, C.A. 81—15 P. D. 4; 62 L. T. 90.

12. Misconduct of petitioner—Cruelty—Previous suit—Alimony—Non-payment.—In 1887 a wife obtained a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, and an order for the custody of her only child. In 1888 the husband was ordered to pay £80 a year for permanent alimony, but did not do so. A deed was afterwards signed, whereby the wife relinquished the custody of the child, in consideration of a sum of £75. The husband afterwards filed a petition for a divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery, of which he had become aware before the deed was signed.

Held, that the husband was not precluded by the previous decree nor by the deed from obtaining a decree.—Badham v. Badham and Gorst, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 663.

13. Misconduct of petitioner—Neglect.—The parties were married in 1876, the husband's wages being about twenty-four shillings per week. They separated in 1878, and the wife became a domestic servant. The only complaint made by the husband was that his wife had got him into debt. The wife afterwards committed adultery.

Held, that the husband had been guilty of such misconduct as to justify the court, in its discretion, in refusing to dissolve the marriage.—Starbuck v. Starbuck and Oliver, P.D. & A.D.—61 L. T. 876.

13a. Misconduct of petitioner—Wilful separation——Reasonable excuse—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 31.—The petitioner, an officer of marines, when only twenty years of age, in December, 1883, married the respondent, relying upon statements made by her as to her having been previously entrapped into a ceremony of marriage with a man whom she afterwards found had a wife then living. The petitioner, soon after his marriage, found that his wife's statements as to the alleged bigamous marriage were false, and that she had, in fact, been guilty of pre-marital incontinence, and was in an advanced state of pregnancy. Still believing, however, that her former statements, as to her being possessed of private means, were true, the petitioner told her to go to her friends, and he never contributed to her support, and did not see her again for about seven years, being most of that time on service. During that time the respondent committed adultery.

Held, that the petitioner's conduct did not disentitle him to relief.—Kennedy v. Kennedy and Schurch, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 705.

14. Parties — Wife's suit — Counter-charges of adultery—Appearance by alleged adulterer—Divorce Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 28—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 32), s. 2.—In a wife's suit for a dissolution of marriage the respondent charged the petitioner with adultery with A., but did not pray for a dissolution of marriage.

The court allowed A. to file an answer.—Wheeler v. Wheeler and Rhodes, P.D. & A.D.—14 P. D. 154; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 65; 61 L. T. 306.

15. Petition — Affidavit — Verification — British consul petitioner—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 108), s. 20.—Where the petitioner was a British consul in a foreign country, and the only person there before whom the affidavit in support of the petition could be filed, the court allowed the affidavit to be verified by the petitioner's solicitor to the best of his knowledge and belief.—Russell v. Russell and Maclaren, P.D. & A.D.—59 L. J. P. D. & A. 13.

16. Variation of settlements—Appointment of new trustees—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 61), s. 5.—A marriage was dissolved on the ground of the wife's adultery. The marriage settlement gave the wife a first life interest in the half the income derived from herself. There was a joint power to appoint new trustees. The husband held a public appointment, and his income was likely to be increased by promotion. An order was made for variation of the settlement, the wife's interest in the income derived from the husband being extinguished, the trustees to pay to the husband £50 a year for the maintenance of the infant child of the marriage.

Held, that the joint power to appoint new trustees must be retained.—Tupper v. Tupper and Terrell, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 665.

17. Variation of settlements—Variation of order—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5.—An order for the variation of a marriage settlement after a decree dissolving a marriage cannot be afterwards further varied on the ground of a change of circumstances after the order.

Decision of Butt, J., affirmed.—Benyon v. Benyon and O'Callaghan, C.A.—15 P. D. 54; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 39; 62 L. T. 381.

18. Wife's costs—Decree nisi—Payment into court—Payment out.—Where a sum of money had been paid into court before trial, on the order of a registrar, to secure the wife's costs at the trial, and a decree nisi was pronounced on her petition, the court, on appeal from chambers, refused to order payment out to the wife or her solicitor of such sum of money before the decree was made absolute.—Butler v. Butler, Butler v. Butler and Burnham, P.D. & A.D. 272—14 P. D. 160; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 70; 62 L. T. 477.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW:—

1. Jurisdiction—Bishop—Discretion—Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85), ss. 8, 9—Mandamus.—A representation under section 9 of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, was made by qualified persons to the bishop to the effect that certain sculptured figures in a reredos erected in the cathedral church of his diocese tended to encourage superstitious ideas and unauthorized devotions. The bishop declined to forward the representation to the ecclesiastical court, on the ground that, having considered all the circumstances of the case, he had come to the opinion that the main question of principle at issue had been already decided in a former case, and that, the difference of detail in the present reredos from that complained of in the former case being of so little importance in principle, further litigation would be mischievous.

Held (reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the bishop, having declared that he had considered all the circumstances of the case, and not having been shown to have declined to consider any circumstance of the case brought before him, nor to have considered and acted upon any circumstance outside the case before him, had acted within his jurisdiction; that this jurisdiction gave him a discretionary power to stay the proceedings; and that the court had no power to review his reasons for the exercise of such discretion, provided he had acted within his jurisdiction.—Reg. v. Bishop of London, C.A. 214—24 Q. B. D. 213; 59 L. J. Q. B. 169; 62 L. T. 167.

2. Jurisdiction—Court of Archbishop of Canterbury.—The Archbishop of Canterbury has jurisdiction, either sitting alone or with assessors in the archiepiscopal court of his province, to cite a bishop of the province to appear and answer a petition alleging offences on his part against the ecclesiastical law in reference to matters of ritual.—Read v. Lincoln (Bishop of), COURT OF ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY—14 P. D. 88; 61 L. T. 403.

3. Jurisdiction—Misconduct of clerk—Scandal Suspension.—In a suit in the Court of Arches against a clerk in orders, the articles alleged a conviction against the clerk for drunkenness and riotous conduct in a public place, and prayed that he might be punished for the scandal thereby caused. The respondent by his plea alleged that the conviction had been obtained by perjury, denied the charges of drunkenness, &c., and that the conviction had caused scandal, and asked for a full inquiry into the facts.

Held, that the plea must be struck out, and that the Court of Arches had jurisdiction to suspend the clerk ab officio on account of the scandal caused by the conviction without considering whether the offence charged had been actually committed.—Borough v. Collins, ARCHES COURT—15 P. D. 81.

4. Minister—Bishop—Rubrics—Acts of Uniformity (1 Eliz. c. 2 and 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 4).—The word "minister" in the rubrics relating to the administration of the Holy Communion must be taken to include a bishop, and, therefore, a bishop officiating as minister in the service of the Holy Communion is bound to celebrate it in the order and form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.—Read v. Lincoln

ELECTION LAW:—

1. County council—Occupation—Service franchise—Poor Rate Assessment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), ss. 7, 19—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 32—Representation of the People Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 3), ss. 2, 3—County Electors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 10), s. 2 (1).—Certain labourers resided in cottages situated on the farms of their employers; they were permitted, but not required, to live in the cottages, on condition that they were to give up possession when their employment ceased, and the rent was either calculated in their wages or was reduced in consequence of their employment. The rates for the cottages were paid by the farmers who employed them, but the names of the labourers appeared in the rate-book as occupiers. They claimed to be registered in Division 1 as parliamentary voters in respect of their occupation, and to be enrolled as burgesses.

Held, that the facts showed an occupation by the claimants as householders, and not by virtue of service; that it was not necessary for the claimants to actually pay or tender the rates in accordance with section 32 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882; and that the claimants possessed a burgess qualification, and were entitled to be registered as both parliamentary and county electors.—Marsh v. Estcourt, Q.B.D. 495—24 Q. B. D. 147; 59 L. J. Q. B. 100.

2. County council—Separate divisions—Separate qualifications—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 2, 75—County Electors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 10), s. 7 (4)—Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 45, 51 (2) 59.—Under the Local Government Act, 1888, an elector is not entitled to vote at an election of county councillors in more than one electoral division of an administrative county, although duly registered under the County Electors Act, 1888, in more than one division of the same county.

Held, that A. was not disqualified as a voter.—Criglington v. Gallagher, C.A. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 134.

ESTOPPEL:—

1. Bailment—Jus tertii.—An action was brought by bailors against bailees for non-delivery of goods.

Held, that the bailees were estopped from setting up the title of third parties, under whose authority they did not claim to defend, and to whom they had not delivered the goods, although the property in the goods might have passed to such third parties since the date of bailment.—Rogers v. Lambert, Q.B.D. 542—24 Q. B. D. 573; 59 L. J. Q. B. 250; 62 L. T. 694.

2. Company—Transfer of stock—Forgery by executor—Liability of co-executor—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16), s. 18.—One of two executors cannot make a valid transfer of shares or stock registered in their names under section 18 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, though their names are entered in the register as executors.

Railway stock was registered in the names of two executors as such. One of them sold certain portions of the stock without the knowledge of the other, and executed transfers to the purchasers, to which he forged the signature of his co-executor, and the transfers were duly registered by the company. On discovering the frauds, the executor whose signature had been forged brought an action against the company to compel them to replace the stock.

Held, that, under section 18 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the two executors in whose names the stock was registered became joint shareholders in respect of such stock, though their names were entered in the register as executors; and that the stock could only be transferred by a transfer duly executed by both, and therefore the transfers were void.

Upon the occasion of the last forged transfer, the company sent the plaintiff notice that the transfer was at their office, and would be registered unless the company received notice to the contrary. The plaintiff, acting on the advice of her co-executor, did not answer this notice.

Held, that the plaintiff was not estopped from alleging the invalidity of the transfer.—Barton v. London and North-Western Railway Co., C.A. 197—24 Q. B. D. 77; 59 L. J. Q. B. 33; 62 L. T. 164.

3. Deed—Recital.—In 1869 A. mortgaged land to B. In 1877, after B.'s death, the trustees for sale under his will assigned the mortgage to D., A. joining in the deed. A. had in 1872 leased the land to M. for ten years from 1870. After the expiration of the lease M. continued to pay rent to A. In 1887 the Irish Land Commission made an order, on M.'s application, fixing a fair rent. In the same year D. sued for possession. At the trial he produced the deed of 1877, which recited B.'s devise to trustees for sale, but he did not produce the will itself.

Held, that M., who claimed through A., was estopped by the recital in the deed.—Clarke v. Hall, C.A. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 316.

4. Res judicata—Foreign judgment—Interlocutory judgment.—In order that an action may be brought in this country on a foreign judgment, such judgment must be final and unalterable in the court which pronounced it.

Decision of the Court of Appeal affirmed.—Nouvion v. Freeman, H.L. 581—15 App. 1; 59 L. J. Ch. 337; 62 L. T. 189.

5. Res judicata—Judgment—Foreign judgment—Fraud.—In an action brought in England to enforce a foreign judgment, it is competent for the defendant to raise a defence alleging fraud, even if the fraud alleged is such as necessitates a re-trial in England of the merits adjudicated upon by the foreign court.

Abouloff v. Oppenheimer, 31 W. R. 57, 10 Q. B. D. 295, followed.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division affirmed.—Vadala v. Lawes, C.A. 594—25 Q. B. D. 310; 62 L. T. 701.

EVIDENCE:—

2. Affidavit—Company—Cross-examination before examiner—Practice—Ord, 37, rr. 21, 22.—An application was made by a shareholder for the rectification of the register of a company. When the application came on for hearing, the shareholder applied to have the witnesses who had made affidavits on behalf of the company cross-examined upon their affidavits, and an order was made that the witnesses on both sides should attend for cross-examination before an examiner. On attending before the examiner, the question was raised whether the shareholder's witnesses or the company's witnesses ought to be cross-examined first.

Held, that the shareholder's witnesses should be cross-examined first if the company desired to cross-examine them.—In re Doré Gallery Co., CH.D. NOR., J. 491—62 L. T. 758.

3. Affidavit—Description of deponent—Married woman.—The affidavit of a married woman must state the description of her husband.—Ellam v. Ellam, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 331.

4. Criminal law—Director of Public Prosecutions—Public prosecution—Disclosure of name of informer—Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 22), ss. 2, 7.—In an action for conspiracy to procure the Director of Public Prosecutions to institute a criminal prosecution against the plaintiff, the Director of Public Prosecutions was called as a witness for the plaintiff, and asked to state the name of the informer, and, if he had a statement in writing, to produce it.

Held, that, as a prosecution instituted by the Director of Public Prosecutions is a public prosecution, the question was not admissible.

5. Criminal law—Unsworn evidence of girl under thirteen—Conviction on a count for indecent assault—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 4.—The prisoner was indicted under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, for an attempt to defile a girl under the age of thirteen years. The child's evidence was, under that section, received, though not given upon oath. In a second count the prisoner was charged with an indecent assault under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100. He was acquitted upon the first count, and found guilty upon the second on the evidence of the child.

Held, that the unsworn evidence was inadmissible on the second count, and the conviction was wrong.

6. Depositions—Cross-examination—Information.—On the trial of an indictment for the murder of A., a police officer, who had been killed while endeavouring to execute a warrant of arrest, a police officer, who was called as a witness for the prosecution, swore that he knew the prisoner, and saw him strike A. In cross-examination, the witness stated that he believed he had stated before the magistrates the names of all the persons present when A. was killed, but that he had made a mistake. The prisoner's name was not mentioned in his deposition then taken. The counsel for the Crown then put in evidence an earlier information by the witness, in which he had referred to the prisoner as taking part in the attack on A. The judge allowed the witness to be asked whether he had, at the date of the information, stated on oath that he saw the prisoner throw stones at A., who was lying on the ground. The witness answered the question in the affirmative.

Held, that the evidence was admissible.—Reg. v. Coll, C.C.R. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 522.

7. Depositions—Cross-examination—Summing up.—Upon a trial at quarter sessions a witness for the prosecution admitted in cross-examination that her evidence differed from the evidence which she had given before the magistrates. Neither the counsel for the prosecution nor the counsel for the defence put in the witness's deposition, but the chairman of the court read the deposition in his summing up.

Held, that the reading of the deposition to the jury was not a misreception of evidence.—Reg. v. Garner, C.C.R.—61 L. T. 699.

8. Legitimacy — Baptismal register — Entry in course of business.—To prove the legitimacy of A. the defendant tendered an entry in a Roman Catholic parochial register of marriages and baptisms of a parish in Ireland, dated in 1804, and signed by a deceased curate of the parish, and describing A. as the child of H. and M., his wife. It was the curate's duty, when baptizing a child, to register the baptism, and to state therein whether the child was legitimate or not.

Held, that the entry was inadmissible in evidence, because it was not proved to be contemporaneous.—Ryan v. Ring, P. & D.D. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 184.

9. Legitimacy—Conduct—Bastardizing issue—Law of Evidence Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 68), s. 3—Settlement—Revocation.—By a marriage settlement a sum of £10,000 was vested in trustees upon trust (subject to trusts of the income in favour of the husband and wife successively) for the issue of the marriage as the husband and wife should by deed, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, jointly appoint, with a trust in default of such appointment and of any appointment by the survivor, if there should be only one child who should attain twenty-one or marry, as to one moiety of the trust fund, for that only child, and, as to the other moiety, for the husband. The marriage took place on the 30th of April, 1878. A legitimate child, R., was born on the 2nd of July, 1881, and two illegitimate children, L. and M., on the 26th of April, 1885, and the 25th of June, 1886, respectively. A decree nisi for the dissolution of the marriage was obtained by the husband on the 3rd of November, 1886, on account of the wife's adultery with W. By a deed dated the 11th of May, 1887, the husband and wife irrevocably appointed that, subject to the interests of the husband and wife, one moiety of the fund should be held in trust for R. absolutely if and when she should attain twenty-one or marry under that age; and they also appointed the other moiety to R. in the same way, but subject to a power of revocation and new appointment reserved to the husband. The decree nisi was made absolute on the 17th of May, 1887, and, by a deed dated the 18th of May, 1887, and made between the husband and divorced wife, the latter released her interest in the trust fund in the event of her surviving, and also her power of appointment over the fund. By a deed poll dated the 30th of November, 1887, the husband revoked the appointment of the second moiety of the trust fund to R., to the intent that it might go as if that appointment had not been made, but might be subject to any further appointment by him. The husband claimed a declaration that one moiety of the trust fund ought to be held by the trustees of the marriage settlement upon the trusts affecting the same in case there was no child of the marriage—that is, for the husband absolutely—on the ground that the children L. and M. were illegitimate.

Held, (1) that statements by W. respecting the birth of L. were admissible as evidence of conduct tending to prove that W. was the father of L.; (2) that the contents of the entry of the birth of the second child could be proved by a copy, which had been compared by a witness with the original, and been found to be accurate; (3) that the evidence of the husband was not admissible, after the dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery, to prove the illegitimacy of a child born before the date of such dissolution; (4) that the reservation in the deed of the 11th of May, 1887, of the power of revocation to the husband was invalid.—Burnaby v. Baillie, CH.D. NOR., J. 125—42 Ch. D. 282; 58 L. J. Ch. 842; 61 L. T. 634.

10. Newspaper—Printer and publisher—Newspaper Libel and Registration Act (44 & 45 Vict. c. 60)—Criminal Law (Ireland) Act (50 & 51 Vict. c. 20), s. 19.—"Intimidation" in section 19 of 50 & 51 Vict. c. 20 may be by words published, and "personal intent" may be inferred from the words themselves. A statement contained in the issue of a newspaper that A. was the printer and publisher of the same at the office, and the fact that the return of the proprietor's name, address, and residence required by the Newspaper Libel Act purported to be made and signed by A., after whose name the words "printer and publisher" appeared, is not evidence that A. was the printer and publisher of particular issues of the paper.—Whelan v. Fisher, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 340.

11. Pedigree—Parish registers—Scotch registers—

EXECUTOR:—

1. Administration action—Parties—Creditor—Executor universal legatee.—An executor cannot maintain an administration action against one creditor, even if the executor is universal legatee.—Mandeville v. Mandeville, C.A. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 339.

2. Distribution of assets—Advertisements for creditors—Lord St. Leonards' Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35), s. 29—Ord. 55, rr. 44, 46.—There is no rule of practice in the Chancery Division rendering it in every case necessary for the sufficiency of the publication of notices to creditors and others, under section 29 of Lord St. Leonards' Act, to have an advertisement of such notice inserted in the Times, or some other London daily newspaper, in addition to the London Gazette.

On the death of a testator, who had for many years previously resided in Lancashire, where he had carried on the business of a farmer, the usual statutory notice to creditors and others was published by his executor in the London Gazette and in three local weekly newspapers, but not in the Times nor in any other London daily newspaper.

Held, that there had been sufficient publication of the notice to discharge the executor from liability.

The notice was dated the 16th of September, 1875, and the advertisement was published in the local newspapers on the 17th and 18th of September, and in the London Gazette on the 21st of September. The time limited by the notice for sending in claims was, not one month from the date of publication of the last advertisement, but one month from the date of the notice.

Held, that the notice was sufficient.—Doughty v. Townson, C.A. 48—43 Ch. D. 1; 59 L. J. Ch. 18; 61 L. T. 531.

3. Married woman—Will—Probate—Choses in action—Rights of husband—Probate Rules, 1887, r. 15.—A married woman—married before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882—possessing no separate estate, and no testamentary capacity by assent of her husband or otherwise, made a will, by which she appointed an executor and bequeathed all her property to persons other than her husband. She died in July, 1887, and probate of the will was granted to the executor in the ordinary form, in pursuance of rule 15 of the Probate Rules of March, 1887. The husband brought an action in the Chancery Division against the executor to recover certain choses in action to which the wife was entitled at the time of her death.

Held, that the effect of the grant of probate in general form to the executor was to entitle the executor to get in all assets of the wife, including the choses in action which the wife had no power to dispose of by will, but that the husband was beneficially entitled to these choses in action, and was entitled to have them transferred to him by the executor, subject to the same deductions as they would have been subject to if the husband had taken out administration under the old practice.

Held, that the payment was a good answer to the action.—Vibart v. Coles, C.A. 359—24 Q. B. D. 364; 59 L. J. Q. B. 152; 62 L. T. 551.

5. Retainer—Executor of executor.—B., as executor of A., received £2,010, the amount of a policy of insurance of A. on his own life. B. died, and E., his executor, made his assets liable for £8,250, as security for A.

Held, that E. was bound to retain the £2,010 as security against the £8,250.—Poe v. Shortt, M.R. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 328.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT:—

Reasonable and probable cause—Police constable—Issue of warrant.—Knowledge by a police constable that a warrant has been issued by a duly authorised magistrate for the arrest of a person for felony is a sufficient ground of reasonable suspicion that a felony has been committed so as to authorize an arrest by such constable.

If an act is done in a legal manner, the person directing such act is not responsible for its being carried out in an illegal manner, unless the relation of master and servant exists between the person giving and the person carrying out the direction.—Creagh v. Gamble, EX.D. FISHERY:—

1. Arm of sea—Navigability—Custom—Crown rights.—A creek or arm of the sea, in order to be navigable, in the legal sense of the term, must be affected by the ebb and flow of ordinary or neap tides. The circumstance that it can be traversed by small boats does not make navigable a creek which is not so affected. The rights of private owners over the foreshore extend down to ordinary high-water mark, and there is no legal right for fishermen, apart from exceptional circumstances, such as stress of weather, to draw up or leave their boats above that line.

The expressions "navigable" and "ebb and flow" considered and explained.—Earl of Ilchester v. Raishley, CH.D. KEK., J. 104.

2. Bye-law—Ultrà vires—Fisheries (Ireland) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 92), s. 10.—A bye-law made by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, and approved of by the Lord-Lieutenant in Council, imposed a penalty for having nets on board a fishing boat at times when fishing is illegal, and also rendered the nets liable to confiscation.

Held, that the bye-law was not ultrà vires.—Jones v. Clancy, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 161.

3. Fishery Acts—Offence—Conservators—Justices—Penalty—Salmon Fishery Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 121), ss. 27, 35—Salmon Fishery Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 71), ss. 36, 62—Freshwater Fishery Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 39), s. 7.—A person was convicted by justices for fishing without a licence in a fishing district subject to a board of conservators, upon the complaint of a water bailiff duly appointed by the conservators, but who was not proved to have been authorized by them to institute the proceedings.

Held, that the penalty for the offence could only be recovered by the conservators, and that the conviction must be quashed.—Anderson v. Hamlin, Q.B.D.—25 Q. B. D. 221.

4. Non-tidal lake—Riparian owner—Injunction.—The plaintiffs were owners of lands adjoining, and of islands in a lake; the defendants were tenants of a part of one of the islands. The lake is a freshwater lake, varying in width from one to four miles, and is discharged into a smaller lake, whence the water flows by a river to the sea. The public had for many years fished in the larger lake without the plaintiffs' permission, but had recently used cross lines, with many hooks, which were destructive to fish. The defendants fished in all parts of the lake with cross lines.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from fishing with cross lines.—Percy v. Thornton, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 402.

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF:—

1. Sale of land—Memorandum—Misdescription of vendor—Specific performance.—The memorandum at the foot of the particulars and conditions of sale stated that V. & Son were agents for the "vendor," who was so described throughout the conditions. The particulars stated that the sale was by direction of the "owner." The conditions erroneously stated that the vendor was a trustee for sale.

Held, that the vendor was not sufficiently designated.—Butcher v. Nash, CH.D. KEK., J.—61 L. T. 72.

2. Sale of land—Memorandum—Parol evidence.—H. signed a memorandum of agreement between himself and O. for the sale to O. of a freehold estate for £2,375. The memorandum contained all the terms of the contract except a statement of the property agreed to be sold. Two days later O. sent to H. a cheque for £375 as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase-money of £2,375. H. answered by letter as follows:—"I beg to acknowledge receipt of cheque value £375 on account of the purchase-money for the F. Estate."

Held, that the circumstances under which the letter was written might be explained by parol evidence; and that, as such evidence showed a connection between the letter and the memorandum, the two documents might be read together, and constituted a sufficient memorandum under the Statute of Frauds.—Oliver v. Hunting, CH.D. KEK., J. 618—44 Ch. D. 205; 59 L. J. Ch. 255; 62 L. T. 108.

3. Lease—Contract—Landlord and tenant—Omission of name in body of memorandum—Signature of lessee—29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 4.—By a memorandum of agreement the plaintiff agreed to let a certain brickfield for five years, "the tenant" to pay a certain rent and royalty. Only the name of the plaintiff appeared in the body of the agreement, but it was signed by the defendant and plaintiff.

Held, that it could not be reasonably inferred that the defendant signed the agreement in any other capacity than that of tenant, and therefore so far as regarded the Statute of Frauds the agreement was valid.—Stokell v. Niven, C.A.—61 L. T. 18.

The rules contained the usual rules in restraint of trade, providing for the fining, suspending, and expelling of members for violating the rules of the society as to trade matters. They also contained rules similar to those of a friendly society, giving to members allowances in cases of sickness, infirmity, and want of employment, and other benefits.

Held, that, as the objects of the society were partly in restraint of trade, the society was, at common law, an illegal association, and by section 4 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, no agreement between members to provide benefits to members could be enforced in any court of law.—Old v. Robson, Q.B.D. 415—59 L. Held, that, although the gas company could appear on the hearing of such appeal by their "agents," they could not, as a matter of right, appear by "counsel," as counsel cannot be "agents" in such cases, and that it is in the discretion of the chief gas examiner whether he will hear counsel or not.—Reg. v. Williamson, Q.B.D. 769.

2. Supply — Demand — Notice — Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 125), s. 17—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 41), ss. 11, 36.—A metropolitan gas company is bound to give a supply of gas within a reasonable time after notice, and is not entitled to seven days' notice. — South Metropolitan Gas Co. v. Noakes, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 556.

3. Supply—User in district of another company—Railway company—Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 41), ss. 6, 14.—By section 6 of the Metropolis Gas Act, 1860, a certain district was assigned to each metropolitan gas company, and it was provided that no other company or person should "supply gas for sale within the said limits," unless authorized by Parliament to do so. By section 14 the supply of gas to owners or occupiers of premises within or partly within the company's district requiring such supply was made compulsory. A railway company had a station which was partly within the district of the appellant company and partly within that of the respondent company. The respondents, on being required to do so by the railway company, provided a meter at a point within their own district from which they supplied gas which was used for lighting the whole station, including the part within the appellants' district, to which it was conducted though pipes laid on the premises of the railway company.

Held, that this was an infringement of the provisions in section 6 of the Metropolis Gas Act, 1860.

2. Donatio mortis causâ—Banker's deposit note—Cheque—Death of donor.—Four days before his death, D., being ill, gave his sister-in-law a banker's deposit receipt for £580 and interest. On the deposit receipt was a memorandum intimating that it was not transferable, that the amount was repayable on demand, and that, when the money was withdrawn or the interest paid, the depositor must sign the cheque on the back of the receipt after affixing a penny stamp, and that, if part were withdrawn, a new receipt would be given for the balance. A form of cheque was indorsed on the back of the receipt, which form was filled up for £580 and signed by the donor, but the document was not presented for payment at the bank till after his death, when the bankers said their authority to cash it was at an end.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that there was a good donatio mortis causâ of the deposit receipt and the money represented by it, that the form of cheque, the filling up of which was merely a convenient means of obtaining, and preserving evidence of, the payment of the money, was not such an essential part of the document as to prevent it being made the subject of a good donatio mortis causâ, and that any difficulty arising from the non-negotiable character of the instrument was removed by the case of Duffield v. Elwes, 1 Bli. N. R. 497, which case was a conclusive authority to show that the donor's executors would, in such circumstances, be constituted trustees for the donee, and be bound to do whatever might be necessary to effectuate the gift.

GUIANA, LAW of:—

Will — Construction — Executors — Substitution.—A., who died domiciled in British Guiana, by his will appointed four persons, two of whom took in succession, his executors for the purpose of paying debts and legacies, and administrators of his residuary estate, with all powers incident to that office by law or custom, and with further specified powers, and also "the powers of assumption, surrogation, and substitution to any of them to the two last surviving of them and to any by them assumed, surrogated, and substituted for the purposes aforesaid."

Held, (1) that the testator's intention was to provide for the continuous management of his estate by a series of private administrators, and to give a power of substitution to the two last survivors; (2) that the nomination of the Administrator-General of British Guiana by one of the last survivors was null and void. —Farnum v. Administrator-General of British Guiana, P.C.—14 App. 651; 59 L. HABEAS CORPUS:—

Writ—Non-compliance—Contempt of court.—The defendant, having permission from the parent of a child to keep the child in his institution, without the leave of the parent handed the child over to a person to be adopted by him and taken out of the country. No address was given to the defendant by this person, and the defendant alleged that it was impossible for him to find this person. On a subsequent application for a writ of habeas corpus,

Held, that a writ of habeas corpus must issue, per Lord Esher, M.R., on the ground that it had been decided in The Queen v. Barnardo, 37 W. R. 789, 23 Q. B. D. 305, that, where a child had been intrusted to a person other than its lawful guardian, and he wrongfully parted with the custody of the child, a writ of habeas corpus would issue to compel him to produce the child, unless he was able to convince the court that it was absolutely impossible for him to do so; per Fry, L.J., on the ground that, although a writ of habeas corpus would not issue where it was plain that obedience to it was impossible, that the writ would issue where this was not plain, and where the defendant wilfully and with intent to defeat the process of the court had, by an act done before the application for the writ, put it out of his power to obey the writ when issued.—Reg. v. Barnardo, C.A. 315—24 Q. B. D. 283; 59 L. J. Q. B. 345; 62 L. T. 44.

HIGHWAY:—

Repair—Indictment—Owner not in occupation—Liability ratione tenuræ — Turnpike trust. — An owner of land who is not the occupier cannot be charged ratione tenuræ with the repair of a common highway.

The liability to repair ratione tenuræ ceases when the highway so repairable has been under statutory powers so altered in its course and nature as to be practically destroyed. An ancient highway repaired ratione tenuræ was paved to the width of nine feet in the centre with stone got from the land charged with the repair. Trustees, under a Turnpike Act, converted the road into a macadamized road by taking up the old pavement and substituting macadam to the width of fifteen feet in the centre, and they also diverted the course of the road. On the expiration of the turnpike trust the defendant, the non-occupying owner of the land charged, was indicted and convicted for non-repair of the road ratione tenuræ.

Held, (1) that the defendant, not being occupier of the land, was not liable; and (2) that the ancient road, the subject of repair, must be deemed to have been destroyed, and that the liability to repair ratione tenuræ had, therefore, ceased.—Reg. v. Barker, C.C.R.—25 Q. HUSBAND and WIFE:—

1. Aggravated assault—Judicial separation—Order of justices — Injunction — Receiver — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 4.—The High Court has no power to enforce an order made by a court of summary jurisdiction under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, for a weekly payment of money by a husband convicted of an aggravated assault upon his wife.

On a wife's petition for dissolution of marriage, on the grounds of her husband's cruelty and adultery, two orders were made for payment by the husband of £16 and £45, the wife's costs, which he had not complied with. The cruelty alleged was an aggravated assault, for which the husband had been convicted, and the court of summary jurisdiction had, under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, made an order that the wife was no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, and that the husband should pay her a weekly sum. The husband was £58 in arrear of such payments. The husband was entitled to a sum of money under a will. The petitioner obtained an ex parte injunction to restrain the husband from receiving the money payable to him under the will, on the ground that he had not paid to his wife the amounts before stated.

The court, on an application to continue the injunction, and for the appointment of a receiver, continued the injunction till the hearing of the petition as to the two sums of £16 and £45 payable under the order of this court; but refused to continue it in respect of the sum of £58 payable under the order of the court of summary jurisdiction.—Gillett v. Gillett, P.D. & A.D. 144—14 P. D. 158; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 84; 61 L.T. 401.

2. Desertion — Maintenance — Married Women's Maintenance Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 52), s. 1—Desertion before Act—Jurisdiction of justices.—In 1881 a husband deserted his wife, and went abroad. In 1886 he returned to England, and his wife applied to two justices for an order for maintenance.

Held, that the Married Women's Maintenance Act, 1886, was retrospective, and the justices had power to make an order upon the husband.—Reg. v. Birwistle, Q.B.D.—58 L. J. M. C. 158.

3. Judicial separation—Custody of children—Death of petitioner — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 4.—On the death of a parent entitled to the custody of a child under a decree for judicial separation the court has no jurisdiction to entertain an application by a stranger for the custody of the child.—Davis v. Davis, P.D. & A.D.—14 P. D. 162; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 88.

4. Restitution of conjugal rights—Decree—Non-compliance — Permanent alimony — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 68), s. 2.—A husband having failed to comply with a decree for restitution of conjugal rights within the time specified in such decree, the court, under section 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, ordered him to secure to the petitioner, for their joint lives, a periodical payment, equal to one-third of their joint income.—Theobald v. Theobald, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 26; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 21; 62 L. T. 187.

5. Restitution of conjugal rights—Decree—Non-compliance by wife—Permanent maintenance—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 68), s. 3.—A wife who had a separate income refused to comply with a decree for restitution of conjugal rights.

The court ordered the wife to pay permanent maintenance to her husband.—Swift v. Swift, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 118; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 61; 62 L. T. 669.

6. Restitution of conjugal rights—Demand of cohabitation—Divorce Rules, rr. 2, 175, 176.—A wife, before commencing proceedings against her husband, who had been living apart from her for eleven years, for restitution of conjugal rights, served upon him a letter signed by herself giving him notice of her desire to cohabit and live with him, and demanding from him a full restitution of conjugal rights, and notifying to him that, in the event of his not receiving her and providing a suitable home and habitation for her, she intended to apply to the High Court for restitution of her conjugal rights. The husband sent a reply the same day acknowledging the receipt of the letter and stating that he declined to receive back his wife or make a home for her. The wife's affidavit filed with her petition set out the letters.

Held (reversing the decision of Butt, J.), that the case was distinguished from Field v. Field, 37 W. R. 134, 14 P. D. 26, by the facts that the letter was the wife's own and not a solicitor's letter that it expressed her desire to cohabit and live with her husband, and that he answered it with an unqualified refusal; and that the wife's letter was a sufficient compliance with rule 175 of the Divorce Rules, and a decree for restitution ought to be made.—Smith v. Smith, C.A. 276—15 P. D. 47; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 19; 62 L. T. 237.

7. Restitution of conjugal rights—Demand of cohabitation—Evidence.—In a wife's suit for restitution of conjugal rights conciliatory applications by the petitioner, followed by a solicitor's letter, demanding restitution, and threatening legal proceedings in default of compliance, and by a formal demand by the petitioner herself, were held to be a sufficient demand for cohabitation.

In a wife's suit for restitution of conjugal rights evidence of the petitioner's pre-marital incontinence is inadmissible.—Mason v. Mason, P.D. & A.D.—61 L. T. 304.

8. Restitution of conjugal rights—Demand of cohabitation—Substituted service—Divorce Rules, 1869, r. 175.—If the petitioner in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights is unable to find the respondent, the written demand for cohabitation may be served on the respondent's solicitor.—Macarthur v. Macarthur, P.D. & A.D.—58 L. J. P. D. & A. 70; 61 L. T. 308.

9. Separate estate—Divorce suit—Inquiry by registrar—Report—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 17.—In a divorce suit a registrar has no jurisdiction to determine questions between husband and wife as to property under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Such questions must be determined by the court or a judge.

Where a registrar on a summons made an order against a husband that he should deliver up certain articles, the court discharged the order and referred the question to the registrar for inquiry and report.—Wood v. Wood and White, P.D. & A.D. 208—14 P. D. 157; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 68.

10. Will—Construction—Gift to husband and wife and third person.—A. gave the residue of his estate to W.; E., the wife of W.; S., the wife of H.; J., the wife of G.; B.; C.; and D., the wife of C., to be equally divided between them, share and share alike.

Held, that W., and E., the wife of W., took one share each, and not one share between them; and that C., and D., the wife of C., also took one share each, not one share between them.

INCLOSURE:—

Common—Lord of manor—Injunction.—The tenants of a manor sued to restrain the lord of the manor from inclosing parts of the waste, and digging or removing any part of its soil so as to interfere with their right of pasture. The tenants proved rights of common appendant over the waste for sheep. Certain landowners, not tenants of the manor, had rights of common appurtenant for sheep, and an exercise of all the rights would turn out more sheep than the waste could carry, though it was improbable that so many would ever be turned out.

Held, that the lord of the manor must be restrained from diminishing the pasturage.

INCOME TAX:—

1. Annuity—Annuity for formation of sinking fund—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, schedule D.—A company was formed to carry out an agreement with the Nizam of Hyderabad for the purpose of making and carrying on a certain railway in India. By the agreement the capital of the company was to consist of a certain share capital and a certain debenture capital, the latter to bear interest at 4 per cent per annum. The Nizam was to pay to the company for twenty years an annuity equal to 5 per cent. on both share and debenture capital, and the company were to apply this sum in paying 5 per cent. on the share capital, 4 per cent. on the debenture capital, and in using the remaining 1 per cent. for providing a sinking fund for the redemption of debenture capital. This sum of 1 per cent. was to be paid to trustees to be invested and accumulated for the purposes of the sinking fund. The company claimed an exemption from income tax with regard to this balance.

Held, that this balance of 1 per cent., which was to be accumulated and applied for the sinking fund, was a profit or annuity to the company within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts, and was not exempt from the tax, and that the company were liable to income tax in respect of the whole annual sum received by them from the Nizam.—Nizam's Guaranteed State Railways Co. v. Wyatt, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 548; 59 L. J. Q. B. 430; 62 L. T. 765.

2. Annuity — Life insurance company — Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 102.—A life assurance company which, in addition to its ordinary business, carries on the business of selling annuities for a lump sum paid down, is not entitled to deduct the amount paid in respect of such annuities from their gross income for income tax purposes, but such annuities are liable to income tax in the hands of the company as sums "payable out of profits and gains" within the meaning of section 102 of the Income Tax Act, 1842.—Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Styles, C.A. 696—24 Q. B. D. 500; 62 L. T. 464.

3. Deduction—Life insurance premium—Foreign company—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 54—Insurance Companies Registration Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 91), s. 1.—The Insurance Companies Registration Act, 1853, provides that any person who shall have made any such insurance or contracted for any such deferred annuity, as in the provision mentioned in section 54 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, in or with any insurance company existing on the 1st day of November, 1844, or in or with any insurance company registered pursuant to the Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, shall be entitled to all the benefits and advantages which, by the said provision, are expressed to be given." Section 54 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, provides that "any person who shall have made an insurance on his life in or with any insurance company which should become registered under any Act to be passed in the present session for that purpose . . . should be entitled to deduct the amount of the annual premium paid by him for such insurance from any profits or gains in respect of which he should be liable to be assessed under schedule D." of the income tax.

Held (Fry, L.J., dubitante), that the words "any insurance company" only apply to companies in the United Kingdom existing at the date mentioned, and subject to the jurisdiction of Parliament, and not to foreign companies outside that jurisdiction at that date.

6. Profits — Life insurance company — Mutual insurance bonus—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, schedule D.—The appellants carried on the business of a mutual life insurance company. There were no shares, and the members were the policy-holders. The premiums were calculated at a rate which left a surplus after providing for the yearly expenditure, and the surplus was either returned to the assured as bonuses, or applied in reduction of premiums, or carried to the credit of the members.

Held (Lords Halsbury, C., and Fitzgerald dissenting), that the surplus did not constitute profits liable to be assessed to income tax.

3. Contract — Settlement — Voidability — Infants' Relief Act, 1884 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62), ss. 1, 2.—A settlement of property made by an infant on her marriage is not void under the Infants' Relief Act, 1884.—Duncan v. Dixon, CH.D. 4. Maintenance—Accumulation—Tenancy for life—Vested estate—Contingent estate—Apportionment—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43 (2).—Under the trusts of a will, an infant granddaughter of the testator was entitled to a life interest in the moiety of the annual income, of a pecuniary legacy and of a freehold house, contingently on her attaining twenty-one or marrying; and power was given to the trustees in their discretion to apply the whole or part of the income arising therefrom for the maintenance of the granddaughter during her minority; the granddaughter was also entitled under the will to a vested life interest in one-sixth share of the income of the testator's residuary estate. After the testator's death, and while the granddaughter was still an infant and unmarried, an order was made in chambers appointing a guardian of the granddaughter, and directing that the trustees of the will should, out of the funds subject to the trusts by the will declared in favour of the granddaughter, pay on account of her maintenance, £100 per annum to her guardian. After the date of this order, and thenceforth during the minority of the granddaughter, the trustees paid the £100 to the guardian out of the whole income arising from the granddaughter's share of the trust property, without distinguishing between the income arising from her share of the pecuniary legacy and the freehold house on the one hand, and the share of residue on the other; and they accumulated the surplus income. On the granddaughter attaining the age of twenty-one years, the question was raised whether she was absolutely entitled to the whole of the accumulations of income arising from her share of residue, and also in what manner the payments made for her maintenance were to be apportioned as between the income arising from her share of the pecuniary legacy and the freehold house on the one hand, and the one-sixth of residue on the other. There was an affidavit by the trustees that they had not exercised any discretion in the matter. The income arising from the granddaughter's share of the pecuniary legacy and of the freehold house was less than £100 per annum.

Held, that the granddaughter was absolutely entitled to the accumulations of income which had arisen from the share of the residue.

Held, also, that the moneys paid for maintenance were primarily payable out of the granddaughter's share of the pecuniary legacy and freehold house, that being most for her benefit, and that, as the trustees had not exercised any discretion, the court could exercise it for them.—Wells v. Wells, CH.D. INHABITED HOUSE DUTY:—

1. Exemption — "Hospital or charity school" — School mainly self-supporting—48 Geo. 3. c. 55, schedule B., case IV.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, s. 2.—The Charterhouse School was established in London by charter as a hospital for the reception and relief of poor people, and as a free school for the maintenance and education of poor children, not to exceed forty. It was a hospital and free charity school within the exemption contained in 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B. (which was repealed, but subsequently re-enacted by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, s. 2). In 1867 the school was removed, under statutory powers, from London to Godalming, the hospital remaining in London. In 1888 the governors were assessed to inhabited house duty in respect of the school buildings. No portion of the school buildings was set apart for the use of boys holding scholarships or exhibitions. The school had then become a public school of 500 boys, and the parents of the boys not on the foundation paid for their support and tuition.

Held, that the liability of the governors to pay inhabited house duty depended on the character of the school buildings at the time of the assessment, as that, Charterhouse School having substantially ceased to be a charity school at that time, the exemption of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, did not apply, and that the governors were liable.—Governors of Charterhouse School v. Lamarque, Q.B.D. 776—25 Q. B. D. 121.

2. Exemption — Servant — Library — Attendant sleeping on premises—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 15), s. 13 (2).—A house was occupied by the London Library and used as a library and reading rooms for the use of members, who paid subscriptions thereto, but who derived no pecuniary profit therefrom. The use of a sitting room and bed room was given to an attendant, in addition to his wages, and the attendant and his wife dwelt in the rooms both by day and at night for the protection of the premises. No other person dwelt on the premises.

Held, that the library was liable to inhabited house duty, and was not exempt therefrom by the provisions of section 13 (2) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878.—London Library v. Carter, Q.B.D. 478—62 L. T. 466.

INJUNCTION :—

1. Bankruptcy—Stay of action—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 9, 10, 37.—In 1886 B., who had acted as agent in Australia for a London firm, brought an action in Victoria against the firm for wrongful dismissal. A bond with sureties to meet the damages was executed. In 1887 a member of the firm died, and in 1889 a receiving order was made against the firm and an interim injunction restraining B.'s action was granted.

Held, that an application to continue the injunction must be refused.—Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Spalding, Q.B.D., BKCY.—61 L. T. 83.

2. Damages—Undertaking—Damages sustained by others than parties restrained.—As a general rule, where an interim or interlocutory injunction is granted, the undertaking as to damages should not be limited to the damages sustained by the party restrained.

An action was brought against A., B., and the C. Co. for an injunction to restrain the C. Co. from confirming by general meeting certain agreements between them and the other defendants. An interim injunction having been granted, A.'s counsel asked for the usual undertaking as to damages, and plaintiff's counsel replied that it would, of course, be given. B. did not appear, not having been served with notice of the motion for the injunction. In drawing up the order the registrar limited the undertaking to damages sustained by the C. Co. (as being the only parties restrained by the injunction), and the order was passed and entered in that form. A. and B. having appealed, and asked that the undertaking might be extended to damages sustained by them respectively,

Held, that, A. having asked for an undertaking, and the plaintiff's counsel having assented, the order must be set right by extending the undertaking to damages sustained by A., but that B., not having applied for or been promised an undertaking, could not now get it extended to damages incurred by him, for that, the court having no power to order an undertaking to be given (an undertaking being merely a condition which the court has power to impose upon the granting of an injunction), the court cannot extend such an undertaking subsequently in the way proposed, as the party might, if asked at the time, have preferred to forego his injunction.

Held, further, that A. ought to have applied to the judge below to set the order right, even after it has been passed and entered, as not correctly expressing the effect of the judgment pronounced.—Tucker v. New Brunswick Trading Co. of London, C.A. 741—44 Ch. D. 249; 59 L. J. Ch. 551.

INSURANCE :—

1. Fire — Contract — Policy — Tender — Initialled slip.—In October, 1886, the plaintiffs, who were merchants in New Zealand, employed insurance brokers in London to effect an insurance against fire on goods in New Zealand. The brokers instructed B., who was also an insurance broker, to effect a part of the insurance. B. prepared a slip, stating the particulars of the risk, which was initialled by the defendant and other members of Lloyds. Through a misunderstanding between the brokers, no policy was signed, and in 1887 the goods were destroyed by fire. No premium had then been paid, but two days after the premium was paid by the plaintiff to the broker. The defendant refused to sign a policy which was afterwards tendered to him.

Held, that the slip was a binding policy of insurance, and was not subject to the implied condition of the tender of a policy within a reasonable time.—Thompson v. Adams, Q.B.D.—23 Q. B. D. 361.

2. Life insurance—Accident—Exception—"Obvious risk of injury."—A policy of insurance against death or injury caused by accident contained an exception in the case of "the exposure of the insured to obvious risk of injury." The insured was killed by a train while he was attempting to cross the main line of a railway in daylight. There was no regular crossing at the spot; there was nothing to prevent a person about to cross from seeing an approaching train. The accused was neither short-sighted nor deaf.

Held, that the risk would have been obvious to the insured if he had been paying reasonable attention to what he was doing, and that the exception applied.—Cornish v. Accident Insurance Co., C.A. 139—23 Q. B. D. 453; 58 L. J. Q. B. 591.

2a. Life insurance — Accident — Poison. — By a policy of insurance a company agreed to pay £1,000 to the representatives of the person insured if "the insured shall sustain any personal injury caused by accidental, external, and visible means within the intention of this policy and provisions and conditions thereof, and the direct effects of such injury shall occasion the death of the insured within three calendar months from the happening of such injury." The policy also contained the following proviso:—"The insured shall not be entitled to make any claim under this policy for any injury from any accident, unless such injury shall be caused by some outward and visible means. . . . And that this insurance shall not extend to death by suicide, whether felonious or otherwise, or to any injury caused by or arising from natural disease or weakness, or exhaustion consequent upon disease, or by any medical or surgical treatment or operation rendered necessary by disease, although such death may have been accelerated by accident, or to any death or injury caused by duelling or fighting, or any other breach of the law on the part of the insured, or by poison or intentional self-injury." While the policy was in force the insured, by accident, drank some poison in mistake for medicine, which he was in the habit of taking, and died from the effects.

Held, that the accident came within the proviso, and that the representatives of the insured were not entitled to recover.—Cole v. Accident Insurance Co., Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 227.

3. Life insurance company—Payment out of deposit Amalgamation—Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), s. 3—Life Assurance Companies Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 41), s. 7.—In order to entitle a life assurance company to receive back the deposit made by them under section 3 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, the sum of £40,000 required by that section to be accumulated must have been accumulated out of the premiums received on the policies of the company.

Where, therefore, the S. Assurance Co. had entered into an agreement for amalgamation with the M. Co., who had, for the security of their then policy-holders, accumulated a sum considerably exceeding £40,000, and the policy-holders of the S. Co. had accepted the liability of the M. Co., but had not abandoned the liability of the S. Co.

Held, that, before the S. Co. could become entitled to receive back the deposit made by them, an accumulation of £40,000 must be made out of the policies of the M. Co. in addition to the amount already accumulated by them.—Ex parte Scottish Economic Life Assurance Co., CH.D. KAY, J. 684—62 L. T. 926.

3a. Life insurance—Policy—Premiums—Payment by stranger—Lien—Contract.—A., the owner of land, and also of a policy of life assurance on his own life in the office of the B. company, mortgaged both these properties to the B. company. It was provided that the mortgage debt should be reduced by instalments, and the mortgage deed contained a covenant by A. to pay the premiums on the policy, and a power of sale was given to the mortgagees (inter alia), if there should be a breach of the covenant, to keep up the policy. A. sold the land subject to the mortgage to C., but retained the policy, and agreed to pay the premiums. He afterwards failed to pay the premiums. The B. company thereupon called upon C. to pay the premiums, and threatened to call in the mortgage and exercise their power of sale if he failed to do so. C. accordingly paid the premiums, and claimed to have it declared that he was entitled to a lien on the policy for the premiums so paid.

Held, that C. was not under the circumstances entitled to any lien on the policy.

Held, further, per Lindley L.J., that C. might have been entitled to a lien if the terms of the agreement between him and A. had not by implication excluded it, and that the list given in In re Leslie, Leslie v. French, 23 Ch. D. 552, of persons who may obtain a lien on a policy is not exhaustive.—Strutt v. Tippett, C.A.—62 L. T. 475.

4. Marine insurance—Collision—Both ships to blame —Lloyd's "running-down" clause.—The defendants insured their ship at Lloyds on a policy containing a running-down clause to the effect that the underwriters should pay three-fourths of any sum which the ship-owners might become liable to pay, and might pay, to the owners of any other vessel for damage caused by a collision. They then insured with the plaintiffs against damage to any other vessel, so far as not covered by the running-down clause in the Lloyd's policy. Subsequently the defendants' ship came into collision with another vessel, both being to blame. Both vessels were injured, but the damage done to the defendants' ship exceeded that sustained by the other. The owners of the other ship paid to the defendants the difference between half the damage sustained by their ship and half the damage sustained by the defendants' ship.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, 38 W. R. 190, 24 Q. B. D. 32), that the defendants had not incurred any liability to pay to the owners of the other ship half the damage sustained, and that they could not recover a proportion of that sum from the plaintiffs under the policy.—London Steamship Owners' Mutual Insurance Association v. Grampian Steamship Co., C.A. 651—24 Q. B. D. 663; 62 L. T. 784.

5. Marine insurance—"Improper navigation"—Improper condition of ship.—By the rules of a mutual insurance association, the plaintiffs, who had entered their ship on the books of the association, were entitled to protection in respect of loss of, or damage to, any goods or merchandise on board the ship caused by the "improper navigation" of the ship. A cargo of wheat was loaded on board the ship, and on arrival at its destination it was found that the wheat was tainted with the smell of paraffin, and it was rejected by the consignee. The smell arose from a cargo of liquid composition, carried on the previous voyage, which had leaked into the hold and saturated the limber boards and ceiling of the ship.

Held, that the damage to the cargo was not caused by "improper navigation" of the ship within the meaning of the rules, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the loss.—Canada Shipping Co. v. Shipowners' Mutual Protection Association, C.A. 87—23 Q. B. D. 342; 58 L. J. Q. B. 462; 61 L. T. 312.

6. Marine insurance — Mutual insurance—Forfeiture—Double insurance — Mortgage — Estoppel.—The rules of a mutual marine insurance company provided that ships of a certain class should not be insured for more than three-quarters of their value, and that if any member should insure, or attempt to insure, elsewhere any ship, or shares in any ship, already insured by the society, he should be liable to immediate expulsion, and a forfeiture of all claims. Every member becoming aware of the mortgage of a ship insured by the company was to give immediate notice, whereupon the directors might call on the mortgagee to give security for all sums due on account of the insurance. In default of such notice, or of security by the mortgagee, the member in whose name the insurance was registered was to forfeit during the existence of the mortgage all claims in respect of the vessel or share to the extent of the mortgage. P., on behalf of the owner of The B., insured that ship with the company for £600, and the policy was issued to him. The ship was already insured with another company for £300, as the directors knew, and £900 was more than three-quarters, but less than the whole, of the sum at which the ship was valued. P. afterwards became aware that the ship had been mortgaged, but no notice of the mortgage was given to the company.

Held, that the company was estopped from enforcing the rule as to double insurance; but that the amount of the mortgage must be deducted from the sum due to P. on the policy.—Jones v. Bangor Mutual Shipping Insurance Society, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 727.

INTEREST:—

1. Compensation—Minerals—Damages—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 29.—The defendants had in 1871 been declared liable in respect of minerals removed by them from under the plaintiff's land, and an inquiry had been directed as to the quantity of minerals taken and their value, with an allowance for cost of carrying to pit's mouth, but not for working.

After this decree the defendants died. The inquiry was continued against their representatives, and the official referee had reported as to the value of the minerals taken.

The plaintiffs claimed on further consideration to be entitled to interest on the sum named in the report with half-yearly rests.

Held, (1) that the action must be treated as in the nature of an action for money had and received, and interest could not be given as damages under section 29 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, which did not apply to such an action; (2) that there was no fiduciary relation between the parties on which such a claim could be based; (3) that the claim ought to have been made at the trial, and that it was too late to make it on further consideration.—Phillips v. Homfray, CH.D. 2. Demand—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28—Railway company.—A claim in the writ for interest upon the amount claimed from the date of the writ till payment or judgment is not a good demand for the purposes of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28.—Rhymney Railway Co. v. Rhymney Iron Co., C.A. 764—25 Q. B. D. 146; 59 L. J. Q. B. 414.

3. Rate of interest—Deposit moneys—Contract to take shares—Rescission—Damages.—W. had contracted to take shares in a company and had paid the deposit moneys. W. subsequently brought an action and obtained rescission of the contract on the ground of misrepresentation, and the deposit moneys were ordered to be repaid.

Held, that W. was also entitled to interest on the deposit moneys from the date on which he paid them. There is no hard and fast rule as to the rate of interest, but having regard to the present mercantile rate of interest 4 per cent. is generally sufficient.—Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association, Wainwright's case, CH.D. 1a. Bye-law—New building—Notice to surveyor—Local Improvement Act.—Section 111 of a Local Improvement Act enacted that "the erection of any building . . . the conversion into a dwelling-house of any building not originally constructed for human habitation," and "the making of any addition to an existing building by raising any part thereof, or making any projection therefrom," should, for the purposes of the Act and the Public Health Acts, and of any bye-laws thereunder respectively, "be deemed to be an erection of a new building," and that the word "building" should, for all such purposes, include "an erection of a building of a permanent character of whatever material constructed." By one of the bye-laws it was provided that "every person before beginning to erect a building or execute any work to which any bye-law relating to new buildings may apply, shall deliver or send to the surveyor a written notice of the date on which he will begin to build or execute the work"; and by another bye-law a penalty was imposed for offences against the bye-laws. The respondent, a builder, at the west side of his dwelling-house, immediately over the ground-floor portion of it occupied by a brick-built scullery, had erected, in accordance with duly approved plans, a conservatory, the west, north, and south walls of which consisted of a framework of wood, filled in with glass, the access to it being through a French window or door in the western external wall of the first-floor room of the house. Subsequently he pulled the conservatory down, bricked up the French window or door, and raised the external walls of the scullery to the same height as that to which the conservatory had reached, and thereby erected over the scullery a brick-built bedroom, occupying the same position and no greater space than the conservatory had done. On summons for infringing the bye-laws, by omitting to give the required notice to the surveyor, the justices dismissed the summons, on the ground that, inasmuch as the bedroom occupied no greater space than the conservatory previously occupied, it was not an "addition to an existing building" within section 111 of the local Act.

Held, on case stated, that the justices were wrong in dismissing the summons on that ground; as, although no greater space was occupied by the bedroom than by the conservatory, it was "an addition to an existing building" within section 111.—Meadows v. Taylor, Q.B.D.—59 L. J. M. C. 99; 62 L. T. 658.

2. Conviction—Appeal—Recognizances—Delay—Jurisdiction of quarter sessions—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 31 (3).—An appellant from a conviction of a court of summary jurisdiction to a court of quarter session had entered into the recognizance specified by section 31 (3) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, but not, as that section requires, within three days after the day on which he gave notice of appeal. The appeal was accordingly dismissed, with costs.

Held, that the recognizance was not void, and might be estreated by the court of quarter sessions for non-payment of the costs awarded upon the dismissal of the appeal.—Reg. v. Justices of Glamorganshire, Q.B.D. 640—24 Q. B. D. 675; 62 L. T. 730.

2a. Conviction—Information—Defect—Alternative offences—Penalty.—A driver of a steam tramcar was prosecuted and convicted for having permitted smoke to escape from his engine "contrary to the bye-laws of the Board of Trade, made for the regulation of traffic on the said company's lines."

The bye-law in question provided that "no smoke or steam shall be emitted from the engines so as to constitute any reasonable ground of complaint to the passengers or the public" under a penalty.

Held, that the bye-law created offences in the alternative, and that, as the information and conviction did not set forth distinctly with which of these alternative offences the defendant was charged, the conviction was bad.—Cotterill v. Lempriere, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 634; 62 L. T. 695.

3. Jurisdiction—Assault—Certificate of dismissal—Withdrawal of charge—Res judicata—Offences against the Person Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), ss. 44, 45.—A. obtained a summons for assault against B. A. gave notice to B. that he would not proceed with the charge, and did not attend or offer evidence at the hearing. B. attended and obtained from the magistrate a certificate of dismissal under section 44 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861. A. brought an action in a county court against B. in respect of the same assault.

Held, (1) that, there having been no hearing on the merits, the magistrate had no jurisdiction to grant the certificate, which was no bar to the action under section 45; (2) (Lord Coleridge, C.J., doubting) that the county court judge had power to inquire into the validity of the certificate.—Reed v. Nutt, Q.B.D. 621—24 Q. B. D. 669; 59 L. J. Q. B. 311; 62 L. T. 635.

4. Jurisdiction—Husband and wife—Aggravated assault—Judicial separation—Evidence—Appeal—Affidavit—Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), ss. 42, 43—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 4.—A husband was convicted of an aggravated assault on his wife, and the justices ordered that she should not be bound to cohabit with him, and that he should pay a weekly sum for her maintenance, and they refused to admit the husband's evidence as to his means.

Held, (1) that the husband's evidence was rightly rejected; (2) that, on an appeal to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, the court could not receive affidavits as to the merits of the case.—Powell v. Powell, P.D. & A.D.—14 P. D. 177; 61 L. T. 436.

5. Jurisdiction—Malicious injury—Highway—Removal of post—Malicious Injuries Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), s. 52.—The respondent, whose wife was the owner of the land at each side of a public footpath, and also of the land over which the footpath passed, erected two wooden posts in the middle of the footpath to prevent his cattle from straying down the path, one post being at the entrance to the footpath and the other some distance along the path. There was a space of two feet at each side of the posts through which foot passengers could pass. The appellants, with a number of others, inhabitants of the district, assembled and pulled up one of these posts and threw it over the fence; they were convicted, under section 52 of the Malicious Injuries Act, 1861, of having committed wilful damage to the post.

Held, that the conviction was wrong, as the appellants, in pulling up the post, had acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that they had a right to do what they did; that the case came within the proviso of the section; and that the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted.—Usher v. Luxmore, Q.B.D. 254.—62 L. T. 110.

6. Jurisdiction—Prohibition—Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), ss. 25, 59—Sale of goods—Post office.—Weights and scales supplied by the Post Office authorities are not within the operation of section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, so that, if such weights or scales are supplied to a postmaster who, at the same time, is carrying on, in the same shop as the post-office, some other business requiring weights and scales, an inspector of weights has no right to seize such post-office weights or scales, even though they are unjust, and even though it be shown that the postmaster has in the shop no other suitable weights or scales for his ordinary business, provided it do not appear that he used such weights or scales in his business.

If, in such a case, an information is preferred against the postmaster under section 25 of the Act, for having in his possession unjust weights, the justices have no jurisdiction to entertain such a question, and a prohibition will go to prohibit them from entering on the inquiry.—Reg. v. Justices of Bromley, Q.B.D. 253.—24 Q. B. D. 181; 59 L. J. M. C. 51; 62 L. T. 117.

7. Res judicata—Dismissal of summons—Dogs Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 56), s. 2.—A. was charged before justices with non-compliance with an order to keep a dangerous dog under control, and the charge was dismissed.

Held, that A. could not be again summoned for not having the dog under control at a time before the date of the former hearing.—Ryley v. Brown, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 458.

8. Special case—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 129—Trade refuse—Mandamus.—The decision of a magistrate under section 129 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, as to what is "trade refuse" within the meaning of that Act is a decision involving a question of law, and a person aggrieved thereby may require the magistrate to state a case for the opinion of the High Court, section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, having modified section 129 of the former Act, which states that the magisterial decision shall be "final and conclusive."—Reg. v. Bridge, Q.B.D. 464—24 Q. B. D. 609; 59 L. J. M. C. 49; 62 L. T. 297.

9. Summons—Service—Delay—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 10.—By section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879, "in all prosecutions under" the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, "the summons to appear before the magistrates shall be served upon the person charged . . . within a reasonable time, and in the case of a perishable article not exceeding twenty-eight days, from the time of the purchase from such person for test purposes of the food or drug, ... and the summons shall not be made returnable in a less time than seven days from the day it is served upon the person summoned."

A complaint was made before two justices against the appellant for having sold adulterated milk, and a summons was granted, but not signed. The summons was afterwards signed and issued by a magistrate who had not heard the complaint. The appellant appeared on the return day under protest, and was convicted.

Held, that the summons was void, and that, the period of twenty-eight days having expired at the date of the hearing, the magistrate had no jurisdiction to hear the case, and the conviction must be quashed.

LANDLORD and TENANT:—

1. Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 7—Compensation—Notice of claim—Notice to quit—Holding over—Custom of county.—The tenant of a farm was entitled under the custom of the county to hold over a part of the land for four months after the expiration of the notice to quit.

Held, that the "determination of the tenancy," within section 7 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, took place when the tenant's holding under the custom of the county ended, and that a notice of his claim for compensation given two months before that time was good.—In re Paul, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 247; 59 L. J. Q. B. 30; 61 L. T. 835.

2. Distress—Bailiff—Percentage fee—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 49, 2nd schedule.—In a distress for rent the bailiff, and not the landlord, is entitled to the percentage fee for "levying distress" specified in the 2nd schedule to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883.

Coode v. Johns, 35 W. R. 47, 17 Q. B. D. 714, dissented from.—Phillips v. Rees, C.A. 53—24 Q. B. D. 17; 59 L. J. Q. B. 1; 61 L. T. 713.

3. Distress—Fraudulent removal of goods—Bill of sale—11 Geo. 2, c. 19, ss. 1, 3—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 13.—11 Geo. 2, c. 19, giving a landlord power to sue for the fraudulent removal of the goods of a tenant in order to avoid a distress does not apply where the goods have become, by the execution of a bill of sale by the tenant, the property of the bill of sale holder.

The landlord has no power to sue under section 13 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, where goods of the tenant granted by him under a bill of sale have been removed by the grantee, with the consent of the tenant, within five days after seizure.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division reversed.

Lane v. Tyler, 56 L. J. Q. B. 461, 35 W. R. Dig. 32, approved.—Tomlinson v. Consolidated Credit and Mortgage Corporation, C.A. 118—24 Q. B. D. 135; 62 L. T. 162.

4. Distress—Goods of third party—Execution—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 160.—Goods of the defendant's were taken in execution of a county court judgment obtained against the defendant. The goods so taken were in a house of which the defendant's wife was lessee. The landlord of the house, before the sale of the goods taken in execution, gave to the bailiff making the levy notice, under section 160 of the County Courts Act, 1888, claiming arrears of rent due from the defendant's wife.

Held, that, as there was a rightful execution against the defendant's goods, the claim of the landlord to distrain for the arrears of rent was good, and must prevail against the claims of the execution creditor.—Hughes v. Smallwood, Q.B.D.—25 Q. B. D. 306.

5. Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 72), s. 12—Condition of tenancy—Fitness for habitation—Damages.—A tenant residing in premises which came under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885, was injured by the fall of a ceiling.

Held, that he was entitled to sue the landlord for damages for breach of the implied condition that the premises were reasonably fit for habitation as provided for by section 12 of the Housing of the Working Classing Act, 1885.—Walker v. Hobbs, Q.B.D. 63—23 Q. B. D. 458; 59 L. J. Q. B. 93; 61 L. T. 688.

6. Lease—Assignment—Sub-lessees—Rent—Contribution.—C. demised to M. a piece of land for 999 years, at a yearly rent of £11 7s. 8d. M. assigned by way of mortgage a part, at an apportioned rent, to A., the predecessor in title of the plaintiff, for the residue of the term, and also assigned by underlease another part, at an apportioned rent, to W., the predecessor in title of the defendants, for the residue of the term, less ten days. The defendant subsequently bought this apportioned rent from M. The plaintiff paid, under threat of distress, the whole chief rent to C., M. being insolvent, and sought to recover from the defendants a proportionate part of the rent.

Held, that no right to contribution existed, for there was no common demand to which the parties were liable, there being no one entitled to sue the defendants for their proportion of the rent.—Johnson v. Wild, Ch.D. Chl., J. 500—44 Ch. D. 146; 59 L. J. Ch. 322; 62 L. T. 537.

7. Lease—Covenant—"Good tenantable repair."—Under an agreement to keep a house in "good tenantable repair," and to so leave it at the expiration of the term, the tenant's obligation is to put and keep the premises in such repair as, having regard to the age, character, and locality of the house, would make it reasonably fit for the occupation of a tenant of the class likely to take it.—Proudfoot v. Hart, C.A. 730—25 Q. B. D. 42; 59 L. J. Q. B. 389.

8. Lease — Covenant — Restrictive covenant — Licensed house—Sale of beer.—By a lease made between C. & W., thereinafter called "the lessors," "including in such term each of them, their, each, and every of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns" of the one part, and H. of the other part, a public-house was demised to H. for a term of years, and he covenanted with the lessors not to take, sell, or deal in upon the demised premises any beer other than beer purchased from the lessors or from either of them, either alone or jointly with any other person or persons who might thereafter become a partner or partners with them or either of them, provided they or he should at such time deal in or vend such liquors as aforesaid, and should be willing to supply the same to the said lessee of good quality and at the fair current market price thereof. At the date of the lease C. & W. carried on business as brewers at the A. Brewery, but they subsequently sold the A. Brewery, with their plant, business, and goodwill, to N. They also conveyed their reversion in the lease of the public-house to him, with the benefits of the covenants in the lease, and expressly assigned to him the benefit of the aforesaid covenant; and about the same time, or soon afterwards, ceased to carry on business and dissolved partnership. N. did not use the A. Brewery as a brewery, but carried on his brewing business at his adjacent M. Brewery. H. having declined to take his beer from N., the latter brought an action in his own name and those of C. & W. for an injunction in the terms of the covenant to restrain H. from taking or selling beer other than such as should have been purchased from N., either directly or through C. & W.

Held, (1) that, upon the true construction of the covenant taken in connection with the clause in the lease defining "lessors," it was a covenant which included C. & W.'s assigns of the reversion in the demised premises, and was not confined to such of their assigns as should continue to carry on the business of brewers at the A. Brewery, and was, therefore, not a mere personal covenant, nor incapable of being assigned; (2) that the covenant was one which did, in fact, touch or concern the demises premised, and the benefit of it would accordingly run at law with the reversion; (3) that, even if the covenant were one the benefit of which would not at law run with the reversion of the demised premises, the fact of the assignment to N. of the brewery business, which must have included the goodwill, and of the benefit of the covenant having been also expressly assigned to N. with the reversion of the demised premises, entitled him in equity to sue upon the covenant; (4) that H., having presumably got the premises at a lower rent in consideration of his entering into the covenant, and it being in effect restrictive, and not affirmative, the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774, applied, and an injunction ought to be granted.

Decision of Bristowe, V.C., affirmed.

Doe v. Reid, 10 B. & C. 849, and Renals v. Cowlishaw, 26 W. R. 754, 28 W. R. 9, 9 Ch. D. 125, 11 Ch. D. 866, distinguished.—Clegg v. Hands, C.A. 433—44 Ch. D. 503; 59 L. J. Ch. 477; 62 L. T. 502.

8a. Lease—Notice to quit.—By an agreement for a lease for five years it was provided that the tenancy might be determined "after the expiration of the term of three years out of the term of five years" by six months' notice in writing expiring at the corresponding quarter day at which the tenancy commenced. The tenant entered into possession on the 29th of September, 1885, and on the 23rd of March, 1888, gave notice to the landlord in the following terms:—"Kindly take notice that I intend to surrender to you the tenancy of this house on or before the 29th of September, 1888."

Held, that the notice to quit was equivocal in its terms, and therefore bad.

9. Tenancy from year to year—Implied covenant—Quiet enjoyment.—In a tenancy from year to year there is no implied covenant for quiet enjoyment against eviction by title paramount on the determination of the landlord's interest, and if, on such determination, the tenant is evicted by the superior landlord, he has, in the absence of an express agreement, no claim against his landlord for damages for such eviction by the superior landlord.—Schwartz v. Locket, Q.B.D. 142—61 L. T. 719.

LANDLORD and TENANT (IRELAND):—

1. Improvements — Compensation — Ejectment — Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 1.—A tenant ejected for non-payment of rent does not lose his right to compensation for improvements.—Kelly v. Lord Massareene, C.A. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 199.

2. Judgment against tenant — Execution against holding—Stay of execution—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 33), s. 30.—The defendant was tenant of two farms, the value of one of which was less than £50, though the aggregate value of both exceeded that amount. The plaintiff obtained judgment against the defendant on a bill of exchange. The defendant applied for a stay of execution against his interest in the farm, which was worth less than £50.

Held, that the case was not within section 30 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, and that the application must be refused.—Bank of Ireland v. Watkins, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 258.

3. Lease—Compulsory sale—Rent—Arbitration—Award—Railways (Ireland) Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 70), s. 9.—Land held by A. as lessee to B. was compulsorily acquired under a local Act, incorporating the Railways (Ireland) Act, 1851. An arbitrator awarded that the rent should be wholly abated. The compensation money was not paid into court till after the award.

Held, that B. was entitled to receive rent from A. from the date of the award till the payment of the compensation into court.—Callow v. Flynn, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 179.

4. Lease—Covenant—Forfeiture—Fair rent—Stay of proceedings—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 13.—In an action of ejectment for forfeiture by assignment of a lease, contrary to covenant, the defendant alleging a waiver, there ought not to be a stay of proceedings under section 13 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881.—McNeill v. Thompson, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 444.

5. Lease — Covenant — Renewal — Enforcement by lessor—Waiver.—A lessor of church lands with a perpetual covenant for renewal was entitled to enforce renewal by the tenant, but for twenty-five years neglected to do so, and permitted the latter to deal with the holding as an ordinary tenancy from year to year.

Held, that the court could not now enforce the covenant in favour of the lessor.—Pilson v. Allen, L.J. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 5.

6. Lease—Covenant—Renewal—Laches.—A tenant under a lease for lives renewable for ever may be compelled to accept a fee-farm grant though the lease contains no express covenant by the lessee to renew.

A landlord's ignorance of the death of the last life in the lease displaces the presumption of laches.—Ward v. McRoberts, L.J. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 224.

7. Lease—Mistake—Rectification.—A lease was made for twenty-one years, from the 29th of September, 1867, at £80 a year, payable half-yearly, in consideration of £40 paid by the lessee, and it was provided that the lessor, his heirs and assigns, should allow to the lessee, his executors or administrators, the said sum of £40 in discharge of the half-year's rent which would accrue due on the 29th of September, 1898, provided that the term should not have been previously forfeited. In an action by the lessor against the assignee of the lease for rent due on the 29th of September, 1888, the defendant averred that the date 1898 had been inserted, by mutual mistake, instead of 1888. The plaintiff alleged in his reply that the agreement was that the £40 should be allowed on the termination of the tenancy, and on giving up possession and on due performance of the covenants in the lease, but that the defendant had not given up possession, and had served a notice to fix a fair rent. The jury found that 1898 was a mutual mistake for 1888.

Held, that the court could treat the lease as reformed by substituting 1888 for 1898, and that the defendant was entitled to credit for the £40.—Borrowes v. Delaney, EX.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 503.

8. Lease—Rent—Fair rent—Ejectment—Covenant for quiet enjoyment—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 8.—If a landlord lets leasehold lands to a tenant from year to year, and is afterwards ejected for non-payment of rent, his tenant having previously fixed a fair rent, the landlord's executor is not liable to the tenant for damages for breach of an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment.—Kearns v. Oliver, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 473.

9. Lease—Rent—Fair rent—Order of Land Commission—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 33), s. 1.—An order of the Land Commission, fixing a fair rent on the application of the assignee of the lease, discharges the original lessee from liability for rent accruing afterwards. — Sturgess v. Ryan, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 305.

10. Lease—Rent—Fair rent—Temporary letting—Resumption—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 58—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 33), s. 1.—B. was tenant under a lease which permitted the lessor to resume, for building purposes, half of the holding. B. served a notice to fix a fair rent.

Held, that the notice must be dismissed.—Butterly v. Carroll, C.A. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 93.

11. Lease—Tenancy from year to year—Estoppel—Bonâ fide occupation—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (45 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 21—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 33), s. 4.—A lessee for twenty years, with a clause against alienation, died intestate. His widow remained in possession for over twelve years. She never took out administration, but was treated as tenant by the lessor. After marrying again she resided on the farm for three years, and afterwards removed elsewhere, but still carried on the farm. The lessor consented to the house and garden being underlet. The lessor afterwards sued the widow of the original lessee and the sub-tenant for possession.

Held, (1) that the lessee's widow was lessee within section 21 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881; (2) (Holmes, J., dissenting) that the plaintiff was estopped from denying the widow's title; (3) that the defendants were in bonâ fide possession when the lease expired.—Rankin v. McMurtry, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 290.

12. Notice to quit—Demand of possession—Service by agent—Land (Ireland) Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 124), s. 86.—It is not necessary that a demand for possession under section 86 of the Land (Ireland) Act, 1860, should be personally made by the known agent of the landlord.

The agent of a landlord signed a written demand of possession and a written authority to a bailiff to serve the demand. The bailiff served the demand on the caretaker.

Held, that the service was sufficiently served.—Lord Massareene v. Bellew, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 420.

13. Recovery of land—Lease—Rent—Non-payment—Administration—Land (Ireland) Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 154), s. 52.—The reversion of a lease was vested in the plaintiff as heir-at-law of A. The plaintiff had obtained letters of administration to A.'s estate. One year's rent was due to the plaintiff as administrator, and six months' rent as heir-at-law and owner of the reversion.

Held, that A. could not maintain an action to recover the land for non-payment of rent.—Mennons v. Burke, EX.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 193.

14. Rent—Fair rent—Receiver—Application by receiver—A receiver appointed by the court on a petition for sale of the lessee's interest in a holding took possession of the holding, and, pursuant to the order of the Land Judge, applied on behalf of the lessee to have a fair rent fixed.

Held, that the lessee was bonâ fide in occupation of the holding, and that a fair rent could be fixed.—Moir v. Blacker, C.A (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 375.

15. Rent — Fair rent — Re-hearing — Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), s. 3.—In 1883 a sub-commission fixed the fair rent of a holding at £64. In 1888 the Land Commission re-heard the case and varied the order by fixing the fair rent at £60. The landlord then sued the tenant for the difference between the old rent, which was £87, and £64, between the dates of the two orders.

Held, that the rent of £60 only was payable from the date of the first payment due after the order of 1883.—Davies v. McMahon, C.A. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 447.

16. Rent—Fair rent—Special contract—Agreement for lease—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 49), ss. 8, 22, 57.—A., who was tenant of land at the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, afterwards agreed in writing with the landlord for a lease for thirty-one years at £225 per annum, and not to sell without the landlord's consent. A. afterwards served a notice to fix a fair rent.

Held, that A. had contracted himself out of the benefit of the Act.—Ronaldson v. Latouche, C.A. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 344.

17. Rent—Non-payment—Ejectment—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 33), s. 7.—The plaintiff obtained judgment against the defendant for possession of two farms held by the latter at a fair rent fixed by the Land Commission. On the 27th of May, 1888, the plaintiff served a notice in lieu of execution under section 7 of the Land Law (Ireland)

Act, 1887. On the 4th of June, 1889, the plaintiff commenced an action to recover the land for non-payment of rent. The defendant had paid no rent since 1884, but he had never been out of possession of farm A.

Held (Murphy, J., diss.), that the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict for possession of A.—Marquis of Clanricarde v. Clarke, EX.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 261.

18. Rent—Non-payment—Redemption—Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 33), s. 7.—The period of six months for redemption under section 7 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, runs from the day of the posting to the tenant of the statutory notice, and not from the day on which he receives it.—Reg. v. Justices of Carlow, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 492.

19. Waste—Ancient pasture—Injunction.—By a settlement dated in 1838 P. was tenant for life of land, with remainder to the plaintiff in tail male, with power to P. to grant leases for three lives or any term not exceeding thirty-one years, provided that the lessees should not be exempt from impeachment of waste. In 1871 P. made a lease to the defendant of a part of the settled land, with a house and garden, at a yearly rent of £79. The lease provided that if any part of the land should be broken up or tilled, it should, at least two years before the expiration of the lease, be planted with grass seed, and delivered up properly laid down in grass. There was a power of surrender, after six months' written notice, at the expiration of any three years of the term. From 1838 till 1871 the land had never been broken up. The defendant ploughed up a small part of the land to drain it.

Held, that it was open to the defendant to show that the act complained of was meliorative waste, and that an injunction could not be granted against him.—Palmer v. McCormick, C.A. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 110.

20. Waste—Illegal conspiracy—Injunction.—A. was tenant to S., for a statutory term, of twelve acres of land on which was a house, which A. occupied. G. was tenant of land only separated from A.'s holding by a road, under a different landlord, and was evicted for non-payment of rent. On the day of G.'s eviction, A. and other persons, without S.'s consent, erected a wooden hut on A.'s holding, opposite to G.'s former house. G. and his family then resided in the hut.

Held, that S. was entitled to an injunction to prevent the continuance of the hut on his land.—Steele v. Tiernan, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 583.

LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT :—

1. Arbitration—Award—Appeal—Entry on land—Injunction—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 85.—An arbitrator decided that a part of the plaintiff's land which was required by the defendants for the purpose of the defendants' railway could be severed from the rest without material detriment. He awarded damages for the value of the land taken, and for the severance. The plaintiff applied to the High Court to set aside the award. The defendants paid the amount of the award into court, and took possession of the land.

Held, that the defendants' entry was lawful, and could not be restrained by injunction on the ground that proceedings to set aside the award were still pending.—Lambert v. Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Co., C.A. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 164.

2. Compulsory powers—Damages—Severance of land—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 49, 63.—Where land is compulsorily taken under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the owner is entitled to compensation for depreciation of the value of his other lands, though such depreciation is due to the anticipated legal use of works to be constructed upon the land taken.

When the unity of ownership of parcels of land conduces to the advantage of the property as one holding, they are held together within the meaning of section 49 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and actual contact is not essential.

Reg. v. Clerk of Peace for Cheshire, 12 W. R. 762, approved.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 34 W. R. 587, 17 Q. B. D. 447, reversed.—Cowper Essex v. Acton Local Board, H.L. 209—14 App. 183; 58 L. J. Q. B. 594; 61 L. T. 1.

3. Compulsory powers—Damages—Light—Loss of easement—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 6, 16.—The owner of certain ancient lights pulled down the old buildings and erected others, of which some of the windows corresponded, and others did not correspond, with the ancient lights. Before any right to the access of light had been acquired by the new windows, a railway company, under statutory powers, erected a building on adjacent land which obstructed the light of all the windows.

Held, affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division (38 W. R. 332, 24 Q. B. D. 40), that compensation must be given in respect of all the windows obstructed, and not merely in respect of those which corresponded with ancient lights.—In re London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Co., C.A. 343—24 Q. B. D. 326; 59 L. J. Q. B. 162; 62 L. T. 306.

4. Compulsory powers—Injury to land—Trial—Regulation of Railways Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), ss. 41, 43—Ord. 36, r. 7a.—Upon a claim for compensation against a railway company for lands alleged to be injuriously affected, the railway company disputed the title of the complainant to the lands in question, and, on an application of the railway company under section 41 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, to a judge at chambers, an order was made directing that the questions of liability and the amount of compensation, if any, should be tried before a judge of the High Court sitting without a jury.

Held, that the order exceeded the jurisdiction given to a judge at chambers under the section, and that "the question between the parties" mentioned in the section only embraced the question of compensation.

Semble, that the question of compensation, if ordered to be transferred to the High Court under the section, can only be tried by a judge with a jury.—In re East London Railway Co., C.A. 312—24 Q. B. D. 507.

5. Compulsory powers—Limits of deviation—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 85, 92—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 13, 15.—A railway company authorized to take such of the lands shown on and described in the deposited plans and books of reference as might be required for the purposes mentioned in the special Act has power to take lands outside the limits of deviation if such lands are reasonably required for the purpose of constructing the line of railway within the limits of deviation, provided that such lands are properly shown and described in the deposited plans and books of reference.

Wrigley v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 4 Giff. 352, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 92, explained.

Dowling v. Pontypool Railway Co., L. R. 18 Eq. 714, 23 W. R. Dig. 203, approved.

The deposited plans and books of reference showed two tenements, marked as Nos. 122 and 123, which consisted of two houses, with their respective curtilages. One of the two houses and part of the other house, as well as parts of the curtilages of both houses, were within the limits of deviation, and the remaining parts of the two tenements were outside those limits. The tenant of the house partly within and partly without the limits of deviation required the company to take the whole of his tenement, but the lessor refused to sell the whole of the two tenements to the company.

Held, that it became reasonably necessary for the company to take the whole of the two tenements numbered 122 and 123, and that, as the whole of these two tenements were shown and described in the deposited plans and books of reference, the company were entitled to take the whole.

Pulling v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 12 W. R. 969, 3 De G. J. & S. 661, distinguished.

Decision of Kay, J. (37 W. R. 375), affirmed.—Fincke v. London and South-Western Railway Co., C.A. 513—44 Ch. D. 330; 59 L. J. Ch. 453; 62 L. T. 881.

6. Costs — Conveyance of outstanding interest—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18) s. 82.—Lands held under a lease for life and term of years, but which for twelve years had been in the possession of A., were taken by a company under compulsory powers. The company required that administration should be taken out to B., the assignee of the lease, through whom A. claimed. C. accordingly took out administration to B., and conveyed her interest in the lands as administratrix to A.

Held, that under section 82 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, the cost of this conveyance should be borne by the company.

7. Payment into court — Lunacy—Investment—Consols—Conversion—Redemption—Petition for re-investment—Cash under control of court—Costs—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 69, 80—Lord St. Leonards' Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38), s. 10—Ord. 22, r. 17.—The purchase-money of land belonging to a lunatic and taken by a railway company had been paid into court and invested in Three per Cent. Consols. The committee not having assented to their conversion, the Consols were redeemed by the Government, and the redemption-money was paid into court to the account of the lunatic, ex parte the railway company.

Held, on a petition by the committee that the redemption-money might be invested in railway preference stock, that the redemption-money was "cash under the control of the court" within the meaning of section 10 of Lord St. Leonards' Act, 1860, and ord. 22, r. 17, and that there was power to direct its investment in the manner sought.

Ex parte St. John's College, Oxford, 31 W. R. 55, 22 Ch. D. 93, followed.

Held, also, that the railway company should pay the costs, as the re-investment was rendered reasonably necessary by the Act of the Legislature, and was not occasioned by the mere caprice of the holder.—In re Brown, LUN. 529; 59 L. J. Ch. 830.

8. Payment out of court—Costs—Incumbrancers.—On petition for payment out of purchase-money paid into court under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the company or local authority must pay the costs, not exceeding 42s., of incumbrancers on the fund, and the costs of an affidavit of service of the petition upon the incumbrancers, even if the incumbrance is created after the payment into court.

The tenant for life afterwards petitioned to apply the purchase-money in discharge of incumbrances.

Held, that the railway company was not liable to pay the costs of the second petition.—In re Dublin, Wicklow, & Wexford Railway Co., M.R. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 175.

LEGACY DUTY:—

Real estate abroad — Partnership — Conversion.—A., who died in 1880, and who at the time of his death was domiciled in England, had for many years previous to his death carried on the business of sheep-breeding in partnership with his brother, S., in New Zealand. Part of the partnership property consisted of a freehold estate in New Zealand, known as the Milbourne Estate. By articles of partnership dated the 14th of February, 1879, made between the testator and S., it was agreed that the Milbourne Estate should be forthwith sold in the manner which the parties should mutually agree upon, and the articles contained provisions for sale in case of no agreement and for carrying on the partnership. S. died in January, 1880. A. was entitled to four-sevenths of the partnership property. No sale of the estate was made in the lifetime either of S. or of the testator. A., by his will, gave his four-sevenths in the Milbourne Estate to trustees upon trust to sell, with powers of management until sale, and subject to the payment of an annuity, and of the income of one-seventh to the widow of S. during her life, to divide the proceeds and produce until sale among thirteen charities. The Milbourne Estate had never been sold, but the income since the death of the testator had from time to time been paid into court in an action to administer the testator's estate which was commenced in 1881. Under an order made in the action in April, 1888, the funds then in court were divided, and legacy duty had been paid upon the moneys arising from the Milbourne Estate. The duty had been paid under an arrangement that it should be repaid if it was ultimately decided that it should not be payable. The governors of the London Hospital, who had been appointed to represent the other charities, presented a petition asking for distribution of the fund which had accumulated in court, without payment of legacy duty, on the ground that, inasmuch as it represented proceeds of sale of real estate in New Zealand, it was not subject to English legacy duty.

Held, that, as the testator's interest in the property was personal estate, legacy duty was payable according to the law of the testator's domicil.

LEGITIMACY. — See EVIDENCE, 8, 9; LEGITIMACY DECLARATION ACT, 1, 2.

LEGITIMACY DECLARATION ACT:—

1. Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 93), s. 1—Foreign marriage—Japan, law of.—The petitioner, a British subject with an Irish domicil of origin, being temporarily resident in Japan, married a Japanese woman in accordance with the formalities required by Japanese law. By the Japanese law the petitioner would be unable to marry any other woman during the continuance of the marriage.

Held, that the marriage was valid.—Brinkley v. Attorney-General, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 76; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 51; 62 L. T. 911.

2. Probate action—Writ—Joinder of claims.—In a probate action the court refused to allow the plaintiff to include in the writ a prayer for a declaration of legitimacy.—Warter v. Warter, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 35; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 45; 62 L. T. 328.

LIBEL:—

1. New trial—Excessive damages.—In an action ex delicto in the nature of an action of libel a new trial ought not to be granted on the ground that the damages are excessive unless the court comes to the conclusion, upon all the circumstances, that the damages awarded by the jury are so large that no twelve reasonable men could have given them.—Praed v. Graham, C.A. 103—24 Q. B. D. 53; 59 L. J. Q. B. 230.

2. Pleading—Aggravation of damages—Ord. 19, r. 27.—In an action for libel published in a newspaper the statement of claim alleged that the defendant knew that the words published would be, and they were in fact, repeated and published in other editions of the same newspaper.

Held, that the allegation was relevant, and ought not to be struck out.—Whitney v. Moignard, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 630; 59 L. J. Q. B. 324.

3. Privilege—Legal proceedings—Report of judgment.—A jury found that an alleged libel was a fair, accurate, and honest report of the judgment of a judge; that it was published bonâ fide and with the honest intention of making known the true facts of the case, in order to protect the reputation of the defendants, and in reasonable self-defence; and that the publication was not malicious.

Held, that it was too late after the trial to raise the question whether or not the judgment truly represented all the evidence given.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (34 W. R. 727, 17 Q. B. D. 636) affirmed on different grounds.—Macdougall v. Knight, H.L. 44—14 App. 194; 58 L. J. Q. B. 537; 60 L. T. 762.

4. Privilege — Register of judgments.—Judgment was obtained against A. in England as executor of his deceased father. The judgment was afterwards registered in Ireland, and in the registered memorandum the judgment was stated to have been recovered against A. personally. The particulars of the judgment as registered were published by the defendants in their weekly gazette, which contains a list of all judgments. The defendants did not act with malice, and had no knowledge of the actual facts.

Held, that the publication was privileged, and that the plaintiff could not maintain an action for libel.—Lord Annaly v. Trade Auxiliary Co., EX.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 11.

5. Privilege—Second action—Stay of action.—The defendants published in the form of a pamphlet a report of a judgment delivered in a former action brought against them by the plaintiff. The pamphlet contained no separate report of the evidence. The plaintiff brought an action for libel in respect of the pamphlet, and specified certain passages in it as defamatory. A jury having found that the report was accurate, and was published bonâ fide and without malice, judgment was given for the defendants, and a new trial was refused by a divisional court, the Court of Appeal, and the House of Lords. The plaintiff then brought a second action in respect of the same pamphlet, specifying, however, other passages as defamatory, and raising as a point of law a question suggested as a doubt by Lord Halsbury, C., in the House of Lords (38 W. R. 44, 14 App. 194)—namely, whether, if the report did not give reasonable opportunities to the reader to form his own judgment as to the conclusion to be drawn from the evidence given, it might be the subject of an action for libel and not be privileged.

Held, that the action must be stayed, as being frivolous and vexatious.—Macdougall v. Knight (2), C.A. 553—25 Q. B. D. 1.

B. D. 557; 59 L. J. M. C. 79; 62 L. T. 290.

2. Permitting gaming—Betting—Money brought to house after receipt outside—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1, 3—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 17.—The appellant was a keeper of a licensed tavern, in close proximity to which were a piece of waste ground and a public footway. On the day of a race meeting a betting man was for some hours on the waste ground and the footway, receiving from persons who resorted thither packets containing money, which they deposited with him for the purpose of backing various horses. The packets were brought into the tavern at intervals by the appellant's daughter. The plan was adopted for the purpose of evading the provisions of the Betting Act, 1853, and with the connivance of the appellant.

Held, that the appellant was not liable to be convicted under section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872, of having suffered his house to be used in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853.—Davis v. Stephenson, Q.B.D. 492—24 Q. B. D. 529; 59 L. J. Q. B. 305; 62 L. T. 436.

3. Provisional licence—Renewal—Refusal—Appeal —9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 27—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 22.—A provisional grant of a licence under section 22 of the Licensing Act, 1874, may be renewed from year to year like an ordinary licence, and an appeal to quarter sessions lies from a refusal of the licensing justices to renew such a licence.—Reg. v. Justices of London, Q.B.D. 269—24 Q. B. D. 341; 59 L. J. M. C. 71; 62 L. T. 458.

4. Renewal of licence—Transfer—Jurisdiction of justices—Appeal—9 Geo. 4, c. 61, ss. 4, 14—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 75, schedule 2. —A licensee, convicted of an offence under the Licensing Acts, declined to quit until the last day of the adjournment of the general annual licensing sessions.

J., a new tenant, obtained a temporary licence, and applied at the next special sessions for a transfer of the former licence under 9 Geo. 4, s. 14, on the ground that the former holder had "wilfully omitted or neglected to apply" for a renewal at the general licensing sessions. The licensing justices refused the application, and, on appeal, the justices at quarter sessions held that they had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, on the ground that the application was one for a new licence and not for a transfer, and that the powers of appeals in that respect were repealed by the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 75, schedule 2.

Held, that the application was one for the transfer of a licence, as contemplated by sections 4 and 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and that the justices had jurisdiction, as it came within the exception contained in the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 75, schedule 2.—Thornton v. Clegg, Q.B.D. 160—24 Q. B. D. 132; 58 L. J. M. C. 6.

5. Sale of beer—Sale of game—Game Act (1 & 2 Will. 3, c. 32), s. 18—Inland Revenue Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 33), s. 1.—The holder of a licence to sell beer in bottles to be drunk off the premises under the Inland Revenue Act, 1863, is, by section 18 of the Game Act, disqualified from holding a licence to deal in game.— Shoolbred v. Justices of St. Pancras, Q.B.D. 399—24 Q. B. D. 346; 59 L. J. M. C. 63; 62 L. T. 287.

6. Sale of beer—Sale by retail—6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2—4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 19—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), ss. 3, 74.—The plaintiff, not being a brewer, held a licence under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2, "to sell strong beer in casks of not less than four gallons and a half imperial gallon measure, or of not less than two dozen reputed quart bottles at one time, to be consumed elsewhere than on his premises." He was summoned under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, for having sold beer by retail without being licensed to do so, in that he had sold beer in two dozen imperial pint or half-pint bottles instead of in the manner stated in the licence, and he was convicted and fined for the said offence.

Held, that the conviction must be quashed, on the ground that, by section 74 of the Licensing Act, 1872, when read with 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 19, a sale of beer by retail is defined to be selling in less quantity than four gallons and a half; that the quantity sold was the criterion of the offence; and that here there had been no offence shown under the Licensing Acts, as the quantity sold was in excess of the measurement statutably imposed.—Fairclough v. Roberts, Q.B.D. 330—24 Q. B. D. 350; 59 L. J. M. C. 54; 62 L. T. 700.

7. Transfer — Refusal — Application by second tenant—Mandamus.—A. applied for a transfer of the licence of a public-house, the holder of the licence having left the house several months before. The justices refused the application. An application for a new licence was afterwards refused. While the original licence was still in force B. entered on the premises and applied for a transfer of the licence, but the judge refused to hear the application.

The court issued a mandamus directing the justices to hear B.'s application.—Reg. v. Justices of Goldcross, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 112.

1. Easement—Extinguishment—Damages—Artisans' Dwellings Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 36), s. 20.—The plaintiff built a house in 1867. In 1877 the land adjoining it was acquired by a local authority under the provisions of the Artisans' Dwellings Act, 1875. In 1888 the defendant, the lessee, erected on the land buildings which obstructed the access of light to the plaintiff's house.

Held, in an action to recover damages for the obstruction, that the defendant was protected by section 20 of the Artisans' Dwellings Act, 1875, since the plaintiff had in 1877 an inchoate right over the land acquired by the local authority, which was extinguished by the section, and in respect of which compensation was payable.—Barlow v. Ross, C.A. 372—24 Q. B. D. 381; 59 L. J. Q. B. 183; 62 L. T. 552.

2. Easement—Implied grant—Railway company—Superfluous land—Injunction.—A railway company sold to the plaintiff a piece of surplus land, with a house erected thereon, facing the railway, which ran over a series of brick arches, through which there was access of light to the lower windows of the house. The company retained lands adjoining the property sold, and the conveyance contained a recital that the company required all the land other than that sold to the plaintiff for the construction of their railway; but it contained no express grant of a right to light. The defendant's predecessor in title subsequently acquired from the company the fee simple of the lands opposite the plaintiff's house, on which he erected buildings, and took a lease of the arches. Afterwards the defendant acquired the property, and blocked up the openings of the arches on the side nearest the plaintiff's house with hoardings.

Held, that the company, on selling the land, entered into an implied obligation not to do anything on the land retained by them which would interfere with the plaintiff's reasonable enjoyment of the land purchased by him, except what was necessary for the construction of their railway; and that, the hoarding erected by the defendant not being necessary for that purpose, an injunction ought to be granted.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.—Myers v. Catterson, C.A. 488—43 Ch. D. 470; 59 L. J. Ch. 315; 62 L. T. 205.

3. Obstruction—Mandatory injunction—Damages—Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), ss. 1, 2.—A mandatory injunction may be granted for the removal of a building obstructing ancient lights, although it was completed before the writ was issued.

The circumstances under which the court will grant such an injunction in lieu of damages under Lord Cairns' Act considered.—Lawrence v. Horton, CH.D. CHI., J. 555—59 L. J. Ch. 440; 62 L. T. 749.

LIMITATIONS, STATUTE of:—

1. Acknowledgment. — In 1882 E. gave B. a promissory note to B. for £2,000, payable in advance. B. died in 1884, and in 1885 E. addressed the following letter to B.'s son, who was one of his executors and residuary legatee:—"The great kindness of your father on every occasion, and more especially the money that he lent me to purchase my seat on the New York Stock Exchange, place me now in your debt. I must now leave it to your generosity whether you will have me liquidate the loan on the sale of my seat." E. sold his seat in 1887, and died in 1888.

Held, that a new period of limitation ran from the date of E.'s letter.—Duke of Buccleugh v. Eden, CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 360.

2. Acknowledgment to stranger.—An acknowledgment of a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations given to a person who is neither the agent of, nor in privity with, the creditor, will not revive the liability.—Rogers v. Quinn, EX.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 137.

3. Acknowledgment — Principal and surety — Payment by principal—Discharge.—Five directors of a company gave, in the years 1871 and 1874 respectively, two joint and several promissory notes to secure an advance to the company. The advance was also secured by a mortgage by assignment by the company of certain leasehold collieries. The company was wound up, and at that date a considerable sum was due to the lenders. The collieries could not be profitably worked. One of the five directors afterwards became bankrupt, and the lenders proved against his estate for the balance due on the promissory notes. The proof was afterwards withdrawn, in pursuance of certain arrangements which the lenders had entered into for the purpose of relieving themselves from the rents and covenants under the colliery leases to which they had become liable, and a general receipt had been given to the trustee in bankruptcy. The lenders now claimed to prove for the balance due on the promissory notes against the estate of another of the signatories which was being administered by the court. This claim was first made in 1879.

Held, that the claim on the first promissory note was barred by the Statute of Limitations, since the fact that the principal debtor, the company, had made payments in respect of the debt did not prevent the statute from running in favour of the surety, and an affidavit by the testator's representatives as to creditor's claims was not a sufficient acknowledgment to take it out of the statute. The receipt given to the trustee in bankruptcy could not release the other sureties, because, although a release to one of several joint debtors is a release to all, the liability became on the bankruptcy several only, and the release was given to one of a number of persons severally liable, and the receipt was not intended to be a release of the whole liability, but merely a compromise of the claim against the bankrupt's estate.

Held, also, that the withdrawal by the creditors of their proof against the bankrupt's estate was a pro tanto discharge to the co-sureties.—Wolmershausen v. Wolmershausen, CH.D. STI., J. 537—62 L. T. 541.

4. Breach of trust—Express trust—Heir-at-law—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 25.—P. devised a house and the rest of his real estate to his executors upon trust, the declaration of trust being as to the house only. He died possessed of two other houses. The executors took possession and received the rents for more than twelve years. The heir-at-law sued the executors, claiming execution of the trust.

Held, that the action was not barred by the Statute of Limitations.—Patrick v. Simpson, Q.B.D. — 24 Q. B. D. 128; 59 L. J. Q. B. 7; 61 L. T. 686.

5. Concealed fraud—Specific allegations—Dismissal of action—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 26.—In a case of concealed fraud within 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 26, the plaintiff must prove that he or the person through whom he claims has been deprived of possession of the land which he claims, and that the fraud could not have been with reasonable diligence discovered during the statutory period. A general allegation of fraud is not sufficient, but all the facts must be fully and precisely set forth in the statement of claim, and, in default of such precise allegations, the court may dismiss the action.—Lawrance v. Lord Norreys, H.L. 753—15 App. 210; 62 L. T. 706.

6. Deposit—Building society—Death of depositor—Action by administrator.—A sum of money was deposited with the defendants by way of loan, upon certain conditions contained in a loan pass-book, which was handed to the depositor at the time of the loan. Those conditions were that notice of withdrawal was required, that the money was payable according to the terms stated when the notice was given, and that no money would be paid out except on production of the pass-book, and the depositor must either attend personally or send a written authority. The depositor having given notice of withdrawal, the defendants sent him a memorandum stating that the sum would be payable on or after a certain day, between 10 a.m. and 5 p.m., and that the memorandum and pass-book must be produced when the money was applied for. Upon the day named in the memorandum for repayment the depositor died intestate, without having applied for or received the money. The plaintiff, who had taken out letters of administration to the estate, brought an action to recover the amount of the deposit more than six years after the date named in the memorandum for repayment, but within six years from the grant of the letters of administration.

Held, that the conditions contained in the pass-book were conditions precedent to any liability in the defendants to repay the money, and that, as these conditions had not been fulfilled by the depositor, no cause of action accrued to him in his lifetime, and the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until the letters of administration had been taken out.

Held, also, that, even assuming the conditions—except that as to notice—were not conditions precedent, in the absence of proof by the defendants that the depositor died after the hour named for the repayment, it was not proved that a cause of action accrued to him in his lifetime, and the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until letters of administration had been taken out.—Atkinson v. Bradford Equitable Benefit Building Society, C.A. 630, 657n; 59 L. J. Q. B. 360; 62 L. T. 857.

7. Estate tail—Infant—Disability—Accruer of right—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), ss. 1, 3, 9.—The plaintiff's mother was tenant in tail by descent of certain property which was entailed by the will of a testator who died in January, 1811, and she became entitled to the possession of the property on the death of R. W., which took place in November, 1871, at which time the plaintiff's mother was under no disability either of coverture or infancy. She married in 1875, and died in 1882, without ever having acquired possession of the property. Upon her death the plaintiff became entitled to possession as her issue in tail, and in 1889 he commenced an action to enforce his right to such possession.

On a point of law as to whether the plaintiff, not having claimed or taken possession until after the expiration of twelve years from November, 1871, and who was an infant on his mother's death, and also at the date of the action, was entitled to the benefit of his infancy to prevent the Statute of Limitations from running.

Held, that as the plaintiff claimed through his mother, as a tenant in tail, the right to possession first accrued to her; that, as there had been no possession by either of them for twelve years, the statute applied; and that, therefore, the plaintiff was not now entitled to claim the property.—Murray v. Watkins, CH.D. CHI., J.—62 L. T. 796.

8. Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 62—Street—Paving, &c.—Expenses—Charge on premises—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37

& 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.—A local authority which had incurred, in 1875, expenses which, by section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1858, were made a charge upon the premises in respect of which they were incurred, did not apportion the expenses till 1885, and in 1889 brought an action against the then owner of the premises to effectuate the charge.

Held, that the expenses became a charge upon the premises at the date at which they were incurred; that the period of twelve years limited by section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, commenced to run then, and that the action was brought too late.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (reported 37 W. R. 556, 23 Q. B. D. 149) affirmed.—Hornsey Local Board v. Monarch Building Society, C.A. 85—24 Q. B. D. 1; 59 L. J. Q. B. 105; 61 L. T. 867.

8a. Mortgage—Foreclosure—Interest—Evidence.—In a foreclosure action on an equitable mortgage to secure a simple contract debt the mortgagor pleaded the Statutes of Limitation.

Held, that there was no evidence of a payment of interest sufficient to take the case out of the statute.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal (33 Ch. D. 127) affirmed upon the facts and evidence, without any expression of opinion as to the propositions of law laid down therein. — Newbould v. Smith, H.L.—14 App. Cas. 423; 61 L. T. 814.

9. Possession—Agent—Trustee—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, ss. 2, 3, 8, 9, 14, 34—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 1.—D. was devisee in fee of certain hereditaments let to yearly and weekly tenants under the will of B., who died in 1859. D. and K. were executors of the will, but as such had no interest in the property in question. K., by arrangement, managed this property in the name of "the executors of B.," gave receipts for rents, and paid them into an account so entitled. D. died in 1867, intestate as to this property, but no change was made in the management of the property. K. frequently acknowledged that he was acting for D.'s heir down to 1880, when he claimed to be in receipt of the rents and profits for himself. L., the assignee of the co-heiresses of D., brought an action in 1881 against K. to recover possession of the land, and for an account of the rents and profits.

Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, 35 W. R. 725, 18 Q. B. D. 796), that K. was an agent, whose acts were ratified by bringing this action; that he was never in actual possession, which was in the heirs; that the rents were received in a fiduciary character; and that, subject to the existing tendencies and all just allowances, L. was entitled to judgment.—Lyell v. Kennedy, H.L. 353—14 App. Cas. 437; 59 L. J. Q. B. 268; 62 L. T. 77.

10. Principal and surety—Acknowledgment—Mortgage—Covenant—Interest—Payment by principal—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, ss. 3, 5—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 14—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.—If section 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, applies at all to actions brought against one who, covenanting expressly as surety, has, jointly and severally with a mortgagor, covenanted for payment of the mortgage debt, then payments made by the principal debtor keep alive the remedy against the surety.

Decision of Kay, J. (37 W. R. 603), affirmed.

Quære, whether section 8 applies to actions brought against a surety on such a covenant.—Allison v. Frisby, C.A. 65—43 Ch. D. 106; 59 L. J. Ch. 94; 61 L. T. 632.

11. Rent—Payment to third person—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, ss. 2, 3, 8.—The owner of land, subject to a yearly tenancy vested in the defendant, devised it to G. for life, with remainder to G.'s issue, as G. should appoint. G. received rent from the defendant till 1872, when G. died. G. by his will appointed land to W. in fee, and devised other land to M. on certain trusts. From 1872 till 1879 M. received rent from the defendant, his agents giving receipts for rent due to the representatives of G. W. died in 1879, having devised the land to J., and the defendant did not afterwards pay any rent. In 1888 M. and J. sued the defendant for rent.

Held, that the claim was not barred by the Statute of Limitations.—McAuliffe v. Fitzsimons, EX.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 29.

12. Solicitor—Negligence—Mortgage.—A client sued a solicitor for negligence in advising an investment in an insufficient mortgage, the defendant not having disclosed the fact that he had not had an independent valuation.

Held, that the Statute of Limitations ran from the date when the negligence was discovered.—Wood v. Jones, CH.D. KEK., J.—61 L. T. 551.

13. Will—Real estate—Conversion—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), ss. 8, 10.—The testator left all his property upon trust for sale and conversion into money, and, "after payment thereout" of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, to be held on certain trusts. In answer to an advertisement for creditors, A. sent in a claim to the executor.

Held, that, as against the real estate, A.'s claim could not be barred within twelve years.—Warburton v. Stephens, CH.D. KEK., J.—43 Ch. D. 39; 59 L. J. Ch. 109; 61 L. T. 609.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT:—

1. Building line — Unfinished houses — Public Health Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 52), s. 3.—A. began to erect the front main wall of a new house. B. had at that time raised the front main wall of a house which he was building on the same side of the same street to a height of five inches above the ground. The two houses were more than 300 feet apart, there being no other house between them. The front main wall of A.'s house was six feet nearer to the road than that of B.'s house.

Held, that A. had not erected any part of a house beyond the front main wall of the house on either side within section 3 of the Public Health Act, 1888.—Ravensthorpe v. Local Board of Hinchcliffe, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 168; 59 L. J. M. C. 19; 61 L. T. 80.

2. Building without approval of board—Demolition—Notice—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 158.—A local board cannot, under section 158 of the Public Health Act, 1875, pull down buildings erected without their approval until it has given the building owner notice of its intention to pull them down.

Cooper v. Wandsworth District Board, 11 W. R. 646, 14 C. B. N. S. 180, and Masters v. Pontypool Local Government Board, 9 Ch. D. 677, 27 W. R. Dig. 121, approved.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division affirmed.—Hopkins v. Smethwick Local Board, C.A. 499—24 Q. B. D. 712; 59 L. J. Q. B. 250; 62 L. T. 783.

3. Bye-law—Ultrà vires—New street—Width of entrance—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 157.—One of the bye-laws of a local board, which had been allowed by the Local Government Board, provided as follows:—"Every person who shall construct a new street shall provide at one end at least of such street an entrance of a width equal to the width of such street and open from the ground upwards."

Held, that, upon the right construction of the bye-law, it prevented a landowner from constructing a new street and building upon his own land until he had provided an entrance to the new street of the requisite width; and that the bye-law was not ultrà vires, but applied not merely to the making of the roadway, with sewers and footpaths, but also to the construction of the houses on each side and the gardens attached to them; and that, if the landowner could not provide the requisite entrance, either over his own land or by arrangement with some other landowner, he could not utilize his land by constructing a new street and building houses upon it.

4. County council—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869—Contributions by borough authority—Action to recover contributions—Mandamus.—The plaintiffs, as the local authority of a borough, having brought an action against the defendants, as the local authority for the county, to recover the proportionate amount contributed by the plaintiffs between the years 1869 and 1878 to the expenses incurred by the local authority for the county under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act of 1869.

Held, that no action would lie against the defendant for the amount claimed, and that the plaintiffs' remedy under the Act of 1869 against the local authority for the county was by mandamus.—Salford (Mayor of) v. County Council of Lancashire, C.A. 661—25 Q. B. D. 384.

5. County council—Joint committee—Maintenance of buildings—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 30 (4).—The standing joint committee of a quarter sessions and county council has exclusive control of buildings used for quarter sessions, or for the accommodation of justices out of session, or their clerks, or by the police. All questions as to the maintenance or repair of such buildings must be determined by the joint committee, and the county council must raise such sums as the joint committee may in their discretion think it necessary to expend on the building.—Ex parte Somersetshire County Council, Q.B.D.—58 L. J. Q. B. 513.

6. County council—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 74)—Local Government Act, 1888 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 41), s. 28.—A county council, as the local authority for carrying out the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, appointed an executive committee, who had delegated to a sub-committee, as authorized by schedule 6 (5) (6), the exercise of powers under that Act. Subsequently an Order in Council was issued, calling upon the local authorities to take steps against rabies under the powers given them by the Act, and the executive committee thereupon issued regulations against rabies on their own authority, for breach of which regulations the appellant had been fined.

Held, that the executive committee had the right to issue such regulations, since, in delegating their powers to a sub-committee, they had in no way parted with their original powers as local authority.—Huth v. Clarke, Q.B.D. 655—25 Q. B. D. 391; 59 L. J. M. C. 120.

7. County council—Street—Paving expenses—Main roads—Highways Amendment Act, 1878, ss. 13, 15—Local Government Act, 1888, s. 11, sub-sections 1, 2.—The county council of the county is liable to the local board of an urban sanitary district for the costs of the maintenance and repair, and reasonable improvement connected with the maintenance and repair, of paved or pitched crossings over what are "main roads" within the meaning of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, and if the local board alter the flagging or pavement of the footways in the streets of the town, the county council is liable for the cost of such alteration, if it be a reasonable improvement, and if there be any dispute as to the reasonableness, such dispute is to be settled by arbitration of the Local Government Board.—Warminster Local Board v. Wilts County Council, Q.B.D. 671—59 L. J. Q. B. 434; 62 L. T. 902.

8. District rate—Improvement rate—Special Acts—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 207, 211.—Improvement commissioners were empowered by special Acts to levy a rate not exceeding 1s. in the pound on the annual value of all houses, buildings, and hereditaments within the town of Cambridge, for the purpose of certain specified improvements. When the special Acts were passed the colleges at Cambridge were not liable for the improvement rate. After the passing of the Public Health Act, 1875, the commissioners, acting as an urban sanitary authority, assessed the appellant railway company at the full net annual value of its land and property for the purposes of the special Acts and of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Held, that the rate to be levied under the special Acts was not a "rate in the nature of a general district rate leviable throughout the whole of the district" within section 207 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and that, as regards the rate to be levied under that Act, the appellants were liable to be rated at only one-fourth of the net annual value.—Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Cambridge Improvement Commissioners, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 243.

9. Markets and Fairs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 27), s. 4—Weighing machine—Highway—Nuisance—Injunction.—The plaintiffs, the market authority under the Markets and Fairs Act, 1887, provided a weighing-machine for cattle in a market-place which consisted of two strips in the town separated by the highway. The defendants interfered on the ground that the market-place was a highway dedicated to the use of the public, subject only to the right of the owner of the soil or his lessees to hold markets, and was vested in the defendants, as the urban authority, and that the proposed machine would be a public nuisance, and interfere with their rights in the highway and with the public right of passage.

Held, that section 4 of the Markets and Fairs Act, 1887, was imperative, and the market authority was bound to provide a weighing-machine for the market, which must be a permanent structure and not a movable machine, and that the defendants must be restrained from interfering with the plaintiffs.—Macintosh v. Romford Local Board, CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 185.

10. Penalty—Officer—"Allowance"—Town clerk—Solicitor—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 189, 193.—The defendant was clerk to an urban sanitary authority at a fixed salary. After the fixing of the defendant's salary the sanitary authority promoted a sewage scheme, in connection with which a large amount of extra labour, which was not in contemplation when the defendant's salary was fixed, was thrown upon him. On the completion of the works the authority resolved that he should be paid a sum of money for his services in connection with the scheme.

Held, that the defendant, in accepting the money, did not render himself liable to the penalties imposed by section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875, on officers or servants of local authorities accepting, under colour of their office or employment, any fee or reward other than their proper wages, salaries, or allowances.

Semble, the word "allowances" in section 193 of the Public Health Act, 1875, includes extra payment for extra work.—Edwards v. Salmon, C.A. 166—23 Q. B. D. 531; 58 L. J. Q. B. 571.

11. Sanitary expenses—Charge on land—Registration—Mandamus—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 257—Land Charges Registration Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 51), ss. 4, 10.—Expenses incurred in respect of premises by a local authority in carrying out the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, for the repayment of which the owner of the premises is liable, are, by section 257 of that Act, made "a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred."

Held, that such charges are not "land charges" within the meaning of the Land Charges Registration Act, 1888, and do not require registration.—Reg. v. Holt, Q.B.D. 236—24 Q. B. D. 178; 59 L. J. Q. B. 113; 62 L. T. 117.

12. Street—Apportioned expenses—"Owner"—Validity of notice—Receiver appointed in action—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 2, 4, 150.—A receiver of rents and profits appointed in an action is not within the term "owner" in section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875.—Bacup (Corporation of) v. Smith.—CH.D. CHI., J. 697—44 Ch. D. 395; 59 L. J. Ch. 518.

12a. Street—Lighting expenses—General expenses—Railway—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 161, 211, 229, 230, 276.—An order was made by the Local Government Board under section 276 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which directed that the provisions of the first paragraph of section 161 of that Act (which gives powers to urban authorities for lighting the streets in their districts with gas) should be in force within certain contributory districts of a rural sanitary authority, and the rural sanitary authority should be invested with the powers of an urban sanitary authority "under those provisions." The rural authorities issued their precept under section 230 for payment of the expenses of the lighting. A railway company, having property in one of the contributory districts, contended that they ought to be assessed under section 211 at one-fourth only of the rateable value of their property.

Held, that the expenses were general expenses, and not special expenses under section 229.

Held, also, that, on the true construction of the order of the Local Government Board, it did not invest the rural authority with the powers of the urban authority as to rating, and they were only entitled to issue the precept under their ordinary powers; and that, therefore, the railway company must be rated at the full rateable value of their property.—Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. v. Bolton Union Assessment Committee, C.A.—23 Q. B. D. 555; 58 L. J. Q. B. 256; 61 L. T. 782.

13. Street—Paving, &c.—Expenses—Charge on land—Restrictive covenant—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 150, 257, 276.—The charge upon premises for expenses for improvements created by section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is a charge upon the whole proprietorship of the land, and not merely a charge upon the estate in fee simple.

Premises subject to a restrictive covenant against building, which become liable to such a charge, may, for the purpose of satisfying the charge, be sold free from the covenant.—Tendring Guardians v. Dowton, CH.D. STI., J. 653—59 L. J. Ch. 528; 62 L. T. 805.

14. Street—Paving, &c.—Expenses—Highway—Additional land—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 150, 257.—Where a street has been formed by an old footpath and by strips of land newly added to it, and the old footpath was repairable by the parish, the frontagers are liable to pay the expenses incurred in improving the whole street under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875.—Evans v. Newport Urban Sanitary Authority, Q.B.D. 400—24 Q. B. D. 264; 59 L. J. M. C. 8; 61 L. T. 684.

15. Street—Paving, &c.—Expenses—Sale of property before notice—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 150.—In January, 1883, a local board passed a resolution to pave a street, and in May, 1883, a notice was served on P. requiring him to carry out the works. P. had been the owner of the whole of the land on which the street was formed, but in April, 1883, he had sold the property to A.

Held, that A. was not liable for the paving expenses. Wallsend Local Board v. Murphy, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 777.

16. Street—Tramway—Paving—Right of road authority to alter pavement—Difference between company and road authority—Reference to arbitration—Injunction—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 33.—The defendants, who were the road authority, gave notice to the plaintiffs, a tramway company, of their intention to re-lay the whole of the roadway of certain streets, along which the plaintiffs' tramways were laid, including the part between the tramway rails, with a particular kind of pavement, and for this purpose to take up the existing pavement. The plaintiffs objected, and brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the pavement between and contiguous to their tramway rails until the matter in difference had been settled by a referee nominated by the Board of Trade under section 33 of the Tramways Act, 1870.

Held, that, as the defendants were acting under the general powers vested in them as road authority of altering and improving the roads, section 33 was not applicable, and an injunction could not be granted.

the Act, if the visitors in their discretion think right to grant him such allowance.—Reg. v. Hereford County Council, Q.B.D. 775.

2. Judgment—Charging order—Fund in court.—A fund was standing in the books of the Paymaster-General of the Chancery Division to the credit of P., "a person of unsound mind." A judgment creditor of the lunatic applied for an order charging the fund, and a judge at chambers ordered that "so much of the defendant's interest in the fund so standing as aforesaid should stand charged with the payment of the . . . amount due on the judgment as the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy might deem applicable to payment of the judgment debt."

Held, that the proper form of order upon such an application was to make an order charging the fund, or such part of it as the judge should think fit, and that the judge had no jurisdiction to leave it to the discretion of the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy to say how much should be so charged.—Horne v. Pountain, Q.B.D. 240—23 Q. MARKET:—

Disturbance—Sale of animals out of market—Penalty.—The Abergavenny Improvement Commissioners were by private Acts, incorporating the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, authorized to set up a market and to take tolls for animals sold there, tolls and penalties being imposed on all persons selling such animals within the district, except in their own dwelling-houses or shops or premises in their own occupation. The defendant, an auctioneer, held sales of such animals in a field in his own occupation.

Held, that this did not constitute a disturbance of the market, though it would have been otherwise but for the special Acts, as the defendant's conduct would have been a disturbance of an ancient market.—Abergavenny Improvement Commissioners v. Straker, CH.D. MARRIED WOMAN:—

1. Administratrix—Retainer—Loan by wife to husband—Death of husband intestate and insolvent—Administration of husband's estate — Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 3—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10.—A married woman advanced money to her husband for the purposes of his business. The husband died intestate and insolvent without repaying the advance, and the widow became his administratrix. An action was brought by creditors for the administration of the husband's estate. The widow, as administratrix, received considerable personal estate of her husband, and claimed to retain out of the balance in her hands the amount of her advance to him. On a summons in the administration action for payment of the balance into court, Held, that the widow, as administratrix, was entitled to retain out of the balance of the personal estate the amount of the advance made by her to her husband.—In re May, Crawford v. May, CH.D. NOR., J. 765.

2. Equity to settlement—Waiver—Election—Deed—Acknowledgment.—In 1866 A., who was a married woman and one of the presumptive next of kin of a lunatic, in consideration of money advanced to her husband, and of a covenant by B. to repay to her on the lunatic's death two sums of £400 and £500, with interest on the former amount, for her separate use, joined with her husband in assigning to B. her prospective share in the lunatic's estate, the husband covenanting for a good title and for further assurance. The interest on the £400 was paid till the lunatic's death in 1881, but not afterwards. In a suit to administer the lunatic's estate A. was declared one of the next of kin. In 1883 A., being then the administratrix of the lunatic, acknowledged the deed of 1866 before commissioners. Part of the lunatic's property had been lent on the security of real estate.

Held, (1) that the deed of 1866 was void against A., and could not be confirmed by her; (2) that A. had not elected to take under the deed, nor waived her equity to a settlement.—Druitt v. Willens, M.R. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 436.

3. Separate estate—Contract—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1 (3).—An action of contract against a married woman under section 1 (3) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is answered if it appears that, at the time of entering into the contract, the married woman had not any separate property which she could reasonably be supposed to have intended to bind.

A married woman was entitled to the income of certain stock for her separate use without power of anticipation. At the time of entering into the contract sued upon, she had spent all the income then accrued in clothing for herself and her children.

Held, that it was unreasonable to suppose that the wife intended to bind the clothing by her contract.—Leake v. Driffield, Q.B.D. 93—24 Q. B. D. 143; 59 L. J. Q. B. 89; 61 L. T. 771.

4. Separate estate—Contract—Damages—Agreement for lease—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1 (2).—In 1876 A., a married woman, agreed to grant a lease to B., when he should have built a house on the land, with an option of buying the freehold. In 1877 B. assigned the agreement to D. by way of mortgage. In 1878 A. conveyed the land to B.

Held, that section 1 (2) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is not retrospective, and that A.'s breach of contract did not bind her separate estate.—Davies v. Stanford, CH.D. KEK., J.—61 L. T. 234.

5. Separate estate—Contingent title—Spes successionis—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 57), s. 5.—J. S. by his will left property to trustees upon trust for his daughter, E. B., for life, with an ultimate remainder, upon failure of issue of E. B., to "such person or persons as, at the time of the failure of the preceding trust, would be my next of kin and entitled to my personal estate under the statutes for distribution of the personal estate of intestates if I had then died intestate." J. S. died in 1879; E. B. died in 1886 without having had any issue. E. P., who would have been one of the next of kin of J. S. if he had died at the same time as E. B., and who was married before the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, made her will in 1887, and died in 1889, leaving her husband her surviving.

Held, that the property first accrued in title and interest to E. P. on the death of E. B. in 1886, and that by section 5 of the above-mentioned Act E. P. was entitled to it for her separate use, and that it passed by her will.

In re Beaupré's Trust, 21 L. R. Ir. 397, dissented from.—In re Parsons, Stockley v. Parsons, CH.D. KAY., J. 712—62 L. T. 929.

6. Separate estate—Evidence—Burden of proof—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1 (3).—In an action against a married woman for jewellery supplied, the jury found that she had purchased the goods "on her own credit for her own use as her separate estate." According to the evidence, the only separate estate existing at the time of the contract was certain other jewellery previously supplied by the plaintiffs and a wardrobe of dresses, furs, and jackets, and there was no evidence of any separate property being subsequently acquired other than these.

Held, on a motion for judgment, that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment, on the ground that such separate property was property in respect of which the married woman might reasonably be deemed to have contracted credit within the meaning of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and that the words "unless the contrary be shown" in section 1 (3) only admit evidence of the fact of there being no such separate property in respect of which a married woman could reasonably be deemed to have contracted, and not of any intention, or absence of intention, of the married woman so to contract, at the time of making the contract or getting credit.

7. Separate estate—Judgment—Garnishee order—Relation back of judgment—Ord. 41, r. 3; ord. 45, r. 1—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1.—The plaintiff in 1887 recovered judgment against the defendant, a married woman, in the form laid down in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120. On the 23rd of July, 1889, the defendant obtained a verdict for £150 against a third person for malicious prosecution, and the judge at the trial gave judgment, but judgment was not entered till October. On the 31st of July, 1889, the plaintiff, whose judgment remained unsatisfied, obtained an order attaching the £150 to answer his judgment.

Held, affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, that the order was rightly made, as the plaintiff had obtained a "judgment" against the defendant within the meaning of ord. 45, r. 1, and the £150 was a "debt owing" to the defendant within that order.

Held, also, that, by ord. 41, r. 3, the judgment, when entered, related back to the day on which it was pronounced, and that there was a debt at the date of the garnishee proceedings.—Holtby v. Hodgson, C.A. 68—24 Q. B. D. 103; 59 L. J. Q. B. 46; 62 L. T. 145.

8. Separate estate—Judgment against wife—Action against husband—Statute of Limitations—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 13—15.—A husband who is sued for the ante-nuptial debts of his wife is entitled to the benefit of the Statute of Limitations from the time when such debts first accrued against her.

The plaintiff having recovered judgment against a married woman for a debt incurred by her before her marriage, and such judgment being unsatisfied because she had no separate estate, sued her husband, who had received property from his wife, for the amount of the debt.

Held, that the action was not barred by the prior judgment against the wife.—Beck v. Pierce, C.A. 29—23 Q. B. D. 316; 58 L. J. Q. B. 516; 61 L. T. 448.

9. Separate estate — Restraint on anticipation—Judgment — Costs — Execution—Garnishee order on trustee—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1 (2).—An order, with costs, against a married woman suing under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, in respect of her separate property must state that the costs are "payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise," and execution must be limited to separate property not subject to restraint on anticipation.

Money in the hands of a trustee for a married woman in respect of separate property subject to restraint on anticipation, and accruing due after a judgment against her, is not liable to attachment by the judgment creditor.—Galmoye v. Cowan, CH.D. CHI., J.—58 L. J. Ch. 769.

10. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Life estate — Gift over — Forfeiture—Mortgage.—A married woman entitled to a life interest in a fund for her separate use without power of anticipation, and with a gift over "on her anticipating" the income, assigned her life interest by way of mortgage.

Held, that, as the assignment was wholly inoperative, the married woman had not in fact anticipated her income, and therefore her life interest had not determined.—Frank v. Muzeen, CH.D. NOR., J. 425—43 Ch. D. 630; 59 L. J. Ch. 404; 62 L. T. 433.

11. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Removal—Annuity— Partnership — Company—Preference shares—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 39), ss. 39, 69.—A married woman was entitled to a life annuity, with restraint on anticipation, charged on a third share of a partnership. It was proposed to convert the partnership into a limited company.

The court sanctioned the removal of the restraint on anticipation to enable the annuity to be released on being satisfied that it was for the woman's advantage to receive preference shares in the company producing an income equal to the annuity, to be settled on her for life, with a restraint on anticipation, and with a power of appointment on her death.—In re Millar, M.R. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 107.

12. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Second marriage — Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 75), ss. 13, 19.—Section 13 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, by which a woman, after her marriage, is made liable in respect and to the extent of her separate property for all debts contracted by her before her marriage, and section 19, by which a restraint on anticipation imposed by a woman in a settlement of her own property is invalid against debts contracted by her before marriage, refer not only to debts contracted by her while a feme sole, but also to those contracted by her under the powers of the Act during a previous coverture.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division reversed. —Jay v. Robinson, C.A. 550; 59 L. J. Q. B. 367.

13. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Settlement — After-acquired property — Covenant to settle.—A. by a deed appointed, under a power contained in a will, that after her death the trustees of the will should hold her share in certain real and personal estate as to £1,000 upon trust for her daughter, and as to part of the residue in trust for such daughter and two others equally, the £1,000 and the daughter's share in the residue to be for the latter's separate use, and her receipt to be a sufficient discharge as each sum should become due, and not by way of anticipation. The daughter married in 1882, and covenanted by her settlement to settle the appointed property. A. died in 1889.

Held, that the restraint on anticipation was removed by the covenant in the settlement.—Wood v. Hooper, CH.D. KEK., J.—61 L. T. 197.

14. Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Settlement—Infancy—Judgment—Receiver—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 1 (3), 19.—A married woman, who was an infant at the time of her marriage, was then entitled to a fund for her separate use, and to freeholds. After marriage, and while still an infant, she contracted a debt, for which judgment was recovered against her separate estate. After contracting the debt, but before attaining the age of twenty-one, a post-nuptial settlement was made of all her property for separate use, with a restraint on anticipation, and after her death for her husband and children. The settlement was approved by the court.

Held, that the settlement was valid against creditors, and that the judgment creditor was entitled to a receiver.—Hemingway v. Braithwaite, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 224.

15. Separate estate—Will—Power of appointment—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 1 (1), 2, 5.—Section 1 (1) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, must be construed with sections 2 and 5, and does not give a married woman power to dispose of property not falling within either of the two latter sections.

In 1863, by a marriage settlement, the wife's property was, in default of issue, limited upon trust for the wife absolutely if she survived her husband, but if she should predecease him upon such trusts as she should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for her next of kin. In 1886 the wife made a will appointing, if she should die during coverture, the fund to trusts on certain trusts. She also bequeathed to the trustees on the same trusts all property of which she could dispose by will. She survived her husband, and died without having had issue.

Held, that the settled property did not pass under the will.

MASTER and SERVANT:—

1. Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 7—Persistent following —Prevention of lawful act.—A., a workman on strike, stood as a picket outside a certain manufactory, and, when the workmen employed in the place of the strikers came out, followed B., one of the foremen, down two streets. A crowd also followed B. with hostile words and gestures.

Held, that A. was properly convicted under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, of persistently following B. from place to place. —Smith v. Thomasson, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 68.

2. Contract—Engaging in business—Injunction.—S. agreed, in writing, with B. not to engage in a similar business within half a mile of B.'s premises for six months after leaving the same. S. left B.'s service and entered the service of D., who carried on the same business next door to B.

Held, that the defendant must be restrained by injunction from entering D.'s service for six months after leaving B.'s service.—Watts v. Smith, CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. T. 453.

3. Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1 (4)—Conforming to order.—The plaintiff was employed by the defendant, the owner of a saw mill, containing saws driven by steam power, and was told by the defendant's foreman to cut some wood in specified lengths with the circular saw. This work was generally performed by two men, one "feeding" the saw and the other taking the wood out from it. A. was engaged by the defendant to attend to the engine and boiler, and to assist generally in the saw mill, and was also told "not to neglect the engine." At the time in question the plaintiff was at one end of the saw frame pushing the wood through it, and A. was at the other end receiving the wood coming out from the saw. Hearing steam blowing off, A. suddenly, and without notice to the plaintiff, let go the wood and ran to the engine-room, whereupon the wood, becoming unsteady, shook the plaintiff's hand against the saw, which cut and injured his fingers.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, on the ground that, although the injury was caused by "the act or omission" of A. in leaving the saw without notice to the plaintiff, there was no evidence that such act or omission was "done or made in obedience to any rule or bye-law of the employer, or to instructions by any delegate of his.—Whatley v. Holloway, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 639.

4. Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1 (3)—Conforming to order—Negligence—Contributory negligence.—A workman sought to recover compensation from his employer under section 1 (3) of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, for injury caused by reason of the negligence of a person in the service of his employer, to whose orders the plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was bound to conform, and did conform, it being alleged that the injury resulted from his having so conformed. It appeared that on a certain morning the plaintiff was ordered to do a piece of work by S., a carpenter in the service of the defendant. The plaintiff was bound to obey the orders of S. as to what work he should do, but S. had no authority to specify any particular place where the work should be done. In the evening the plaintiff was working overtime at the piece of work in a shed which was his usual place of work. S., in stacking timber in the same shed, negligently let fall a beam which injured the plaintiff.

Held, that the injury did not result from the plaintiff having conformed to any order to do a particular piece of work, and that he was not entitled to recover.

Decision of the Divisional Court (38 W. R. 558, 24 Q. B. D. 568) affirmed.—Snowden v. Baynes, C.A. 744 —25 Q. B. D. 193; 59 L. J. Q. B. 325.

5. Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1 (1)—Negligence—Defective machinery.—The fact of a machine being dangerous to the workman whose duty it is to use it, although it is perfectly effective for the purpose for which it is used, is "a defect in the condition of the machinery" within section 1 (1) of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, which, when combined with negligence on the part of the employer, entitles the workman to recover damages in an action brought under that subsection.

Walsh v. Whiteley, 36 W. R. 876, 21 Q. B. D. 371, explained.—Morgan v. Hutchins, Q.B.D. 412—59 L. J. Q. B. 197.

6. False imprisonment—Assault—Scope of employment.—A servant of a company having been directed to exclude the public from the inclosed portion of a street, which was being repaired by the company under a private statute empowering the company to exclude the public, and imposing a fine for resisting its servants, forcibly prevented the plaintiff from driving into the inclosure, and caused him to be arrested.

Held, that the company was not liable for damages for the plaintiff's arrest.—Barry v. Dublin United Tramways Co., Q.B.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 150.

7. Negligence—Contributory negligence—Voluntary risk.—Where a workman is engaged by an employer to do work which the employer has contracted with a third person to do on the premises of such third person, and the work is dangerous without help, it is not the duty of the third person to furnish such help.

The maxim Volenti non fit injuria considered.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.—Membery v. Great Western Railway Co., H.L. 145—14 App. 179; 58 L. J. H. L. 563; 61 L. T. 566.

8. Negligence—Sub-contractor.—J., a workman, was employed with others by H., a builder, in carrying out certain works which H. had contracted to do. Under the contract, L., an ironfounder, was to do certain special work required to be done by a specialist at a price to be paid out of the contract price for the whole work, but L. paid and had control over his own workmen. J., having been injured by the negligence of L.'s workmen, brought an action for damages against L.

Held (dissentiente Fry, L.J.), that L. was a sub-contractor under H., and was, with his workmen, in the employment and under the control of H., who was accordingly the common master of the injuring and injured workmen; that the case was governed by Wiggett v. Fox, 4 W. R. 254, 11 Ex. 832, and the action could not be maintained.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division affirmed.

Abraham v. Reynolds, 8 W. R. 181, 5 H. & N. 143, explained and distinguished.

Per Fry, L.J., L. was not a sub-contractor under H.; the burden of proving that H. had control over L.'s part of the work and over the workmen engaged on it lay upon L., and he had not discharged that burden; even if there was common employment, there was no common master; and the case was not within Wiggett v. Fox, and the defence of common employment was not maintainable.—Johnson v. Lindsay, C.A. 119—23 Q. B. D. 508; 58 L. J. Q. B. 581; 61 L. T. 864.

9. Truck Acts—Wages—Payment otherwise than in coin—1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37, s. 1—Truck Act, 1881 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 46), ss. 2, 5.—A., who was both a licensed victualler and a brickmaker, supplied certain labourers employed by him at brickmaking with intoxicating liquors, debiting them with the price, which was 3s. 10d. On the same day in his public-house he handed 4s. to one of the labourers, who returned him two-pence, and 4s. was deducted from the labourers' wages.

Held, that A. had committed an offence under the Truck Acts.—Gould v. Haynes, Q.B.D.—59 L. J. M.C. 9; 61 L. T. 732.

MEDICAL ACTS:—

General Medical Council—Jurisdiction—Medical Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), s. 29.—The defendants, the General Medical Council, had held an inquiry into a charge preferred against the plaintiff, a registered medical practitioner, of "infamous conduct in a professional respect," the particulars of which charge were, that the plaintiff, being a registered medical practitioner, did act as "cover of," or by his presence, advice, and assistance, did enable H., an unqualified person, "to carry on the business or profession of a medical electrican, and to practise as if he were duly qualified, under the style of the Medical Battery Co." The inquiry resulted in the defendants finding that the plaintiff had been guilty of the acts charged against him, and the defendants ordered the name of the plaintiff to be erased from the register of medical practitioners. The charge against the plaintiff was preferred in the name of and by the Medical Defence Union, which was an association incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, as a company limited by guarantee, having for its objects the protection of the interests of medical practitioners, the promotion of honourable practice, the prosecution of unauthorized practitioners, and the defence of members of the association where proceedings involving questions of professional principle were brought against them. By the articles of association, the management of the business and the control of the Medical Defence Union was vested in a council, which was thereby authorized to exercise all powers and do all acts which might be exercised or done by the Medical Defence Union in general meeting. Two persons who were members of the Medical Defence Union and subscribers to its funds were also members of the General Medical Council, and, as members of the General Medical Council, were present at the inquiry into, and adjudicated upon, the charge against the plaintiff. These persons were not members of the council of the Medical Defence Union, and had no pecuniary interest in the success of the accusation brought against the plaintiff.

Held, that the charge in question, on the true construction of its terms, amounted to a charge that the plaintiff had assisted an unqualified person to practise as if he were a medical practitioner duly qualified to practise as such; that the charge was therefore one which the defendants had power to deal with, and did in fact deal with, under section 29 of the Medical Act, 1858; and that, as the defendants, acting bonâ fide and after due inquiry, had adjudged the plaintiff guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect, the courts of law had no jurisdiction to review their decision. (2) (Fry, L.J., dissenting), that the two persons were not, either actually or constructively, accusers or quasi-prosecutors in the charge preferred against the plaintiff, and that the tribunal which adjudicated on the charge preferred against the plaintiff was a tribunal competent to do so.

MERCHANDISE MARK:—

1. Sale of goods—False description—Intent to defraud—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 2 (1), (2); s. 3 (1) (3).—B., a mineral water manufacturer, made use of certain bottles, the property of, and moulded with the name of, W., with the intention of selling therein mineral water of his own make to his customers. On the bottles B. affixed a label bearing his own name, and he sent with the bottles an invoice which left no doubt that B. was the sender.

Held, that B. was guilty of using a false trade description under sections 2 and 3 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.—Wood v. Burgess, Q.B.D. 331—24 Q. B. D. 46; 59 L. J. M. C. 11; 61 L. T. 593.

2. Sale of goods—Misdescription—Intent to defraud—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 2 (1) (2).—The defendants, a firm of gunpowder manufacturers, had contracted to deliver to her Majesty's Government a large amount of gunpowder, which they were in the habit of manufacturing under the trade name of "R. L. G. No. 4." Being prevented by an explosion from manufacturing the required amount, they imported similar gunpowder from Germany. This they placed in the barrels ordinarily supplied by the Government, and labelled the same "Chilworth Gunpowder Co., Ltd. R. L. G. No. 4"; and so delivered them to the Government. Upon an information being laid against them under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, for "having unlawfully applied a false trade description" to the said gunpowder, the magistrates found that the name of the firm had been placed on the label where the name of the contractor was required to be inserted by the Government; that there had been no intent by the defendants to defraud the Government; and that there was no stipulation between the parties that the gunpowder to be supplied should be of English manufacture; but that the defendants were in fact manufacturers of gunpowder, and the gunpowder so delivered was not in fact manufactured by them.

Held, that the magistrates ought to have convicted the defendants, under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, of the offence of applying to or selling goods with a false trade description with intent to defraud, as such a description as was attached implied that the defendants were delivering gunpowder of their own manufacture when, in fact, it was not such; and that an intent to defraud under this Act did not necessarily imply an intent to cheat a customer as to the quality of the goods delivered, nor any fraud in a pecuniary sense, but such intent was implied from the fact that the manufacturer or vendor supplied something else than that which the customer, from the description given to the goods, thought he was getting.—Storey v. Chilworth Gunpowder Co., Q.B.D. 204—24 Q. B. D. 90; 59 L. J. M. C. 13; 62 L. T. 73.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT ACTS:—

1. Building—Party wall—Height—Story—Metropolitan Building Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), ss. 83, 85, schedule 1.—A "topmost story" within the meaning of rules 5 and 6 of the schedule to the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, need not necessarily be contained within four vertical walls; floors or rooms inclosed on three sides by vertical walls, and in front by the sloping roof of the house are "stories" within the meaning of the schedule and rules.—Foot v. Hodgson, Q.B.D.—25 Q. B. D. 160; 59 L. J. Q. B. 343.

2. Domestic refuse—Hotel—Refuse of furnace used for electric lighting—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 125, 128.—Ashes and clinkers produced in the furnace of boilers used at an hotel for electric lighting and for working lifts, pumping water, and cooking are domestic refuse, and not the refuse of a trade manufacturer or business, and consequently the vestry is bound to remove the same without being entitled to extra payment.—St. Martin's Vestry v. Gordon, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 835.

3. Street—Obstruction—Removal—Seizure of goods by vestry—Local government—57 Geo. 3, c. xxix., s. 65.—The local authority having the control of the streets and public places in the metropolis has power, under section 65 of 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix., after giving due notice, to seize and detain the articles therein enumerated which are placed by any person in any street or public place within the district of the local authority, even if the person so offending has not been convicted of the offence before a magistrate.

3a. Street—Obstruction—New street—Continuing offence—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 202—Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 98.—The appellants were the owners of a road which had been recently laid out for building as a street for the purposes of carriage traffic, but had not been dedicated to the public. The road communicated with a thoroughfare, and at their junction the appellants had erected, without the consent of the Board of Works or their successors, certain piers and gates for the purpose of excluding the public. The appellants were convicted and fined for having laid out a road or way for building as a street for the purposes of carriage traffic, the same not having an entrance of the full width of such street nor being open at both ends from the ground upwards, contrary to section 98 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, and to a bye-law made under section 202 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. Subsequently the appellants were convicted for permitting the said road to be continued so formed and laid out for a certain number of days.

Held, that no new street laid out for building since the passing of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, should have barriers across it to exclude the public unless with the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works or their successors, and that the appellants had been properly convicted of a continuing offence.—Daw v. London County Council, Q.B.D.—59 L. J. M. C. 112; 62 L. T. 937.

4. Superannuation allowance—Discretion of vestry—Mandamus—Metropolis Superannuation Allowances Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 31), ss. 1, 4.—A metropolitan vestry has a discretion, under section 1 of the Metropolis Superannuation Allowances Act, 1866, not only to grant or refuse a superannuation allowance to a retiring officer, but also, as to the amount of the allowance, so long as it does not exceed the scale prescribed in section 4.

MISREPRESENTATION:—

1. Company—Director—Prospectus—Evidence—

Knowledge of fraud.—In order to sustain an action of deceit there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. If fraud be proved the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial.

The directors of a tramway company issued a prospectus containing the statement that the company had the right to use steam or other mechanical power. This was untrue, but, under the circumstances disclosed, the directors were considered to have acted honestly, believing that the fact was as stated by them. An action was brought by a shareholder against the directors, claiming damages for the fraudulent misrepresentations contained in the prospectus, on the faith of which he had taken shares in the company.

Held, that the action must be dismissed.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal, 36 W. R. 699, 37 Ch. D. 544, reversed, and judgment of Stirling, J., restored.—Derry v. Peek, H.L. 33—14 App. 337; 58 L. J. Ch. 864; 61 L. T. 265.

2. Company—Director—Prospectus—Promoter—Costs—Shorthand notes—Ord. 58, r. 4; ord. 70, r. 1.—In order to maintain an action of deceit the plaintiff must prove actual fraud or dishonesty on the part of the defendant in making the statement relied on as a misrepresentation, and nothing less will suffice.

Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. 337, followed.

R. was the principal partner in a business which was to be turned into a limited company, of which he was a promoter, and of which he was to be a director as soon as the purchase was completed; the prospectus as to the company contained a statement that "the business at the present time returns a net profit of over seventeen per cent. on the capital employed." R. did not see the prospectus, as issued, before it was issued, but saw and corrected two drafts of it. The truth or falsehood of the statement appeared to depend upon the doubtful question of the proper meaning to be attached to the words "the capital employed"—that is to say, upon the amount at which such capital ought to be taken—a question involving, in this case, somewhat complex calculations, and depending, to some extent, on mercantile usage.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J., reported 37 W. R. 430), that, even if the statement had been false in fact, of which there was no sufficient proof, the plaintiff had failed to discharge the burden, which lay upon him, of proving that it was false to the knowledge of the defendant so as to involve dishonesty on his part.

When the case was decided by Kekewich, J., the decision of the Court of Appeal in Peek v. Derry, 36 W. R. 899, 37 Ch. D. 541, not having been reversed by the House of Lords, the law was understood to be that it was not necessary for a plaintiff, in order to succeed in an action of deceit, to prove actual fraud. The plaintiff accordingly did not press that part of his case, and the judge did not decide the question of fraud, but decided in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that the statement was untrue in fact, and that, though the defendant may have believed it to be true, he had no reasonable grounds for such belief.

Held, that, as the plaintiff might have insisted on pressing the case of fraud, but had not done so, he ought not now to be allowed to put the defendant to the risk and expense of a new trial upon that issue.

After the order of the Court of Appeal, allowing the appeal and dismissing the action, with costs, had been passed and entered, the successful appellant applied to the Court of Appeal for an order that the costs of the shorthand notes of the evidence taken at the trial of the action, and of the transcripts of the judgments of the Lords in Derry v. Peek, might be allowed on taxation.

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction, after the order had been passed and entered, to alter it in the manner sought, the order, as passed and entered, having expressed what it was the intention of the Court of Appeal to order at the time the order was made.—Glasier v. Rolls, C.A. 113—59 L. J. Ch. 63; 62 L. T. 305.

MORTGAGE:—

1. Account—Profits—Licensed house—Sale of beer—Exclusive supply.—In an action for account by a mortgagor against a mortgagee, a brewer, who had gone into possession and had afterwards sold the mortgaged premises—a public-house—a decree had been made directing (inter alia) "an account of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises received, or which, without wilful default, might have been received," by the mortgagee, and also directing an inquiry as to "the profits made by the mortgagee in carrying on the business in the pleadings mentioned," since he took possession of the mortgaged premises.

Held, on further consideration, that the profits arising from the supply of beer by the mortgagee to persons to whom the mortgagee had let the public-house, with a stipulation that they were to take all beer from him, were not "profits of the mortgaged premises," but were profits of the mortgagee's brewery business, which was not in any way carried on on the mortgaged premises, and that the mortgagee was not bound to account for such profits; but that if it could be shown that the mortgagee could have got a higher rent for the mortgaged premises if they had been let free from the stipulation that the tenants should take all beer from the mortgagee, the mortgagor would be entitled to relief in respect of the difference of the rents.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.—White v. City of London Brewery Co., C.A. 82—42 Ch. D. 237; 58 L. J. Ch. 855; 61 L. T. 741.

2. Attornment clause—Validity—Landlord and tenant—Bill of sale—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 6—Ord. 14.—An attornment clause in a mortgage of real property is effectual to create the relation of landlord and tenant between mortgagee and mortgagor, and is not avoided by section 6 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, except as regards the power of distress, which would otherwise be an incident of the tenancy.

Therefore, where, by a mortgage deed, the mortgagor had attorned tenant to the mortgagee at a rent equivalent to the mortgage interest, and that interest was in arrear,

Held, that the mortgagee was entitled to obtain judgment under order 14 in an action for ejectment against the mortgagor.—Mumford v. Collier, Q.B.D. 716—25 Q. B. D. 279.

2a. Consideration—Escrow—Set-off—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 56.—An action was brought by the transferor of a mortgage against the transferees for payment of the consideration-money for transfer, or to have his mortgage and other deeds back again. The plaintiff and the defendants had employed in the matter of the transfer the same firm of solicitors, who were then in good credit. On the 20th of October, 1888, the plaintiff executed the transfer, which expressed that the money was paid, and he handed the transfer and the title deeds to the solicitors, they undertaking either to return them or to pay the money. The plaintiff did not make any inquiry till the 5th of February, 1889, the solicitors telling him so much notice was required. On the 22nd of February the solicitors handed over the deeds and the transfer to the defendants. On the 15th of March the solicitors filed their petition in bankruptcy. The defendants never paid the money in cash to the solicitors, but they set off in their books part of a sum owed by them to the defendants.

Held, (1) that there had been no negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and that the deed was an escrow until the defendants had paid the money to the solicitors in cash; (2) that the defendants were not entitled to set off a debt due to them from the solicitors.

Gordon v. James, 30 Ch. D. 249, distinguished.—Coupe v. Collyer, CH.D. KAY, J.—62 L. T. 927.

2b. Consolidation—Surety.—By a deed dated the 11th of March, 1875, G. mortgaged to I. certain real estate, and by a deed dated the 10th of December, 1875, G. mortgaged to I. certain Hudson Bay shares, and by the same deed A. and wife mortgaged to I. certain railway shares. A. and wife were, in fact, sureties for G., but that fact was not disclosed on the deed. G. subsequently executed other mortgages of the Hudson Bay shares to other persons, including M. The chief clerk found that the first mortgagee was I., and that he was entitled to consolidate his mortgage of the 11th of March, 1875; that the second mortgagees were A. and wife to the extent of the value realized from the railway shares (which had gone in part payment of I.'s securities of the 10th of December, 1875), and that the other mortgagees were entitled subject to those priorities.

Held, on a summons to vary the certificate, that I. was entitled to consolidate, on the ground that the suretyship not being disclosed by the deed of the 10th of December, 1875, the only right of A. and wife against the trust fund was through G., and was therefore subject to I.'s rights against G.—In re Toogood, CH.D. CHI., J.—61 L. T. 19.

3. Covenant — Interest — Judgment — Merger.—A. executed an instrument acknowledging the advance from B. of a certain sum which he promised to repay, with interest at 18 per cent. per annum, by monthly instalments, and he assigned to B. by way of security a policy of insurance on his own life. He afterwards executed a similar instrument on the occasion of a further advance, the interest being at the same rate, but the monthly instalments were not to commence till after the liquidation of the first debt. B. recovered judgment on both securities, with interest up to the date of the judgment.

Held, that the covenant for payment of interest was merged in the judgment for the principal.—Arbuthnot v. Bulstlall, CH.D. STL., J.—62 L. T. 234.

4. Covenant—Interest—Personal estate—Arrears of interest—Statutes of Limitation (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 42; 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3).—By a mortgage deed, dated in 1875, the mortgagor assigned to the mortgagee a reversionary interest in personal estate, and covenanted for payment of the principal sum and interest thereon at five per cent. per annum on a day certain, but there was no covenant as to payment of interest in the event of the principal sum, or any part of it, remaining unpaid after the day named for payment. The mortgagor paid a sum on account of principal, but no interest was ever paid. In an action brought by the transferee of the mortgage for foreclosure,

Held, that interest was recoverable as damages, and must be calculated from the date of the mortgage deed, at £5 per cent., and was not limited to six years' arrears.—Mellersh v. Brown, CH.D. KAY, J. 732.

5. Covenant—Solicitor—Auctioneer—Costs.—By a mortgage deed made between two mortgagors and two mortgagees (one of the latter being a solicitor, and the other an auctioneer and valuer), after reciting that the mortgagees took over the transfers of certain mortgages at the request of the mortgagors, on the terms that they should advance the necessary money at the rate of £4 10s. per cent. per annum, and that, on the other hand, they should be entitled to make the same charges and receive the same remuneration respectively for all business done by them respectively in or about those presents as they would have been entitled to make and receive if they had not been mortgagees, the mortgagors covenanted with the mortgagees to pay the principal moneys stated to be advanced by them out of moneys belonging to them on a joint account, and every other sum which might thereafter be advanced or paid by the mortgagees, or either of them, or become owing to them or him by the mortgagors, or either of them, with interest.

The stamp on the mortgage deed was sufficient to cover a further £100. On taking the accounts under a foreclosure order, two sums charged for certain costs incurred by the mortgagors to the solicitor-mortgagee after the date of the mortgage and not connected therewith, and a sum of £5 5s. remuneration paid to the auctioneer-mortgagee for valuing the property on the occasion of the mortgage, were disallowed.

Held, that the mortgage was only intended to include sums paid in the nature of advances, and did not include future costs incurred to the solicitor with reference to other matters.

Held, also, that the £5 5s. could not be allowed in the absence of special contract.

Decision of Kay, J., affirmed.—Field v. Hopkins, C.A.—44 Ch. D. 524; 62 L. T. 775.

6. Equitable mortgage—Tender—Refusal—Detinue for title deeds.—The refusal by a mortgagee of a proper tender of the money due to him does not entitle the mortgagor to an action to recover the deeds.

It is now the practice, in relaxation of the rule in Postlethwaite v. Blythe, 2 Sw. 256, where a proper tender has been made and refused, to make an order giving the mortgagor liberty to pay into court a stated sum sufficient to cover the amount of principal, interest, and probable costs of suit, and, upon such payment, requiring the mortgagee to deliver up the title deeds.

Chilton v. Carrington, 3 W. R. 17, 248, 376, 15 C. B. 95, 730, 16 C. B. 206, explained.—Bank of New South Wales v. O'Connor, P.C. 465—14 App. 273; 60 L. T. 467.

7. Foreclosure action — Default—Judgment—Personal judgment—Account—Ord. 19, r. 13; ord. 27, r. 11.—On a motion for judgment in default of defence in a foreclosure action, the plaintiff, an equitable mortgagee of leaseholds, asked for a personal judgment against the defendant, the mortgagor, who did not appear, for the amount which the plaintiff alleged by his statement of claim to be due to him, on the ground that the defendant, by not pleading, had admitted that amount to be due to him. The plaintiff had not by his statement of claim asked for a personal judgment against the defendant.

Held, that the defendant's admission by not pleading could only be treated as made for the purpose of the relief asked by the statement of claim; that, as the defendant did not appear, the plaintiff could only have such relief as he had asked by his statement of claim; and that an account must be directed of what was due to the plaintiff.—Faithfull v. Woodley, CH.D. NOR., J. 326—43 Ch. D. 287; 59 L. J. Ch. 304; 61 L. T. 808.

8. Foreclosure action—Parties—Trustee—Ord. 16, r. 8.—In a foreclosure action a mortgagee defendant who is a trustee of the money secured on his mortgage, and who has become bankrupt, does not properly represent his cestui que trust.—Francis v. Harrison, CH.D. NOR., J. 329—43 Ch. D. 183; 59 L. J. Ch. 248; 61 L. T. 762.

9. Foreclosure—Receiver—Possession.—In an action brought by brewers for foreclosure of a mortgage of a public-house of which the mortgagor was in possession, a receiver and manager had been appointed by order on interlocutory motion in the form given in Truman, Hanbury, & Co. v. Redgrave, 18 Ch. D. 547. The mortgagor continued in occupation of a part of the premises, and was alleged to have acted in a manner which interfered with the proper conduct of the business by the receiver. The mortgagee moved for an order directing the mortgagor to give up possession to the receiver, and restraining him from remaining in occupation of any part of the premises.

Held, that the mortgagee was not entitled to such an order before judgment.

Hawkes v. Holland, W. N., 1881, p. 128, distinguished.—Taylor v. Soper, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. T. 828.

10. Judgment—Execution—Growing crops—Receiving order—Official receiver.—On the 18th of August, 1887, B. executed a mortgage to A. On the 22nd of August he executed a second mortgage in favour of his bankers, who obtained judgment, and possession was taken by the sheriff. On the 2nd of May a receiving order was made against B., and the sheriff withdrew. On the 25th of June the bankers took possession under their mortgage, and arranged that the growing crops should be sold without prejudice to the rights of the parties.

Held, that the bankers were entitled to proceeds of the sale of the crops as against the official receiver.—Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Gordon, Q.B.D., BKCY.—61 L. T. 299.

11.—Lease by mortgagor.—If a mortgagor creates new tenancies, after informing the mortgagee, who makes no objection, a new tenancy is not created as against the mortgagee.—In re O'Rourke, L.J. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 497.

12. Power of sale—Sale of surface, reserving minerals—25 & 26 Vict. c. 108—Service of petition on mortgagor.—Where mortgagees apply to the court for liberty to sell, with a reservation of the mines and minerals in the land sold, the mortgagor must be either served with the petition or made a co-petitioner.—In re Hirst's Mortgage Trust, CH.D. NOR., J. 685.

13. Priority — Equitable mortgage — Fraud — Negligence—Title deeds, possession of—Legal estate.—A mortgagor, not acting by a separate solicitor, produced to the plaintiffs' solicitors a forged deed, which purported to be a conveyance, from the same grantors of property in the neighbourhood of property to which he had already shown a good title, and the plaintiffs' solicitors made no requisition as to the identity of the property. The mortgagor subsequently mortgaged the same property to the defendants. Prior to both these mortgages the mortgagor had obtained a conveyance of the equitable estate from the owners of the property. The defendants, who had possession of the title deeds, afterwards obtained a conveyance of the legal estate from the owners of the property, all parties then having notice of the plaintiffs' mortgage.

Held, that the negligence necessary to postpone the first equitable mortgagees must be so gross as to render them responsible for the fraud committed on the second mortgagees.

Held, that the first mortgagees had not been guilty of such gross negligence as to be postponed to the second mortgagees.

Held, that possession of the title deeds conferred no advantage upon the second mortgagees.

Held, also, that the getting in of the legal estate was no protection to the second mortgagees.—Taylor v. Russell, CH.D. KAY, J. 663—62 L. T. 922.

14. Priority—Equitable mortgage—Merger.—D. R., under two deeds of conveyance dated 1843, was seised in fee of the lands of A., and entitled to the leasehold interest in the lands of B. under a lease of June, 1782, at a rent of £221 10s. 9d., subject as to part of the lands of B. to annuities of £100 and £200. On June 7, 1850, D. R. mortgaged A. and B. by demise for £8,000, and covenanted for himself, his heirs and assigns, to execute all further assurances, not only for assuring the lands for the residue of the term, but also "for granting the fee simple, reversion, and inheritance, or other the estate or interest of D. R. in the said hereditaments" to or in trust for the mortgagees. In 1856 D. V. R., a son of D. R., purchased the reversion in fee of the B. lands, subject to an annuity of £240. By a deed also in 1856 D. R. and D. V. R. conveyed the lands of A. and B., together with other lands, subject to the charges affecting the same, to the use of D. V. R. for life, remainder as he should appoint, with ultimate remainder in default of issue to D. V. R. absolutely. By settlement on the marriage of D. V. R. in 1867 the lands were settled to the use of D. V. R. for life, remainder to his male issue as he should appoint, in default of appointment remainder to the sons successively in tail male, and in default of issue male to D. V. R. absolutely. £6,000 East India Stock, part of the wife's fortune, was vested in trustees on condition that upon D. V. R. paying to the trustees such sum as, with the value of the stock, should amount to £8,000, the trustees should sell the stock and invest the proceeds and the sum to be added by D. V. R. upon an assignment of the mortgage of June, 1850, to be held to the extent of the proceeds of the stock upon the settlement trusts, and as to the residue for D. V. R. absolutely. In 1868 D. V. R. contributed a sum of £1,122 10s., which, with the sum of £6,877 10s. realized by the sale of the stock, was applied in taking an assignment to the trustees of the mortgage debt. In 1885 D. V. R. deposited with the Provincial Bank the two deeds of 1843, the deed of conveyance of the reversion in fee of B. and the deed of 1856 as a security for an advance. On December 7, 1886, D. V. R. assigned for value to V. the £1,122 10s. contributed by D. V. R. A notice of this assignment was in 1887 served on the trustees of the settlement. Notice of the equitable mortgage to the bank was not given to the trustees until 1889.

Held, (1) that as between the bank and V., who had purchased without notice of the bank's claim, V. had an equity superior to the bank as to the £1,122 10s., and was entitled to priority; (2) that the leasehold interest in B. was not merged in the fee simple.—In re Roche, C.A. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 284.

15. Priority—Registration—Incorrect statement of county in deed—Memorial.—An incorrect statement in the operative part of a deed as to the county in which the lands conveyed are situate, although the proper county is named in a recital, and although the memorial accurately follows the deed, is an error which vitiates the registration and postpones the deed to a subsequent incumbrancer by duly registered deed, without notice.—Butler v. Gilbert, M.R. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 230.

16. Priority—Settlement—Power of appointment—Annuity—Jointure—Covenant for title.—A covenant in a mortgage deed that the mortgagor has a good title to assign "free from incumbrances, save and except" a specified annuity, gives no priority to the annuitant.

If the donee under a power of appointment exercises the power at different dates for different objects, the charges take priority in order of date.

A jointure has not necessarily priority over all other estates under a settlement.—In re Lord Annaly, L.J. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 481.

17. Receiver—Legal mortgagee in possession—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25 (8). A legal mortgagee who has gone into possession of the mortgaged property cannot afterwards go out of possession, nor is he entitled, as of right, to have a receiver appointed.

Mason v. Westoby, 34 W. R. 498, 32 Ch. D. 206, discussed.—Prytherick v. Williams, CH.D. NOR., J. 61—42 Ch. D. 590; 59 L. J. Ch. 79; 61 L. T. 799.

18. Receiver—Recovery of rent—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 24 (3).—A mortgagor died, having devised the mortgaged land on certain trusts; one of the trustees had predeceased the testator, and the other disclaimed. The mortgagee appointed a receiver.

Held, that the receiver could sue for rent in the name of the mortgagor's heir-at-law on giving him a sufficient indemnity.—Fairholme v. Kennedy, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 498.

19. Redemption—Exclusion of right—Life insurance.—A. mortgaged his reversionary interest in land contingent on his surviving B., to secure an advance of £10,000. The mortgagees were to effect a policy of assurance for £34,000 on the life of A. against that of B., and, if they paid the premiums, to add them to the debt. The policy, in the event of A. predeceasing B., was to belong to the mortgagees absolutely. On A.'s death in B.'s lifetime, A.'s administrator brought an action to redeem the policy.

Held, that, on the principle, "Once a mortgage always a mortgage," the condition that the policy should belong absolutely to the mortgagees was void, and that the plaintiff was entitled to redeem on the usual terms.—Marquis of Northampton v. Pollock, CH.D. NOR., J. 346—62 L. T. 313.

20. Redemption—Loss of mortgage deed—Indemnity.—In 1867 M. mortgaged his life interest in certain funds subject to the trusts of his marriage settlement and three policies of insurance on his own life. In 1876 he executed a second mortgage of his life interest to the plaintiffs. This mortgage did not include the policies of insurance. In 1886 an action was brought by the plaintiffs against the mortgagor and H., the legal personal representative of the first mortgagee, to redeem the first mortgage and foreclose the mortgagor. Pending the progress of the action it was discovered that the mortgage of 1867 and the policies were not in the possession of H., and an inquiry was directed as to the loss of the documents, and whether any and what indemnity should be given in respect of the loss in case it should be found that any of them had been lost. In the meanwhile the plaintiffs had paid into court the amount which had been certified to be due to the defendant H. under the mortgage of 1867, and for H.'s taxed costs of the action. The chief clerk, in answer to the inquiry, found that the mortgage of 1867 and the policies had been lost, and he also found that the plaintiffs were entitled to "such an indemnity as will equal that which the insurance company may require." The plaintiffs took out a summons to vary this certificate, by which they asked that the whole of the fund in court might be retained until further order by way of indemnity to them. The insurance company declined to make any arrangement with regard to an indemnity until claims should be made on the policies.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to a bond of indemnity, to be given by the defendant H. as executrix, the bond to be settled in chambers in case the parties differed, and that they were also entitled to have retained in court the sum of £100, as a reasonable sum to meet any possible costs that might be incurred when the policies should become claims.—Caldwell v. Matthews, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. T. 799.

21. Redemption—Successive mortgages—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 15—Conveyancing Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 39), s. 12.—The plaintiffs in a foreclosure action were first and third mortgagees, the second mortgagee was entitled to a jointure on the property. There were also subsequent mortgagees.

The court made an order giving the second mortgagee six months to redeem. If she did so, the plaintiffs, as third mortgagees, were given three months to redeem subject to the jointure, with a third period of three months to the subsequent mortgagees.—Smithett v. Hesketh, CH.D. NOR., J. 698—44 Ch. D. 161; 59 L. J. Ch. 567; 62 L. T. 802.

22. Redemption—Successive mortgages—Separate estates—Rateable payment to first mortgagee.—If A. mortgages D. and E. to B., and afterwards mortgages D. to C., and E. to M., C. and M. are entitled to insist on B.'s debt being paid rateably out of the two estates.—Moxon v. Berkeley Mutual Benefit Building Society, CH.D. KAY, J.—59 L. J. Ch. 524; 62 L. T. 250.

22a. Redemption — Tender — Interest. — Notwithstanding default in payment of the principal money according to the proviso for redemption, the mortgagor is entitled to redeem without giving the mortgagee six months' notice if he pays in advance six months' interest in lieu of the notice.—Johnson v. Evans, C.A.—61 L.T. 18.

23. Sale by mortgagee—Particulars—Misdescription—Compensation—Second mortgage.—On a sale of a building estate by first mortgagees, the particulars, which were prepared by an auctioneer employed by the first mortgagees, contained an erroneous statement that the roads on the property were kerbed and sewered, and the purchaser claimed and obtained compensation in respect of this misstatement.

Held, that, as between the first mortgagees and the second mortgagees, the former were liable to the latter, but only if, and so far as, any loss had been occasioned by the misstatement; but that the compensation allowed to the purchaser was not the measure of that loss.

24. Will—Exoneration—Locke King's Act—17 & 18 Vict. c. 113, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 34.—Testator, a trader, by will in 1885 gave his trade property (which included real and leasehold estate) and business to his son, subject to and charged with, in exoneration of the rest of his estate, the payment of all debts and liabilities owing at the time of testator's death in connection with his trade. Testator included in this property freehold premises situated at Acton which he had purchased and intended for his business subject as to such estate to the purchase or other moneys payable in respect thereof at testator's death.

The residue of testator's real and personal estate was given on trust to convert and pay thereout debts other than those thereinbefore provided for. Testator at his death owed trade debts not secured by mortgage and private debts which were secured by mortgage of the real and leasehold estates used in his business, and also of real and leasehold estates not so used.

Held, that the testator had, as to his trade debts, clearly indicated a contrary intention within the meaning of Locke King's Act and the Amendment Acts, and that it must be implied he had the same intention in dealing with his private debts, and that the mortgage debts, therefore, were primarily payable out of the proceeds of sale of the residuary real and personal estate.—In re Nevill, Robinson v. Nevill, CH.D. MUNICIPAL CORPORATION:—

1. Ultrà vires—Certiorari—Costs.—A rule having been made absolute for a certiorari against a municipal corporation to bring up and quash certain orders made by the town council for illegal payments out of the corporation funds, the court, on a separate application against the members of the town council who had joined in making the orders, ordered them to pay the costs of the certiorari.—Reg. v. Vaile, Q.B.D.—23 Q. B. D. 483; 58 L. J. M. C. 185; 61 L. T. 253.

2. Ultrà vires—Contract—Payment out of borough rates—Surplus funds—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 140, 143, 144.—A municipal corporation agreed to pay to a railway company an annual sum for fifteen years in consideration of the company opening a bridge for foot passengers free of toll. A local improvement Act authorized rates for certain purposes, not including such a bridge, and contained a provision as to the surplus from rates resembling the provisions of section 143 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

Held, (1) that the corporation was not entitled to apply the proceeds of rates to payments under the agreement with the railway company, nor to make rates for that purpose, nor bind the surplus of future years; (2) that the agreement was not illegal; (3) that there must be a declaration that the corporation could not pay money due under the agreement out of the borough funds, nor make any borough or improvement rate to provide for such payment; and (4) that such declaration was not to prevent payments out of any surplus after applying the funds or rates to the purposes for which they were legally liable.—Attorney-General v. Mayor, &c., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, C.A.—23 Q. NEGLIGENCE:—

1. School — Accident to scholar — Negligence of teacher—Liability of committee of management.—The plaintiff was a scholar in a voluntary school, and the defendant, the vicar of the parish, was an ex-officio trustee of the school, and one of the committee of management. The plaintiff sought to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted upon her by a black-board falling from an easel and striking her upon the head. It was alleged that the board fell owing to the negligence of one of the teachers. The staff of teachers was appointed by the committee of management, but was not otherwise under its control.

Held, that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury; but that, if there was, the defendant, as one of the committee of management, was liable for the negligence of the teacher in the school.—Crisp v. Thomas, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 810.

2. Solicitor—Action commenced in Palatine Court—Amount recoverable in county court—Costs.—A solicitor was instructed by the defendants to commence proceedings against the owner of certain premises to recover the amount due from him as the frontager in respect of the expense of repairing a road upon which his premises abutted. The proceedings might have been instituted in the county court, but the solicitor commenced them in the Chancery Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster. The action was dismissed by the Vice-Chancellor, and the defendants refused to pay the solicitor's costs upon the ground that he had been guilty of negligence in not commencing the action in the county court.

Held, that, as the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine had no jurisdiction to inflict any penalty as to costs upon a plaintiff for bringing in the County Palatine Court an action which might have been brought in the county court, the plaintiff had not been guilty of actionable negligence in not advising that the proceedings should be commenced in the county court.—Barker v. Fleetwood Improvement Commissioners, Q.B.D.—62 L. 2. Injunction — Damages — Jurisdiction — Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), s. 2—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 264—Notice of action.—An action was brought bonâ fide against a rural sanitary authority for an injunction restraining the defendants from causing a nuisance by continuing to discharge sewage into a river. The judge thought that, under the circumstances, an injunction was not then necessary, because the nuisance was not likely to recur except in an unusually dry season. He accordingly refused an injunction, but awarded damages.

Held, that the judge had power to award damages instead of an injunction, although there had been no notice of action under section 264 of the Public Health Act, 1875.—Chapman v. Auckland Guardians, C.A.—23 Q. B. D. 294; 58 L. J. Q. B. 504; 61 L. T. 446.

3. Injunction—Damages—Payment into court—Discontinuance—Costs—Taxation—Ord. 22, rr. 6, 7—Ord. 26, r. 1.—In an action for an injunction and damages for a nuisance, the plaintiff moved for an interlocutory injunction, but, the defendants having taken steps to stop the nuisance, no order was, by consent, made on the motion, except that the costs were to be costs of the action. The defendants by their defence denied liability, but paid money into court in respect of the claim for damages. The plaintiff accepted the money, in satisfaction of his claim for damages, and wrote that he should discontinue the action, take the money out of court, and tax his costs. The plaintiff then took out a summons for taxation of his costs of the action, and the defendants also took out a summons that the plaintiff do pay them their costs of the action, including their costs of the motion for injunction, such costs to be taxed, on the ground that the plaintiff's letter was a notice of discontinuance of the action.

Held, (1) that, as the money was paid into court and accepted only in satisfaction of the claim for damages, and as the entire claim or cause of action was not thereby satisfied, ord. 22, r. 7, did not authorize the taxation of costs thereunder, and that the plaintiff's application to tax the whole costs of the action was not right; (2) that the plaintiff's letter was not a notice of discontinuance so as to entitle the defendants to their costs under ord. 26, r. 1.—Moon v. Dickinson, CH.D. NOR., J. 278.

4. Injunction—Public shows—Quia timet action.—An action was brought by inhabitants of houses abutting on an open and unbuilt-on area of land situate in the centre of a town, and known as Market-square, for an injunction to restrain the owner thereof from using, or causing or permitting the same to be used, for the purpose of any sports, exhibitions, entertainments, or otherwise whereby a nuisance might be occasioned to the annoyance and injury of the plaintiffs. The defendant's agent had licensed S. to use Market-square for holding a public show for several days, S. paying £6. The show consisted of a large circular roundabout worked by a steam engine, which engine also worked an organ; a large circular mechanical switchback worked by another steam engine, which worked a second organ; a shooting gallery; and a boxing booth. Whilst the show was going on, the plaintiffs complained to the defendant's agent, and a correspondence ensued, which resulted in the defendant's agent declining to give an undertaking, and expressing his intention of allowing persons to use Market-square for public shows.

Held, that, as the defendant contended that he had the right to do the thing complained of, and had refused to give an undertaking, the inference was that there would be a repetition of the nuisance; and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were justified in bringing the action, and were entitled to an injunction.—Phillips v. Thomas, CH.D. CHL., J.—62 L. T. 793.

5. Reasonable use of property—Injunction.—It is not a sufficient defence to an action for an injunction to restrain a nuisance to prove that the nuisance is caused by a perfectly reasonable use of defendant's property.

The defendant, who was a hotel proprietor, placed in his kitchen and used in the course of his business a large cooking range, with a shaft for hot air, which interfered with the comfort of the plaintiff's house by overheating his wine cellar.

Held, that, although the use by the defendant of the range and shaft was reasonable, the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to restrain the nuisance.

PARTITION:—

1. Sale.—In a partition action the court will not, as a general rule, at the request of persons claiming to be interested in a moiety of the property, make an order for immediate sale without first directing an inquiry as to the persons interested in the property.

The court may, where the value of the property is small, make an order at the trial for immediate sale, on satisfactory evidence being produced as to the persons interested.—Wood v. Gregory, CH D. NOR., J. 226—43 Ch. D. 82; 59 L. J. Ch. 232; 62 L. T. 179.

2. Sale out of court—Infant—Ord. 51, r. 1a—Rules of December, 1888, r. 9.—Upon a motion for judgment in an action for sale in lieu of partition, where all persons interested, some being infants, asked that an inquiry as to title might be dispensed with and for an immediate sale by auction and out of cour an order was made for an immediate sale out of co subject to directions for fixing a reserve price an auctioneer's remuneration in chambers, and f conditions of sale to require the purchaser to p court his purchase-moneys.

Having regard to the fact that infants were interested, and to rule 9 of the Rules of December, 1888, which modifies ord. 51, r. 1a, the court required the allegations in the claim to be verified by affidavit, though the allegations were admitted by the defendant. —Willis v. Willis, CH.D. PARTNERSHIP :—

1. Assignment of share—Lease—Specific performance—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.—G., S., and B. being partners, S. agreed to retire from the partnership, and almost immediately afterwards B. signed a document, the material part of which was as follows:—"Rough Draft.—31 May, 1888.—This is to record that, in consideration of W. G. or his executors paying H. C. B. or his assigns the sum of £100 on the 1st of January, 1890, and the sum of £100 on every 1st of January for the nine succeeding years, H. C. B. agrees to withdraw from the firm of G., S., & B." The partnership business was carried on upon leasehold premises.

Held, that the document amounted to a concluded agreement, and that, though, as involving an agreement to assign the leasehold premises, which constituted an interest in land, it fell within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, it was a sufficient memorandum in writing within that section.

Held, also, that G. was not entitled to use B.'s name as part of the title of the new firm.

2. Dissolution—Receiver—Jurisdiction.—By a deed of dissolution of partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant, it was agreed that the defendant should have the sole management of the liquidation of the firm, should pay all existing debts of the firm, and indemnify the plaintiff against the same, and should account to the plaintiff for the share of any dividends which might be received in respect of any debts or claims, after payment of all creditors of the firm out of the assets of the firm. The firm had a claim for a large sum against a foreign merchant, in respect of which claim little or nothing was capable of being realized in the ordinary way. The defendant proposed, with a view to obtaining something on this claim, to take shares in a company about to be formed, the object of which was to take over the property of the debtor in question, subject to an arrangement being come to with the creditors of the debtor to accept, in shares of the company, amounts equal to twenty-five per cent. of the value of their claims. The plaintiff having brought an action to have the accounts of the partnership taken and to restrain the defendant from carrying out, in opposition to the wish of the plaintiff, such proposed arrangement, an order was made by Kekewich, J., appointing the defendant receiver, with liberty to compromise the claim in question upon terms to be approved by the judge in chambers.

Held, (1) that the deed of dissolution contained no power, either express or implied, authorizing the defendant to enter into any arrangement of the kind proposed; (2) that the appointment of the defendant as receiver did not give the court jurisdiction to clothe the defendant as receiver, contrary to the wish of the plaintiff, with authority not given by the agreement between the partners; (3) that the order appointing the defendant receiver having been made for the purpose of enabling the proposed arrangement to be carried into effect, should be discharged.

3. Real estate — Conversion — Re-conversion — Tenancy in common.—In 1873 A. and B., being tenants in common in equal shares of certain freehold and leasehold properties, entered into copartnership under the style of M. & Sons, as builders and contractors, for a period of ten years, those properties and certain plant being by the articles of partnership made partnership assets. In 1877 the plant was sold and the proceeds divided, but the freehold and leasehold properties, with the exception of an office, were let to tenants, and no new contracts were entered into. The business connected with the receipts and payments in respect of the properties was transacted at the office, and a banking account kept in the name of the partnership firm of M. & Sons. In 1888 A. died intestate.

Held, that the partnership terminated in 1877, and that from that time the property was simply held by the former partners as tenants in common, the right of either party to call for a sale being taken away when they ceased to carry on the partnership business, and, therefore, that the property must be be considered as realty.—Myers v. Myers, CH.D. CHL., J.—61 L. T. 757.

4. Real estate—Joint speculation—Intestacy—Conversion.—H. had for many years previously to his death been engaged in various land speculations jointly with C. The speculations consisted in the buying and selling of plots of land, the laying out of the land for building purposes, and the advancing of money to builders. The lands were generally bought in consideration of chief rents, and then sold to builders at increased chief rents, which were retained by H. and C. The conveyances of the lands bought were taken either to H. and C. jointly or to C. alone. A banking account was kept in the names of H. and C., and statements of account were made out every half year, but there were no partnership articles between H. and C. Upon the death of H., there being an intestacy as to certain lands and chief rents which had been acquired by him in the course of his joint speculation with C.,

Held, that the proper inference to be drawn from the evidence and statements of account was, that the relation which had existed between H. and C. was that of partners, and that they were not co-owners of real estate, but that the property in question constituted partnership assets, and, therefore, that the property must be treated for the purpose of devolution as personal estate of H., to which his next of kin were consequently entitled.—Hulton v. Lister, C.A.—62 L. T. 200.

PATENT :—

1. Assignment—Mortgage—Registration—Infringement—Practice—Joinder of parties—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 23, 46, 85, 87—Ord. 16, r. 11.—The practice of the Comptroller of Patents is, not to register a mortgagee, even where the mortgage is by way of assignment, as assignee of the patent, but as mortgagee only, and this is the correct practice.

Under ord. 16, r. 11, the mortgagee may at any time be added as a co-defendant, if it appears to the judge, either of his own motion or on an application by the defendant, that the presence of the mortgagee is necessary for the purposes of justice.

The assignee of a patent, whose name was entered on the register of patents as assignee, mortgaged the patent by way of assignment, and the name of the mortgagee was entered on the register as mortgagee.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the mortgagor was entitled, on general equitable principles, to sue for infringement without joining the mortgagee as a co-plaintiff, and that there was nothing in the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, to disentitle the mortgagee from doing so, having regard to the mode in which the entries were made on the register.

2. Damages — Infringement.—The plaintiffs, who were patentees, had obtained judgment in an action for infringement, and on an inquiry as to damages, the official referee had found that the prices at which the defendants at first sold the patented articles were lower than the plaintiff's original prices, and that they lowered them again from time to time during the period of infringement, and that the plaintiffs reduced their prices to the prices of the defendants from time to time to meet the competition of the defendants, but never below the defendants' prices. He also found that but for the defendants' illegal competition the plaintiffs would have made all the sales made by the defendants as well as those made by themselves, at their original prices, subject to a percentage for increased sales caused by the connection and exertion of the defendants and by the reduction of the prices.

Held (reversing Kekewich, J., 38 W. R. 329), that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover all the profits which would have been made by them if all the sales made by them and by the defendants had been made by the plaintiffs at their original prices; after making allowance for the increased sales attributable to the exertions and connections of the defendants and to the reduction in prices.

3. Infringement—Amendment—Disclaimer—Costs —Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 19, 20.—After the delivery of the statement of defence in an action for infringement of a patent, the plaintiff applied to amend his specification by way of disclaimer. A judge in chambers gave the plaintiff leave to amend and to give the amended specification in evidence, on condition that there should be no damages and no injunction for anything done before the disclaimer, the costs to be the defendant's.

Held, that the judge had full discretion as to the terms on which the plaintiff should be allowed to apply for amendment.—Lang v. Whitecross Co., Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 119.

4. Infringement—Assignment — Licence — Limited grant—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 23, 36, 87.—An exclusive licence to use a patented invention in a particular district for a limited term does not amount to an assignment of the patent rights for that district, and does not confer any rights which enable the licensee in his own name to maintain an action without joining the patentee as a co-plaintiff against a person who has infringed the licensee's rights under his licence by using the invention within the said district and term.

M., a patentee, gave H. by deed an exclusive licence to use M.'s patent within a specified district for four years, and covenanted that he would not during the term sell the invention or grant other licences to use it within the district, and that, in case M. failed to take steps effectually to protect the patent against any infringement which should take place, H. should be at liberty to take such steps in M.'s name. The deed was duly registered under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, and shortly afterwards M. sold one of his patented machines to S., carrying on business outside the district, and S., two or three weeks later, sold the machine to J., who used it within the district.

Held, that H., having a mere licence to use the patent, and no property in it, could not maintain an action against J. without joining M. as a co-plaintiff; and, that H., having failed on the evidence to satisfy the court that J., when he bought the machine, had actual notice of H.'s rights, the action failed on that ground also, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Decision of Bristowe, V.C., affirmed.

5. Infringement—Discontinuance before action—Injunction—Damages.—An injunction against the infringement of a patent will not be granted where, though there has been an infringement, it has been discontinued several years before action brought, and there is no intention or probability of a renewal of the wrongful user.

In 1882 A. commenced using experimentally certain machines supplied by B. In 1883, A. being dissatisfied with the machines, the user was discontinued and never resumed, and B. was requested to remove them, which he did in 1885. In 1887 C. obtained a judgment against B. that the machines were an infringement of C.'s patent, and shortly afterwards C. claimed royalties from A. for the use of the machines supplied by B. A. replied that he was not using, and had no intention of using, either B.'s or C.'s machines, and stated the circumstances under which he had formerly used them. In 1888 C. brought an action against A. for an injunction and account of damages. A., by his defence, denied infringement, and stated that, if there had ever been infringement, it had been discontinued long before the action, and that there was no threat or intention to infringe in the future.

Held, reversing the decision of Bristowe, V.C., that, though there had been an infringement, the circumstances were such as not to afford any inference that the infringement was likely to be repeated, and, an injunction ought not to be granted; and that in a case in the Palatine Court of Lancaster, to which the Judicature Acts did not apply, damages could not be given except under Cairns's Act, under which they can only be given where there is a proper case for an injunction.

6. Infringement — Discontinuance of action — Threats—Injunction—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.—An action for infringement of a patent was commenced with due diligence, and subsequently discontinued before trial.

Held, that no right of action accrued, under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, to the party sued in the discontinued infringement action.—Colley v. Hart, CH.D. NOR., J. 501—44 Ch. D. 179; 59 L. J. Ch. 308; 62 L. T. 424.

7. Infringement—Threats—Cross action—Costs—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.—A solicitor's letter saying that proceedings will be instituted is a threat within the meaning of section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

The action pointed at by the section is an action by the patentee against the person whom he has threatened, not against any other person who may be infringing.

In an action to restrain threats the defendant is not bound to assert his rights by defence or counter-claim, but is entitled to bring a separate action for the alleged infringement of his patent; but, if he does so, arrangements ought to be made so that the proceedings in one action should be stayed to abide the result of the trial in the other.

A. commenced an action under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, against B. to restrain threats. B., within ten days, brought a cross-action against A. for infringing his patent. After pleadings had been delivered and notice of trial given in both actions, A. offered to stay his action for threats until B.'s action was concluded, but B. refused, and forced A. to proceed, and both actions came on together for trial. B.'s action was dismissed, with costs.

Held, that A.'s right of action was taken away by B. having, within a reasonable time, commenced and prosecuted with due diligence his cross-action for infringement; and that A.'s action must be dismissed, without costs.—Combined Weighing and Advertising Co. v. Automatic Weighing Machine Co., CH.D. KEK., J. 233—42 Ch. D. 665; 58 L. J. Ch. 709; 61 L. T. 474.

8. Infringement—Threats — Injunction — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32—Ord. 25, r. 4.—D., the patentee of an invention, who had granted to F. an exclusive licence to use the invention on payment of royalties, on the 17th of December, 1888, threatened F. with legal proceedings, on the ground that F. was manufacturing articles which infringed the patent without paying royalties, and on the 24th of April, 1889, commenced an action against F. for an injunction to restrain the manufacture of such articles, except subject to the terms of the licence. F. denied that the articles were an infringement of D.'s patent, and alleged that they were manufactured under B. and E.'s patent, of which F. was also licensee. B. and E., as "persons aggrieved" by D.'s threats against F., their licensee, on the 16th of August, 1889, commenced an action for an injunction to restrain D. from threatening F., and for damages. Summonses were taken out by D. for a stay of proceedings in the action by B. and E., and by B. and E. for a stay of proceedings in the action against F. until their action against D. had been heard.

Held, that the action of D. against F. was an action for infringement brought with due diligence within the proviso to section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883; that there was no cause of action for the action of B. and E. against D.; and that all further proceedings in that action must be stayed. —Barrett v. Day, Day v. Foster, CH.D. NOR., J. 362 —43 Ch. D. 435; 59 L. J. Ch. 464; 62 L. T. 597.

9. Licence—Royalties—Account—Provisional specification—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 5), ss. 9-13.—A patentee who had obtained only a provisional specification, granted to the defendant a licence of his patent for one year, and further from year to year during the continuance of the letters patent. The defendant paid royalties for one year, but refused to continue the payments because the patentee had not obtained a complete specification.

Held, that the licence was not void, and that the plaintiff was entitled to an account of the sum due for royalties.—Otto v. Singer, CH.D. CHI., J.—62 L. T. 220.

10. Novelty—Improved results.—A patentee is not only entitled to the mechanism described in his specification, but also to the results produced by such mechanism; and the attainment of a result better than any previous result constitutes a new invention, as distinguished from a mere improvement.—Thomson v. Moore, V.C. (Ir.).—23 L. R. Ir. 599.

11. Revocation—Petition—Trial—Respondent resident out of the jurisdiction—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 26—Ord. 11, r. 1.—The sole respondent to a petition for revocation of a patent was a domiciled Scotchman, resident in Scotland. A copy of the petition and the petitioner's particulars of objection had been served on him in Scotland, and he had written a letter to the petitioner in which he stated that he did not intend to appear at the hearing because he was not under the jurisdiction of the English courts.

The court ordered that, unless the respondent should, on or before a specified date, show cause to the contrary, the petition would be tried on viva voce evidence.—In re Drummond's Patent, CH.D. NOR., J.—43 Ch. D. 80; 59 L. J. Ch. 102.

POOR LAW:—

1. Settlement—Derivative settlement—Child under sixteen—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.—The provision in section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, that, "if any child in the section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, . . . and it cannot be shown what settlement such child . . . derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born, does not apply to the case of a child under sixteen years of age.

Reigate Guardians v. Croydon Guardians, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. 465, followed.

A pauper under the age of sixteen having become chargeable, the settlement of his deceased father could not be ascertained, and the settlement which he derived from his mother could not be shown without inquiring into her derivative settlement.

Held, that section 35 did not prohibit the inquiry, but that the pauper took his mother's settlement, and not his own birth settlement.—West Derby Guardians v. Atcham Guardians, C.A. 361—24 Q. B. D. 117; 59 L. J. M. C. 17.

2. Settlement — Derivative settlement — Irremovability—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), ss. 34, 35.—The father of a pauper had a settlement in the C. Union in 1878, which he never lost. He died in 1881. The maiden settlement of the mother, who survived the father, was in the R. Union, and the mother, in 1886, had not acquired any settlement since her husband's death. In 1886 a justices' order was made adjudging the settlement of the pauper, who was then under the age of sixteen, to be in the C. Union.

Held, that, inasmuch as the pauper on the death of her father took the settlement of the father, and as the pauper's widowed mother had not, since her husband's death, acquired a settlement for herself, the pauper retained the father's settlement in the C. Union, and that the order of the justices was right.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 35 W. R. 824, 19 Q. B. D. 385, reversed.

A pauper was born on the 27th of October, 1861, in W., her father's birth parish, which is within the appellant union. In 1862 she removed with her father to the parish of R. in the N. Union, where she resided with him until his death in 1868. Her mother married again. From her father's death until November, 1885, the pauper, who was physically incapable of work, resided with her mother in the parish of R., and from the 5th of June, 1880, was in receipt of relief from the N. Union until November, 1885, when she went with her mother to the parish of A., in the respondent union, to which she became chargeable in September, 1886. When the pauper, who attained sixteen in October, 1877, became chargeable in June, 1880, she had resided in R. for about four years, without having received relief, and for two years and ten months of that time she was above sixteen.

Held, that the pauper had acquired by residence a status of irremovability, and had a settlement in her own right in the N. Union under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 3 6 W. R. 422, 20 Q. B. D. 597, reversed.

The widow and three children under six years of age of a man who at the time of his death had acquired a settlement in G. under section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, became chargeable to the B. Union, the widow not having, since her husband's death, acquired a settlement for herself.

Held, that, the father having, at the time of his death, acquired a settlement in G. under section 34, his widow and children took his settlement under the provisions of section 35.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 36 W. R. 851, 21 Q. B. D. 278, affirmed on different grounds.—Reigate Guardians v. Croydon Guardians; Highworth Guardians v. Westbury-on-Severn Guardians; Medway Guardians v. Bedminster Guardians, H.L. 295—14 App. 465; 59 L. J. M. C. 29; 61 L. T. 733.

3. Settlement—Derivative settlement—Pauper wife —Derivative settlement of husband—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.—E. C., a pauper, was the wife of one A. C., who had deserted her and could not be found. A. C. had not acquired any settlement for himself. A. C., born in 1857, was the legitimate son of J. C., who was born in 1825 in the Edmonton Union, and had not acquired any settlement for himself before his son A. C. was twenty-one years old.

Hold, that, upon the authority of the Reigate case, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 466, the court were bound to hold that, under clause 3 of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, E. C. took the settlement of her father-in-law, J. C., as being the parentage settlement of her husband, A. C.—West Ham Guardians v. St. Giles-in-the-Fields and St. George's Guardians, Q.B.D. 736—25 Q. B. D. 272.

4. Settlement—Derivative settlement—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 111), s. 1—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.—The meaning of section 1 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848, is that, where a child lives with its father or mother as one of the family, and has no settlement other than one derived from the parent, the removability of such child depends on the removability of the parent.

A girl lived with her father as part of his family for a period during which he acquired by residence a settlement in the M. Union. Before she attained the age of sixteen they went to live in the W. Union. After she had attained the age of sixteen, but before they had lived twelve months in the W. Union, she became chargeable. After they had lived twelve months in the W. Union, and the father had become irremovable, an order was made removing the girl to the M. Union.

Held, that the settlement which, by virtue of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, the girl retained on reaching the age of sixteen, was still a derivative settlement after she passed that age; and that she came within the meaning of section 1 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1848, and, her father being irremovable, she was irremovable also.—Mitford Guardians v. Wayland Guardians, C.A. 632—25 Q. 5. Settlement—Illegitimate child—Birth settlement —Mother's settlement—Burden of proof—4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71.—Upon the hearing of an appeal against an order of removal of an illegitimate child under sixteen to the place of its birth settlement, it was proved that the mother was alive, but no evidence as to her settlement was given.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the burden of proving that the mother had a settlement lay upon the appellants, and that, in the absence of such proof, the order adjudging the child to be settled in the place of its birth was right.

2. Rateable value—Sewage farm—Parochial Assessment Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96), s. 1.—The Corporation of Burton-on Trent were owners of a sewage farm and a pumping station for the purpose of disposing of the sewage of the town, in respect of which the corporation were assessed to the poor rate. It was impossible to work the sewage farm except at a loss so long as it remained a sewage farm, and if the corporation wished to let it as a sewage farm, no one would be found to take it even at a nominal rental. The pumping station, while used as part of the sewage system, was incapable of yielding a profit, and could not be used beneficially for any other purpose. If the sewage farm and pumping station belonged to a private owner, the corporation would be willing to hire them at a yearly rent sufficiently high to support the present rates.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that, in ascertaining the rateable value, the corporation must be taken into account as possible hypothetical tenants, and the rent that they would give for the sewage farm and pumping station as a sewage farm and pumping station if they were not the owners in occupation must be taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value, and that, therefore, the rating was right.

Held, that the order was good under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 49, s. 6.—Caistor Guardians v. North Kelsey Guardians, Q.B.D.—59 L. J. M. C. 102; 62 L. T. 731.

1. Exercise—Will—Codicil—Republication.—A., having under under his marriage settlement a power of appointment jointly with his wife during her life, and, in case of her predeceasing him without any joint appointment being made, a power of appointment as survivor by deed or will among the children of the marriage, by his will, made in the lifetime of his wife, after making certain specific devises and bequests, provided that any other estate or property of which he might be possessed at the time of his decease, or over which he might have a power of bequest or disposal, should be held in trust for the benefit of any younger child or children of the marriage as therein mentioned. By a codicil, after the death of his wife, A., after making certain devises and bequests, and giving the residue of his real and personal estate to his second son, confirmed his will in all respects so far as it was capable of taking effect.

Held, that the power of appointment was well exercised by the effect of the codicil republishing the will.—Smiles v. Blackburn, CH.D. NOR., J. 140—43 Ch. D. 75; 59 L. J. Ch. 208.

2. Exercise—Will—Objects designated nominatim—Law of Powers Amendment Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 37).—If a power is given by will to appoint a fund among several persons nominatim, with a gift over in default of appointment to the same persons nominatim, or their representatives, and all the objects of the power survive the testator, the death of some of the objects during the lifetime of the donee of the power will not affect the validity of the power over the whole fund.

The principle of Boyle v. Bishop of Peterborough, 1 Ves. jun. 298, followed and applied.—In re Ware, Cumberlege v. Cumberlege-Ware, CH.D. STI., J. 767.

3. Exercise—Will—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 27.—In section 27 of the Wills Act, 1837, after the words "which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper," some such words as "by the will in question" must be read in from the context and the general scope of the Act.

A., who, under a settlement made in 1884, had a general power of appointing some stock by writing under his hand, not being a will or codicil, or by will or codicil expressly referring to the power, bequeathed all his personal property to trustees upon certain trusts, but without any express reference to the power or to the property subject to it.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the condition in the power restricting the class of wills whereby the power was to be exercised to wills expressly referring to the power was a perfectly lawful restriction not forbidden or invalidated by any statute; that the testator had not power to appoint in any manner he might think proper, within the meaning of section 27 of the Wills Act, 1837, but only in the case of wills by the particular class of will aforesaid; and that the will, not being a good exercise of the power apart from the section, was not made so thereby.

4. Exercise—Will—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 27.—T. having a power over a fund "for such persons and purposes and in such manner as she shall by will expressly referring to this present power appoint," by her will gave all her property to her executors upon certain trusts, without referring to the power.

Held, that the will was not a valid appointment under section 27 of the Wills Act, 1837.—In re Tarrant's Trusts, CH.D. CHI., J.—58 L. J. Ch. 780.

5. Revocation—Special power—Will—Deed—Contrary intention—Election—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), ss. 19, 23, 24, 27.—By a settlement dated in 1842, and made on the marriage of A., an infant, with B., A. and B. covenanted that, as soon as A. attained twenty-one, certain real estate of which she was tenant in tail, and certain personal estate to which she was entitled, should be conveyed and assigned to the trustees upon trust, after the death of A., for the children of the marriage as A. and B. by deed, or the survivor of them by deed, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, or by will, should appoint, and, in default of appointment, in trust for the children of the marriage in equal shares. B. also settled a policy of assurance upon his life upon the same trusts. The joint power was never exercised, and A. died in 1857. No disentailing assurance of her real estate had ever been executed, and, on her death, C., her eldest son, entered into possession thereof as heir in tail. By a deed dated in 1864, B., after reciting the death of A. without barring her estate tail, and that C. was her heir in tail, appointed all the funds comprised in the settlement other than the real estate to his four younger children, and reserved to himself a power of revocation and new appointment by deed or will. The trustees thereupon divided the funds, other than the moneys secured by the policy, equally among the four children. By his will, dated in 1869, B., in express exercise of the power contained in the settlement of 1842, appointed certain specific sums to his children, including C., and the residue of the funds thereof to C. By a deed dated in 1878, B., after reciting the deed of 1864 and the division of the trust funds, and that the only fund then subject to the trusts of the settlement was the policy-moneys, in exercise of the power reserved to him by the deed of 1864, revoked the appointment therein contained, and appointed the policy-moneys in equal fifths between his four surviving children, including C., and the children of his deceased daughter; and he again reserved to himself a power of revocation and new appointment. By a deed dated in 1883, B. made the appointment to C. in the deed of 1874 irrevocable, and in 1888 he died.

Held, that B.'s will did not speak from his death so as to revoke the appointment by the deed of 1878, there being sufficient evidence of a "contrary intention" within section 24 of the Wills Act, 1837, from the fact that the will was dated before that deed.

Held, also, that the will operated as to the one-fifth ineffectually appointed by the deed of 1878 to the children of the deceased daughter.

Held, further, that C. was not bound to elect as regards any interest taken by him under the deed of 1878, but that he was bound to elect as regards the real estate and any interest which might be coming to him under the will.—Hardisty v. Wells, CH.D. STL., J. 229—42 Ch. D. 646; 58 L. J. Ch. 835; 61 L. T. 588.

6. Special power—Fraud on power.—A. having, under a settlement, a power to appoint by will a sum of £35,000 among his children, bequeathed a legacy of £150,000 to a daughter J., with directions that it should be paid to trustees upon trust for J. for life, with remainder to her issue; and then, after reciting the power of appointment, appointed £10,000 part of the £35,000, to J., with directions that it should be paid to the trustees of the legacy of £150,000 bequeathed to her upon the trusts declared with respect to that legacy. After making appointments to other daughters, the testator appointed the residue of the £35,000 to his son R. absolutely, and provided that, in case he had exceeded his power in not appointing the £10,000 to J. unconditionally, but in directing a settlement thereof, and in case anyone having a right to the settlement thereof should so object, or should not confirm such settlement if required so to do, then he appointed the sum of £10,000 to R. absolutely, adding, "But who will, I am assured, settle the same voluntarily in the manner in which I have attempted to settle the same as aforesaid, so as thereby to carry out my wishes." R. did in fact execute a declaration of trust to carry out the testator's wishes, but there was no evidence of any bargain between the testator and R.

Held, that the appointment to J. was invalid, but that the absolute appointment to R. was valid, and that the trustees of the declaration of trust executed by him held the fund upon the trusts declared thereby.—Crawshay v. Crawshay, CH.D. NOR., J. 600—43 Ch. D. 615; 59 L. J. Ch. 399; 62 L. T. 489.

PRACTICE:—

1. Affidavit—Omission—Jurat—Ord. 38, rr. 6, 14.—In the jurat of an affidavit purporting to have been sworn before a British vice-consul abroad, the words "before me" were omitted. Blanks in the affidavit had been filled up, and alterations had been made apparently in the same handwriting as the signature.

Held, on an application to take the affidavit off the file, (1) that the reasonable inference to be drawn, in the absence of proof to the contrary, was that the affidavit had been in fact sworn before the vice-consul, and that everything had been rightly done; (2) that ord. 38, r. 14, was applicable to the omission of the words "before me," and that the affidavit ought to be received, and the application refused.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.—Eddowes v. Argentine Loan and Mercantile Agency Co., C.A. 629—59 L. J. Ch. 392; 62 L. T. 514.

2. Amendment—Decree twenty years old—Words accidentally omitted—Ord. 28, r. 11.—In December, 1868, S. and C., who were partners in business, dissolved their partnership, and the lease of the premises in which the business was carried on was thereupon assigned to S., and C. entered into a covenant that he would not, "during the remainder of the term of the lease," carry on business within a mile of the premises. In Februrary, 1871, a decree was made at the suit of S. prohibiting C. from carrying on the business within a mile of the premises. S., long after the lease had expired, served C. with notice of motion to commit him for breach of the injunction, and C. served S. with notice of a cross-motion to amend the decree by inserting in it words limiting the operation of the injunction to the duration of the term of the lease, which words, he alleged, had been accidentally omitted.

Held, that the decree should be amended by the insertion of the words omitted.—Shipwright v. Clements, CH.D. NOR., J. 746.

APPEAL—

3. Criminal matter—Contempt of court—Divorce suit—Newspaper—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), ss. 19, 47.—An application made by a party to a civil action then pending, against a stranger to the action, for attachment for contempt of court committed by the publication in a newspaper of comments colculated to prejudice the fair trial of the civil action, is a "criminal cause or matter" within the meaning of section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and no appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from a judgment imposing punishment for such contempt, made on such application, by a judge of the High Court.

4. Judgment—Further consideration—Setting aside—Ord. 39, r. 1; ord. 40, rr. 4, 5.—At the trial of an action with a jury, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing the damages. The judge, upon further consideration, held that there was no evidence of liability on the part of the defendant, and entered judgment accordingly.

Held, that an application to set aside the judgment so entered must be made to a divisional court, and not to the Court of Appeal.—Rocke v. McKerrow, C.A. 342—24 Q. B. D. 463; 59 L. J. Q. B. 146; 62 L. T. 556.

5. Inland revenue—Time for appealing—"Judgment" or "order"—Ord. 58, rr. 9, 15.—A decision of the Queen's Bench Division upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 19 of the Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), is an "order" and not a "judgment," and an appeal from the decision must be brought within twenty-one days.—Onslow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, C.A. 728.

6. Official referee—Motion to set aside findings—Judgment ordered by referee—Judgment entered—Jurisdiction to enter judgment for other party—Ord. 36, r. 52.—The court has power, in a reference under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, not only to set aside the judgment ordered by an official referee to be entered for one of the parties, although such judgment has been entered accordingly, but also to enter the judgment for the other party, instead of sending the case back to the referee to be reheard.

8. Official referee—Judgment ordered by referee—Judgment entered—Power of court to enter judgment for other party—Ord. 36, r. 52.—The court has power, in a reference under section 57 of the Judicature Act, 1873, not only to set aside the judgment ordered by an official referee to be entered for one of the parties, although such judgment has been entered accordingly, but also to enter the judgment for the other party instead of sending the case back to the referee to be reheard.—Clark v. Sonnenschein, Q.B.D. 717—25 Q. Held, that section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, gave A. a right of appeal to the Court of Appeal.—In the Goods of Clook, C.A.—15 P. D. 132; 62 L. T. 607.

11. Stay of proceedings—Discretion of court—Ord. 58, r. 16.—There is no practice to limit the absolute discretion given to the court by ord. 58, r. 16, to grant or refuse a stay of proceedings pending an appeal.—Attorney-General v. Emerson, C.A. 102—24 Q. B. D. 56; 59 L. J. Q. B. 192; 62 L. T. 21.

12. Third party—Notice of appeal—Service—Ord. 58, r. 2.—The defendant had brought in a third party for purposes of indemnity, and at the trial the action was dismissed. The plaintiff appealed.

Held (Cotton, L.J., dissentiente), that, on the true construction of ord. 58, r. 2, the third party was not a party "directly affected" by the appeal, and that it was not the duty of the plaintiff as appellant to serve the third party with notice of the appeal, but that the proper course would be for the defendant to apply to the Court of Appeal for leave to serve the third party with notice.—Priest v. Uppleby, C.A. 150—42 Ch. D. 351; 61 L. T. 146.

13. Time—Interlocutory order—Final judgment—Order as to declarations of right—Ord. 58, r. 15.—An order made after final judgment in an action for the purpose of directing how the declarations contained in the final judgment are to be worked out, is an interlocutory order so far as regards the time for appealing from it.—Blakey v. Latham, C.A. 193—43 Ch. D. 23.

JURISDICTION—

14. Administration—Originating summons—Claim by executor — Ord. 55, r. 3g. — The court has no jurisdiction, on an originating summons under ord. 55, r. 3, to determine any question or matter which could not have been determined in an action for administration of the estate or trust.

An originating summons was issued by an executor as plaintiff, to have it determined whether or no a particular sum of money formed part of the testator's estate at the time of his death. The summons was served on the testator's widow as defendant, she taking under the will a life interest in the testator's estate. The defendant filed an affidavit in which she claimed the sum in question, not under the will, but as a gift made to her by the testator in his lifetime, and she appeared on the hearing of the summons, but took the objection that the court had no jurisdiction, in such proceedings, to determine her claim. The judge who heard the summons considered that he had jurisdiction, and after hearing the evidence adduced by the plaintiff and the defendant respectively, held that there had been no gift to the defendant by the testator in his lifetime.

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction on an originating summons to determine the question raised by the claim of the defendant.

Rule 20 of order 4 of the County Court Rules of 1889, by which a judge is allowed, in his discretion, to give costs on a higher scale on "a claim for more than £20 where less is recovered," is not affected by section 119 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which gives power to a judge to award costs on the higher scale in three specified classes of actions.—King v. Charing Cross Bank, Q.B.D. 287—24 Q. B. D. 27; 59 L. J. Q. B. 26; 62 L. T. 42.

16. Evidence—Letters of request in lieu of commission—Examination of witness abroad by special examiner—Ord. 37, rr. 5, 6a.—An examination of witnesses abroad before a special examiner, ordered under ord. 37, r. 5, is not an ordinary commission so as to prevent the issuing of letters of request in addition thereto under rule 6a of the same order.—Mason & Barry v. Comptoir D'Escompte, Q.B.D. 685.

17. Evidence — Letters of request — Ord. 37, r. 6a — Appendix K., Form 37a, 37b. — An order for letters of request to issue to a foreign court under ord. 37, r. 6a, can only be made where it is sought to examine witnesses under the order, and the court has no jurisdiction to make such an order where production of documents alone is asked for.—Cape Copper Co. v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, C.A. 763.

18. Interpleader—Claimant substituted as defendant—Limitation of defence—Ord. 57, rr. 1a, 7.—M. & Co. were sued by G. as acceptors on a bill of exchange. M. & Co. had handed the bill to L. & Co. for full value received. L. & Co. had really obtained the bill for one H. in consideration of the value of a cargo sent by G. to England from Russia, which H. instructed L. & Co. to sell on commission. H. obtained possession of the cargo on handing over the bill to G.'s agents in England. The bill was then forwarded to G. in Russia, and, being duly presented, was dishonoured, whereupon G. sued M. & Co. as acceptors. L. & Co. meantime give M. & Co. notice not to pay the bill, on the ground that L. & Co. had parted with the bill through the fraud of H., and that, the cargo being deteriorated, they had not received full value for the bill, and claimed to be recouped for their loss on its sale from the moneys handed to M. & Co. for the bill. M. & Co. applied for an interpleader issue to be ordered, which the master granted, and on which he substituted L. & Co. as defendants in lieu of M. & Co. On appeal to the judge at chambers the order for interpleader was affirmed, but a condition imposed limiting L. & Co., as defendants, to such defences only as M. & Co. could have raised.

Held, that, M. & Co. being "persons seeking relief who were under liability for a debt in which they were, or expected to be, sued by two or more parties making adverse claims" within the terms of ord. 57, r. 1a, there was jurisdiction for the court or judge to exercise a discretion in ordering an interpleader issue, and that such discretion had been rightly exercised; but that there was no jurisdiction under ord. 57, r. 7, to limit the defences of the claimant, substituted as defendant, to such defences as the original defendant could raise, since the words of ord. 57, r. 7, empowering the court or judge to substitute any claimant as defendant "in lieu of" the applicant, the original defendant, did not mean that such claimant should stand "in the actual place of," but instead of, such defendant.—Gerhard v. Montague, Q.B.D. 76—61 L. T. 564.

19. Mortgage—Priority—Originating summons—Appeal—Time—Final order in chambers—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 50—Ord. 55, rr. 3, 5.—The limit of time for giving notice of motion to discharge or vary a final order in the Chancery Division by a judge in chambers is twenty-one days from the date when the order in chambers was pronounced.

Manchester and Liverpool Banking Co. v. Beales, 37 W. R. 765, 42 Ch. D. 505, approved.

An originating summons was issued by the mortgagees of property to which the mortgagors were beneficially entitled under the trusts of a will. The mortgagors and the trustees were made defendants to the summons, which claimed, as against the mortgagors, payment of the mortgage-moneys, or, in default, sale or foreclosure, and, as against the trustees, an account of the income of the mortgaged property received by them as trustees of the mortgagors. The trustee defendants brought in an account and gave evidence claiming to be entitled to retain a large portion of the income of the property in question, by virtue of a mortgage, made to them by their cestui que trusts, prior in date to the mortgage of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs alleged that they had given notice of their mortgage to the trustees, and that, at the time of the issue of the summons, they had no notice given them by the trustees of any prior charge on the property.

Held, that the originating summons should be dismissed as against the trustee defendants, on the ground that the question which had arisen as to priority of the mortgages was a question which could not be properly dealt with on proceedings by way of originating summons.

Held, also (Lindley, L. J., dubitante), that the court had no jurisdiction to determine a question of disputed priority of mortgages on proceedings by way of originating summons.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.—Real and Personal Advance Co. v. Michell, C.A. 273—43 Ch. D. 391; 59 L. J. Ch. 226; 62 L. T. 375.

20. Receiver—Death of judgment debtor—Equitable execution—Ord. 17, rr. 1, 4; ord. 42, rr. 3, 23, 28.—The appointment of a receiver of the interest of a judgment debtor in real estate, though sometimes inaccurately called "equitable execution," is not a mere form of execution, but it is relief producing the same benefit as execution properly so called, but obtainable, and obtainable only, by means of an order of the court in that behalf, based on the fact that execution, properly so called, cannot be had.

After the death of a judgment debtor the court has no jurisdiction, on the ex parte application of the judgment creditor, to make an order appointing a receiver of the interest of the deceased judgment debtor in real estate, for the purpose of satisfying the judgment debt, when the person on whom the real estate has devolved is not a party to the proceedings.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed, upon different grounds.—Atkins v. Shephard, C.A. 133—43 Ch. D. 131; 59 L. J. Ch. 83; 62 L. T. 337.

OFFICIAL REFEREE—

21. Accounts—Form of report—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 56.—An official referee is not bound to take accounts referred to him under section 56 of the Judicature Act, 1873, in the strict way used in the Chancery Division before a chief clerk in chambers, though he may adopt that method so far as the circumstances of the case seem to him to admit. He is not compelled, in cases of complicated accounts, to proceed upon any particular accounts and to refer to each item in the report, but may strike a balance upon the result of the inquiry generally. The parties may use the notes of the inquiry and of the evidence for the purpose of tracing any item allowed or disallowed which they may desire to question.—Turpin v. Pain, CH.D. CHI., J. 422—44 Ch. D. 128; 62 L. T. 754.

PARTIES—

22. Death of plaintiff — Damages—Injunction—Continuance by executor—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 2—Ord. 17, rr. 1-4—Ord. 36, r. 58.—The plaintiff in an action for damages and a mandatory injunction for obstructing the access of light to a house died more than six months after the issue of the writ, and B., his executor and devisee, obtained a common order to carry on the proceedings.

Held, that the order was rightly made.—Jones v. Simes, CH.D. CHI., J.—43 Ch. D. 607; 59 L. J. Ch. 351; 62 L. T. 447.

23. Foreclosure — Equity of redemption — Ord. 16, r. 9. — In a foreclosure action an order had been made in chambers under ord. 16, r. 9, authorizing two of a large class of persons all having the same interest in the equity of redemption to defend the action on behalf of the others.

Held, that a foreclosure order could not be made unless all the persons interested in the equity of redemption were parties to the action.—Griffith v. Pound, CH.D. STI., J.—59 L. J. Ch. 522.

24. Partnership—Conditional appearance—Ord. 9, r. 6; ord. 12, rr. 15, 16; ord. 42, r. 10.—In an action against a firm the writ was served upon R. at his residence, where some of the partnership business was ordinarily carried on. R. was not informed in what capacity he was served, whether as a partner in the firm or under ord. 9, r. 6, as a "person having at the time of service the control or management of the partnership business" at the place where the service was effected.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that there was no power to give leave to R. if the plaintiff did not undertake not to apply under ord. 42, r. 10, to enter a conditional appearance, denying himself to be a partner, and such appearance to stand till an issue as to his partnership had been decided. —Davies v. Andre, C.A. 437—24 Q. B. D. 598; 59 L. J. Q. B. 233; 63 L. T. 151.

25. Representative defendants—Consent to judgment—Ord. 16, r. 9.—Persons authorized by the court to defend an action on behalf of others, having the same interest as themselves, cannot consent to judgment against them.—Rees v. Richmond, CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. T. 427.

26. Third party—Appearance—Trial—Ord. 16, rr. 52, 53.—The defendant in an action for specific performance of a contract served a third-party notice upon another person, alleging that he signed the contract as agent for that person. The third party appeared, but obtained no directions as to delivery of pleadings or defending the action. The defendant obtained an order that the question of liability between himself and the third party should be tried as soon as might be after the trial of the action.

Held, that the third party might appear by counsel and take part in the trial, and might have the question of his liability tried immediately after the trial of the action.—Blore v. Ashby, CH.D. KEK., J. 141—42 Ch. D. 682; 58 L. J. Ch. 779; 61 L. T. 766.

27. Third party—Service out of the jurisdiction—Ord. 11, r. 1e; ord. 16, r. 48. — A third-party notice may be served out of the jurisdiction in any action founded on a breach, committed within the jurisdiction, of a contract which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, unless such third party is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland.—Dubont v. Macpherson, Q.B.D. 62—23 Q. B. D. 340; 58 L. J. Q. B. 496; 61 L. T. 689.

PLEADING—

28. Amendment—Judgment recovered—Merger—Ord. 19, r. 15; ord. 28, r. 1.—One of two defendants in an action of tort applied, at the trial of the action, for leave to amend his statement of defence by pleading, as a bar to the action, a prior judgment obtained by the same plaintiffs against other joint tort-feasors in respect of the same tortious act. The application for leave to amend was made after the evidence of the plaintiffs and of the other defendant had been given.

Held, that the merger of the cause of action in the prior judgment was a matter which ought to have been pleaded by the defendant, and that, having regard to the nature of the case, and to the time when the application was made, leave to amend ought not to be given to the defendant.

Decision of North, J. (reported 38 W. R. 8, 41 Ch. D. 563) affirmed.—Edevain v. Cohen, C.A. 177—43 Ch. D. 187; 62 L. T. 17.

29. Default by plaintiff—Dismissal of action—Ord. 27, r. 1; ord. 64, r. 7.—If an order has been made dismissing an action unless the next step is taken by the plaintiff within a specified time, and the plaintiff within such specified time neither takes any such step nor appeals against the order, the time cannot be extended, and the action is at an end.—Script Phonography Co. v. Gregg, CH.D. NOR., J.—59 L. J. Ch. 406.

30. Default—Judgment—Patent—Infringement—Particulars—Ord. 27, r. 11.—The plaintiff, in an action for infringement of a patent, upon motion for judgment, heard as a short cause, asked for such judgment as upon his statement of claim the court should consider him entitled to. The statement of claim stated "Particulars of breaches are delivered herewith."

Held, that the particulars of breaches might be regarded as forming part of the statement of claim.—United Telephone Co. v. Mitchell; United Telephone Co. v. Smith, CH.D. NOR., J. 70—61 L. T. 617.

31. Default — Peremptory order — Order for particulars — Ord. 19, r. 8. — Upon an application by the defendant for an extension of time to plead, the master, on the 1st of August, made an order giving the defendant a "month peremptory" for pleading. On the 9th of August the defendant obtained an order for particulars of the plaintiff's claim, and particulars were delivered on the 21st of August. On the 5th of September the plaintiff signed judgment for want of a defence. The defendant applied to set aside the judgment, on the ground that, under ord. 19, r. 8, he had the same time for pleading after the delivery of the particulars that he had at the return of the summons.

Held, that the effect of the "peremptory" order was that the pleading must be delivered within the specified time unless the order itself was expressly altered by a subsequent order; that ord. 19, r. 8, which was inconsistent with it, did not apply so as by implication to extend the time for pleading; and that the judgment was regularly signed.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division affirmed.—Falck v. Axthelin, C.A. 196—24 Q. B. D. 174; 59 L. J. Q. B. 161.

31a. Judgment on admissions in pleadings—Motion—Summons in chambers—Costs—Ord. 32, r. 6.—In an action to restrain the defendant from building so as to obstruct plaintiff's ancient lights and for damages, the defendant paid a sum of money into court in satisfaction of the claim for damages, and by his statement of defence offered to undertake not to carry his buildings higher than they were at the commencement of the action, to consent to an order embodying this undertaking, and for payment to the plaintiff of the money in court, and to pay the plaintiff's costs. The plaintiff accepted these terms, and prepared minutes, which he sent to the defendant's solicitors with a notice that he should set down the action on motion for judgment as a short cause. The defendant's solicitors wrote that the matter could be concluded at much less cost on a summons in chambers, and the defendant wished that course adopted. The plaintiff nevertheless proceeded with his motion.

Held, that the letter of the defendant's solicitors rendered the admission in the pleadings an admission to submit to an order for an injunction to be obtained in chambers, and that the plaintiff was only entitled to such costs of his motion as would have been incurred on a summons in chambers; and, for the guidance of the taxing master, the judge intimated that he should have allowed counsel in chambers.—Allen v. Oakey, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. T. 724.

32. Particulars — Seduction. — In an action for seduction particulars of time and place of the alleged seduction will not be ordered before the statement of defence has been delivered, in the absence of an affidavit by the defendant stating his intention to deny the seduction.—Knight v. Engle, Q.B.D. — 61 L. T. 780.

33. Payment into court—Trover—Lien—Ord. 50, r. 8.—Under ord. 50, r. 8, where an action is brought to recover specific property, and the defendant does not dispute the plaintiff's title, but claims to retain the property by virtue of a lien upon it, the court has power, on the application of the plaintiff, to order the property to be given up to him upon payment into court of the amount in respect of which the lien is claimed.

Held, that, in order that the property should be given up to the plaintiff, the whole amount for which the lien is claimed must be paid into court, even if such amount exceeds the value of the property.—Gebruder Naf v. Ploton, C.A. 566—25 Q. B. D. 13; 59 L. J. Q. B. 371.

34. Striking out—Frivolous and vexatious defence —Jurisdiction.—A. brought an action against a bishop and the patrons of a benefice, claiming that he was vicar of the benefice; that an instrument of resignation executed by him was void; and an injunction to restrain the presentation and institution of any other person to the benefice. Judgment was given against A. on the ground that the benefice was vacant through his resignation with the bishop's consent. B. was afterwards duly appointed to the benefice, and sued A. for a declaration that B. was vicar, and for an injunction restraining A. from depriving him of occupation. A., in his statement of defence, set up the same case on which he had been defeated in the former action.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to strike out the defence as frivolous and vexatious.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.—Reichel v. Magrath, H.L.—14 App. 665; 61 L. T. 131.

34a. Striking out defence—Discovery—Defendant out of jurisdiction—Ord. 27, r. 11; ord. 31, r. 21.—An English testator had executed a deed in favour of creditors which comprised real estate in Trinidad, but, though valid according to the law of England, did not pass the legal estate of the land in Trinidad to the trustees of the deed, because it was not executed as required by the law of Trinidad. The testator died intestate as to real estate, and the legal estate was vested in M., a British subject residing in Trinidad, and in the other defendants, who resided in England. An action was brought by the trustees of the deed and another creditor to enforce the trusts of the deed against the real estate in Trinidad. The plaintiffs had alleged in their statement of claim that under the law of Trinidad the deed bound the beneficial interest of the debtor, and of all persons claiming through him, in the real estate in Trinidad, and claimed to have such estate vested in the trustees of the creditors' deed, and to have the property sold under the direction of the court to pay the creditors under the trusts of the deed. The writ was, by leave, served in Trinidad on M., and he appeared and delivered a defence denying the plaintiffs' allegation that the beneficial interest in the land was bound. This defence was afterwards struck out under ord. 31, r. 21, because the defendant failed to obey an order to give discovery. By arrangement with the other defendants the action came on for trial, when the plaintiffs contended that M. was in the same position as if he had admitted the allegation in the statement of claim.

Held (affirming North, J.), that as the defence had only been struck out for a collateral reason, the law of Trinidad had not been sufficiently proved to justify the court in deciding; and that the action must stand over generally, with liberty to apply, with a view to proceedings being taken against M. in Trinidad.—Jenney v. Mackintosh, C.A.—61 L. T. 108.

35. Striking out—Trial of question of law—Ord. 25, r. 4; ord. 34, r. 2.—A. left £20,000 to trustees for G. for life, with remainder to her younger children, which was invested by the trustees in India Four per Cent. Stock. The Secretary of State for India gave notice to the holders of that stock offering equal amounts of India Three and a Half per Cent. Stock in exchange, and announcing his intention to pay off at par such of the holders of Four per Cent. India Stock as did not accept his offer. The trustees did not accept this offer, and were paid off at par, and they then allowed the sum received in payment to remain at the bank uninvested for seven months, after which they invested it in railway stock. The India Three and a Half per Cent. Stock stood in the market at a premium from the date of the offer of the Secretary of State for India down to the time of the investment by the trustees in railway stock. An action was brought by G. and her younger children against the trustees, claiming in the writ (1) the loss of income occasioned by the delay in investment of the sum received in payment off of the Four per Cent Stock; (2) the loss of capital incurred by the neglect of the trustees to accept the offer to take Three and a Half per Cent. Stock in exchange for the Four per Cent. Stock, with further relief. J., one of the trustees, paid into court the sum claimed for loss of income, which was taken out of court by G. The statement of claim stated the facts, including the payment into court by the defendant J. and the taking of the money out of court by G., and claimed (1) for loss of capital incurred by the neglect of the trustees to accept the offer of Three and a Half per Cent. Stock instead of Four per Cent. Stock; (2) costs. The defendant J. moved, under ord. 25, r. 4, that the statement of claim might be struck out as against him, on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action.

Held, that, as the statement of claim disclosed a cause of action for loss of income, which J. had admitted to be reasonable by his payment into court, and also asked for the costs of the relief sought in the action, it could not be struck out under ord. 25, r. 4, even supposing the claim for loss of capital was bad; but leave was given to amend the notice of motion so as to apply for the determination of the question of law under ord. 34, r. 2.

The notice of motion was amended as follows:—"Whether, assuming, for the purposes of the arguments of such question, that the allegations in the statement of claim are true, there was any such duty on the part of the defendants or of the defendant J. to accept India Three and a Half per Cent. Stock as in the 9th paragraph of the claim alleged, and whether the defendants or the defendant J. were or was guilty of any negligence or breach of duty in not accepting such stock, and whether the defendant J. is under any liability to make good to the capital of the trust funds in the claim mentioned" the loss therein mentioned. J. did not admit that he had in fact received the above-mentioned notice from the Secretary of State for India.

Held, that, as the notice of motion only assumed, for the purposes of the argument of the question, that the allegations in the statement of claim were true, and left it open to J. to raise other defences if the question were decided against him, it would not be convenient to decide the question on the motion. —Grosvenor v. White, CH.D. NOR., J. 201—61 L. T. 663

RECEIVER—

36. Judgment creditor—Sale of interest in land—Petition — Dispensing with inquiries — Judgment Law Amendment Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112), ss. 4, 5.—Upon a petition by a judgment creditor who had obtained equitable execution by the appointment of a receiver, an order was made, without directing inquiries, for the immediate sale of the debtor's interest in land which was subject to a legal mortgage, there being evidence that the mortgagee, who consented to the sale, had not received any notice of any incumbrance on the land; that searches had been made by the petitioner's solicitor, who had found that no execution or other process affecting the land had been registered, except the order appointing the receiver, and that no bankruptcy petition had been presented or receiving order made against the debtor. —In re Bithray, CH.D. NOR., J. 60—59 L. J. Ch. 66; 61 L. T. 383.

SEQUESTRATION—

37. Death of contemnor.—A writ of sequestration was issued to compel the performance of a duty, and the sequestrator obtained an order for sale of the contemnor's chattels, but, before the sequestrators sold, the contemnor died, and a creditor obtained an order for the administration of the estate, which was alleged to be insolvent and not proved to be solvent.

Held, that, an order having been made for the continuance of the sequestration proceedings against the legal personal representative of the contemnor, the death of the contemnor was no ground to restrain the sequestrator from selling.—Pratt v. Inman, CH.D. CHI., J. 200—43 Ch. D. 175; 59 L. J. Ch. 274; 61 L. T. 670.

38. Divorce—Alimony—Writ—Registration—Payment—Vacating registration—Lands Charges Registration Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 51), s. 14.—Where a writ of sequestration has been issued and duly registered under the Lands Charges Registration Act, 1888, there is no power to order the registration to be vacated, even by consent of all parties concerned, and the writ is satisfied by payment.—Cook v. Cook, P.D. & A.D. 656—15 P. D. 116—62 L. T. 667.

TRIAL—

39. Jury—Chancery action.—If a plaintiff who has commenced an action in the Chancery Division desires afterwards to have it tried by a jury, the onus is upon him to show some reason why it should not be tried in the manner in which it would, in the ordinary course, be tried in that division. If he does not discharge that onus, an application by him to have the action tried by a jury will be refused.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed, on different grounds.—Attorney-General v. Vyner, C.A. 194.

39a. Jury—Special jury—Certificate—Omission to ask for certificate—Special Jury Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 50), s. 34.—At the trial of a probate action in January, 1890, the plaintiff obtained a verdict on every issue, including that of forgery. The judge had left the building at the time the verdict was given, and the following morning, upon the application of the plaintiff's counsel, he gave judgment in accordance with the findings of the jury, but counsel omitted to ask for a certificate for a special jury. Upon application, in April, 1890, for the certificate, Held, that the application, not being made "immediately after trial," must be refused.—Webster v. Appleton, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 704.

40. Lancashire Palatine Court—Transfer to Chancery Division.—The plaintiffs assigned property in trust for their creditors, and afterwards sued the trustees and a purchaser from them, and to impeach the sale as fraudulent and collusive. The property was within the jurisdiction of the Lancashire Palatine Court, and at the time of the sale all the parties resided within that jurisdiction, but one of the trustees afterwards removed out of the jurisdiction. He was served with a writ out of the jurisdiction, and applied to transfer the action to the High Court. Only one of the defendants opposed the application.

Held, that the action ought to be transferred to the High Court.—Cooke v. Smith, C.A.—44 Ch. D. 72; 62 L. T. 712.

41. New trial—Verdict against weight of evidence.—A verdict should not be set aside as against the weight of evidence unless it is one which the jury, on a reasonable view of the whole evidence, could not properly find.—Phillips v. Martin, P.C.—15 App. 193.

42. Patent—Petition for revocation—Action for damages in Queen's Bench Division—Transfer of petition to Queen's Bench Division.—The court will order a transfer of a petition for revocation of a patent to the Queen's Bench Division to be heard by the judge at the same time as an action for damages before a judge and jury in respect of the same subject-matter.—In re Edge's Patent, CH.D. NOR., J. 698.

43. Referee—Marine insurance—Scientific witnesses—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 57.—In an action against insurers for the constructive total loss of a ship the chief issue was whether the condition of the ship was or was not caused by perils of the sea. The evidence taken on commission filled 300 printed pages, and six scientific witnesses were to be examined.

Held, that the case was not one which ought to be tried before an official or special referee instead of a jury.—Hamilton v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Co., Q.B.D.—58 L. J. Q. B. 544.

WRIT—

44. "Address of plaintiff"—Business address—Indorsement—Ord. 4, r. 1; Appendix A., Part I., Form 1.—The "address of the plaintiff" to be indorsed upon a writ of summons under ord. 4, r. 1, must be the plaintiff's place of residence, and not his place of business.—Stoy v. Rees, C.A. 683—24 Q. B. D. 748; 59 L. J. Q. B. 310; 63 L. T. 49.

45. Amendment—Statute of Limitations.—The plaintiff, who was assignee of a debt, issued a writ for money lent, without having given the defendant notice of the assignment. After the Statute of Limitations had barred the plaintiff's remedy, he applied to amend the writ by adding the assignor as a plaintiff.

Held, that leave to amend ought not to be granted. —Hudson v. Fernyhough, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 722.

46. Renewal—Writ issued before Judicature Acts—Power to renew such writ without leave of court or judge—Ord. 8, r. 1; ord. 72, r. 2.—Writs of summons issued prior to the coming into force of the Judicature Acts come within the operation of ord. 8, r. 1, as to renewal, so that such writs cannot now be renewed without the leave of the court or a judge, as required by that rule.—Hume v. Somerton, Q.B.D. 748—25 Q. B. D. 239; 59 L. J. Q. B. 420; 62 L. T. 828.

47. Service—Partnership—Dissolution unknown to plaintiff—Foreign partner out of the jurisdiction—Service on manager at place of business within the jurisdiction—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 9, r. 6; ord. 16, r. 14.—For the purposes of service under ord. 9, r. 6, and ord. 16, r. 14, a partnership which has been dissolved before the commencement of the action without the knowledge of the plaintiff must be treated as still subsisting.

Ex parte Young, 30 W. R. 330, 19 Ch. D. 124, considered.

Service on one partner when within the jurisdiction effected under either branch of ord. 9, r. 6, is good service on all the partners, although the partnership is a foreign partnership, and all the partners reside and are domiciled out of the jurisdiction.

Pollexfen v. Sibson, 34 W. R. 534, 16 Q. B. D. 792, followed.

Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526, discussed.—Shepherd v. Hirsch & Co., CH.D. CHL., J. 745.

48. Service out of the jurisdiction—Contract—Sale of goods for shipment to England—Ord. 11, r. 1.—The defendant agreed to sell goods to the plaintiff and to be shipped from Sweden to an English port, and to be paid for on their arrival, the plaintiff paying the freight. The defendant failed to deliver the goods.

Held, that there had been no breach of a contract within the jurisdiction, and that service out of the jurisdiction ought not to be ordered.—Wanske v. Wingren, Q.B.D.—58 L. J. Q. B. 519.

49. Setting aside—Irregularity—Misdescription of defendant—Conditional appearance—Ord. 12, r. 30.—The writ in an action described the defendant as "J. L. Young, carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co., at No. 60, Ludgate-hill." The defendant, who was not in fact carrying on the business, entered an appearance as "J. L. Young, sued as J. L. Young, carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co., at No. 60, Ludgate-hill, but who denies that he is carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co. at No. 60, Ludgate-hill aforesaid or elsewhere."

Held, on a motion to set aside the writ and subsequent proceedings on the ground of irregularity, that there was no irregularity in the writ, that the mistake had been set right by the form in which an appearance had been entered by the defendant, and that the motion must be refused.—Zuccato v. Young, CH.D. NOR., J. 474.

50. Special indorsement—Judgment—Delivery of defence—Ord. 14, r. 1.—An application by a plaintiff for judgment under ord. 14, r. 1, may be made after the statement of defence has been delivered, but when so made, the onus is cast on the plaintiff of explaining the delay, as the proper time for such application is before the defence is delivered in the usual way, though the delivery of the defence is not an absolute bar to a subsequent application under the order.—McLardy v. Slateum, Q.B.D. 349—24 Q. B. D. 504; 59 L. J. Q. B. 154; 62 L. T. 151.

51. Substituted service—Foreign corporation—Agent in England—Ord. 9, r. 8.—It is competent for the parties to a contract to contract themselves out of the rules as to the mode of service of writs, and to appoint a particular person to accept such service; hence, where, in a contract made by an English company with a foreign corporation, the foreign corporation appoints a person within the jurisdiction of the English courts an agent to accept service of any writ or other legal process arising out of the contract, and such appointment is to be irrevocable until some other agent is appointed, and no other agent is appointed, service of a writ upon such person is a good and effective service, although not in accordance with the rule as to service upon corporations, even though the foreign corporation has become bankrupt before the date of the service, as such bankruptcy does not operate as a revocation of the authority of the agent to accept service.—Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Co. v. Societe Industrielle et Commerciale des Metaux, Q.B.D. 78—60 L. T. 924.

PRACTICE (IRELAND):—

1. Affidavit—Jurat—Illiterate person.—In the case of an affidavit made in the Chancery Division by an illiterate person, the jurat need not state that the affidavit was read over to the deponent in the presence of the person before whom it is sworn; but it is sufficient if a third person named in the affidavit, and attesting the deponent's mark, swears that he read over the affidavit to the deponent and saw the latter make his mark.—Verner v. Cochrane, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 422.

2. Attachment—Garnishee order—Service—Payment by garnishee—Ord. 44, r. 3.—Payment by a garnishee after notice, but before service of a conditional order, is a ground for not making the order absolute, unless the order expressly directs attachment of the debt by the notice.—O'Donovan v. Dillon, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 442.

3. Discovery—Interrogatories—Time—Extension.—If a party has obtained an extension of time for delivering a pleading, he may administer interrogatories to the opposite party, but his intention ought to be stated on the application for an extension of time.—Jordan v. Meeredy, M.R. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 421.

4. Dismissal of action—Delay.—An action commenced in the Chancery Division more than ten years before hearing does not abate, but must be dismissed for want of prosecution.—Carroll v. Hickey, M.R. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 418.

5. Dismissal of action—Want of prosecution—Ord. 35, rr. 2—4.—If the plaintiff does not within six weeks after the close of the proceedings give notice of an application for directions as to the mode of trial, the defendant cannot move to dismiss the action for want of prosecution without first giving notice of an application for directions as to the mode of trial.—Thwaites v. Mooney, V.C. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 48.

6. Parties—Adding defendant—New cause of action.—In 1843 A. devised land to B. in trust for his wife for life with remainder to his son D. for life, with remainder to his three daughters, E., G., and H. in equal shares as tenants in common for their respective lives, with remainders over. If D. should become entitled to the S. estates, his trust in the estate in B. was to be postponed to the trusts in favour of his sisters. A. died in 1845, being then in treaty with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the owners of the land in B. held by him in lease, for the purchase of the reversion to be secured by mortgage. The will contained a direction to complete the purchase and mortgage, and after the death of the testator's wife to set apart £300 a year, to accumulate at interest to pay off the mortgage. A.'s widow died in 1868, and in 1869 £300 was invested. In 1882 the plaintiffs were appointed new trustees under the will, and in the same year D. succeeded to the S. estates. E., G., and H. then appointed W. as their agent. W. died in 1888. The plaintiffs sued W.'s executrix for an account.

The court refused to add E., G., and H. as defendants.—Crawford v. Donnelly, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 511.

7. Pauper suit—Certificate by counsel.—On an application for leave to sue in formâ pauperis, the petitioner must produce a certificate of counsel that he has a good cause of action.—In re Atkinson, M.R. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 509.

8. Payment into court—Investment.—The court ordered a fund in court to be invested in Irish Railway Debenture Stock and in India Three per Cent. Stock.—Johnston v. O'Neill, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 430.

9. Pleading—Time—Recovery of land—Ord. 21, r. 1.—In an action to recover possession of land the defendant may deliver his statement of defence at any time before judgment.—Kennane v. Mackey, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 495.

10. Reversion—Payment of incumbrances.—In the absence of special circumstances a receiver will not be ordered to pay the principal money due on an incumbrance.—In re Kearney, L.J. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 89.

11. Recovery of land—Execution—Costs—Waiver.—The plaintiff in an action for recovery of land recovered judgment for possession with costs, but issued execution for possession without having taxed the costs.

Held, that the plaintiff had not waived execution for his costs.—Harold v. Daly, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 412.

12. Trial—Disagreement of jury—Dismissal of action—Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 113), s. 107.—If, after a jury have disagreed, the plaintiff does not proceed to a second trial, the defendant's proper course is a trial by proviso, under section 107 of the Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1853, and not a motion to dismiss the action for want of prosecution.—Joyce v. Boyle, C.A. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 455.

13. Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—Substituted service—Registered letter.—If the plaintiff having obtained leave to serve a writ personally out of the jurisdiction, has failed in all his efforts to do so, the court will direct service by registered letter.—Seaton v. Clarke, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 297.

PRESCRIPTION:—

Profit à prendre—Fishing—Copyholds—Enfranchisement—Prescription Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 71), ss. 1, 4.—T. brought an action in 1889, on behalf of himself and others, the owners and occupiers of tenements formerly copyhold, but now enfranchised, of the Manor of C., to restrain the defendant interfering with a right of fishing in a river which the plaintiff claimed as appurtenant to his and the other tenements, and alleged user thereof for sixty years without interruption until the interruption of the defendant. The middle of the river formed one of the boundaries of the Manor of C., and the homage had for many years made a presentment of the right of the copyhold tenants to fish therein. In 1845 the defendant's copyhold tenement abutting on the river was enfranchised, and subsequently the plaintiff's tenement was also enfranchised. Both before and after enfranchisement, the right of fishing existed along the defendant's land where it abutted on the river. In 1885 the defendant interrupted the right of fishing.

Held, (1) that the claim based on user could not be maintained, as there had been an interruption acquiesced in for more than one year before action brought; (2) that there could not be a prescriptive claim to a profit à prendre for an indefinite class such as owners and occupiers; (3) that if any customary right of fishing had attached to the plaintiff's tenement while copyhold, it was extinguished by enfranchisement; (4) that any regrant of the right to the plaintiff in the deed of enfranchisement could have no effect as against the defendant, whose land had been previously enfranchised by the same grantors, and conveyed to the defendant in fee usque ad medium filum.—Tilbury v. Silva, CH.D. KAY, J.—62 L. T. 254.

PRINCIPAL and AGENT:—

1. Account—Wilful default—Form of decree.—In an action by a principal against an agent for account, including an account on the footing of wilful default, the question of wilful default should, in general, be disposed of at the hearing and not be reserved; if no wilful default is then proved, the court will dismiss that part of the action, and only grant the usual account between principal and agent.—Boylan v. Cusack, M.R. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 269.

2. Bribery of agent—Action against briber—Damages—Excess price fraudulently obtained—Right of briber to plead satisfaction by agent—Municipal corporation.—Where an agent under the influence of bribes persuades his principal to pay a price for goods obtained from the briber which is in excess of the market price, the principal has two distinct causes of action. He may sue the agent to recover the bribe which the agent has received, and at the same time he may sue the agent and the briber, either jointly or severally, for damages for the loss occasioned by their joint fraud; and in an action against the briber the defendant is not entitled to rely upon an agreement made between the principal and his agent, the effect of which is to discharge the agent from his liabilities, either because, according to Denman and Charles, JJ., the agreement only operates as an accord and satisfaction of the action for bribes, and has no bearing upon the action for damages for fraud, or because, according to Vaughan Williams, J., although the agreement may purport to be in accord and satisfaction of both causes of action, it is one which the plaintiffs, being a municipal corporation, were not entitled to make.—Salford (Mayor of) v. Lever (2), Q.B.D. 771—25 Q. B. D. 363; 59 L. J. Q. B. 483.

3. Commission—Investment by agent—Following investments—Injunction.—The plaintiffs employed the defendant as agent to buy goods for them. The defendant entered into a corrupt bargain with the vendor of the goods, whereby the defendant received, without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, sums of money by way of commission on the goods bought. The defendant had invested part of such commission money in the purchase of real estate.

Held, that neither the commission money nor the investments representing it could be treated as the property of the plaintiffs, and that, though the defendant was liable to account to the plaintiffs for the commission moneys, the relation existing between the defendant and the plaintiffs in respect of such money was only that of debtor and creditor, not that of trustee and cestui que trust; and that the plaintiff was not entitled, either to an injunction to restrain the defendant from dealing with the investments in question, nor to an order that the moneys should be paid into court pending the trial of an action which had been brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant to recover the money.

Judgment of Stirling, J. affirmed.—Lister v. Stubbs, C.A. 548—45 Ch. D. 1; 59 L. J. Ch. 570.

4. Solicitor—Misrepresentation—Investment.—The plaintiff employed the defendant, a solicitor, to invest money, requiring the investment to be good and the interest paid regularly. The defendant found a security, but misrepresented to the plaintiff the amount of the prior charges, and also that the interest on the prior charges had been regularly paid; the defendant, who was also solicitor for the borrower, knew that the loan was being obtained to meet the interest on prior charges.

Held, that the defendant had received the money to invest on a safe investment, and having constituted himself a fiduciary agent was liable to repay to the plaintiff the money which had been lost by the investment.—Hamilton v. Lane, V.C. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 189.

5. Stock Exchange—Custom—Default of principal—Closing of account.—The usage of the London Stock Exchange which permits a broker who has been instructed to carry over stock to the next settlement to close his principal's account if the balance in the broker's favour has not been paid on the day for the current settlement is reasonable if the broker gives the principal notice of the balance before the settlement day.—Davis v. Howard, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 691; 59 L. J. Q. B. 133.

6. Stockbroker—Banking account—Money received for clients—Appropriation of payments—Judgment creditor—Execution.—A stockbroker kept an account at a bank into which he paid all the money received by him for clients. A judgment creditor of the stockbroker obtained a garnishee order on a balance standing to the credit of the broker on this account. In the case of two clients an amount in excess of the balance at the respective times of the payment in of their money had been drawn out. These two clients were the only persons who claimed any part of the balance.

Held (reversing the decision of North, J., 37 W. R. 459, 41 Ch. D. 456), that the judgment creditor had no right against the balance, no part of the money in the bank being the debtor's own; and the balance being equal to the sum due from the broker to the two clients in respect of money belonging to them which had been paid into that account, and there being no claim by any other client, the money belonged to these two clients.

PRINCIPAL and SURETY:—

NOR., J. 598—44 Ch. D. 168.

2. Discharge—Lunacy of principal.—In an action against a surety on a bond for the due performance of the duties of a collector, the defendants alleged that, before the collector entered on his duties, he became, and had since continued, a lunatic.

Held, that the defence was good.—Grove v. Johnston, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 352.

3. Promissory note—Transfer of mortgage by principal.—The plaintiff was surety on a promissory note, the defendant being one of the principals. The defendant had transferred a mortgage security to the holder of the note, who had then released him from liability. No cash was paid by or on behalf of the plaintiff on the footing of the security. The plaintiff sued the defendant for money paid.

Held, that a verdict was rightly entered for the plaintiff for the value of the mortgage.—Fahey v. Frawley, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 78.

PROMISSORY NOTE:—

1. Indorsement—Discharge—Holder for value.—The defendant gave to W. a promissory note as security for a debt due. He subsequently gave to W. a collateral security for the same debt, which W. transferred for value. W. indorsed the promissory note to the plaintiff, who had no notice of the collateral security, to secure a debt due from W. to the plaintiff.

Held, that the note was not discharged, and that the plaintiff was a bonâ fide holder for value entitled to sue the defendant on the note.—Glasscock v. Balls, C.A. 155—24 Q. B. D. 13; 59 L. J. Q. B. 51; 62 L. T. 163.

2. Renunciation — Promissory note payable on demand—Maturity—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 62, 89.—A promissory note payable on demand reaches maturity as soon as it is made.

A., having lent his niece £2,000, secured by a promissory note payable on demand, made a codicil to his will, by which he had bequeathed to her a sum of £6,000, and recited the existence of the loan, which he wished to be considered an advance on account of the legacy of £6,000, and directed that, if the sum of £2,000 should be due and owing at his death, such moneys should be deducted from the said legacy, and that the said legacy should be reduced accordingly, in satisfaction of the moneys due. About two hours before his death he expressed a desire to destroy the promissory note, and to forgive the debt. The note could not then be found, and a stranger present wrote a memorandum of his wishes, which was not signed by him.

Held, that there was not an absolute and unconditional renunciation within section 62 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

RAILWAY:—

1. Abandonment—Parliamentary deposit—Private Act.—A railway company's private Act of Parliament, passed in 1881, incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and provided (by section 34) that the parliamentary deposit should not be repaid to the depositors if the railway was not completed and opened to the public by a specified time, and (by section 35) that, in such case, the deposit should be applicable towards compensating landowners or other persons whose property had been interfered with or rendered less valuable by the commencement, construction, or abandonment of the railway, or who had been "subjected to injury or loss in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company" by that Act, and, if no such compensation was payable, or any balance of the deposit remained after paying such compensation, the deposit or such balance thereof should either be forfeited to the Crown or, in the discretion of the Chancery Division, if the company was insolvent and had been "ordered to be wound up" or a receiver had been appointed, should be paid to such receiver or to the liquidator of the company, or be "otherwise applied as part of the assets of the company for the benefit of the creditors thereof." In 1888 a private Act was passed for the abandonment of the railway in a form commonly used for such Acts, and provided that where, before the passing of that Act, any contract had been entered into or notice given by the company for the purchase of land, the company should be released from all liability to complete such purchase, but that full compensation should be made by the company to the owners and occupiers, or other persons interested in such land, for all injury or damage sustained by them respectively by reason of the purchase not being completed pursuant to the contract or notice. Section 5 provided that, "subject to the provisions of this Act, and of section 35 of the Act of 1881, with respect to compensation to landowners and other persons injured, and for the protection of creditors," the court might and should order the deposit to be repaid to the depositors. Section 6 was as follows:—"Forthwith after the passing of this Act the company shall proceed to wind up their affairs, and shall pay, satisfy, and discharge all their debts, liabilities, and engagements."

Held, (1) (reversing the decision of Stirling, J.) that the effect of section 6 of the Act of 1888 was that the company had been "ordered to be wound up" within the meaning of section 35 of the Act of 1881; that section 5 of the Act of 1888 took away incidentally any claim to the deposit money which the Crown previously had under section 35 of the Act of 1881; and, that, subject to the priority of landowners and other persons injured who might be entitled under section 35 to compensation out of the deposit, it was applicable to the payment, as creditors, pari passu with other creditors, of any landowners proving injury or damage under section 4 of the Act of 1888; (2) (affirming the decision of Stirling, J.) that, by the words "in consequence of the compulsory powers of taking property conferred upon the company," in section 35, what was meant was, "in consequence of the exercise of" such powers, and that service of a notice to treat did not of itself, or even if a contract resulted, amount to an exercise of compulsory powers, so as to give the landowner any claim in priority under that section against the deposit; (3) that, even if service of notice to treat were an exercise of compulsory powers, the incurring of costs by a landowner to his solicitors and surveyors by reason of such notice, even though there resulted therefrom an agreement to purchase, which ultimately failed owing to the abandonment, did not amount to such injury or loss as was contemplated by section 35.—In re Uxbridge and Richmond-worth Railway Co., C.A. 644—43 Ch. D. 536; 59 L. J. Ch. 409; 62 L. T. 347.

2. Bridge—Highway—Repair—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 46.—If a railway crosses a highway which is carried over it by a bridge the railway company is bound, under section 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to keep in repair the roadway upon the bridge.

3. Carriers—Cattle—Contract note.—The defendant sent cattle by the plaintiffs' line of railway from Dublin to York. The defendant signed a contract note which provided that the plaintiffs did not undertake to supply cattle wagons of any particular size or class, but that the charge would be for the class of wagons actually used. The actual sum to be paid by the defendant was not specified. The defendant's cattle were loaded in wagons of three different classes, and the plaintiffs demanded the rates applicable to the wagons actually used.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the charges demanded.—London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Hughes, Q.B.D. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 165.

4. Jurisdiction—Railway Commission—Discontinuance of traffic—Resumption—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), ss. 1—3—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), ss. 1, 8.—The court has power, under sections 1—3 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, to make an order requiring a railway company to resume passenger traffic on a part of its line on which passenger traffic has been discontinued.—Winsford Local Board v. Cheshire Lines Committee, H.C. 511—24 Q. 5. Minerals—Quarrying—Notice by landowner—Limestone—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 77—79.—Beds of ironstone and limestone are "mines of ironstone and other minerals" within section 77 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, even if, according to the custom of the district, they are got by surface workings (Lord Macnaghten dissenting).

It is sufficient if the owner, giving notice under section 78 of his intention to work the minerals, has a bonâ fide intention of working by his lessees or licensees.

6. Negligence — Injury to servant — Contributory negligence.—The plaintiff was a station-master on a single line of railway, and it was his duty to obtain a staff from the driver of each arriving train, and to hand it to the driver of the next train, as an indication of the line being clear. The plaintiff, having omitted to obtain the staff from the driver of a goods train, which had been shunted for a passenger train to pass, left the platform to get the staff, and while running back with it was knocked down and injured by an arriving passenger train, which he knew to be due. The jury found that the driver did not whistle; that the plaintiff had not been guilty of negligence; and that, with ordinary care, the plaintiff might have avoided the accident.

Held, that the accident had arisen from the plaintiff's contributory negligence, and he could not recover.—McDonnell v. Great Southern and Western Railway Co., EX.D. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 369.

6a. Railway company—Undue preference—Rates—Railway and Canal Regulation Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 48), s. 14—Jurisdiction.—The applicants, a colliery company, sought for an order under section 14 of the Railway and Canal Regulation Act, 1873, requiring the defendant company to distinguish in the rate-books kept at certain stations on their system, or in the rate-books kept at certain stations nearest to the places at which traffic was received from certain collieries alleged to be in competition with the applicants, how much of the said rates charged by the defendant company to the applicants and the said competing collieries for the carriage of coal and slack to certain stations and sidings (some of which were stated but not proved to be off the defendant company's system) to which the defendant company quoted a rate, was for the conveyance of the said coal and slack on the said railway or railways, &c.; and how much for other expenses, &c. The affidavits in support of the application alleged that certain specified collieries competed with the applicants in the same trade, districts, and markets, but did not state that the products of seven out of the nine specified collieries were conveyed or delivered at any of the specified stations, or that such products were sent by the defendant company from other stations, in the rate-books of which the applicants sought to have the rates divided for their information, or that any of these latter stations were on the defendant company's system, or that any of the competing collieries sent any of their products from any of these latter stations. The affidavits further alleged that the defendant company charged seven out of the nine specified collieries lower rates than those charged to the applicants, and, as to the other two, that the defendant company performed gratuitously costly and important services which they did not perform for the applicants.

Held, that, while the court had jurisdiction to make the order sought for in a properly proved case, the applicants had not, by proper evidence, sufficiently made out to the satisfaction of the court that they were persons interested within the meaning of section 14 of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 48, or that the defendant company had the information necessary for the division of the alleged through rates, so as to be entitled to have the rates in the rate-books at the various stations specified distinguished in the manner sought by them, and that the application ought to be dismissed.—Pelsall Coal and Iron Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., R.C.—61 L. T. 257.

8. Scheme of arrangement—Preference shareholders—Assent—Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 119), ss. 12—17—Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 118), s. 14—Special Act.—A railway company, by its special Act, was empowered to divide any share in its capital into a preferred half-share and a deferred half-share; the dividend which would have been payable on an entire share to be applied, first, in payment of a dividend not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum on the preferred half-share, and the remainder (if any) on the deferred half-share; each preferred half-share to be entitled to such dividend in priority to the deferred half-shares bearing the same number; the several half-shares to be half-shares in the capital of the company, and every two half-shares, whether preferred or deferred, or one of each, held by the same person, to confer such right of voting at meetings of the company, and to have all such other rights, liabilities, and incidents as attached or were incident to an entire share. The share capital of the company on its incorporation, consisted exclusively of ordinary shares. The company, in exercise of power contained in its special Act, divided a part of its shares into preferred half-shares and deferred half-shares. The directors of the company subsequently prepared and filed a scheme of arrangement with the creditors of the company.

Held, that the holders of preferred half-shares were not preference shareholders nor a class of preference shareholders within the meaning of section 12 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, and that it was not necessary to procure their assent as such to the scheme of arrangement in the manner required by that section.

9. Scheme of arrangement—Unsecured creditors—Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), ss. 6, 7, 17, 18.—A dock company, which was also a railway company within the Railway Companies Act, 1867, being unable to meet its engagements with its creditors, a scheme of arrangement was prepared by the directors under section 6 of that Act. The scheme contained provisions for funding the interest accruing during a suspense period on the mortgages, charges, and debenture stock of the company; for preventing debts secured by mortgages or charges, the interest on which should be duly paid or funded, being called in before the expiration of a period of ten years; empowering the company to liquidate the debts of unsecured creditors incurred before a specified date, by the issue to them of deferred debenture stock charged on the undertaking of the company; and providing that one-half of any surplus proceeds of realization of specific mortgages and charges, and of the proceeds of certain other realizations, should be applied in the purchase or redemption of the deferred debenture stock; and various other provisions, framed with the view of enabling the company eventually to discharge all its liabilities. The confirmation of the scheme was opposed by certain of large unsecured creditors of the company.

Held (affirming the decision of Chitty, J.), that the scheme, though it might indirectly affect them, did not infringe or take away any legal right of the unsecured creditors, nor in any way exceed the powers given by the Act, but was an honest and reasonable scheme, affording a reasonable prospect of enabling the creditors to be paid, and intended to do, and apparently doing, the best that could be done for all the parties concerned, secured and unsecured creditors and shareholders alike, and that it ought to be confirmed; and that the directors ought to exercise the power given by the scheme, of offering deferred debenture stock to the unsecured creditors, without favour or partiality, as between such creditors.

1. Riparian owner—Floating wharf.—A riparian owner has a right to construct and moor to his land a floating wharf and boathouse, if they do not obstruct the navigation, and is entitled to sue for damages for interference with the flow of the stream.—Booth v. Ratte, P.C. 737—15 App. 188; 59 L. J. P. C. 44.

2. Riparian owner — Railway—Obstruction—Injunction — Damages. — There is no distinction in principle between riparian rights on the banks of navigable or tidal, and on that of non-navigable rivers; but in the former case there must be no interference with the public right of navigation, and, in order to give rise to riparian rights, land must be in permanent contact with the stream, either laterally or vertically.

Lyon v. Fishmongers' Co., 25 W. R. 165, 1 App. 602, is an authority applicable to every country where the same general law of riparian rights prevails, unless it is excluded by a positive rule or binding authority of the lex loci.

The defendants made a railway on the foreshore of a tidal and navigable river, with an embankment extending over the whole of the plaintiffs' frontage, thus cutting off all access to the river from the plaintiffs' land, except through two small openings, one of which was just outside the plaintiffs' frontage.

Held, (1) that the plaintiffs had the same right of access as if the river had been non-navigable; (2) that the obstruction of their access without parliamentary authority was actionable; (3) that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction, and to damages if the injunction was disobeyed.—North Shore Railway Co. v. Pion, P.C.—14 App. 612; 59 L. J. P. C. 25; 61 L. T. 525.

3. Obstruction—Non-tidal stream—Right of way—Dedication—Injunction.—The plaintiff sued to restrain the defendant from interfering with posts and chains which the plaintiff, the owner of the bed of the river under a title derived from the Crown, had placed in the River Mole to stop the waterway. The defendant, who was not a riparian owner, counterclaimed for an injunction to restrain any hindrance to the passage of his boats. He based his claim on a public right of highway over part of the river, not on a right of recreation. The evidence showed that the reach in question was not tidal; that it could not be approached by boats from below; that its depth was artificial, and depended on mill dams; that it had never been used for purposes of commerce, or as a way from one public place to another; that there was no public access to it at one end, and it was doubtful whether there was any public access to it for boats at any point; that no one except the mill-owners had done anything towards maintaining it as a waterway; and that there had been a considerable amount of boating on the reach by riparian owners and by others in boats brought from a distance, chiefly for fishing, but that no right to fish was claimed, and persons boating had hardly ever been interfered with.

Held, that the user had been permissive, and not of right, and that the defendant must be restrained from removing the obstruction.—Bourke v. Davis, CH.D. KAY, J. 167—44 Ch. D. 110; 62 L. T. 34.

SALE of GOODS:—

Sample—Implied warranty of merchantableness—Extent of.—The defendant manufacturers contracted to supply to the plaintiff a quantity of indigo cloth according to sample. The cloth was delivered and accepted according to sample, but the plaintiff, who was a tailor as well as a woollen merchant, used the cloth for the purpose of making liveries, for which it proved to be unsuited. It was proved that cloth of the same description was commonly used for making liveries, but the defendants were unaware of the purpose for which the plaintiff bought the cloth in question. It was not proved that the cloth was unsuitable for any other purpose than that of making liveries. In an action against the defendants for breach of an implied warranty of merchantable quality, the judge left the question to the jury whether the cloth was merchantable for a woollen manufacturer, and refused to leave to them the question whether an ordinary use for the cloth was the making of liveries.

Held, that there was no misdirection.—Jones v. Padgett, Q.B.D. 782—24 Q. B. D. 650; 59 L. J. Q. B. 261; 62 L. T. 934.

SAVINGS BANK:—

Trustee—Negligence—Contributory—Savings Banks Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 87), s. 11—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 165, 200.—By section 11 of the Savings Banks Acts Amendment Act, 1863, trustees or managers of savings banks are exempted from personal liability, except (inter alia) for neglect or omission in complying with the rules and regulations required by the Act to be adopted for the maintenance of checks and the audit and examination of accounts.

D., a former manager and trustee of a savings bank, omitted to observe the requirements of the section, and frauds were committed by the actuary which necessitated the winding up of the bank.

Held, that the section relieved a trustee or manager from liability to contribute under section 200 of the Companies Act, 1862, and that D.'s name ought not to settled on the list of contributories.

Held, also, that the omission or neglect to observe the rules and regulations, although it did not render a trustee liable as a contributory, constituted a misfeasance or breach of trust within the meaning of section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, and that D. must contribute an adequate sum to the assets of the bank by way of compensation.—In re Cardiff Savings Bank, Davies's case, CH.D. SCOTLAND, LAW of:—

1. Arbitration—Future disputes.—By the law of Scotland an agreement to refer future disputes to a person unnamed, and designated only by his filling a particular position, is not binding.—Tancred v. Steel Co. of Scotland, H.L.—15 App. 125; 62 L. T. 738.

2. Fishery—Royal charter—Exclusive enjoyment.—The appellants were owners of salmon fisheries under a Crown charter, dated 1591, confirming to the town of Inverness all the waters of the Ness, with all the salmon fisheries from C. to the sea. The respondent was the owner of land on the Ness, partly above and partly below C. He owned part of the land under a Crown charter, dated 1566, granting half the land of H. with the salmon fisheries pertaining thereto. H. held the other half of the land under a grant which did not mention the fisheries. The respondent and his predecessors had uninterruptedly enjoyed the fisheries above C.

Held, that the appellants were entitled to the exclusive enjoyment of the fisheries below C.—Warrand v. Macintosh, H.L.—15 App. 52.

3. Husband and wife—Deed—Post-nuptial contract—Testamentary deed.—In 1850, by a post-nuptial contract, reciting an ante-nuptial contract in 1817, a husband and wife agreed to a new arrangement of their individual property after the death of the predecessor. The husband bound himself and his heirs to pay his wife, if she survived him, an annuity of £200 a year, with the use of his house and furniture, and the wife accepted this in discharge of all legal claims. The wife granted and assigned in favour of her husband and his heirs all her real and personal estate belonging to her at the time of her death, including her rights under the ante-nuptial contract. She nominated her husband her sole executor and universal legatee. The deed contained a power of alteration during their joint lives. The wife's property included a part of the residue of her grandfather's estate, in life rent exclusive of her husband, with a general power of appointment in default of issue. The husband predeceased the wife, having bequeathed his property to trustees.

Held, that the deed of 1850 was not a testamentary deed, but a deed of contract, and that the residue of the estate of the wife's grandfather passed to the husband.—McOnie v. Whyte, H.L.—15 App. 156.

4. Succession—Period of vesting—Widow's repudiation of her testamentary provisions—Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98).—A truster, who died in 1865, by trust disposition directed his trustees to hold his whole estate on trust to pay his wife an annuity, and "as soon after the death" of his said wife "as convenient 'to convey specific heritable subjects to certain of his children, to realize the whole residue, and, having invested £1,000 for the life-rent benefit of another child, to divide the remaining residue among his four children; with a declaration that if any of the children "predeceased the term of payment of their provisions without leaving issue" his or her provisions under the deed "should lapse and fall into residue." The residue was to be divided in the proportion of one share to each surviving child, and one share among the children of each deceasing child.

Immediately after the truster's death the widow repudiated her testamentary provisions, and elected to take her legal rights of terce and jus relictæ. The period for accumulation allowed by the Thellusson Act expired in 1886.

One of the children and the representative of the husband of the deceased child then claimed that the fund in respect of the widow's repudiation had vested a morte testatoris. The widow was still alive.

Held, that the beneficial fee of the specific heritable subjects and the residue would not vest until the death of the widow; that her repudiation could not accelerate the distribution of the fund; and that until her death the beneficiaries could not be ascertained.—Muirhead v. Muirhead and Crellin, H.L.—15 App. Cas. 289.

5. Trustee — Negligence — Borrowing — Trust for maintenance.—A trustee with power to sell or borrow is only required to follow the dictates of ordinary prudence in adopting either course, and the question whether he acted prudently must be decided according to the circumstances of each case.

Trustees appointed under a settlement were directed to pay debts, and to pay a portion of the free income of the settled property to the settlor's widow for the maintenance and advancement of his children, and, after the youngest child had attained the age of thirty, to sell and divide the estate, which consisted of houses, and to make such further advances for the maintenance and education of the children as they should think expedient. In 1858 the trustees borrowed money to pay off a bond and other debts. The trust was sequestrated in 1867, and the creditors were not all paid in full. The furniture, in which the widow had a life interest, was pledged by her, and was lost.

Held, that the trustees were authorized to make payments to the widow and children, even out of capital; and that they were not liable for the loss of the furniture.—Binnie v. Broom, H.L.—14 App. 576.

6. Trustee—Negligence—Mortgage.—T. was trustee under a marriage settlement, the wife's property being settled on her for life, and the jus mariti being excluded. In the event of the wife surviving her husband it was settled to her in fee, and in the event of her predeceasing him to the husband for life or till his second marriage, and after his death or second marriage to her children in fee. T. and the husband and wife, who were also trustees, lent the trust fund on the security of unfinished houses, which were being erected under a building speculation. Their only valuation was made by an architect, and was obtained by the borrower, but their solicitors advised them that there was no objection to the investment. The settlement exonerated the trustees from "omissions or neglect of difference, or the insufficiency of securities, insolvency of debtors, or depreciation in the value of purchases." The fund was lost.

Held, that T. was liable for a positive breach of duty.—Rae v. Meek, H.L.—14 App. 558.

7. Vendor and purchaser—Entailed estate—Misrepresentation.—An error on the part of one of the parties to a contract as to its legal meaning will not invalidate his consent to the contract.

A. offered to sell his entailed estates to B. at a certain price, the sale to be "subject to the ratification of the court." B. accepted the offer.

Held, that A. could not have the contract set aside on the ground that he believed that the court would judge of the sufficiency of the price, and did not consider his own offer to be that of an absolute and unconditional sale.—Stewart v. Kennedy, H.L.—15 App. 108.

SETTLEMENT:—

1. After-acquired property—Covenant to settle—Property acquired after wife's death.—Under a deed poll dated in 1833 A. was entitled, subject to certain successive life interests, to a share of certain funds thereby settled. By a settlement dated in 1841, made on the marriage of A. with B., B. covenanted to settle any property to which A., or B. in her right, should subsequently become entitled. A. died in 1852. B. was still living, but had assigned his interest. There were children of the marriage living. The last surviving tenant for life under the deed of 1833 having recently died, the funds thereupon became distributable.

Held, that the covenant of the husband, being in general terms, was not to be confined to property falling into possession during the coverture, and that the trustees of the settlement of 1841 were therefore entitled to A.'s share of the funds.—Fisher v. Shirley, CH.D. STI., J. 70—59 L. J. Ch. 29; 61 L. T. 668.

2. After-acquired property of wife—Reversionary defeasible interest — Covenant by husband.—A reversionary interest which becomes vested in the wife during coverture, liable to be divested by the exercise of a power of appointment, is included in a covenant by the husband contained in a marriage settlement to settle all personal estate which shall come at any time during coverture to him or shall vest in him in right of his intended wife, or in her by bequest, gift, or otherwise.—In re Ware, Cumberlege v. Cumberlege-Ware, CH.D. STI., J. 767.

2a. Construction—Chattels settled to go with mansion house—Sale of mansion house—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 37.—By the will of the settlor chattels were given upon trust to be held and enjoyed and go along with his P. House. After his death some of the personalty settled by the will was laid out in the purchase of real estate, with a house upon it more suitable for the family mansion than the P. house. It was desired to sell the P. house, and such of the chattels in it as were not suitable for removal to the new house, and to remove to that house such of the chattels as were suitable for removable.

Held, that this might be done.—Brown v. Collins, CH.D. STI., J.—62 L. T. 566.

3. Construction—Borrowing powers—Condition—"Not more than two children."—A marriage settlement authorized the trustees, on the request of the survivor of the husband and wife, if there should be "not more than two children of the marriage," to raise £5,000, and if more than two children £3,000. The husband survived the wife, there never having been any children of the marriage.

Held, that there was power to the trustees to raise £5,000.—Wilkinson v. Thornhill, CH.D. CHI., J.—61 L. T. 362.

4. Construction—Resulting trust.—In 1873, by a voluntary settlement, property was settled on trust for W. for life, with remainder to his children. If there should be no child of W. who should take a vested interest, the trustees were to stand possessed of the property in trust for D. and her child or children, subject to the like trusts, limitations, declarations, and agreements as were expressed in a certain indenture of even date. No such indenture was executed, but at the date of the settlement an indenture had been prepared settling certain property on trust for D. for life, with remainder to her children. A deed was afterwards signed by which the property was conveyed to D. absolutely. D. died without leaving a child.

Held, that there was a resulting trust for the settlor's benefit.—Wilcock v. Johnson, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. T. 317.

5. Power of appointment — Deficiency—Hotchpot.—A trust fund was appointed under a power of appointment in a deed which contained no hotchpot clause. After portions of the appointed sums had been paid to the appointees, the fund proved insufficient to pay all the appointees in full.

Held, that the balance belonged to all the appointees in proportion to the unpaid balances, and that the previous payments ought not to be brought into account as under a hotchpot clause.—Hutton v. Anderson, CH.D. CHI., J.—42 Ch. D. 559; 58 L. J. Ch. 823; 61 L. T. 458.

6. Power of appointment—Remoteness—Contingent remainder.—That an estate cannot be limited by way of remainder, after a life estate to an unborn person, to children or issue of such unborn person, is an absolute and still existing rule of law, applicable to legal limitations, and exists independently of the rule against perpetuities, and such a remainder or gift over is not rendered valid by the insertion of words having the effect of restricting it to children or issue born before the expiration of the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities, which prevents property being tied up for a longer period than a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards.

By a marriage settlement lands were limited to the use of the husband and wife successively for life, with remainder to the use of any one or more of their children, grandchildren, or more remote issue, born before any appointment made, as the husband and wife should by deed appoint. The husband and wife, in exercise of the power, appointed part of the lands, by deed, to the use of a married daughter for life for her separate use, and after her decease to the use of her children living at the date of that deed, as tenants in common in fee.

Held, that the limitation, to the children of the married daughter, contained in the deed of appointment, when read, as it must be, as part of the original settlement, was bad, as offending against the first rule, notwithstanding the fact of the limitation being restricted to children living at the date of the deed of appointment.

Judgment of Kay, J. (38 W. R. 5, 42 Ch. D. 494), affirmed.—Whitby v. Mitchell, C.A. 337—44 Ch. D. 85; 59 L. J. Ch. 485; 62 L. T. 771.

7. Rent-charge—Right of action—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 36.—The statement of claim alleged that A had granted land, by indenture of settlement, to the use that B., if she survived the settlor, might, from his death, enjoy to her own use a yearly rent-charge of £150, by way of jointure during her life, payable out of the settled land, and that, subject to such rent-charge, the land was limited to the use of trustees for a term of 160 years, and subject thereto to the use of the grantor in fee, and that the term of years was vested in the trustees on trust, whenever the jointure should be in arrear, to raise the arrears by mortgage or sale, that the grantor had died, and the defendant had taken possession under the grantor's will, and that arrears of rent-charge had accrued due to B., to whom the plaintiff was executrix.

Held, that an action for arrears of the rent-charge was not maintainable.—Swift v. Kelly, C.A. (Ir.)—24 L. R. Ir. 478.

8. Setting aside — Delay — Conflict of laws — Restraint on alienation.—In 1834 a domiciled Englishman, tenant in tail in possession of real estate in England, married in Turkey a subject of the then Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. By a contract executed before marriage he gave half of all his revenues and real and personal estate as an irrevocable donation in augmentation of her dowry. The evidence showed that, if the husband's land had been in Sicily, this contract would have transferred half of it at once for the benefit of the wife without further conveyance, that that half would have been inalienable during their joint lives, and that the contract was irrevocable. No steps were taken to carry out the contract. In 1846 the husband disentailed all his property and sold part of it, and in 1847 he and his wife executed a deed, by which, after reciting that doubts had arisen as to the effect of the contract, the rest of the property was settled. The husband died in 1887, and an action was brought by the tenant in tail under the deed of 1847 to have the trusts of the deed carried into execution, and for a declaration that a deed executed in 1886 by the husband and wife, purporting to annul the deed of 1847, was void. The wife defended the action, and at first alleged undue influence and want of consideration and independent advice, but she subsequently withdrew these allegations. Her case was that in 1847 the land comprised in the contract was inalienable, and that a capacity to alienate could not be obtained by arrangement. She brought a cross-action to have the deed of 1847 declared void.

Held, that in 1847 there was a serious doubt as to the rights of the parties, and that the settlement of that year was a family arrangement, with which the court would not interfere after the lapse of forty years.—Case v. Case, CH.D. KAY, J. 183—61 L. T. 780.

9. Setting aside—Undue influence—Father and son.—A son being tenant in tail in remainder expectant on the decease of his father to an estate of about 3,000 acres, the income of which was about £1,450, executed, shortly after he came of age, a deed of resettlement of the property, including an adjoining farm of about 116 acres, and by the resettlement, after certain trusts in his favour, £200 per annum was settled on his mother, and subject thereto a trust was created for raising any sum not exceeding £2,000 as the father should appoint, with the usual remainders. The father in exercise of the power raised sums of £500 and £400, the former of which was admittedly applied for the benefit of the son, and the latter for the benefit of the father himself. The son having brought an action to set aside the settlement, on the ground of undue influence, and that it was executed without independent advice, the father offered to release his right to charge the estate further, and to indemnify the estate against the £400 already raised, and the mother offered to release her right to the £200 a year.

Held, that the action must be dismissed.

Held, also, that the court, in questions regarding the upsetting of resettlements, has regard to various considerations not admissible in other cases, and the court will not minutely inquire whether the father exerted his influence more or less, or insist that the son has independent advice; but if the father obtains a benefit, the suspicion of the court is aroused, and where it is unfair, the settlement, if otherwise unobjectionable, may be reformed in this particular, the rest being allowed to stand.—Hoblyn v. Hoblyn, CH.D. KEK., J. 12—41 Ch. D. 200; 60 L. T. 499.

10. Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18), ss. 24, 26, 50—Lease by married woman—Separate examination—Orders of December, 1878, rr. 4, 13.—A married woman interested in a settled estate, who has been served with a notice of a petition for the approval by the court of a lease proposed to be made under the Settled Estates Act, 1877, and who, in answer to such notice, states in writing that she submits her rights and interests to be dealt with by the court, need not be separately examined.—In re Stanley's Settled Estates, CH.D. NOR. J. 32—61 L. T. 169.

11. Tenancy for life—Custody of title deeds—Production.—An equitable tenant for life of a settled estate is entitled to the custody of the title deeds upon undertaking not to part with them, but to produce them to the trustees on all reasonable occasions.—In re Burnaby's Settled Estates, CH.D. STI., J.—42 Ch. D. 621; 58 L. J. Ch. 464; 61 L. T. 22.

12. Tenancy for life—Improvements—Payment out of capital—Evidence—Improvement of Land Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 114), ss. 9, 55—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 25—Settled Land Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2.—A summons asking for a delaration that trustees might apply capital in payment of rent-charges due to the Land Commissioners for money borrowed for land drainage and other improvements was ordered to stand over for further evidence that the works were improvements within section 25 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. The inspector of works to the Land Commissioners had certified that the work consisted of new farm buildings, the conversion of a barn into a cowhouse, and other re-arrangements of buildings, and that the work had been executed in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the Land Commissioners, and would, in his opinion, produce a permanent improvement in the rental value of the land exceeding the proposed annual charge thereon.

Held, that there was not sufficient evidence for the court to authorize the trustees to apply capital in payment of the rent-charge.—In re Newton's Settled Estates, CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 787.

13. Tenancy for life—Improvements—Rent-charge—Redemption out of capital—Bonus—Settled Land Acts (Amendment) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 30), s. 1.—Where a tenant for life of settled land has created a terminable rent-charge in pursuance of any Act of Parliament for the purpose of repaying money borrowed for improvements, it is allowable for the trustees of the settlement, under section one of the Settled Land Act of 1887, in applying capital money to the expenses of redeeming such rent-charge, to include in such expenses a payment by way of bonus to the lender for taking repayment before the proper time.

In re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates, 36 W. R. 162, 37 Ch. D. 123, disapproved.—In re Egmont's (Lord) Settled Estates, C.A. 762.

14. Tenancy for life—Improvements—Separate properties.—Four estates were devised upon trust for the same tenant for life, and, after her death, as to the first three of the estates, to different persons in strict settlement, and as to the fourth, upon trust for a long term of years, and subject thereto as to one moiety to the uses of the first of the other estates, and as to the other moiety to the uses of the second of the other estates.

Held, that, notwithstanding the term of years, the second estate and the moiety of the fourth estate constituted one settled estate within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, so that capital arising from the moiety of the fourth estate might be applied in improvements on the second estate; and that the costs, as between solicitor and client of the surveyor and solicitor of the tenant for life, in preparing and carrying out the schemes for such improvements, were costs incidental to the application, and payable out of the same capital moneys.

15. Tenancy for life—Reversion—Apportionment.—In 1815 A., on his son's marriage, settled two funds of £10,000 in trust for his son for life, after his son's death for his son's wife for life, and in default of issue as the settlor should, by deed, will, or codicil referring to the settlement, appoint. In 1832 A. executed a will which did not refer to the settlement, and provided that his residuary personal estate should be invested in trust for his son for life, and in default of his son's issue for A.'s daughters and their children. By a codicil executed in 1833 A. appointed that the two settled funds of £10,000 should form part of his residuary personal estate. A. died in 1834. A.'s son died in 1850 without having had issue. The widow of A.'s son died in 1879. In 1879 the two settled funds were represented by £25,400 in Consols.

Held, that the fund was properly apportioned between capital and income by treating the capital as the sum which would have accumulated on the death of A.—Matheson v. Goodwyn, CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 216.

16. Tenancy for life—Waste—Equitable waste—Timber—Injunction.—Trees not planted exclusively for ornament are not necessarily excluded from the rule which protects ornamental timber.

The court granted an injunction restraining a tenant for life, without impeachment of waste, from cutting ornamental timber, the trees not being near the mansion though some were visible from it.—Bedoyere v. Nugent, M.R. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 143.

The power of the taxing officer under this provision is limited to the ascertainment of the amount of the costs and charges according to the scale in the schedule; he is to assume them to have been properly incurred, and cannot deal with the question of liability, and there is no appeal from his decision.—Townsend v. Sheriff of Yorkshire, Q.B.D. 381—24 Q. B. D. 621; 59 L. J. Q. B. 156; 61 L. T. 402.

2. Execution—Costs and charges—Taxation—Bankruptcy—Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), s. 20—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 46, sub-section (1)—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, r. 118.—On the 2nd of September, 1889, the goods of the bankrupt were seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa., and in consequence of interpleader proceedings the possession was continued without selling until the 2nd of October, 1889, when, in virtue of a receiving order having been made against the bankrupt, the goods were delivered by the sheriff to the official receiver. The sum of £5 10*s.* having been taxed by the master off a charge made by the sheriff in his bill of costs of £7 10*s.* for thirty days' possession money from the 2nd of September to the 3rd of October, 1889, the sheriff applied that the decision of the taxing master might be reviewed.

Held, that the proper order would be that the amount should be allowed unless the official receiver, within seven days, required the sheriff to take out a summons before the master to have the costs disposed of. If such summons were taken out, the official receiver to be at liberty to appear in it, and to contend, if so advised, that the claimant or the execution creditor ought to pay the possession money in dispute.—Ex parte Sheriff of Essex, In re Levy, Q.B.D. 784.

SHIPPING:—

1. Bill of lading—Delivery of goods—Production of bill of lading.—Goods were shipped in London for a German port on board a German ship under the terms of a bill of lading in two parts, exclusive of the master's copy, making the same deliverable to M. or to his or their assigns. M. was the agent of P., and the shippers of the goods sent one of the parts of the bill of lading to P., and P. afterwards returned it to an agent of the shippers. When the ship arrived at its destination the master delivered the goods to M. without production of the bill of lading. In an action against the shipowners for wrong delivery of the goods the court found that the German law governing the case did not essentially differ from the law of England.

Held, that the defendants had not delivered the goods according to the contract of shipment, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment, subject to a reference as to the amount of damages.—The Stettin, P.D. & A.D. 96—14 P. D. 142; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 81; 61 L. T. 200.

2. Excepted perils—Negligence, "whether in navigating the ship or otherwise"—Liability of shipowner.—A bill of lading contained a clause exempting the shipowners from liability for (inter alia) "misfeasance, error in judgment, negligence or default of pilot, master, mariners, engineers, or other persons in the service of the ship, whether in navigating the ship or otherwise." Damage from "rain or from contact with other goods" was also excepted. After the plaintiffs' goods had been shipped upon the vessel, but before the vessel had started on her voyage, the plaintiffs' goods were injured through the master and crew negligently allowing them to be wetted by rain or by wet goods loaded on the top of them.

Held, in an action to recover from the shipowners damages for the injury to the goods, that the words of the bill of lading absolved the shipowners from liability for damage brought about in negligently navigating the ship, or in negligently bringing about those other losses from which the shipowners had exempted themselves in the bill of lading, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.—Norman v. Binnington, Q.B.D. 702; 25 Q. B. D. 475; 59 L. J. Q. B. 490.

3. Negligence—Wharf—Obstruction in river.—It is the duty of wharfowners to keep the frontage of their wharf, over which vessels must necessarily pass in order to lie at their wharf, in a reasonably safe condition, or to warn vessels using the wharf of its danger.—The Calliope, C.A. 155—14 P. D. 138; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 76; 61 L. T. 656.

CHARTER-PARTY—

4. Warranty—Capacity of ship.—A charter-party provided for the loading of a cargo of creosoted timber and sleepers, and contained the following words:—"Charterer has option of shipping 100 to 200 tons of general cargo . . . owners guarantee ship to carry at least about 90,000 cubic feet or 1,500 tons dead weight of cargo."

Held, that there was only a warranty of the carrying capacity of the ship, and not a warranty that it could carry about 90,000 cubic feet of cargo of the description which the charterer was entitled to tender.—Carnegie v. Conner, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 45; 59 L. J. Q. B. 122; 61 L. T. 661.

COLLISION—

5. Damages—Loss of instruments.—A barque, having been run into by a steamer, which was solely to blame, lost in the collision its instruments of navigation, and made for a port of safety; but, while on the way thither, without any negligence or want of skill, ran aground and was lost.

Held, that the loss was a reasonable and natural consequence of the collision, and that the owners of the steamer were liable for it.

Decision of Butt, J., reversed.—The City of Lincoln, C.A. 345—15 P. D. 15; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 1; 62 L. T. 49.

6. Limitation of liability—Registered tonnage—Evidence—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 26—Merchant Shipping Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54.—In an action for limitation of liability for a collision, the defendants denied that the registered tonnage of the plaintiffs' ship was the correct tonnage.

Held, that the defendants could give evidence of the actual tonnage of the ship.—The Recepta, P.D. & A.D.—14 P. D. 131; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 70; 61 L. T. 698.

7. Negligence.—The sailing ship E., while sailing free, saw the red light of the sailing ship A. on the starboard bow. The A. was sailing close-hauled, but not as close to the wind as was possible. The E. ported, to keep out of The A.'s way. At the same time The A. luffed up as close to the wind as possible, and went a little further under a starboard helm, thus counteracting the porting of The E., and a collision occurred.

Held, that The A. was to blame for the collision.—The Earl of Wemyss, C.A.—61 L. T. 289.

8. Negligence — Crossing ships — Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 18.—If two steamships are approaching one another so as to involve the risk of a collision, and it is the duty of one of them to keep out of the way, and of the other to keep its course, the latter must comply with the regulations as to slackening speed or stopping and reversing if necessary, and, in default of doing so, the burden is on that ship of proving that the continuance of speed was the best manœuvre under the circumstances.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.—Liverpool, Brazil, and River Plate Steamship Co. v. Campanhia Bahiana de Navigacio, H.L.—62 L. T. 84.

8a. Negligence — Crossing ships—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 16, 18, 23.—When two steamships are approaching so as to involve risk of collision, and it is the duty of one to keep out of the way, and of the other to keep her course, the latter is bound to comply with article 18 of the regulations as to slackening her speed or stopping and reversing if necessary, and if she does not do so the onus lies upon her to show that to continue her speed was in fact the best and most seamanlike manœuvre under the circumstances.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed on the facts.—The Memnon, H.L.—62 L. T. 84.

9. Negligence—Crossing ships—River Thames.—If a vessel lying at anchor in the River Thames, with the head to the tide, gets under way in order to proceed up or down the river, and has to cross the river in turning round, such vessel must keep out of the way of vessels passing up and down the river.—The Schwan, P.D. & A.D.—61 L. T. 308.

9a. Negligence—Crossing ships—River Thames—Rules for Navigation of River Thames, arts. 24, 25.—A steamship ceases to be "crossing from one side of the river towards the other side" within the meaning of article 24 of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Navigation of the River Thames when her stem has got so far across that it can go no further, although she is still athwart the stream; but where a vessel is swinging for the purpose of turning in the river with her anchor down but not holding, she is not a crossed ship if she is still moving towards the shore, although she may have got more than athwart, and although her stern may be swinging to the tide. The steamship A., having come up the Thames as far as Bugsby's Reach on the flood tide, was about to turn head down, and, having whistled, her helm was ported and anchor let go so that it might dredge, and she began to swing round. Meanwhile the steamship R. D., which had been coming up the river astern of the A., instead of taking any steps to keep out of the way of The A., although she saw that The A. was doing nothing to keep out of her way in obedience to article 24 of the Thames Rules and Bye-laws, came on and collided with The A.

Held, that both vessels were to blame, The A. because, being a crossing ship, she neglected to keep out of the way of The R. D., and The R. D. because, after she saw that The A. was neglecting her duty to keep out of the way, she failed to take any steps in sufficient time to avoid the collision.—The River Derwent, C.A.—62 L. T. 45.

10. Negligence—Fog.—There is no rule of navigation that a vessel is not to alter its helm in a fog.—The Vindomora, C.A. 69—14 P. D. 172; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 8; 61 L. T. 655.

11. Negligence—Fog—Fog-horn—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 12.—A sailing vessel in stays in a fog is required under article 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea to make with the fog-horn, at intervals of not more than two minutes, when the wind is blowing on the starboard side one blast, and when the wind is blowing on the port side two blasts in succession.—The Constantia, P.D & A.D. 272.

12. Negligence—Fog—Regulations for Preventing Collisions, 1884, art. 18.—If two steamships, invisible to one another by reason of fog, find themselves gradually approaching till they are within a few ships' lengths of one another, each of them ought at once to stop and reverse, unless the fog signals of one ship show that it has passed clear without risk of collision, or unless other circumstances render it dangerous to stop and reverse.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed.—The Ceto, H.L.—14 App. 670.

13. Negligence—Infringement of regulations.—There is no power to absolve a vessel from the consequences of neglecting the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, unless an absolute necessity is proved for disregarding them.

A vessel was proved to have been navigated recklessly, but the other vessel which collided had neglected to slacken speed in good time, in accordance with the regulations.

Held, that the latter vessel was to blame.—The Arratoon Apcar, P.C. 481—15 App. 37; 59 L. J. P. C. 49; 62 L. T. 331.

14. Negligence—Lights—Observation—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 6—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.—The lights of a ship which came into collision with another ship were so fixed as to be partially observed.

Held, that it was for the court to ascertain whether the infringement of the Regulations for Preventing Collisons at Sea could have possibly contributed to the collision, and it appearing that this was impossible, the ship whose lights were partially observed was held not to blame.

Decision of Butt, J., reversed.—The Duke of Buccleuch, C.A.—15 P. D. 86; 62 L. T. 94.

15. Negligence — Lights — River Humber.—In the River Humber a vessel with two masts at anchor must show an after light at least double the height of the bow light, though it need not be exactly double that height.—The Magneta, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 101; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 55.

15a. Negligence — Lightship — River Mersey — Merchant Shipping Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17—Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 32.—The steamship H. at night ran into the barque E. at anchor in the River Mersey. By Order in Council of the 5th of January, 1881, every vessel when at anchor in the River Mersey shall carry two white lights, the after light being carried double the height of the foremost light. The E. exhibited two anchor lights, both of which were about twenty feet above the deck. It was admitted by the defendants that they only saw the after light.

Held, that The H. was to blame for a bad look out, and The E. to blame for a breach of the regulation, it not being shown that in the circumstances of the case the breach could not have contributed to the collision.

The Duke of Buccleuch, 15 P. D. 86, considered.—The Hermod, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 670.

16. Negligence—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 17, 22, and 23.—The fact that a steamship is neglecting to keep out of the way of a sailing-ship does not make it the duty of the sailing-ship to take measures to avoid a collision, except possibly in very exceptional circumstances, because it is possible for a steamship to act for a sailing-ship up to almost the last moment, and any action on the part of the sailing-ship might be liable to increase risk of collision.

The s.s. H. was approaching the sailing-ship S. for several minutes, with her mast head and red lights open, on the starboard bow of The S. The S. kept hept her course till a collision was imminent, and then hard-a-ported, but The H. with her port side struck the stem and port bow of The S. The H. admitted that she was to blame, but contended that The S. was also to blame for breach of article 23 of the Regulations in not manœuvring for The H. after she saw The H. persisting in doing nothing to keep out of her way.

Held, that The S. was not to blame, as the circumstances were not such as to require The S. to alter her course and manœuvre for The H.

The Tasmania, 14 P. D. 53, distinguished.—The Highgate, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 841.

17. Negligence—Sailing Rules.—The decision of the Court of Appeal (37 W. R. 552, 14 P. D. 53) reversed, and the decision of Butt, J., restored, on the ground that upon the evidence as it stood at the trial there was no proof that the master of The Tasmania was guilty of negligence; the decision of the Court of Appeal being based upon a point not suggested at the trial.—The Tasmania, H.L.—15 App. Cas. 223.

18. Pilotage—River Burry—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 353.—Pilotage in the case of vessels trading to the port of Llanelly was, by law, compulsory before the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and therefore, by section 353, continues to be compulsory.—The Ruby, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 139.

19. Repairs to damaged ship—Bankruptcy—Shipwright.—Where in the registrar's report in a collision action it appears that the claimant claims (inter alia) as part of his damages the cost of repairing his ship, but has not paid the shipwright, and has since the repairs were effected become insolvent, and the registrar allows such item, the court has no power to do anything to insure the money being paid over by the claimant to the shipwright, and will not retain the money in the registry until the claimant has given satisfactory evidence that he has paid the shipwright. —The Endeavour, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 840.

CO-OWNERS—

20. Mortgage—Arrest of ship—Release by mortgagee — Indemnity. — A ship having been arrested in an action by the master for disbursements, the plaintiffs, who were the registered mortgagees of forty-eight sixty-fourth shares, in order to obtain the release of the ship, paid the master's claim, and brought an action to recover the amount so paid from the owners of the remaining sixteen shares.

Held, that, as the plaintiffs' shares in the ship had been lawfully seized for a debt for which the defendants were liable, and the plaintiffs had been compelled to pay the debt in order to obtain a release of their property, there was an implied promise on the part of the defendants to reimburse the plaintiffs, and that the action was maintainable.

Edmunds v. Wallingford, 33 W. R. 647; 14 Q. B. D. 811, followed.—The Orchis, C.A. 472—15 P. D. 38; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 31; 62 L. T. 407.

21. Demurrage—Bill of lading—Charter-party—Lay days—Strike. — A cargo was shipped under a charter-party which fixed the number of lay days for unloading, and allowed other days for demurrage. Neither the charty-party nor the bill of lading contained any exception of strikes. By the custom of the port of discharge cargoes were unloaded by the joint act of the shipowners and the consignees. During the lay days a strike took place among both the labourers employed by the ship and those employed by the consignees, and the unloading ceased, and was not resumed till some time after the lay days expired.

Held, that the consignees were liable to pay demurrage, notwithstanding the inability of the shipowners, owing to the strike, to do their part of the unloading.—Budgett v. Binnington, Q.B.D.—25 Q. B. D. 320.

22. Bill of lading—Charter-party—Lien—Consignee—Delay at port of loading. — Goods were shipped on the plaintiffs' ship under a bill of lading which named the defendants as consignees, but the property had not passed to them, and the plaintiffs knew that they were acting as agents. The bill of lading provided the the cargo should be delivered on payment of freight and "other conditions as per charter-party." By the charter-party demurrage was payable, and the plaintiffs had a lien in respect thereof. Before the ship arrived the defendants were informed that demurrage was payable in respect of delay at the port of loading. The defendants paid the freight, but not the demurrage, and the plaintiffs claimed a lien on a part of the cargo.

Held, that the defendants were not liable to pay demurrage.—County of Lancaster Steamship Co. v. Sharp, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 158; 59 L. J. Q. B. 22.

23. Charter-party—Cesser clause—"Clean" bill of lading.—A "cesser clause" in a charter-party applies to every liability incurred through detention in the nature of demurrage.

A "clean" bill of lading is a bill of lading which contains nothing in the margin to qualify the words of the instrument itself.—Restitution Steamship Co. v. Pirie, Q.B.D.—61 L. T. 330.

24. Charter-party—Lay days—County court—Transfer of action—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 8.—Where a case is transferred under the 8th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, pleadings must be entered into as in actions originally commenced in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

A vessel laden with a cargo of 1,855 tons of coal was chartered to proceed to O., or so near thereto as it could safely get, and deliver the same to the freighters alongside any safe wharf, store, craft, steamer, depot, ship, or arsenal, as ordered by receiver, cargo to be discharged at the average rate of not less than 300 tons per working day, Sundays and holidays excepted, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said working days at 16s. 8d. per hour, except in cases of strikes, lock outs, colliery holidays, strikes at mines where steamer is booked, detention by railway, stoppage of trains, accidents to machinery, or any other causes beyond the control of the charterers or receivers, or their respective agents delaying the due loading and unloading, time for loading and unloading to commence when the steamer is ready and intimation has been given in writing. The vessel arrived in the harbour of O. on the 16th of November, and came to anchor there, but not in any usual discharging berth, and the same day the master gave the agents of the consignees of the cargo notice in writing of the ship's readiness to discharge. On the arrival of the ship, and up to the morning of the 20th of November, it was impossible for the ship to get alongside the quay at O. in any of the usual discharging berths for coal cargoes, which were all occupied, but the consignees, whilst such berths were all so occupied, ordered the ship alongside the quay, and at the same time informed the master that he would have to wait his turn. On the morning of the 20th of November the ship got alongside the quay and commenced to discharge. On the afternoon of the 25th of November the discharge was finished. The owners of the ship brought an action in the City of London Court against the consignees for demurrage under the charter-party, and the judge, during the progress of the cause, ordered it to be transferred to the High Court. At the hearing of the transferred cause it was admitted that the agents of the consignees knew, at the time when they ordered the ship alongside the quay, that all the berths there were occupied; that there was no other place for discharge of coal cargoes at O., and that there were no lighters available.

Held, that the defendants were liable for demurrage.

Davies v. McVeagh, 28 W. R. 143, 4 Ex. D. 265, followed.

Semble, that, the consignees' agent having exercised the option given them by the charter-party, and ordered the ship to a quay alongside which she could not get, the lay days began to run from the time when notice was given of the ship's readiness to discharge on the 16th of November.—The Carisbrook, P.D. & A.D. 543—15 P. D. 98; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 37; 62 L. T. 843.

25. Charter-party—Lay days.—By a charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiffs' vessel should "proceed to Odessa, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and load, twelve running days to be allowed for loading and discharging, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days." The vessel arrived at a point in the outer harbour of Odessa, which was as near as it could safely get to a loading berth, and the captain gave notice to the charterers' agents that she was ready to load. The cargo was stored at a quay in the inner harbour, and the agents were unwilling to load it where the vessel then was. It was impracticable to load the steamship except at some quay in either the inner or outer harbour, but there was no custom by which ships were considered ready to receive cargo only when moored alongside the quay. The ship was not loaded till after the lapse of twelve days from the time of arrival in the outer harbour owing to the crowded condition of the quay which was selected for loading.

Held, that the lay days were to be computed from the time when the vessel arrived in the outer harbour, and that the charterers were liable for demurrage.—Pyman v. Dreyfus, Q.B.D. 447—24 Q. B. D. 152; 59 L. J. Q. B. 13; 61 L. T. 724.

DOCK—

25a. Grounding of vessel — Harbour master — Damage.—The plaintiffs' vessel having fouled her propeller whilst entering the harbour of Port Talbot, was, with the permission of the foreman docksman in the absence of the harbour master, placed in the sea lock leading into the dock, for the purpose of being put upon the ground and freeing her propeller. On the water being let out, the vessel took the ground, and sustained damage to her bottom by sitting upon an old sill, which had not been removed when the lock was lengthened. The control of the management of the dock was in the hands of the harbour master, who at the time was ill, and the foreman docksman was acting in his place. The foreman docksman did not know the condition of the bottom of the lock, and had so informed the master of The Apollo. In an action by the shipowners against the dock authority,

Held (Lord Esher, M.R., dissentiente), that the use of the lock for the purpose was an extraordinary use; that the master of the vessel was a bare licensee; and that the foreman docksman had no authority to grant the use of the lock for such purpose so as to render the defendants liable for the damage ensuing.—The Apollo, C.A.—61 L. T. 286.

HARBOUR BOARD—

25b. Harbour master—Pilotage—Negligence—New Zealand Harbours Act, 1878, ss. 49, 75, 76, 215, and 227.—A harbour board was empowered by statute to licence pilots for the purpose of acting within their district. Pilotage was not compulsory in the district, and the pilot made his own bargain with the shipowner. The harbour master, who was also a duly licensed pilot, was acting as pilot to a vessel, engaged by the owners themselves, when she was wholly lost, through his negligence and default.

Held, that the harbour board were not responsible, not being entitled under the statute by which they were constituted to become pilots themselves, but only to issue licences.—Shaw v. Timaru Harbour Board, P.C.—62 L. T. 913.

JETTISON—

26. General average—Salvage—Lien.—The owner of goods sacrified for the common benefit has (1) a direct claim against each of the owners of the ship and cargo for a pro rata contribution towards his indemnity, and (2) a lien, to be enforced through the master, upon each parcel of goods salved belonging to a separate consignee for a due proportion of his individual claim.

Hallett v. Bousfield, 18 Ves. 187, explained.

Jettison was rendered necessary by the master's default in navigating a ship.

Held, that the owners of the jettisoned cargo were entitled to general average.—Steel v. Scott, P.C. 452—14 App. 601; 59 L. J. P. C. 1; 61 L. T. 597.

MASTER—

27. Disbursements — Maritime lien — Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 10), s. 10—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 191.—The master of a ship has no maritime lien on it for disbursements.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 35 W. R. 824, 12 P. D. 158, reversed.—Hamilton v. Baker, H.L. 129—14 App. 209.

SALVAGE—

28. Compulsion—Costs.—The salving vessel had found the salved vessel in the Atlantic in distress, having lost part of her propeller and leaking, and being unable to use her engines, and the salving vessel had towed the salved vessel into Halifax.

The master of the salving vessel before rendering the service, had insisted on the master of the salved vessel signing an agreement that the owners of the salved vessel should pay £5,000 if successful, or a sum for work done if unsuccessful.

The master of the salved vessel had reasonable grounds for believing that if he did not sign the agreement his vessel would be abandoned. £5,000 was more than one-fifth of the total value of the salved vessel, her cargo, and freight.

Held, that the agreement must be taken to have been made under compulsion and could not be enforced, but the salvors were awarded £3,000 as a fair remuneration for the service, and were also allowed their costs.—The Mark Lane, P.D & A.D.—15 P. D. 135.

29. Passengers.—A steamer, with a cargo of cattle in charge of men who were nominally on the ship's books, but were paid by the owners of the cattle, towed a disabled ship for a long distance to Queenstown. The keepers of the cattle rendered no assistance.

Held, that the keepers of the cattle were not entitled to share in the salvage.—The Coriolanus, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 103; 62 L. T. 844.

30. Towage—Contract—Action in personam.—The plaintiffs, the owners of a steam tug, contracted with the defendants, the owners of five steel barges, to tow the barges from Chepstow to Portland for a fixed sum. During the progress of the voyage the barges broke adrift, and were saved by the tug, which also saved the lives of some of the bargemen.

At the end of the voyage two of the barges were given up by the defendants to the Government. An action of salvage was brought in personam against the defendants in respect for salvage to these two barges, and in rem against the three barges remaining in the defendants' possession.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to salvage, and that an action in personam would lie against the defendants.—Five Steel Barges, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 142.

31. Towing—Contract—Increased perils.—The defendants' steamship becoming disabled when about 250 miles from Gibraltar and about sixty from Carthagena, an agreement was made with the master of the plaintiffs' steamship that the plaintiffs' vessel should tow the ship to Gibraltar for £600, the defendants' vessel to provide the hawsers. At this time the weather was moderate. The next day the wind increased to a hurricane, and, in consequence, several of the hawsers broke, only one rope being left. The master of the plaintiffs' vessel, finding it impossible to tow to Gibraltar, towed the defendants' vessel to Carthagena. The plaintiffs brought an action of salvage.

Held, affirming the judgment of Butt, J., that the supervening circumstances had made the service rendered wholly different from that contracted for, and that the court had jurisdiction to award salvage entirely independent of the contract.—The Walbourne, C.A. 56—14 P. D. 132; 58 L. J. P. D. & A. 79; 61 L. T. 156.

TOWING—

32. Lien.—There is no maritime lien for ordinary towage services rendered to a ship, either on the high seas or within the body of a county.—Westrup v. Great Yarmouth Steam Carrying Co. CH.D. KAY, J. 505—43 Ch. D. 541; 59 L. J. Ch. 111.

SHORTHAND NOTES.—See COSTS, 25.

SLANDER:—

Innuendo.—In an action for slander the statement of claim alleged that the defendant falsely and maliciously published the following words as to the plaintiff:—"Did he have a fire twice?" (meaning that the plaintiff had twice set his own premises on fire), and "He has had two fires, and is a dangerous man to have on your premises" (meaning that the plaintiff was likely to commit arson again).

Held, that the statement of claim did not disclose a good cause of action.—Jacobs v. Schmaltz, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 121.

SOLICITOR:—

1. Assignment of verdict—Priority—Garnishee order—Ord. 45, r. 1.—A., a solicitor, was the assignee of a verdict recovered in the Mayor's Court, the deed of assignment containing a covenant for further assurance of the amount of the verdict or other sums becoming payable to the assignor. The case was tried a second time, A. being solicitor for the plaintiff, and a verdict was again given for the plaintiff. B., a judgment creditor of the assignor, obtained a garnishee order attaching the amount recovered.

Held, (1) that A. was entitled to the benefit of the assignment made before he began to act as solicitor in the action; (2) that the assignment to A. was entitled to priority over the garnishee order.—Davis v. Freethy, Q.B.D.—24 Q. B. D. 519.

2. Charging order—Property preserved—Payment into court—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.—The plaintiffs, solicitors, obtained an order that the defendants should pay the amount claimed into court as a condition of leave to defend the action. The plaintiff afterwards compromised the action without his solicitor's knowledge, and without provision for costs.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to give the plaintiff's solicitors a charging order on the money paid into court.—Moxon v. Sheppard, Q.B.D. 704—24 Q. B. D. 627; 59 L. J. Q. B. 286.

3. Charging order—Property preserved—Probate action—Trustee in bankruptcy—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.—A will and codicil were propounded by the surviving executor. D., the daughter of the testator, denied only the validity of the codicil. E., a legatee under the codicil intervened, and propounded the codicil in March, 1887. In May, 1887, E.'s trustee in bankruptcy obtained leave to intervene. In November, 1887, the court pronounced for the will and codicil, but reserved all questions as to costs. In December, 1887, it was ordered that the costs of the bankrupt should be paid out of the residue, if any. There was no residue. In April, 1889, an order was made giving E.'s solicitor a charge in respect of his costs on E.'s interest under the codicil. The trustee in bankruptcy applied to set aside the order.

Held, that E.'s solicitor was entitled to a charge only on the balance remaining after the creditors had been paid.—Keeson v. Luxmoore, P.D. & A.D.—61 L. T. 199.

3a. Charging order—Sale—Costs—Service of order—Advertisement—Practice.—In an action for the execution of the trusts of a settlement, the plaintiffs were one of the two trustees, the tenant for life, and three out of the four beneficiaries in remainder; and the other trustee was the sole defendant, the fourth beneficiary not being a party to the action. Judgment for execution of the trusts being obtained, the plaintiffs' solicitors subsequently obained a charging order on the real estate comprised in the settlement for taxed costs, with liberty to apply for a sale. The fourth beneficiary was not a party to this order. On a summons for a sale under the liberty to apply,

Held, that no order for sale could be made without notice to the fourth beneficiary, but that substituted service of such notice might be given by means of advertisement, and if the fourth beneficiary failed to answer within the time limited by such advertisement, that then the order for sale might go.—Rowley v. Southwell, CH.D. NOR., J.—61 L. T. 805.

4. Lien — Property recovered — Compromise of action—Notice.—An action having been compromised before trial, upon the terms that a sum of £50, which had been paid into court by the defendant, should be paid to the plaintiff in discharge of all claims, W., the plaintiff's solicitor, who had ceased to act for him, thereupon gave notice to the defendant's solicitors not to part with the money until W.'s costs of the action had been paid. The defendant's solicitor disregarded the notice, and paid the £50 over to the plaintiff.

Held (1), that the £50 constituted the fruits of the action, and that W. was entitled to a lien upon it for his costs; (2) that the defendant's solicitors were liable to pay the £50, or so much thereof as would satisfy the lien, to W.; (3) that the plaintiff was also liable, but not the defendant, who had received no notice of the lien.—Ross v. Buxton, CH.D. STI., J. 71—42 Ch. D. 190; 58 L. J. Ch. 442; 60 L. T. 638.

5. London agent — Half profits — Interest.—An agreement between a country solicitor and a London solicitor that the latter should act as the London agent of the former, "upon the usual agency terms," entitles the London agent to his disbursements out of pocket, and to half the "profit charges," whether the country solicitor is paid them by his client or not, but does not entitle the London agent to any share whatever in any other profit made by the country solicitor out of the business.

W., a country solicitor, entered into an agreement with L., a London solicitor, that the latter should act as W.'s London agent on the usual agency terms, and subsequently a further agreement was made that all the business in connection with a particular company, a client of W., and the bills of costs in respect of such business, were to be kept separate from the other agency business and bills of costs, and that L. was not to call upon W. to pay him until W. had himself been paid by the company. The company having failed to pay for many years, W., sued them and recovered payment of his costs, with interest. L. claimed to be entitled to a share in this interest under his agreements with W.

Held (reversing the decision of Chitty, J.), that, upon the true construction of the agreements, the usual agency terms applied except so far as expressly varied, and that, in the absence of any express stipulation as to interest, L.'s claim to share in it could not be sustained.—Ward v. Lawson; Lawson v. Ward, C.A. 300—43 Ch. D. 353; 59 L. J. Ch. 323; 62 L. T. 158.

6. Remuneration—Bankruptcy — Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 72, 73—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 305, 306.—Where a solicitor is appointed trustee in a bankruptcy, his remuneration must be in the nature of a commission or percentage, and the creditors have no power to pass a resolution directing that the remuneration of such trustee shall be his proper professional charges as a solicitor for work done and expenses incurred by him in or about the bankruptcy proceedings.—Ex parte Board of Trade, In re Wayman, Q.B.D., BKCY. 95—59 L. J. Q. B. 28; 61 L. T. 644.

7. Remuneration—Lease—Consideration—Premium—Rent—Remuneration Order, 1882, schedule II.—Where a lease is granted partly in consideration of a premium and partly in consideration of a rent, the solicitor is entitled to receive remuneration on a scale calculated upon both the premium and the rent.—In re Robson, CH.D. NOR., J. 556.

8. Remuneration—Mortgage—Solicitor-mortgagee—Profit costs.—A mortgagee who acts in person as a solicitor in realizing his security cannot recover profit costs from the mortgagor, but only costs out of pocket.

Sclater v. Cottam, 5 W. R. 744, approved.—Ex parte Lickorish, In re Wallis, C.A. 482—25 Q. B. D. 176; 62 L. T. 694.

9. Remuneration—Mortgage—Solicitor-mortgagee—Profit costs.—A solicitor cannot charge his client with profit costs for the preparation of a mortgage from the client to himself.—In re Roberts, CH.D. KAY, J. 225—43 Ch. D. 52; 59 L. J. Ch. 25.

10. Remuneration—Solicitor acting for mortgagor and mortgagee—Agreement as to costs of both parties—Reference to taxing master.—A solicitor was instructed by a letter signed by S. to borrow £300 for him upon certain specified security, and S. thereby undertook to pay "your costs (which I agree at £20, exclusive of money out of pocket) . . . to be incurred in . . . doing what is necessary for the purpose of carrying out these instructions." The solicitor, who acted in the matter for the mortgagee as well as the mortgagor, procured the advance, and retained £20 for his costs of both parties. S. having subsequently applied that the solicitor might be ordered to deliver a bill of his fees, charges, and disbursements, and that it might be referred to taxation,

Held (affirming the decision of North, J.), that, though the remuneration agreed upon included matters in respect of which the solicitor was not engaged as solicitor for S. (including as it did the mortgagee's costs), yet as the solicitor was engaged by S. to do business for him as a solicitor, S. was thereby constituted a "client" of the solicitor within the meaning of section 1, sub-section (3), of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and within the meaning of that Act generally, and the letter amounted to an agreement within section 8 of the Act.

Held, also, that, in the absence of any evidence impeaching the agreement as unfair or unreasonable, the court ought not to refer it to the taxing master under section 8, sub-section (4), to deal with it in exercise of the powers thereby given.—In re Palmer, C.A. 673—62 L. T. 778.

11. Remuneration—Vendor and purchaser—Abortive sale—Costs—Remuneration Order, Schedule I., Part I., r. 2; Schedule II.—Solicitors are not bound to wait to be paid for their services in respect of an abortive sale when it is unlikely that the property will be again put up for sale for some years, and are entitled to have their costs taxed under rule 2 (c) of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.—In re Smith, Pinsent, & Co., CH.D. CHI., J. 685—44 Ch. D. 303.

12. Striking solicitor off rolls—Appeal.—An appeal will lie to the Court of Appeal against an order of the court striking a solicitor off the rolls under section 32 of the Solicitors Act, 1843.—In re Eede, Ex parte Davey, C.A. 683—25 Q. B. D. 228; 59 L. J. Q. B. 376.

13. Striking off rolls—Application by third person—Solicitors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 65), ss. 13, 15—Rules, Part I., r. 1; Part VI., r. 3; Form V.—An application under section 13 of the Solicitors Act, 1888, to strike the name of a solicitor off the rolls may be made by a person who has not employed the solicitor in a professional capacity.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (38 W. R. 507) affirmed.—Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Sankey, C.A. 533—25 Q. B. D. 17.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE:—

Lease—Breach of covenant—Acceptance of rent—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14.—A. was in possession of land under an agreement for a lease to be granted when he should have fulfilled certain conditions as to building, but it was the intention of the parties that the agreement should be treated as a lease. The conditions were not fulfilled by the appointed time, but the landlord afterwards demanded and received rent.

Held, that A. was entitled to specific performance of the agreement for a lease.—Strong v. Stringer, CH.D. REK., J.—61 L. T. 470.

2. Settlement—Variation of investments—Deed—Ad valorem stamp—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), schedule.—A marriage settlement was executed whereby certain stocks and other property were settled. The interest which the settlor had in the various stocks and property was contingent, and the investments representing the property comprised in such settlement could be varied by the trustees at pleasure.

Held, that the instrument was a "settlement" of a "certain and definite amount of stock" within the meaning of the word "settlement" in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1870, and required to be stamped with an ad valorem stamp of five shillings for every £100, in addition to the ordinary stamp of ten shillings as a deed.—Onslow v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Q.B.D. 445—24 Q. TRADE-MARK:—

1. Infringement—Rectification of register—Burden of proof—Trade-Marks Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 91), s. 10.—The plaintiffs sued to restrain the infringement of a trade-mark, registered in 1878, in respect of goods sold by their predecessors since 1854. The defendants moved to expunge the trade-mark from the register on the ground that at the time of the registration the words forming the trade-mark had become the ordinary name of the goods.

Held, that the burden of proof was on the defendants.—Edgington v. Edgington, ch.d. kay, j.—61 L. T. 623.

2. Infringement—Rectification of register—Writ-Service out of the jurisdiction—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 90, 107, 111, 117—Ord. 11, rr. 1 (f), 2.—The fact that a motion on behalf of the plaintiffs to rectify the register by striking out the defendants' trade-mark is pending is not material in considering the balance of convenience to the parties.

In an action to restrain infringement of the plaintiffs' trade-marks, the defendants being a company having their principal place of business in Belfast, and supplying customers, but having no agents in England, an order made ex parte, giving leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction, was discharged.—Kinahan v. Kinahan, ch.d. kek., j. 655—62 L. T. 715.

3. Infringement—Registered owner—Agency—Right to sue—Practice.—R. had bought from Heidsieck & Co., who were the registered proprietors of two trade-marks in champagne, the exclusive right to sell Heidsieck's champagne in England.

Held, that R. had no right of action to prevent the infringement of Heidsieck's trade-marks.—Richards v. Butcher, ch.d. kay, j.—62 L. T. 867.

4. Infringement—Registration for one class of goods—Use for another class—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 62, 65, 70, 77.—The right of action for improper user of a trade-mark registered under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, is limited to the particular class of goods in respect of which the trade-mark was registered.—Hart v. Colley, ch.d. non., j. 440—44 Ch. D. 193; 59 L. J. Ch. 355; 62 L. T. 623.

5. Infringement—Trade name—Injunction—Trade-Marks Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 91), s. 10—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64 (3).—E. opened shops in London and other English towns for sale of wines and spirits by the cask, bottle, or glass. Before 1875 E. used the word "Bodega" as a trade-mark, and he registered it in 1876. Each of his places of business was known as "The Bodega." In 1881 he sold his business, goodwill, and trade-mark to the plaintiff company, which continued to use the mark, and was registered in 1883 as proprietors of it. The company opened a shop at Dublin and called it a "Bodega," all rights in respect of which were afterwards assigned to D., with the exclusive right to use the trade-mark in Ireland. In 1888 the defendant opened a shop at Belfast and called it "The Bodega Wine Vaults." Except in three cases, unknown to the plaintiffs, no "Bodegas" other than those of the company, and of E. and D., had been opened.

Held, (1) that the mark was a special and distinctive trade-mark; (2) that the defendant must be restrained by injunction from using "Bodega" as either a trade-mark or a trade name.—Bodega Co. v. Owens, v.c. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 371.

6. Rectification of register—Foreign mark—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 103.—In 1884 V. registered as a trade-mark for fermented liquors a label including the word "Monobrut." The mark had been previously registered in France. In 1888 V. transferred the mark to L., who advertised "Monobrut" champagne. R., who had had since 1883 the sole right to sell in England champagne bearing the trade-marks "Monopole" and "Dry Monopole," applied to expunge the "Monobrut" mark.

Held, that the trade-mark must be removed from the register.—In re Vignier, ch.d. kay, j.—61 L. T. 495.

7. Rectification of register—Mistake—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 90.—Where trade-marks belonging to A. were registered by mistake in B.'s name, the court ordered B.'s name to be expunged, but refused to rectify the register by inserting A.'s name.—Ex parte Kingsford, ch.d. kay, j.—61 L. T. 426.

8. Rectification of register—Old mark—Design—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 90.—A word which has been registered as an old trade-mark, and has remained on the register for five years without opposition, will be removed from the register on proof that before its registration it was not used as a trade-mark, but to specify a particular pattern or design.—In re Harrison's Trade-Mark, ch.d. kek., j.—42 Ch. D. 691; 59 L. J. Ch. 22.

8a. Rectification of register—Old mark—Design.—M. & Co., in January, 1884, registered as a trade-mark the word "Albion," which they had used since 1873, and it remained on the register five years. On motion by W. & Co., the court directed that the mark be expunged from the register, it appearing that prior to the 13th of August, 1875, M. & Co. had used the mark, not as a trade-mark, but as designating the pattern or design of goods manufactured by them.—In re McGregor & Co.'s Trade-Mark, ch.d. kek., j.—61 L. T. 484.

9. Rectification of register—"Person aggrieved"—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 64, 90.—In 1885 Nestor Gianacli registered as a trade-mark the words "Gianacli's Cigarettes" in ordinary capital letters, the mark not having been used before 1885. In 1889 G. sued A. for selling cigarettes in boxes labelled "N. Gianulis." The registered trade-mark was referred to in the statement of claim, but no relief was asked in respect of its infringement. A. applied for the removal of the mark from the register.

Held, that the mark had been wrongfully registered, and must be removed from the register without waiting for the trial of the action.—In re Gianacli, CH.D. NOR., J.—58 L. J. Ch. 782.

9a. Rectification of register—Proprietor—Name.—The sole consignee in England of the wines grown at the vineyards in South Australia known as the Auldana vineyards, registered in his own name the word "Auldana" as a trade-mark in respect of wines, intending to use the registration solely in protection of the wines coming from the Auldana vineyards during the continuance of the agreement constituting him consignee. He subsequently went into liquidation, and the trustee in the liquidation sold and assigned his business and the trade-mark to the Australian Wine Co. (Limited), who procured themselves to be registered as the subsequent proprietors of the trade-mark. On motion by the owners for the time being of the Auldana vineyards,

Held, that the trade-mark had originally been rightfully registered for the protection of the owners of the vineyards, and that the register must be rectified by removing therefrom the name of the Australian Wine Co. (Limited) and inserting instead the names of the owners of the vineyards as proprietors.—In re Australian Wine Co., CH.D. CHI., J.—61 L. T. 427.

10. Registration—Disclaimer—Deceptive mark—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 72, 74.—An application to register a trade-mark, consisting of a heart having within it "No. 176," with the words "Goodall's Cream-Wove Parchment Bank" above it, and the words "Note Paper: Charles Goodall & Son, London," below it, the whole being enclosed in a rectangle, was refused, on the ground that there was already on the register a trade-mark consisting of the words "Pirie's Parchment Bank," and that there was such resemblance between them as was calculated to deceive.

A disclaimer of any right to the exclusive use of a common particular, under section 74 (2) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, must be made in the application to register the trade-mark containing the common particular.—In re Goodall's Trade-Mark, CH.D. NOR., J. 189—42 Ch. D. 566.

11. Registration—Fancy word—Distinctive mark—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 64 (1), (c), (2), 74, (1), (b), (2), (3), 90.—The word "distinctive" in section 74 (1), (b), of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, means primâ facie distinctive, and any word which, though primâ facie distinctive, is, in fact, common to the trade, must be disclaimed when registered as part of a combination.

The words "common to the trade" in section 74 (1), (b), are equivalent to "open to the trade."—Burland v. Broxburn Oil Co., CH.D. CHI., J. 89—42 Ch. D. 89; 58 L. J. Ch. 816; 61 L. T. 618.

12. Registration—Fancy word—Invented word—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 10 (1).—The word "Satinine," when applied to starch and other articles which give a glossy surface, is descriptive of the effect produced by such articles, and is not capable of registration as a trade-mark under section 10 (1) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888.

Semble, the word "Satinine," being formed from a well-known word by the addition of a termination well known in many other words, is not an "invented word" within section 10 (1) of the Act.—In re Meyerstein's Trade-Mark, CH.D. KAY, J. 440—43 Ch. D. 604; 59 L. J. Ch. 401; 62 L. T. 526.

13. Registration—Fancy word—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 10.—In 1887 B. applied for the registration of the word "Oomoo" as a trade-mark for wines and spirits. The application was opposed by P., the registered owner of a trade-mark for wines, consisting of the word "emu," and the representation of a bird.

Held, (1) that section 10 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1886, is not retrospective; (2) that there was no similarity calculated to deceive, and B. was entitled to register his mark.—In re Burgoyne, CH.D. CHI., J.—61 L. T. 89.

14. Registration—Words calculated to deceive—"Fruit Salt"—Patents, &c., Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 73.—The Comptroller has a discretion under the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, to register a trade-mark or not, and he ought to refuse registration where deception may result.

The respondent applied to register the words "Dunn's Fruit Salt Baking Powder" as a trade-mark for baking powder. The appellant, who had for many years used the words "Fruit Salt" as his trade-mark for a powder used in an effervescing drink, opposed the application.

Held (Lord Halsbury, C., and Lord Morris dissenting), that upon the evidence the proposed words were, as a matter of fact, calculated to deceive the public, and that the trade-mark ought not to be registered.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (41 Ch. D. 479) reversed, and the decision of Kay, J., restored.—Eno v. Dunn, H.L.—15 App. Cas. 252.

TRADE NAME:—

1. Injunction—Infringement—Similarity of name.—The plaintiffs had for many years carried on the business of steel plate manufacturers at Sheffield under the corporate name of "Thomas Turton & Sons (Limited)," and that name had obtained a prestige in the trade. The defendant had also for many years carried on at Sheffield a similar business under the name of "John Turton & Co." In 1888 the defendant took two of his sons into partnership with him, and they adopted the name of "John Turton & Sons" as their firm name. The plaintiffs sought to have the defendants and his sons restrained from carrying on business under the name of "John Turton & Sons," or any other name so closely resembling the name of the plaintiffs as to be calculated to deceive. The evidence showed that the defendants had done nothing—apart from the adoption of the name of "John Turton & Sons"—to represent their goods or the business carried on by them as being the same as, or in any way connected with, the goods or business of the plaintiffs; but there was evidence that, owing to the similarity of the names of the two firms, letters intended for the plaintiffs had been sent to the defendants.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction.

Hendriks v. Montague, 30 W. R. 168, 17 Ch. D. 638, discussed.

Decision of North, J., reversed.—Turton v. Turton, C.A. 22—42 Ch. D. 128; 58 L. J. Ch. 677.

2. Injunction — Infringement—Company—Registration—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 20. —The plaintiff company carried on an old-established business of waxwork exhibitors. The defendant, Louis Joseph Kenny Tussaud, formed a company under the name of Louis Tussaud (Limited) to carry on a similar business within a short distance of the plaintiffs' exhibition. Apart from the proposed adoption of the name Louis Tussaud (Limited), there was no evidence of intention on the part of the defendant or the intended new company to deceive the public, and the prospectus of the new company stated that they had no connection with the plaintiffs. The defendant had never carried on any similar business on his own account. His only interest in the new company was that he was a large shareholder, and held a salaried post as manager and wax modeller.

Held, that the name of the new company so closely resembled that of the old company as to be calculated to deceive, and that an injunction must be granted to restrain the defendant from registering a company under that name.—Tussaud v. Tussaud, CH.D. STI., J. 503—62 L. T. 633.

TRESPASS:—

Mischievous animal—Elephant—Injury—Liability of owner.—The plaintiff was present at a public performance given by the defendants, when an elephant which was being exhibited by them attacked and injured him. The jury found that the elephant in question was not an animal dangerous to man, and that the plaintiff did not bring the attack upon himself.

Held, that the defendants were liable, as elephants belonged to the class of animals dangerous to man, and a person who kept an animal of that class was liable for injury done by it.—Filburn v. People's Palace and Aquarium Co., C.A. 706—25 Q. B. D. 258.

TRUSTEE:—

1. Appointment—New trustee—Separate trusts—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), s. 32—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 39), s. 5 (1).—Under section 32 of the Trustee Act, 1850, the court will appoint separate trustees for a part of a trust property which is held on distinct trusts.

One of two trustees under a will died, and the other absconded with the residuary trust funds. The only fund forthcoming was a sum in Indian 3½ per Cent. Stock, which was subject to distinct trusts under the will.

Held, that it was expedient to appoint separate trustees.—In re Aston's Trusts, M.R. (Ir.)—26 L. R. Ir. 96.

2. Appointment—New trustee—Settlement—Donee of power.—The donee of a power of appointing new trustees cannot appoint himself.

By a marriage settlement property of the wife was settled on trusts in favour of the wife, her children, appointees, and next of kin, and if any trustee should die or go to reside abroad, or desire to retire from, or refuse, or become incapable, to act in, the trusts, the husband and wife, or the survivor of them, and, after the death of the survivor, the continuing trustees or trustee, or, in default of a continuing trustee, the retiring or refusing trustees or trustee, or the executors or administrator of the last acting trustee, were empowered to appoint any "other" person or persons in the place of the trustee or trustees so dying, or going to reside abroad, or desiring to retire, or refusing, or becoming incapable, to act. The husband and wife appointed the husband and A. trustees in the place of retiring trustees.

Held, that the appointment of the husband was invalid.—Skeats v. Evans, CH.D. KAY, J.—42 Ch. D. 522; 61 L. T. 500.

3. Appointment—New trustee—Vesting order—Originating summons—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 50) ss. 35, 43—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 17—Ord. 55, r. 13a.—An order appointing new trustees, made on motion in proceedings instituted by way of an originating summons, may also vest in the trustees a right to call for the transfer of stock under section 35 of the Trustee Act, 1850.—In re Jones, CH.D. KEK., J. 203—59 L. J. Ch. 157.

4. Appointment — New trustee— Vesting order—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), s. 10.—If one of two trustees is residing permanently out of the jurisdiction, and a new trustee has been appointed in his place, the court has power under section 10 of the Trustee Act, 1850, to make an order vesting the trust property in trustees appointed out of court.—In re O'Gorman's Trusts, M.R. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 93.

5. Breach of trust—Mortgage—Purchase of equity of redemption—Infant—Compromise by trustees—Estoppel.—By a settlement property was vested in trustees to be invested as the settlor directed, with power to them to invest upon freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or chattel real securities, including equitable mortgages by deposit, and in the purchase of freehold and leasehold hereditaments. After the death of the settlor the trustees, to save a sum advanced during the life and by the direction of the settlor on second mortgage, agreed to purchase the equity of redemption of the property. One of the cestui que trusts brought an action alleging breaches of trust by reason of improper investments, and the details of the investments in question were set out in an affidavit filed by the trustees. The plaintiffs in the present action, who at the time of the first-mentioned action were infants, had been served with the judgment and had leave to attend. The first action was compromised. The infants, on coming of age, brought the present action against the trustees for improper investment by reason of the purchase of the equity of redemption.

Held, that the power to purchase freehold or leasehold hereditaments did not authorise the purchase of an equity of redemption, which was a breach of trust.

Held, also, that the question as to the breach of trust was not res judicata, and the present plaintiffs were not estopped from bringing the action.—Worman v. Worman, CH.D. KEK., J. 442—43 Ch. D. 296.

5a. Breach of trust—Discretion—Maintenance—Assignment by beneficiary—Payments by trustees after notice. — A testator gave a share of his estate to trustees upon trust during the life of one of his sons to pay and apply the whole or any part of the income or accumulations of income of the share for the support, maintenance, or education, or otherwise for the benefit of that son, his wife, or children, in such manner in all respects as the trustees should in their uncontrolled discretion think fit. The son assigned his interest by way of mortgage to the plaintiff, and notice of the assignment was given to the trustees of the will, but, after receiving such notice, they made payments out of the income of the share to or on behalf of the son.

Held, that the beneficial interest of the son under the will was that which he was entitled to assign; that money paid to him or to any person on his behalf was necessarily part of his beneficial interest; and that it must be assumed that money paid by the trustees to him or to any person on his behalf was his in their irrevocable determination immediately before the payment at which period of time the trustees were affected with notice of assignment, and, therefore, that the trustees were liable for all sums paid to or on behalf of the son after they had received notice of assignment.—Hemming v. Neil, CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. T. 649.

6. Investment—Negligence—Mortgage—Burden of proof—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 5.—The burden of proof is on a trustee who seeks to show, under section 5 of the Trustee Act, 1888, that, except as to value, the investment was in all respects a proper one.

An investment of trust funds in a mortgage of an undivided third, with an undivided moiety of another third of the reversion of land held at a rent, is within the rule which limits the loans to one-half of the value of the land.—Jones v. Julian, M.R. (IR.)—25 L. R. Ir. 45.

7. Investment—Negligence—Retirement of trustee.—U., a trustee, authorized to invest in real securities, invested £1,300 on a mortgage of freehold property, consisting of cottages, some of which were at the time unfinished, and the remainder of which were let at weekly rents to labourers. The property at the time of the mortgage had been valued at £1,750. U. afterwards retired from the trust, and new trustees were appointed, and the mortgage security was transferred to them. The new trustees, with the assent of the plaintiff, who was an assignee of one of the cestui que trusts, sold by public auction the mortgaged property under the power of sale contained in the mortgage. The property realized a loss on the £1,300, but the sale was not in any way impeached. No offer had been made to U. to take the security for himself on paying the trust fund the amount lent on the security. The plaintiff sought to make U. liable for the loss realized by the plaintiff.

Held, that, though the mortgage investment was an investment authorized by the terms of the trust, it was, having regard to the value and the nature of the property, an improper investment; that U. was liable to make good to the plaintiff the loss occasioned thereby; and that U. was not relieved from that liability by the fact that he had been given no opportunity of electing to keep the security for himself.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.—Priest v. Uppleby, C.A. 150—42 Ch. D. 321; 61 L. T. 146.

8. Investment—Negligence—Sale of security—Re-investment—Mortgage—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), ss. 4, 5.—The executors and trustees of a will continued the testator's investment in two bonds to satisfy a trust legacy. The bonds increased in value, and the trustees sold them and invested part of the proceeds in freehold mortgages. The security proved insufficient.

Held, that the sale and re-investment was not justified, and that the trustees were not protected by sections 4 and 5 of the Trustee Act, 1888, but must account for the value of the bonds.—Walker v. Walker, CH.D. KEK., J.—59 L. J. Ch. 386; 62 L. T. 449.

9. Investment—Will—"Public company."—Trustees were authorized by a will to invest in "debentures or securities of any railway or other public company carrying on business in any part of the United Kingdom." The trustees invested funds in debentures of a company formed under the Companies Act, 1862, with a capital of £600,000, of which £480,000 had been issued in 30,000 £16 shares, with £11 paid up. The shares, but not the debentures, of the company had an official quotation on the Stock Exchange.

Held, that the investment was authorized by the will.—Ricketi v. Sharp, CH.D. STI., J.—62 L. T. 364.

10. Leaseholds—Conversion—Power coupled with a trust—Jurisdiction.—Where a power is coupled with a trust or duty, the court will enforce the proper and timely exercise of the power, but will not interfere with the discretion of the trustees as to the particular time or manner of their bonâ fide exercise of it.

Tempest v. Lord Camoys, 21 Ch. D. 571, followed.—In re Burrage, Burningham v. Burrage, CH.D. CHI., J.—62 L. T. 752.

11. Mistake—Voluntary contributions.—The trustees under a will voluntarily added certain sums to the settled share of a beneficiary under an erroneous belief as to the proper construction of the will. The will was afterwards construed by the court in such a manner as to show that the view taken by the trustees was wrong.

Held, that the voluntary contributions must be held upon the trusts of the will as declared by the court, and not as understood by the trustees.—Nelson v. Walters, CH.D. KEK., J.—61 L. T. 872.

12. Vesting order—Infant—Transfer of stock—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), s. 2—Trustee Extension Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 55), s. 3.—Infants were entitled to legacies, which had been invested in Consols in the names of the executors under the will, and of the infants respectively entitled.

The court made an order under section 3 of the Trustee Extension Act, 1852, vesting in the executors the right to transfer the stock and receive the dividends until the transfer.—Foster v. Barnett, CH.D. STI., J.—61 L. T. 676.

VENDOR and PURCHASER:—

1. Conditions of sale—Rescission.—Conditions of sale provided that, if the purchaser should, within the time limited, make any objection to, or requisition on, the title, which the vendor should be unable or unwilling to remove, it should be lawful for the vendor to annul the sale. The purchasers offered to give time for the removal of an objection which they had made, but only on condition of being given an indemnity, and threatened litigation if the condition was not accepted.

Held, that the vendor, acting bonâ fide, was entitled to rescind.—Woolcott v. Peggie, P.C. 465—15 App. 43; 59 L. J. P. C. 44; 61 L. T. 845.

2. Conditions of sale—Rescission—Requisitions—Non-compliance.—A condition in a contract of sale that the vendor "be at liberty, by giving notice in writing, to rescind the contract in case the purchaser make any requisition which the vendor is unable or unwilling to comply with" gives the vendor the right—arising immediately upon any requisition being made which the vendor is unable or unwilling to comply with—to rescind the contract: the right to rescind arising under such a condition may be validly exercised by the vendor, without specifying in his notice of rescission the requisitions which he is unable or unwilling to comply with, and without communicating to the purchaser any reason for the inability or unwillingness, or allowing the purchaser any opportunity to withdraw his requisitions; the only qualification to which the vendor's right of rescission arising under such a condition is subject, is the implied qualification that the right must not be exercised by the vendor capriciously or unreasonably.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.—In re Starr-Bowkett Building Society, C A. 1—42 Ch. D. 375; 58 L. J. Ch. 651; 61 L. T. 346.

3. Conditions of sale—Title.—A condition of sale which provides that the purchaser shall assume that the vendor derived a good title under a will does not preclude the puchaser from showing that on the true construction of the will a good title did not pass.—In re McVicker's Contract, V.C. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 307.

4. Deposit—Forfeiture—Failure of title—Mistake.—A contract for the sale of real property contained the usual conditions of sale and the ordinary provisions as to the forfeiture of the deposit. The vendor's title was fully disclosed and accepted, but the balance of the purchase-money was not paid and the deposit was forfeited. The property was afterwards sold to someone else, when a flaw in the title was discovered.

Held, in an action to recover the deposit by the former purchaser, that, the title having been accepted, the contract went off owing to his default, and that he could not recover.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (36 W. R. 207, 37 Ch. D. 96) affirmed.—Soper v. Arnold, H.L. 449—14 App. 429; 59 L. J. Ch. 214; 61 L. T. 702.

5. Goodwill—Sale of business—Restricted right to use name of vendor.—T. sold a business, goodwill, and stock-in-trade to S., including business cards bearing T.'s name. S. issued further cards bearing T.'s name as before. The assignment contained no express authority to S. to use T.'s name. T. moved to restrain S. from using his name on business cards, or otherwise trading in such name.

Held, that S. must be restrained from using T.'s name so as to in any way expose T. to any liability by holding him out as a person with whom contracts were made which might impose liability on him.

Levy v. Walker, 27 W. R. 370, 10 Ch. D. 436, distinguished.—Thynne v. Shove, CH.D. STI., J. 667—59 L. J. Ch. 509; 62 L. T. 803.

6. Lien—Leasehold—Assignment—Consideration.—An assignment of leaseholds in consideration of natural love and affection is not voluntary.

Leaseholds, on which there was a vendor's lien, were assigned by the purchaser to his son in consideration of natural love and affection. The son had no notice of the vendor's lien.

Held, that there was sufficient consideration in the assignment to make the son a purchaser for value instead of a volunteer, and that the vendor's lien would not prevail against the son.

Price v. Jenkins, 5 Ch. D. 619, 35 W. R. Dig. 253, followed.—Harris v. Tubb, CH.D. KEK., J. 75—42 Ch. D. 19; 58 L. J. Ch. 434; 60 L. T. 699.

7. Malicious injury—Real estate contracted to be sold.—A purchaser of land is not entitled to compensation for malicious injury done to the land sold after the contract but before the execution of the conveyance.—In re Sweeny's Estate, L.J (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 252.

8. Misrepresentation—Leasehold—Annual rental—Monthly tenancy—Knowledge of purchaser.—The particulars of sale of leasehold property described as occupied at an annual rental, but omitted to state that the vendor, as landlord, paid the rates and taxes, and that the tenancy was a monthly one. There was evidence that at the sale the auctioneer stated the exact nature of the tenancy and arrangement as to the rates and taxes.

Held, that the purchaser of the property was not entitled to compensation.—In re Edwards and Sykes, CH.D. CHL., J.—62 L. T. 445.

9. Power of sale—Mortgage—Building society—Specific performance — Costs — Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 19 (1), 20 (1) (2).—By a building society's mortgage it was provided that, if default should be made in the performance of any of the covenants, the total sum for which the mortgage should then be redeemable should be considered as actually due and payable, and the power of sale given to mortgagees by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, should apply and be exercisable by the trustees of the society. The mortgagor neglected to pay one of the instalments, and the trustees contracted to sell the property.

Held, that the statutory power of sale, whether applicable to a building society mortgage or not, was incorporated in the mortgage by the act of the parties; that the money had become due; and that the power was exercisable.

The contract for sale was dated within less than three months of default, and no notice of the proposed sale had been given to the mortgagor nor to a second mortgagee under section 20 (1) of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. The purchaser ascertained the want of notice, and required the concurrence of the mortgagor, which was agreed to, and the second mortgagee was ready to do the same. The conditions of sale stated that the property was being sold by mortgagees under a power of sale, and that the assignment was to be taken without the concurrence of other parties.

Held, that, if the mortgagor and second mortgagee had not waived the notice, they had waived the right to object to the want of it; that want of notice did not prevent the vendors from exercising their power of sale; that the purchaser could get the title he had contracted to take; and that the vendors must bear the costs occasioned by the concurrence of the mortgagor and second mortgagee.—In re Thompson and Holt, CH.D. KEK., J. 525—44 Ch. D. 492.

10. Production of documents—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 3 (6).—A vendor is bound to furnish copies of all documents set out in the abstract of title if they are in his possession, and it is not enough for him to abstract such documents, and to allow the purchaser to inspect them.—In re Furlong and Sheehan, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 407.

11. Title — Covenant — Statutory declaration.—A land company was in possession of settled estates under building agreements providing for the eventual grant of leases, but the agreements were to expire if the respective buildings were not completed in 1881 and 1885. A railway company having brought forward a scheme which involved taking part of the land, the tenant for life waived the obligation of the land company to complete the buildings within the specified time. The railway company agreed to buy the land, subject to the building agreements, and took possession. The land company brought an action against the railway company, and obtained a declaration that the defendants had wrongfully entered on the land. On the completion of the conveyance the tenant for life made a statutory declaration that he knew of no arrangement extending the time under the building agreements. The land company afterwards obtained from the railway company compensation for the land taken.

Held, that the railway company could not recover from the tenant for life the compensation paid by the land company.—London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Boulton, CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. T. 393.

12. Title—Covenant—Restrictive covenant—Misdescription—Compensation.—F. bought one lot of an estate laid out for building, and covenated with the vendors that he, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns would make certain payments and do certain acts in respect of the property, and that, on creating any building on the said land he would only erect buildings of a particular description.

Held, that the restrictive covenant was only a personal covenant binding on F., and that a purchaser from his devisees could not object to the title on the ground that the covenant had not been disclosed.

Property offered for sale was decribed as a messuage situated in T-street, with the builder's yard, stable, and premises lately in the occupation of F., and containing 1,372 square yards. There was a condition that errors of description should not annul the sale, but that compensation should be allowed for them, if pointed out before completion. The property originally contained 1,372 square yards, but F. had sold 339 square yards. The 1,033 yards were well defined, and were separated by a wall from the 339 yards.

Held, that the purchaser must complete, with compensation.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.—In re Fawcett and Holmes, C.A.—42 Ch. D. 150; 58 L. J. Ch. 763; 61 L. T. 105.

13. Title—Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Site for parsonage—Re-sale—58 Geo. 3, c. 45, s. 51—Church Building Act, 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 107), s. 9.—The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have power under the Church Building Acts to sell lands which have been purchased by them for the site of a parsonage house, and have subsequently become unsuitable for that purpose.—In re Ecclesiastical Commissioners and King, CH.D. CHI., J. 473—62 L. T. 535.

14. Title—Trustee—Power of sale—Conditional power—Tenancy for life.—Trustees of real estate, with a power of sale only arising on the death of a tenant for life, who have during the life of the tenant for life entered into a contract as vendors to sell the estate, cannot make a good title by showing, before the date fixed for completion, both that the tenant for life is willing to convey under the Settled Land Act, 1882, the estate to the purchaser, and that trustees for the purposes of the Act have been appointed.

Trustees entered into a contract to sell the fee simple in possession of certain real estate. The conditions of sale fixed a day for completion, and stipulated that the vendors and other necessary parties (if any) would, on completion, convey the property to the purchaser. The abstract of title disclosed the fact that the vendors' power of sale did not arise until the death of a life tenant. The purchaser by his requisitions took this objection, and the vendors answered that the tenant for life (who was living) would make a title under the Settled Land Act, and had agreed in writing to the sale by the vendors, and would execute all necessary assurances to give effect to the sale, and that an appointment of trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, was then pending. The purchaser, in reply—and before the day fixed for completion of the contract—declined to purchase from the tenant for life, repudiated the contract, and demanded a return of the deposit. Trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act were appointed, and notice of such appointment was given to the purchaser by the vendors before the day for completion. On the day fixed for completion the purchaser took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to have it declared that the vendors had not shown a good title in accordance with the contract, and claiming a return of the deposit, with interest thereon at four per cent. per annum from the date of the contract until payment, and the costs of investigating the title.

Held, that the purchaser was entitled to an order in the terms of his summons.

Judgment of Kay, J., affirmed.—In re Bryant and Barningham, C.A. 469—44 Ch. D. 218.

15. Title—Trustee—Power of sale—Conditional power—Tenancy for life—Concurrence of beneficiaries.—A testator devised his real estate to trustees upon trust to pay the rents to his wife, and after her decease to sell the property and hold the income in trust for all his children equally, and he authorised his trustees to adjust and pay all claims made upon his estate. The estate being insolvent, the trustees contracted to sell the real estate, with the consent of the life tenant, but the purchaser declined to accept the title. The trustees subsequently offered to obtain the consent of all the beneficiaries to the sale of the estate.

Held, that the trustees had no power of sale under the will during the life of the testator's widow.

Held, further, that the purchaser could not be compelled to accept a title other than that for which he had contracted.—In re Head's Trustees and Macdonald's Contract, C.A. 657.

WATER:—

1. Water company—Constant supply—Prevention of waste—Special apparatus—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 43, 48, 51, 52—Private Acts—By a local Waterworks Act passed in 1858 it was provided that "all persons supplied with water by the company shall provide proper ball or stop-cocks, or other necessary apparatus of approved construction, for regulating such supply," under the penalty of having their pipes cut off or the water cut off from their premises. By a local Act passed in 1888, the company was compelled to afford a constant supply of water, and took power to attach to the water-pipe outside of each house a stop-valve of the screw-down kind, in order to prevent waste, subject to the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, with respect to breaking up of the streets for the laying of pipes. The company called upon an occupier to put down such stop-valves, and, on his making default, cut off his water supply.

Held, that the company was liable to be convicted for "refusing to furnish a supply of water to an occupier" under the provisions of section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and that a stop-valve to prevent waste outside of a house was not a "necessary apparatus for regulating the supply of water."—Ward v. Folkestone Waterworks Co., Q.B.D. 426—24 Q. B. D. 334; 59 L. J. M. C. 65; 62 L. T. 327.

2. Water company—Supply by meter—Special Act—"Consumer of water."—A water company's special Act provided that the compay should, at the request of any "consumer of water," for purposes other than those for which rates were provided, or at the company's own instance, supply water by means of a meter.

Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal (38 Ch. D. 56) that the words "consumer of water" meant any person actually consuming water, or entitled to demand supply for consumption and taking the steps necessary to obtainit.—Cooke v. New River Co., H.L.—14 App. 698; 59 L. J. Ch. 333; 61 L. T. 816.

WATERMAN:—

River Thames—Navigating boat for hire—Watermen's Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. cxxiii.), s. 54.—A., by order of his employers, rowed certain fellow-labourers to a ship lying in the River Thames, receiving no remuneration, except his weekly wages, for doing so.

Held, that A. could not be convicted for navigating a boat for hire under the Watermen's Act, 1859.—Skittrell v. Showell, Q.B.D.—59 L. J. M. C. 26; 61 L. T. 874.

WAY:—

1. Easement—Deed—Exclusive use of gateway.—A piece of land at the back of a row of houses was granted in 1839, with two of the houses, to a purchaser in fee simple, "together with the exclusive use of" a covered gateway or passage, which formed a sort of tunnel leading from the land at the back through another house in the row into the street in front, and the description of the parcels included the following words:—"Which said piece of ground and premises are more particularly delineated and described by the portion on the plan or ground plot thereof drawn in the margin of these presents coloured pink." The passage was described by its measurements in length, width, and height, but it was not coloured on the plan, though it was suggested that that might have been because the parts of the building above and below the passage were not included in the grant, the house through which it passed not being so included. In 1882 the house was demised to R. In 1885 the piece of land at the back of the houses was demised to B., "together with the entrance-way and passage thereto belonging." B. not having confined himself to using the passage as a "way" of exit into and entrance from the street, but having used it as a room or shop for a variety of purposes, the original grantor and R. brought an action against B., claiming a declaration that he was not entitled to use the passage otherwise than as in exercise of a right of way, and an injunction to restrain him from doing so.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that, even if the entire property in the passage did not pass by the conveyance of 1839, the grantee, and B. as claiming under him, were not restricted to using it merely as a way, but were entitled to use it, and the floor, walls, and ceiling of it, for any purposes not inconsistent with the rights of the adjoining owners or the public.

Semble, the entire property in the passage passed the conveyance.—Reilly v. Booth, C.A. 484—44 Ch. D. 12; 62 L. T. 378.

2. Obstruction—Change of way by grantor—Injunction.—In 1862 a railway company leased to the plaintiff for twenty-one years the space within an arch under a railway station, with a right of way for the plaintiff, his servants, and customers from the arch to V-street only. In 1862 the only way by which the plaintiff could get to V-street was over an open space lying partly in front of two arches occupied by G. In 1880 the railway company made a way into V-street a little south of the plaintiff's arch. The plaintiff thenceforth generally used the new way, but occasionally the old one. In 1882 the company made a fence with a gate across the old way, but gave the plaintiff a key of the gate. In 1888 the company put on a new lock, and sought to restrict the plaintiff to the way made in 1880.

Held, that the railway company, having given the plaintiff the key of the gates, could not alter the way, and that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction to restrain the company from closing the gates.—Deacon v. South-Eastern Railway Co., CH.D. NOR., J.—61 L. T. 337.

WEIGHTS and MEASURES:—

1. Coals—Sale in London—Deficient weight—Penalty—Metropolis Coal Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. lxxvi.), ss. 54, 57.—In an action by a purchaser of coals to recover penalties from the seller for deficiency in weight under the Metropolis Coal Act, it is necessary to show that the sacks of coal were weighed in the particular manner prescribed by the Act.

Meredith v. Holman, 16 M. & W. 798, approved.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division, 37 W. R. 800, 23 Q. B. D. 380, affirmed.—Smith v. Wood, C.A. 138—24 Q. B D. 23; 59 L. J. Q. B. 5; 61 L. T. 879.

2. Coals—Sale—False statement as to weight by servant of seller—Liability of seller—Weights and Measures Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21), s. 29, sub-section (1) (2).—In order to support a conviction under section 29 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, there must be a false representation as to the weight of the coals sold by the seller of them. Where, therefore, the seller of the coals made no representation as to their weight, but his servant, in the course of delivering them, made an untrue statement as to their weight,

Held, that the master was not liable for the representation of his servant, and could not be convicted.—Roberts v. Woodward, Q.B.D. 770.

WEST AUSTRALIA, LAW of:—

Registration of title—Refusal by commissioner—Caveat—Transfer of Land Act, 1874, ss. 19, 21, 120.—The Commissioner of Titles for Western Australia is not bound to register a title merely on the issue of the prescribed notices and the absence of a caveat; but he has a discretion to refuse to register, subject to the opinion of the supreme court.—Manning v.

Commissioner of Titles for Western Australia, P.C. —15 App. 195.

WILL:—

CONSTRUCTION—

1. Abatement — Deficiency — Lapse.—A. made a bequest of jewels and ornaments to trustees upon trust to sell for the best price obtainable, and to pay thereout two legacies of definite amounts, but the will contained no gift of surplus sale moneys. One of the legacies lapsed. The price obtained was insufficient to pay both in full.

Held (distinguishing Page v. Leapingwell, 18 Ver. 463), that the legacy which did not lapse was not liable to abate in favour of the residuary legatee.—Raikes v. Raikes, CH.D. CHI., J. 636.

2. Abatement—Legacy to wife.—If an estate is insufficient to pay all legacies in full, a legacy to the testator's wife, to be paid to her immediately after his death for her immediate requirements, is liable to abatement.—Cazenove v. Cazenove, CH.D. KEK., J.—61 L. T. 115.

3. Ademption—Mortgage—Payment in testator's lifetime.—The testator bequeathed to his trustees in trust for A. and B. £4,000, at present secured by a mortgage of landed property at P. The mortgage was paid off during the testator's lifetime.

Held, that the legacy was specific, and was ademed.—Slade v. Walpole, CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 497.

4. Advancement.—A. gave an annual allowance to B., his eldest son. He took one hundred £10 shares in a company in B.'s name, and 550 shares in another company, and B. became a director in both companies. He received the director's fees, but voluntarily paid all the dividends to his father. A. by his will settled nearly all his estate on B. for life, with remainder to his children. After A.'s death the shares were found in envelopes, with the words "belonging to me" in A.'s writing.

Held, that the presumption of advancement was rebutted, and that B. held the shares as a trustee.—Gooch v. Gooch, CH.D. KAY, J.—62 L. T. 384.

4a. Charge of debts on realty—Interim rents—Trustee.—A testator who died in January, 1887, by his will gave his real estate at North and South Collingham and his residuary real estate to his nephew, he also paying thereout the following legacies: that is to say, the legacy or sum of £1,000 to my trustees, to be held by them upon the trusts hereinafter declared concerning the same; the like legacy or sum of £1,000 to the four daughters of my late niece, Mary Holroyd, in equal shares; and the legacy or sum of £200 to my niece, Sarah Woodruff, to whom I give and bequeath the same respectively." The testator directed that such legacies should be paid at the end of six months after the death of his sister, and he directed his trustees to stand possessed of the sum of £1,000 thereinbefore directed to be paid to them and "charged on my Collingham Estate," upon certain trusts.

Held, that the testator's nephew was not a trustee of the legacies for the legatees, but that the same were merely charged on the North and South Collingham Estate; and that, that being so, he was not liable to account for the back rents and profits of that part of the Collingham Estate of which he was in possession from the death of the testator to the date of the completion of the sale of that estate by the direction of the court.—Newbald v. Beckitt, CH.D. CHI., J.—62 L. T. 533.

5 Charity—Advancement of economic and sanitary education.—The testator gave £200,000 to trustees, payable exclusively out of such part of his personal estate as might be legally bequeathed for charitable purposes, in trust to apply the money for the advancement and propagation of education in economic and sanitary science in Great Britain.

Held, that there was a valid charitable bequest.—Berridge v. Turner, CH.D. STI., J.—62 L. T. 365.

6. "Children"—Illegitimate children.—In 1862 A. by his will gave a share of his residuary estate in trust for B. for life, and after B.'s death for B.'s children. B. was married in 1845, but was separated from his wife in 1848, and never saw her again. She died in 1878, never having had any children, and at the date of the will she was past the age of child-bearing. Between 1851 and 1858 B. had four children by D., but A. treated them as his grandchildren. B. predeceased A.

Held, that B.'s illegitimate children could not take a share in the residue.—Raggett v. Browne, CH.D. CHI., J.—61 L. T. 463.

7. Class gift—Children of members of class dead at date of will.—A. by her will gave the residue of her property to be equally divided between the sons and daughters of her four deceased brothers, but directed: "should any of them be dead before me I then direct that his or her share shall be equally divided between his or her children.

Held (affirming the decision of Kay, J.), that children, living at the date of the will, of nephews and nieces who were dead at the date of the will, could not take under the will.—Groves v. Musther, C.A.—43 Ch. D. 569; 59 L. J. Ch. 296.

8. Condition — Marriage—Consent of trustees.—Where a testator attaches, as a condition to the enjoyment of property given by his will, that the beneficiary shall, if he marries, do so with the consent of his trustees, but prescribes no particular form of consent, the court will treat such consent as a matter of substance rather than of form, and will hold that the condition has been satisfied if the consent has been substantially given.

Daley v. Desbouverie, 2 Atk. 261, followed.—Keeling v. Smith, CH.D. STI., J. 380—59 L. J. Ch. 284; 61 L. T. 181.

9. Cy-près—Charity.—The testator gave legacies to charitable institutions, including the "Protestant Home Mission in Ireland" and the "Home Mission of the Gospel of Christ in Ireland." There were no societies answering to above descriptions.

Held, that the legacies should be given to the Church of Ireland Home Mission.—In re Geary's Trusts, M.R. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 171.

10. Cy-près — Charity — School. — A. bequeathed £1,800 to Baron F. R. to build a synagogue and school at Jerusalem. Baron F. R. disclaimed the trust. The money was not enough to build a synagogue and school. The court allowed the money to be paid to the committee in England of Baron L. R.'s school near Jerusalem, though there was no synagogue attached to it.—In re Davis's Trusts, CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 530.

11. Direction to pay debts—Legacy to creditor—Satisfaction.—A direction in a will to pay debts only is sufficient to rebut the presumption of satisfaction of a debt by a legacy.

T. gave a bond to her nephew, to whom she was not in loco parentis, to secure payment to him of £1,000 within twelve months after her death if he should be then living, or to his executors, administrators, or assigns if he should be then dead leaving issue, with interest from the day of her death. By her will she left him a freehold estate, a legacy of £3,000, and certain chattels. By a codicil she directed that all her funeral expenses and lawful debts should be paid at once.

Held, that the debt was not satisfied by the legacy. —Bradshaw v. Hutsh, CH.D. KAY, J. 199—43 Ch. D. 260; 59 L. J. Ch. 135; 62 L. T. 52.

12. Effects.—A. gave all the rest of the furniture and effects at the house in which he lived to A., and the residue of his estate to B. After his death bank notes, stock and share certificates, and jewellery were found in his house.

Held that the bank notes, stock and share certificates, and jewellery belonged to B., and not to A.—Daniel v. Daniel, CH.D. NOR., J.—61 L. T. 365.

13. Equitable estate—Mixed devise—Freeholds and copyholds.—A., who died in 1844, by his will, devised his freehold and copyhold estates to trustees upon trust during the life of B. to receive the rents and profits, and to pay the same to B. and his assigns "during his life, or otherwise to permit him or them to receive the same"; and from and after the death of B., "to the sole use and behoof of the heirs of his body lawfully begotten"; and in case B. should die without leaving any issue of his body lawfully begotten he devised the same to G., her heirs and assigns for ever. By a disentailing assurance B. granted all the freehold estates comprised in the residuary devise to H., discharged from all estates tail, to the use of B. in fee.

W., who claimed under B., agreed to sell to J. certain freeholds included in the devise of freeholds in the will. On investigation of the title a requisition was made that B. was equitable tenant for life only of the property, and that the person entitled at B.'s death should concur in the conveyance.

Held, that B. took a legal estate tail in the freeholds, and a good title had been shown.—In re Alsop and Joy, CH.D. CHI., J.—61 L. T. 213.

14. Estate tail—Successive gifts.—If there is a devise to several persons in succession in words sufficient to pass the fee, or the testator's whole interest in freeholds, the court will construe the gift as one of successive estates in tail. The general intent must be ascertained from the whole will, and a name clause is an important element in ascertaining such general intent.—Studdert v. Von Steiglitz, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 564.

15. Executor according to the tenor—Trustees.—The testator nominated four persons as his trustees, to whom he bequeathed his residuary estate, with power to receive, and give receipts for, "any sums due to the residue." There was no specific appointment of executors, but there were directions to "my executors" as to payment of debts and other matters, and the words "executors" and "trustees," were used indifferently in various parts of the will.

Held, that the trustees were executors according to the tenor.—In the Goods of Earl of Leven, P.D. & A.D. —15 P. D. 24; 59 L. J. P. D. & A. 35.

16. Executor according to the tenor—Trustees.—The testator gave all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay to A. a debt due to her from the testator, this being the only debt due from the estate, with one exception. The trustees were directed to pay a legacy of £50, to invest the residue, and pay the income to B. for life. He gave the residue of the property to his son.

Held, that the trustees were not executors according to the tenor.—In the Goods of Armstrong, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 185.

17. Forfeiture—Bankruptcy—Scotch sequestration —Revocation.—The testator bequeathed to A. the income of £15,000 for life, or until he shall "become bankrupt or do something whereby the same or some part thereof would, through his act or default, or by operation of law or otherwise, if belonging absolutely to him, become vested in or payable to some other person or persons." A sequestration of A.'s estate was awarded in Scotland, but was recalled before a trustee was appointed.

Held, that the forfeiture clause in the will did not operate.—Clutterbuck v. James, CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. T. 454.

18. Forfeiture — Repugnancy — Bankruptcy — Annulment—Bankruptcy Act, 1833 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 35 (2).—A. by his will gave his personalty absolutely to, amongst others, his children. He devised his real and leasehold estate and his residuary estate, as to one-third to his wife for life, and as to two-thirds to his children for life equally, with remainder, after the death of his wife, to his children equally. The will contained a forfeiture clause, whereby if, by any act or operation of law, the share given to his wife or any child should be aliened, charged, or disposed of, the share or shares so aliened, charged, or disposed of should vest in the other beneficiaries. At the date of the testator's death one of his daughters, who, under the will, had been given an absolute interest, an immediate life interest, and a contingent life interest, was a bankrupt. The bankruptcy was annulled some years afterwards, sufficient funds having come to the trustee's hands to pay all the creditors in full. The contingent gift still remained contingent at the date of the annulment.

Held, (1) that, as to the absolute gifts, whether in possession or remainder at the testator's death, the forfeiture clause was repugnant and void; (2) that, as to the contingent life interest, the forfeiture clause did not operate, since the moment for determining whether the clause applied was when payment and receipt became possible; (3) that, as to the immediate life interest, the clause of forfeiture did operate, notwithstanding the provisions as to the consequences of annulment contained in section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the language of which, for the present purpose, is the same as section 35 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.—Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, CH.D. KEK., J. 397—43 Ch. D. 633; 59 L. J. Ch. 159.

19. Gift to wife and children—Tenancy in common. —Where property is devised to the testator's wife for the benefit of his wife and children, the court will anxiously lay hold of any slight circumstance to enable it to construe the gift as an estate for life to the wife, remainder to the children, and not as creating a joint tenancy.—In re McVicker's Contract, V.C. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 307.

20. Gift over — Codicil — Revocation. — C. bequeathed the legal estate in all his real and personal property to B. and D., whom he appointed executors, on trust to pay certain annuities and, subject thereto, to pay the income to E. for A.'s life, and after A.'s death to transfer all the real and personal estate absolutely to E., subject to existing annuities, and in case of E. predeceasing A. without lawful issue, all the real and personal estate was devised and bequeathed to P., his heirs and assigns for ever, subject to annuities. By a codicil it was declared that, if E. should die before or after A. without lawful issue, or without making any disposition of the property, it might then become the property of P., his heirs and assigns for ever, subject to annuities. A second codicil was in these words:—"I hereby revoke and declare void the appointment of B. and D. as trustees and executors in the will named, and do leave and bequeath all my said real and personal property to E., subject to the annuities and other conditions therein mentioned, and do hereby appoint and nominate E. as my sole executor and administrator." By a third codicil it was declared that the annuities should be chargeable solely on his land at W., which was the only real estate of the testator, and was held for lives, renewable for ever. E. died before A. without issue, and without having disposed of the property.

Held, (1) that the second codicil did not revoke the modifications in the first codicil; (2) that the gift over in the first codicil was void.—Stretton v. Fitzgerald, C.A. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 466.

21. Gift over—Condition—Marriage—Consent of trustees.—A. bequeathed a share in the residue of his estate to M., if she should marry with the consent of the testator's wife, if then living, or of the trustees for the time being of the will, with a gift over if M. should die before attaining the age of twenty-one, or marrying without such consent. M. attained the age of twenty-one without marrying.

Held, that the gift over could not take effect, but that M. was not entitled to the legacy before marriage, Gray v. Gray, V.C. (Ir.)— 23 L. R. Ir. 399.

22. Gift over — Gift during widowhood. — The testator gave all his property to his wife in trust for the benefit of his children so long as she remained unmarried. In the event of her marrying again she was to have a life interest only in the sum of £2,000. He authorized his wife and trustee to advance to either of the children £2,000 from the estate. At his wife's death the estate then remaining was to be divided into four parts, and the proceeds divided equally among the children then surviving. The widow married again before any of the children came of age.

Held, that the residue vested in the children at the marriage of the widow.—Helby v. Dear, CH.D. KAY, J. 31—58 L. J. Ch. 659; 61 L. T. 432.

23. Gift over—"Unmarried and without leaving lawful issue."—By his will, dated in 1838, a testator, who died in 1840, bequeathed a fund upon trust to pay the income to his two daughters for their respective lives for their separate use without power of anticipation, and after their respective deceases the principal of their respective shares was to be in trust for the children or child of each daughter as she might appoint, and in default of appointment equally; and if there should be no such child, then in trust for the executors, administrators, and assigns of each of his said daughters respectively; but in case of the decease of either of his said daughters "unmarried and without leaving lawful issue," then the testator bequeathed the share of the one so dying unmarried and without issue to the surviving sister. The plaintiff, one of the testator's two daughters, had married, but had had no children, and she was a widow over seventy years of age. The question was, whether she was now absolutely entitled to her share of the fund.

Held, that the plaintiff was not absolutely entitled, the words "unmarried and without leaving lawful issue" meaning not under coverture at the time of her death.

In re Sanders' Trusts (L. R. 1 Eq. 675) followed.—In re King, Salisbury v. Ridley, CH.D. KEK., J.—62 L. T. 789.

24. Illegitimate child described as "daughter" of testator—Residuary gift to "children."—Testator, after appointing J. L. B. one of his executors and trustees, describing him as "my son-in-law," and making various devises and bequests of his property to his three sons nominatim, gave other property to his trustees upon certain trusts for his two daughters respectively, describing them as "my daughter M. A. M., the wife of the said J. L. B.," and "my daughter A., the wife of W. W." He then devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust for such of his "children" living at his decease, and such of the issue then living of any child or children of his dying in his lifetime. M. A. M. B. was illegitimate.

Held, that the will showed a sufficient expression of intention on the part of the testator to include M. A. M. B. under the term "children," and that she was therefore entitled to a share in the residue.—Walsh v. Browne, CH.D. STI., J.—62 L. T. 899.

25. Intestacy as to residue. — A. gave various legacies, and stated that he excluded all his relatives except his two nieces from the benefit of his will. His nieces were appointed executrixes, with other executors. The two nieces were not the only next of kin of the testator.

Held, that the residue was undisposed of, and devolved upon the testator's statutory next of kin.—Holmes v. Holmes, CH.D. KAY, J.—62 L. T. 383.

26. Investment—"Railway or other public company"—Companies incorporated under the Companies Acts.—A testator directed his trustees to invest the residue of his estate upon (inter alia) "the debentures or securities of any railway or other public company carrying on business in any part of the United Kingdom." The trustees proposed to invest in the securities of certain companies incorporated under the Companies Acts.

Held, that, the companies being incorporated by public statute, the instruments forming their constitution being accessible to the public and the shares being transferable, they were public companies within the investment clause, and that the power was not restricted to companies incorporated by a special Act or by Royal Charter.

Decision of Stirling, J., affirmed.

Whether all three of the above-mentioned characteristics are necessary to constitute a "public company," quære.—In re Sharp, Bickett v. Sharp, C.A.—62 L. T. 777.

27. "Issue"—Tenancy in common.—A. bequeathed a fund upon trust, in events which happened, for her son for life, and then "in trust for and to be equally divided between all and every my nephews and nieces who shall be living at the time of the death of my said son, and the issue of such of them as shall then be dead leaving issue, as tenants in common, such issue nevertheless taking only the share or respective shares which the deceased parent or parents would have taken if living."

Held, (1) that "issue" must be restricted to children; (2) that the issue took as tenants in common inter se.—In re Smith, CH.D. STI., J.—58 L. J. Ch. 661.

28. Joint tenancy—Severance.—A. devised certain property to his five sons respectively as tenants in common, and appointed them joint tenants. For many years the profits were equally divided among the five sons or their personal representatives. Four of the sons had died.

Held, that the four sons took the residue as joint tenants; but that the joint tenancy had been severed, and that the surviving son was entitled to the whole of the property.—In re Wallis's Trusts, M.R. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 460.

28a. Joint tenancy—Discretionary trust.—A., after certain bequests to his widow, gave the residue of his estate to his father "for his own use and benefit, and at his discretion for the further use and benefit" of A.'s daughter, who was then a minor and his only child.

Held, that, under this clause, the father took the residue as trustee for himself and A.'s daughter as joint tenants, with a discretion in the father as to the application of the daughter's share during her minority.—Atkinson v. Atkinson, Q.B.D.—62 L. T. 735.

29. Life estate—"Default of issue male"—Will Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 29.—The testator was owner in fee of a moiety of an estate and tenant for life of the other moiety, with remainder to A., his eldest son in tail male. His will recited that he had expended large sums on the improvement of his house and property at B., of which improvements A. would have the benefit, and charged his own moiety, which he expressed his intention of bequeathing to A., with £1,000 to his son D., and £1,500 to his son M., to be secured by A. on the testator's death, or when A. came of age. If D. or M. should die without issue, his portion was to be paid or secured to the survivor, and if A. should die without issue, or D. should become possessed of the estates, D. was to secure £2,500 to M. The will further recited that some of the testator's property was settled in tail male, and contained a bequest of the testator's own moiety to A. for life, and to his eldest son and his heirs in tail male, in default of issue male, to D. for life and his issue in tail male, and in default of D.'s issue male to M. and his issue in tail male, subject to £3,000 for any younger children of those who inherited, and in default of issue male to the daughter or daughters of A., D., or M., and in default of issue male or female to the testator's daughters in fee as tenants in common.

Held, (1) that A. took an estate for life, with remainder to his eldest son in tail male and reversion to him in tail male; (2) that "default of issue male" meant an indefinite failure of issue male.—Neville v. Thacker, C.A. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 344.

30. Legacy—Executor—Renunciation—Selection of beneficiaries.—A., by his will, appointed three persons his executors, and gave the residue of his estate to certain charitable institutions named in his will, or such others "as my executors herein named" might appoint. One of the executors renounced probate.

Held, that the renunciation of the office of executor did not operate to prevent him claiming the right of joining with the continuing executors in selecting the charitable institutions to share in the residue.

31. Mortgage of real estate.—A., after appointing two persons executors and trustees of his will, directed "that the trustees for the time being of my will shall have full power to settle my accounts and wind up my affairs as they or he shall think fit, and in so doing to make any sales and arrangements they or he shall judge expedient." He devised and bequeathed all his real and residuary personal estate unto and to the use of his trustees upon the trusts therein declared. Shortly after the testator's death one of the trustees named in the will, the other having renounced probate and disclaimed the trusts thereof, raised a sum of £500 by a mortgage of a portion of the testator's real estate for the purpose of satisfying some pressing claims against the testator's estate.

Held, that the mortgage was authorized by the terms of the will.—Dutton v Brookfield, CH.D. NOR., J. 90—59 L. J. Ch. 31; 61 L. T. 661.

32. Mortmain — Railway company—Debenture—Mortgage—Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 36).—A mortgage debenture issued by a railway company under a special Act, not being in the form given in schedule C. to the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, but in the form of an assignment by the company to the mortgagee, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, of the railway company and undertaking, and all branch railways, lands, and hereditaments belonging thereto, is not within the Mortmain Act.—Ker v. Dent, CH.D. CHI., J.—62 L. T. 55.

33. Next of kin of person dead at date of will—Period for ascertaining class—Lapse.—A. bequeathed a sum of money "to such person or persons as would have become entitled to my said husband's personal estate under or by virtue of the Statute of Distributions had he died intestate and without leaving any widow him surviving." At the death of the testatrix some of the persons entitled to her husband's estate under the statute were different from those entitled to it at his own death.

Held, that the clause must be read as if the words "at my husband's death" were inserted, so that the clause would read "To such person or persons as would, at my late husband's death, have become entitled," &c., and that the persons to take under the gift were to be ascertained at the death of the husband.

Held, also (following In re Ham's Trust, 2 Sim. N. S. 106), that there was a lapse as to the share of one of the husband's next of kin, who died in the lifetime of the testatrix.—Williams v. Davies, CH.D. STI., J. 523—44 Ch. D. 484.

34. "Relatives hereinbefore named"—Illegitimate relatives—"Vested transmissible interest."—A. gave legacies to several persons described as his "cousins" for life, and afterwards for their respective children. He also gave legacies to persons nominatim describing them as his "cousins" and "nieces," and then gave the residue of his estate among such of "my relatives hereinbefore named as by virtue of the provisions hereinbefore contained" should become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of his property. Some of the persons described as cousins were descended from illegitimate children of A.'s grandmother. H. was the only legitimate mentioned nominatim who took a vested transmissible interest under the will.

Held, that "relatives hereinbefore named" included persons whom the testator had himself mentioned in his will and described as the children of his "cousins," whether such cousins were in fact cousins in the strict legal sense of the term or not, and although the testator had not mentioned such children by any of their names, and that such children were accordingly entitled to share in the residue as well as H.

Decision of Stirling, J., 38 W. R. 267, reversed.—In re Jodrell, Jodrell v. Seale, C.A. 721—59 L. J. Ch. 538.

35. Remoteness—Legal contingent remainder.—A. devised successive life estates in freehold lands to his daughter A., and to any husband whom she might thereafter marry, with contingent remainders over of the legal estate in the lands to children who might be living at the death of the survivor of A. and such husband.

Held, that the contingent remainders over, though limitations of the legal estate, were void, as obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities.

The application of the rule against perpetuities to legal contingent remainders discussed.

Cole v. Sewell, 2 H. L. Cas. 186, explained and distinguished.—Frost v. Frost, CH.D. KAY, J. 264—13 Ch. D. 246; 59 L. J. Ch. 118; 62 L. T. 25.

36. Remoteness—Power of appointment—Jurisdiction — Originating summons—Ord. 55, r. 3.—A. devised freehold estate to the use of trustees in fee, upon trust to pay the net income to her sister M. for life, and then to M.'s children for life successively in order of age, and after the death of M. and all her children, to the testatrix's sister E. for life, and then to E.'s children for life successively in order of age, and after the death of M. and E. and all their children, the said trustees were to stand seised of the property in trust for such persons and in such manner as the longest liver of M., E., and their children should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, in trust for the testatrix's heir-at-law absolutely. M. and E. having both survived the testatrix, one of M.'s children, who turned out to be the longest liver of M., E., and their children, made a will purporting to appoint the property to a trustee in trust for the appointor's children, and died in 1889. The trustees under the will of the original testatrix having taken out an originating summons for the decision of the question whether they ought to convey the property to their testatrix's heir-at-law or to the appointee under the will of the longest liver,

Held (reversing the decision of Kay, J.), that the case was within ord. 55, r. 3, and that there was jurisdiction to decide it on originating summons.

All the parties were present and requested to have the case on the merits decided,

Held, that the longest liver of M., E., and their children, being not necessarily ascertainable within a life in being and twenty-one years, the power of appointment given to such longest liver was void, and that upon the termination of the life estates given to M., E., and their children, the heir-at-law of the original testatrix was entitled to the property as undisposed of.

37. "Representatives."—Where a gift is given by will to a person and his "representatives," the term "representatives" means executors and administrators, not next of kin, in the absence of any special words in the will to control or restrict such ordinary meaning.

In re Crawford's Trusts, 2 Drew. 230, followed.—In re Ware, Cumberlege v. Cumberlege-Ware, CH.D. STI., J. 767.

38. Securities for money—Lien—Unpaid purchase-money.—A bequest of "all securities for money" includes money due to the testator in respect of which he had a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money.—Callow v. Callow, CH.D. CHI., J. 104—42 Ch. D. 450; 58 L. J. Ch. 698.

39. "Securities for moneys"—Shares in company.—In the absence of clear words in the context, shares in companies will not pass under a bequest of "securities for moneys."—McDonnell v. Morrow, V.C. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 591.

40. Substitutionary gift—Remoteness.—The testatrix gave her residuary estate in trust for all the children of her son H. who should attain the age of twenty-five, or, being daughters, should marry under that age, with a gift over if any child died under twenty-five leaving children who should attain the age of twenty-five, or, being daughters, should marry under that age, to such last-mentioned children in equal shares of the share which their parent would have taken if he or she had attained the age of twenty-five. One son of H. attained the age of twenty-five before the death of the testatrix.

Held, that the gift was void on the ground of remoteness.—King v. Whitten, CH.D. NOR., J.—62 L. T. 391.

41. Tenancy for life—Period of survivorship.—A. bequeathed £3,000 to his executors in trust to apply the interest to the support and maintenance of his son W. during his life. On the death of W. he bequeathed the said £3,000 to be divided equally between his sons B. and M., and his daughter S., or to the survivors or survivor of them attaining the age of twenty-one. All the children attained the age of twenty-one, but S. alone survived W.

Held, that the period of survivorship was the death of the tenancy for life, and that S. was entitled to the whole of the fund.—Shaw v. Shaw, V.C. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 30.

42. Tenancy for life—Portions—Power of settlement.—The testator declared that any tenants for life under his will should on his or their marriage have powers of settling portions.

Held, that the powers of settlement arose on the marriage of a tenant for life, and could be exercised at any subsequent period.—In re Creagh, L.J. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 128.

43. Tenancy for life—Capital—Maintenance—Absolute or limited interest.—Testator gave all his real and personal estate to his wife and J. H., "upon trust to allow my said wife to have the full and entire use and enjoyment thereof for her maintenance during her lifetime"; and he declared that she might, "at any time during her lifetime, sell, lease, mortgage, or otherwise absolutely dispose of all or any part of the said estate for her maintenance, but not by way of testamentary disposition." And he declared that after her death J. H. should call in and convert all his said estate, or the residue then remaining thereof, and stand possessed thereof upon certain trusts mentioned in his will.

Held, that the wife was not absolutely entitled to the capital of the estate, but only to a life interest, with power to resort to the capital during her life for maintenance, but not for any other purpose.—In re Fox, Fox v. Fox, CH.D. STI., J.—62 L. T. 762.

44. Trust for sale—Interest.—A testator gave property to trustees upon trust after his wife's death to sell and retain two sums of £1,000 with interest, together with simple interest thereon at four per cent. from certain dates to the date of retainer, upon certain trusts. He empowered his trustees to post pone the sale of the real estate after his wife's death for any period not exceeding three years, and declared that the net rents and profits of such of his real estate as should not have been sold should be applied as the proceeds of sale would have been. After the widow's death in 1887 the real estate was not sold.

Held, that interest on the two sums of £1,000 was payable at four per cent. from the death of the widow.

Turner v. Buck, 22 W. R. 748, L. R. 18 Eq. 301, distinguished.—Waters v. Boxer, CH.D. KAY, J. 57—42 Ch. D. 517; 58 L. J. Ch. 750.

45. Vesting.—A testator devised his residuary real and personal estate upon trust to pay the income to the widow of testator's son for life, with remainder upon trust "for all the children" of the testator's said son "who being a son or sons shall live to attain twenty-one, or being a daughter or daughters shall marry under twenty-one with their mother's consent, to be divided between them share and share alike." The will contained powers of maintenance and advancement applicable to all children.

Held, that the daughters who attained twenty-one took a vested interest in the fund, although they had not married under that age.—In re Hunt, Davies v. Hetherington, CH.D., CHI. J.—62 L. T. 753.

46. Vesting—"From and after."—The testator gave a house to trustees on trust to permit his daughter E. to receive the rent for life, and "from and after her death" the house was to be held in trust for all E.'s children in equal shares as tenants in common, on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years. E. had only one daughter, who survived her, but died under twenty-one unmarried.

Held, that E.'s daughter did not take a vested interest.—Jobson v. Richardson, CH.D. NOR., J.—44 Ch. D. 154; 59 L. J. Ch. 245; 62 L. T. 148.

47. Vesting—Resulting trust.—A will contained the following words:—"I give and bequeath to my brother E. whatsoever real estate I may die possessed of wheresoever situate, on trust nevertheless to pay thereout" certain specified debts, "and also in trust to pay to each of my sisters M. and G., and to my brother A., as long as they respectively live, the sum of £50 every year by equal quarterly payments." The testator's personalty was bequeathed to E., A., M., and G., and E. was appointed sole executor. The debts specified in the will were paid before the testator's death.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal), that E. took a vested interest, and that the residue of the real estate did not pass by a resulting trust to the heir-at-law.—Croome v. Croome, H.L.—61 L. T. 814.

48. Vesting—Substitutionary gift. — A. left the residue of his estate in trust for his wife for life, and at her death to be equally divided "between our children, A., B., and C., to take what would have been their mother's share, and any other of my grandchildren to represent their parents in similar circumstances." The testator left seven children. A., B., and C. were the children of a daughter who died before the date of the will. Three other children survived their father, but predeceased their mother.

Held, that the children who survived their father, but predeceased their mother, did not take vested interests, but that their interests were devised and bequeathed to their children.—Miles v. Miles, CH.D. KAY, J.—61 L. T. 359.

EXECUTION—

49. Evidence— Interlineations — Codicil — Probate with blanks.—Where the attestation clause in a codicil contains a declaration that some alterations have been made in the codicil before execution, the court may infer that all the alterations were so made.

In the absence of evidence that words written over erasures in a will were added before execution, probate must be granted with blanks wherever the erasures occur if the words erased cannot be ascertained.—Doherty v. Dwyer, P. & D.D. (Ir.)—25 L. R. Ir. 297.

49a. Interlineations—Probate.—A testator wrote out his will in 1885 and signed and dated it, but did not have it attested. He subsequently destroyed all but the last sheet, and wrote out two fresh sheets, which he attached to the said last sheet. He then, in 1888, inked over his signature in the presence of two attesting witnesses, who duly signed their names at the foot of the attestation clause. The testator died in 1889, and after his death the will was found with the name of the residuary legatee altered, and with several other alterations, all being in the testator's own handwriting. There was no evidence as to when these were made The next of kin and heir-at-law concurred in he application of the sole executor for probate. he court admitted the will to proof.—Maule v. Maule, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 702.

50. Separate pages—Execution on first page—Probate.—A.'s will was written on the first and fourth pages of a sheet of notepaper. She made her mark, which was duly attested, at the foot of the first page, but both pages were read over to her, and she used a mark solely in consequence of physical weakness.

The court admitted the whole document to probate. —In the Goods of Ffrench, P. & D.D. (Ir.)—23 L. R. Ir. 433.

51. Undue influence—Burden of proof.—A person who expects a will to be made in his favour ought to take care that the testator obtains proper and independent advice.

The fact that the person who propounds a will under which he benefits is the only person who took instructions for it and caused it to be prepared, throws upon him the burden of proving the testator's entire freedom and capacity.—Parker v. Duncan, P.D. & A.D. —62 L. T. 642

PROBATE—

52. Amendment—Attestation clause—Signature of legatee.—Where a will has been executed in the presence of two witnesses, and, in addition to their signatures, the signature of a third person, who was a legatee under the will, appeared at the foot of the will immediately below their signatures, the court will receive evidence to explain why such signature was written, and, if satisfied that it was not written with the intention to attest the signature of the will, will, on motion after notice to all parties interested, and on their non-appearance, order the name so written at the foot of the will to be omitted from the probate.

In the Goods of Sharman, 17 W. R. 687, L. R. P. D. & A. 661, followed.—In the Goods of Smith, P.D. & A.D. 384—15 P. D. 2; 62 L. T. 183.

53. Codicil—Non-testamentary document.—A. duly executed a will, and subsequently executed a document drawn up by her husband with her concurrence, and beginning with the words, "This is not meant as a legal will, but as a guide."

Held, that the paper was not entitled to probate as a codicil.—Ferguson-Davie v. Ferguson-Davie, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 109.

54. Evidence—Proof of contents of destroyed will.—The plaintiff asked that probate might be pronounced for a non-existent document as the last will of her father, who died in 1877. At his funeral his wife produced a written paper in the form of a will, stating that it was the will of her deceased husband. By it she took a life interest in her husband's property, which at her death was to be divided among the children of the marriage. The document was subscribed with three names, one of which purported to be that of the deceased, written in his own handwriting. The two other names were signatures of the attesting witnesses. The widow continued to occupy the freehold house and land where the deceased had lived (and which was the only property left by him) until her own death, which occurred in July, 1885. She never took any steps to prove what she had alleged to be the will of her late husband, and at her death the paper produced at the funeral was not forthcoming. The plaintiff propounded that document, and pleaded that, although it had disappeared, the court ought to grant probate of it. No attempt had been made to show that the paper bore any date whatever, or that it contained an attestation clause to the names of the two witnesses.

Butt, J., pronounced for the paper, the contents of which had been proved in the course of the trial. On appeal, Held (dissentiente Cotton, L.J.), that the decision of Butt, J., was justifiable, having regard to the circumstances.—Harris v. Knight, C.A.—62 L. T. 507.

55. Married woman—Power of appointment—Deed poll.—A., by an ante-nuptial settlement, settled her property on such trusts as she should by revocable deed or will appoint. In 1884 she executed a will not expressly referring to the settled property. In 1887 and 1889 she executed two revocable deed polls, which were duly attested, and by which she appointed the settled property upon certain trusts after her death.

Held, that the will and two deed polls were entitled to probate.—Milnes v. Foden, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 105.

56. Two wills—Foreign property—Incorporation.

—A domiciled Englishman made and duly executed in England two wills on the same day, one disposing of his African, the other of his English property, and named separate executors in each. Each will was distinct, and excluded the property dealt with in the other.

On the application of the executors of the English will, and with the consent of the persons entitled in case of intestacy, the court granted probate of the English will alone, with a note that an authenticated copy of the African will had been deposited in the registry.

REVOCATION—

57. Destruction by third person—Ratification—Probate—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 20.—The will of the testatrix was destroyed by one of her relatives in her presence, but without her consent. The testatrix afterwards said that she could not bring her mind to make a new will, but added "let it remain as it is."

Held, that there was not sufficient evidence of ratification of the destruction of the will, and that a copy of it might be admitted to probate.—Mills v. Millward, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 20; 61 L. T. 651.

58. Marriage—Power of appointment—Administration—Will annexed—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 18.—A. by his will bequeathed all the real and personal estate to which he might be entitled upon his death, or over which he might have a power of appointment, to B., whom he appointed sole executrix. He afterwards married B., and died without executing another will. The property over which he had a power of appointment under his mother's will would, if the power was unexercised, have been divided between his brothers and sisters.

Held, that so much of the will as was an execution of the power of appointment was within section 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, and was not revoked by the marriage, and that the widow was entitled to a grant of administration with the will annexed, limited to such property.—In the Goods of Russell, P.D. & A.D.—15 P. D. 111; 62 L. T. 644.

59. Tearing.—A. executed a will in 1881, which was revoked by another will executed in 1884. The later will was found with the signatures of the attesting witnesses torn off. The executor propounded the earlier will, alleging revocation of the second will. The execution of the later will was not proved.

The court pronounced for the first will.—Grubb v. Grubb, P.D. & A.D.—62 L. T. 644.
